Charles II, bon homme, le dédaigna. Le bonheur de l'Angleterre sous Charles Il était plus que du bonheur, c'était de l'enchantement. Une restauration, c'est un ancien tableau pouss au noir qu'on revernit; tout le passé reparaît. Les bonnes vieilles moeurs faisaient leur rentrée, les jolies femmes régnaient et gouvernaient. Evelyn en a pris note; on lit dans son journal: «Luxure, profanation, mépris de Dieu. J'ai vu un dimanche soir le roi avec ses filles de joie, la Portsmouth, la Cleveland, la Mazarin, et deux ou trois autres; toutes à peu près nues dans la galerie du jeu.» On sent percer quelque humeur dans cette peinture; mais Evelyn était un puritain grognon, entaché de rêverie républicaine. Il n'appréciait pas le profitable exemple que donnent les rois par ces grandes gaîtés babyloniennes qui, en définitive, alimentent le luxe. Il ne comprenait pas l'utilit des vices. Règle: N'extirpez point les vices, si vous voulez avoir des femmes charmantes. Autrement vous ressembleriez aux imbéciles qui détruisent les chenilles tout en raffolant des papillons.

Charles II, nous venons de le dire, s'aperçut à peine qu'il existait un réfractaire appelé Clancharlie, mais Jacques II fut plus attentif. Charles II gouvernait mollement, c'était sa manière; disons qu'il n'en gouvernait pas plus mal. Un marin quelquefois fait à un cordage destiné à maîtriser le vent un noeud lâche qu'il laisse serrer par le vent. Telle est la bêtise de l'ouragan, et du peuple.

Ce noeud large, devenu très vite noeud étroit, ce fut le gouvernement de Charles II.

Sous Jacques II, l'étranglement commença. Étranglement nécessaire de ce qui restait de la révolution. Jacques II eut l'ambition louable d'être un roi efficace. Le règne de Charles II n'était à ses yeux qu'une ébauche de restauration; Jacques II voulut un retour à l'ordre plus complet encore. Il avait, en 1660, déploré qu'on se fût borné à une pendaison de dix régicides. Il fut un plus réel reconstructeur de l'autorité. Il donna vigueur aux principes sérieux; il fit régner cette justice qui est la véritable, qui se met au-dessus des déclamations sentimentales, et qui se préoccupe avant tout des intérêts de la société. A ces sévérités protectrices, on reconnaît le père de l'état. Il confia la main de justice à Jeffreys, et l'épée Kirke. Kirke multipliait les exemples. Ce colonel utile fit un jour pendre et dépendre trois fois de suite le même homme, un républicain, lui demandant à chaque fois: — Abjures-tu la république? Le scélérat ayant toujours dit non, fut achevé. — Je l'ai pendu quatre fois, dit Kirke satisfait. Les supplices recommencés sont un grand signe de force dans le pouvoir. Lady Lyle, qui pourtant avait envoyé son fils en guerre contre Monmouth, mais qui avait caché chez elle deux rebelles, fut mise à mort. Un autre rebelle, ayant eu l'honnêteté de déclarer qu'une femme anabaptiste lui avait donné asile, eût sa grâce, et la femme fut brûlée vive. Kirke, un autre jour, fit comprendre une ville qu'il la savait républicaine en pendant dix-neuf bourgeois. Représailles bien légitimes, certes, quand on songe que sous Cromwell on coupait le nez et les oreilles aux saints de pierre dans les églises. Jacques II, qui avait su choisir Jeffreys et Kirke, était un prince imbu de vraie religion, il se mortifiait par la laideur de ses maîtresses, il écoutait le père la Colombière, ce prédicateur qui était presque aussi onctueux que le père Cheminais, mais avec plus de feu, et qui eut la gloire d'être dans la première moitié de sa vie le conseiller de Jacques II, et dans la seconde l'inspirateur de Marie Alacoque.

C'est grâce à cette forte nourriture religieuse que plus tard Jacques II put supporter dignement l'exil et donner dans sa retraite de Saint-Germain le spectacle d'un roi supérieur l'adversité, touchant avec calme les écrouelles, et conversant avec des jésuites.

On comprend qu'un tel roi dut, dans une certaine mesure, se préoccuper d'un rebelle comme lord Linnaeus Clancharlie. Les pairies héréditairement transmissibles contenant une certaine quantité d'avenir, il était évident que, s'il y avait quelque précaution à prendre du côté de ce lord, Jacques II n'hésiterait pas.

II

LORD DAVID DIRRY-MOIR

Lord Linnaeus Clancharlie n’avait pas toujours été vieux et proscrit. Il avait eu sa phase de jeunesse et de passion. On sait, par Harrison et Pride, que Cromwell jeune avait aimé les femmes et le plaisir, ce qui, parfois (autre aspect de la question femme), annonce un séditieux. Défiez-vous de la ceinture mal attachée. Male praecinctum juvenem cavete.

Lord Clancharlie avait eu, comme Cromwell, ses incorrections et ses irrégularités. On lui connaissait un enfant naturel, un fils. Ce fils, venu au monde à l’instant où la république finissait, était né en Angleterre pendant que son père partait pour l’exil. C’est pourquoi il n’avait jamais vu ce père qu’il avait. Ce bâtard de lord Clancharlie avait grandi page à la cour de Charles II. On l’appelait lord David Dirry-Moir; il était lord de courtoisie, sa mère étant femme de qualité. Cette mère, pendant que lord Clancharlie devenait hibou en Suisse, prit le parti, étant belle, de bouder moins, et se fit pardonner ce premier amant sauvage par un deuxième, celui-là incontestablement apprivoisé, et même royaliste, car c’était le roi. Elle fut un peu la maîtresse de Charles II, assez pour que sa majesté, charmée d’avoir repris cette jolie femme à la république, donnât au petit lord David, fils de sa conquête, une commission de garde de la branche. Ce qui fit ce bâtard officier, avec bouche en cour, et par contre-coup stuartiste ardent. Lord David fut quelque temps, comme garde de la branche, un des cent soixante-dix portant la grosse épée; puis il entra dans la bande des pensionnaires, et fut un des quarante qui portent la pertuisane dorée. Il eut en outre, étant de cette troupe noble instituée par Henri VIII pour garder son corps, le privilège de poser les plats sur la table du roi. Ce fut ainsi que, tandis que son père blanchissait en exil, lord David prospéra sous Charles II.

Après quoi il prospéra sous Jacques II.

Le roi est mort, vive le roi, c’est le non deficit alter, aureus.

Ce fut à cet avénement du duc d’York qu’il obtint la permission de s’appeler lord David Dirry-Moir, d’une seigneurie que sa mère, qui venait de mourir, lui avait léguée dans cette grande forêt d’Ecosse où l’on trouve l’oiseau Krag, lequel creuse son nid avec son bec dans le tronc des chênes

II

Jacques II était un roi, et avait la prétention d’être un général. Il aimait à s’entourer de jeunes officiers. Il se montrait volontiers en public à cheval avec un casque et une cuirasse, et une vaste perruque débordante sortant de dessous le casque par-dessus la cuirasse; espèce de statue équestre de la guerre imbécile. Il prit en amitié la bonne grâce du jeune lord David. Il sut gré à ce royaliste d’être fils d’un républicain; un père renié ne nuit point à une fortune de cour qui commence.

Le roi fit lord David gentilhomme de la chambre du lit, à mille livres de gages.

C’était un bel avancement. Un gentilhomme du lit couche toutes les nuits près du roi sur un lit qu’on dresse. On est douze gentilshommes, et l’on se relaie.

Lord David, dans ce poste, fut le chef de l’avenier du roi, celui qui donne l’avoine aux chevaux et qui a deux cent soixante livres de gages. Il eut sous lui les cinq cochers du roi, les cinq postillons du roi, les cinq palefreniers du roi, les douze valets de pied du roi, et les quatre porteurs de chaise du roi. Il eut le gouvernement des six chevaux de course que le roi entretient Haymarket et qui coûtent six cents livres par an à sa majesté.

Il fit la pluie et le beau temps dans la garde-robe du roi, laquelle fournit les habits de cérémonie aux chevaliers de la Jarretière. Il fut salué jusqu’à terre par l’huissier de la verge noire, qui est au roi. Cet huissier, sous Jacques II, était le chevalier Duppa. Lord David eut les respects de M.
Baker, qui était clerc de la couronne, et de M. Brown, qui était clerc du parlement. La cour d’Angleterre, magnifique, est un patron d’hospitalité. Lord David présida, comme l’un des douze, aux tables et réceptions. Il eut la gloire d’être debout derrière le roi les jours d’offrande, quand le roi donne l’église le besant d’or, byzantium, les jours de collier, quand le roi porte le collier de son ordre, et les jours de communion, quand personne ne communie, hors le roi et les princes. Ce fut lui qui, le jeudi saint, introduisit près de sa majesté les douze pauvres auxquels le roi donne autant de sous d’argent qu’il a d’années de vie et autant de shellings qu’il a d’années de règne.

Il eut la fonction, quand le roi était malade, d'appeler, pour assister sa majesté, les deux grooms de l'aumônerie qui sont prêtres, et d'empêcher les médecins d'approcher sans permission du conseil d'état. De plus, il fut lieutenant-colonel du régiment écossais de la garde royale, lequel bat la marche d'Ecosse.

En cette qualité il fit plusieurs campagnes, et très glorieusement, car il était vaillant homme de guerre. C'était un seigneur brave, bien fait, beau, généreux, fort grand de mine et de manières. Sa personne ressemblait à sa qualité. Il était de haute taille comme de haute naissance.

Il fut presque un moment en passe d'être nommé groom of the stole, ce qui lui eût donné le privilège de passer la chemise au roi; mais il faut pour cela être prince ou pair.

Créer un pair, c'est beaucoup. C'est créer une pairie, cela fait des jaloux. C'est une faveur; une faveur fait au roi un ami et cent ennemis, sans compter que l'ami devient ingrat. Jacques II, par politique, créait difficilement des pairies, mais les transférait volontiers. Une pairie transférée ne produit pas d'émoi. C'est simplement un nom qui continue. La lordship en est peu troublée.

La bonne volonté royale ne répugnait point à introduire lord David Dirry-Moir dans la chambre haute, pourvu que ce fut par la porte d'une pairie substituée. Sa majesté ne demandait pas mieux que d'avoir une occasion de faire David Dirry-Moir, de lord de courtoisie, lord de droit.

III

Cette occasion se présenta.

Un jour on apprit qu'il était arrivé au vieil absent, lord Linnaeus Clancharlie, diverses choses dont la principale était qu'il était trépassé. La mort a cela de bon pour les gens, qu'elle fait un peu parler d'eux. On raconta ce qu'on savait, ou ce qu'on croyait savoir, des dernières années de lord Linnaeus.

Conjectures et légendes probablement. A en croire ces récits, sans doute très hasardés, vers la fin de sa vie, lord Clancharlie aurait eu une recrudescence républicaine telle, qu'il en était venu, affirmait-on, jusqu'à épouser, étrange entêtement de l'exil, la fille d'un régicide, Ann Bradshaw, — on précisait le nom, — laquelle était morte aussi, mais, disait-on, en mettant au monde un enfant, un garçon, qui, si tous ces détails étaient exacts, se trouverait être le fils légitime et l'héritier légal de lord

Clancharlie. Ces dires, fort vagues, ressemblaient plutôt à des bruits qu'à des faits. Ce qui se passait en Suisse était pour l'Angleterre d'alors aussi lointain que ce qui se passe en Chine pour l'Angleterre d'aujourd'hui. Lord Clancharlie aurait eu cinquante-neuf ans au moment de son mariage, et soixante à la naissance de son fils, et serait mort fort peu de temps après, laissant derrière lui cet enfant, orphelin de père et de mère. Possibilités, sans doute, mais invraisemblances. On ajoutait que cet enfant était «beau comme le jour», ce qui se lit dans tous les contes de fées. Le roi Jacques mit fin à ces rumeurs, évidemment sans fondement aucun, en déclarant un beau matin lord David Dirry-Moir unique et définitif héritier, défaut d'enfant légitime, et par le bon plaisir royal, de lord Linnæus Clancharlie, son père naturel, l'absence de toute autre filiation et descendance étant constatée; de quoi les patentes furent enregistrées en chambre des lords. Par ces patentes, le roi substituait lord David Dirry-Moir aux titres, droits et prérogatives dudit défunt lord Linnæus Glancharlie, à la seule condition que lord David épouserait, quand elle serait nubile, une fille, en ce moment-là tout enfant et âgée de quelques mois seulement, que le roi avait au berceau faite duchesse, on ne savait trop pourquoi. Lisez, si vous voulez, on savait trop pourquoi. On appelait cette petite la duchesse Josiane.

La mode anglaise était alors aux noms espagnols. Un des bâtards de Charles II s'appelait Carlos, comte de Plymouth. Il est probable que Josiane était la contraction de Josefa y Ana.

Cependant peut-être y avait-il Josiane comme il y avait Josias.

Un des gentilshommes de Henri III se nommait Josias du Passage.

C'est à cette petite duchesse que le roi donnait la pairie de Clancharlie. Elle était pairesse en attendant qu'il y eût un pair. Le pair serait son mari. Cette pairie reposait sur une double châtellenie, la baronnie de Clancharlie et la baronnie de Hunkerville; en outre les lords Clancharlie étaient, en récompense d'un ancien fait d'armes et par permission royale, marquis de Corleone en Sicile. Les pairs d'Angleterre ne peuvent porter de titres étrangers; il y a pourtant des exceptions; ainsi Henry Arundel, baron Arundel de Wardour, était, ainsi que lord Clifford, comte du Saint-Empire, dont lord Cowper est prince; le duc de Hamilton est en France duc de Chatellerault; Basil Feilding, comte de Denbigh, est en Allemagne comte de Hapsbourg, de Lauffenbourg et de Rheinfelden. Le duc de Malborough était prince de Mindelheim en Souabe, de même que le duc de Wellington était prince de Waterloo en Belgique. Le même lord Wellington était duc espagnol de Ciudad-Rodrigo, et comte portugais de Vimeira.

Il y avait en Angleterre, et il y a encore, des terres nobles et des terres roturières. Les terres des lords Clancharlie étaient toutes nobles. Ces terres, châteaux, bourgs, bailliages, fiefs, rentes, alleux et domaines adhérents à la pairie Clancharlie-Hunkerville appartenaient provisoirement à lady Josiane, et le roi déclarait qu'une fois Josiane épousée, lord David Dirry-Moir serait baron Clancharlie.

Outre l'héritage Clancharlie, lady Josiane avait sa fortune personnelle. Elle possédait de grands biens, dont plusieurs venaient des dons de Madame sans queue au duc d'York. Madame sans queue, cela veut dire Madame tout court. On appelait ainsi Henriette d'Angleterre, duchesse d'Orléans, la première femme de France après la reine.

IV

Après avoir prospéré sous Charles et Jacques, lord David prospéra sous Guillaume. Son jacobisme n'alla point jusqu'à suivre Jacques II en exil. Tout en continuant d'aimer son roi légitime, il eut le bon sens de servir l'usurpateur. Il était, du reste, quoique avec quelque indiscipline, excellent officier; il passa de l'armée de terre dans l'armée de mer, et se distingua dans l'escadre blanche. Il y devint ce qu'on appelait alors «capitaine de frégate légère». Cela finit par faire un très galant homme, poussant fort loin l'élégance des vices, un peu poète comme tout le monde, bon serviteur de l'état, bon domestique du prince, assidu aux fêtes, aux galas, aux petits levers, aux cérémonies, aux batailles, servile comme il faut, très hautain, ayant la vue basse ou perçante selon l'objet regarder, probe volontiers, obséquieux et arrogant à propos, d'un premier mouvement franc et sincère, quitte à se remasquer ensuite, très observateur de la bonne et mauvaise humeur royale, insouciant devant une pointe d'épée, toujours prêt à risquer sa vie sur un signe de sa majesté avec héroïsme et platitude, capable de toutes les incartades et d'aucune impolitesse, homme de courtoisie et d'étiquette, fier d'être à genoux dans les grandes occasions monarchiques, d'une vaillance gaie, courtisan en dessus, paladin en dessous, tout jeune à quarante-cinq ans.

Lord David chantait des chansons françaises, gaîté élégante qui avait plu à Charles II.

Il aimait l’éloquence et le beau langage. Il admirait fort ces boniments célèbres qu’on appelle les Oraisons funèbres de Bossuet.

Du côté de sa mère, il avait à peu près de quoi vivre, environ dix mille livres sterling de revenu, c’est-à-dire deux cent cinquante mille francs de rente. Il s’en tirait en faisant des dettes. En magnificence, extravagance et nouveauté, il était incomparable. Dès qu’on le copiait, il changeait sa mode. A cheval, il portait des bottes aisées de vache retournée, avec éperons. Il avait des chapeaux que personne n’avait, des dentelles inouïes, et des rabats à lui tout seul.

LA DUCHESSE JOSIANE

I

Vers 1705, bien que lady Josiane eût vingt-trois ans et lord David quarante-quatre, le mariage n'avait pas encore eu lieu, et cela par les meilleures raisons du monde. Se haïssaient-ils?

loin de là. Mais ce qui ne peut vous échapper n'inspire aucune hâte. Josiane voulait rester libre; David voulait rester jeune.

N'avoir de lien que le plus tard possible, cela lui semblait un prolongement du bel âge. Les jeunes hommes retardataires abondaient dans ces époques galantes; on grisonnait dameret; la perruque était complice, plus tard la poudre fut auxiliaire. A cinquante-cinq ans, lord Charles Gerrard, baron Gerrard des Gerrards de Bromley, remplissait Londres de ses bonnes fortunes.

La jolie et jeune duchesse de Buckingham, comtesse de Coventry, faisait des folies d'amour pour les soixante-sept ans du beau Thomas Bellasyse, vicomte Falcomberg. On citait les vers fameux de Corneille septuagénaire à une femme de vingt ans: Marquise, si mon visage. Les femmes aussi avaient des succès d'automne, témoin Ninon et Marion. Tels étaient les modèles.

Josiane et David étaient en coquetterie avec une nuance particulière. Ils ne s'aimaient pas, ils se plaisaient. Se côtoyer leur suffisait. Pourquoi se dépêcher d'en finir? Les romans d'alors poussaient les amoureux et les fiancés à ce genre de stage qui était du plus bel air. Josiane, en outre, se sachant bâtarde, se sentait princesse, et le prenait de haut avec les arrangements quelconques. Elle avait du goût pour lord David. Lord David était beau, mais c'était pardessus le marché.

Elle le trouvait élégant.

Être élégant, c'est tout. Caliban élégant et magnifique distance Ariel pauvre. Lord David était beau, tant mieux; l'écueil d'être beau, c'est d'être fade; il ne l'était pas. Il pariait, boxait, s'endettait. Josiane faisait grand cas de ses chevaux, de ses chiens, de ses perles au jeu, de ses maîtresses. Lord David de son côté subissait la fascination de la duchesse Josiane, fille sans tache et sans scrupule, altière, inaccessible et hardie. Il lui adressait des sonnets que Josiane lisait quelquefois. Dans ces sonnets, il affirmait que posséder Josiane, ce serait monter jusqu'aux astres, ce qui ne l'empêchait pas de toujours remettre cette ascension à l'an prochain. Il faisait antichambre à la porte du coeur de Josiane, et cela leur convenait à tous les deux. A la cour on admirait le suprême bon goût de cet ajournement. Lady Josiane disait: C'est ennuyeux que je sois forcée d'épouser lord David, moi qui ne demanderais pas mieux que d'être amoureuse de lui!

Josiane, c'était la chair. Rien de plus magnifique. Elle était très grande, trop grande. Ses cheveux étaient de cette nuance qu'on pourrait nommer le blond pourpre. Elle était grasse, fraîche, robuste, vermeille, avec énormément d'audace et d'esprit. Elle avait les yeux trop intelligibles. D'amant, point; de chasteté, pas davantage. Elle se murait dans l'orgueil. Les hommes, fi donc! un dieu tout au plus était digne d'elle; ou un monstre. Si la vertu consiste dans l'escarpement, Josiane était toute la vertu possible, sans aucune innocence. Elle n'avait pas d'aventures, par dédain; mais on ne l'eût point fâchée de lui en supposer, pourvu qu'elles fussent étranges et proportionnées à une personne faite comme elle. Elle tenait peu à sa réputation et beaucoup à sa gloire. Sembler facile et être impossible, voilà le chef-d'oeuvre. Josiane se sentait majesté et matière. C'était une beauté encombrante.

Elle empiétait plus qu'elle ne charmait. Elle marchait sur les coeurs. Elle était terrestre. On l'eut aussi étonnée de lui montrer une âme dans sa poitrine que de lui faire voir des ailes sur son dos. Elle dissertait sur Locke. Elle avait de la politesse. On la soupçonnait de savoir l'arabe.

Être la chair et être la femme, c'est deux. Où la femme est vulnérable, au côté pitié, par exemple, qui devient si aisément amour, Josiane ne l'était pas. Non qu'elle fût insensible.

L'antique comparaison de la chair avec le marbre est absolument fausse. La beauté de la chair, c'est de n'être point marbre; c'est de palpiter, c'est de trembler, c'est de rougir, c'est de saigner; c'est d'avoir la fermeté sans avoir la dureté; c'est d'être blanche sans être froide; c'est d'avoir ses tressaillements et ses infirmités; c'est d'être la vie, et le marbre est la mort. La chair, à un certain degré de beauté, a presque le droit de nudité; elle se couvre d'éblouissement comme d'un voile; qui eût vu Josiane nue n'aurait aperçu ce modelé qu' travers une dilatation lumineuse. Elle se fût montrée volontiers à un satyre, ou à un eunuque. Elle avait l'aplomb mythologique.

Faire de sa nudité un supplice, éluder un Tantale, l’eût amusée.

Le roi l’avait faite duchesse, et Jupiter néréide. Double irradiation dont se composait la clarté étrange de cette créature, A l’admirer on se sentait devenir païen et laquais.

Son origine, c’était la bâtardise et l’océan. Elle semblait sortir d’une écume. A vau-l’eau avait été le premier jet de sa destinée, mais dans le grand milieu royal. Elle avait en elle de la vague, du hasard, de la seigneurie, et de la tempête. Elle était lettrée et savante. Jamais une passion ne l’avait approchée, et elle les avait sondées toutes. Elle avait le dégoût des réalisations, et le goût aussi. Si elle se fût poignardée, ce n’eût été, comme Lucrèce, qu’après. Toutes les corruptions, à l’état visionnaire, étaient dans cette vierge.

C’était une Astarté possible dans une Diane réelle. Elle était, par insolence de haute naissance, provocante et inabordable.

Pourtant elle pouvait trouver divertissant de s’arranger elle-même une chute. Elle habitait une gloire dans un nimbe avec la velléité d’en descendre, et peut-être avec la curiosité d’en tomber. Elle était un peu lourde pour son nuage. Faillir plaît.

Le sans-gêne princier donne un privilège d’essai, et une personne ducale s’amuse où une bourgeoise se perdrait. Josiane était en tout, par la naissance, par la beauté, par l’ironie, par la lumière, à peu près reine. Elle avait eu un moment d’enthousiasme pour Louis de Boufflers qui cassait un fer cheval entre ses doigts. Elle regrettait qu’Hercule fût mort.

Elle vivait dans on ne sait quelle attente d’un idéal lascif et suprême.

Au moral, Josiane faisait penser au vers de l’épître aux Pisons: Desinit in piscem.

Un beau torse de femme en hydre se termine.

C’était une noble poitrine, un sein splendide harmonieusement soulevé par un coeur royal, un vivant et clair regard, une figure pure et hautaine, et, qui sait? ayant sous l’eau, dans la transparence entrevue et trouble, un prolongement ondoyant, surnaturel, peut-être draconien et difforme. Vertu superbe achevée en vices dans la profondeur des rêves.

II

Avec cela, précieuse.

C’était la mode.

Qu’on se rappelle Élisabeth.

Elisabeth est un type qui, en Angleterre, a dominé trois siècles, le seizième, le dix-septième et le dix-huitième. Élisabeth est plus qu'une anglaise, c'est une anglicane. De là le respect profond de l'église épiscopale pour cette reine; respect ressenti par l'église catholique, qui la mélangeait d'un peu d'excommunication. Dans la bouche de Sixte-Quint anathématisant Elisabeth, la malédiction tourne au madrigal. Un gran cervello di principessa, dit-il. Marie Stuart, moins occupée de la question église et plus occupée de la question femme, était peu respectueuse pour sa soeur Élisabeth et lui écrivait de reine reine et de coquette à prude: «Votre esloignement du mariage provient de ce que vous ne voulez perdre liberté de vous faire faire l'amour.» Marie Stuart jouait de l'éventail et Elisabeth de la hache. Partie inégale. Du reste toutes deux rivalisaient en littérature. Marie Stuart faisait des vers français; Élisabeth traduisait Horace. Elisabeth, laide, se décrétait belle, aimait les quatrains et les acrostiches, se faisait présenter les clefs des villes par des cupidons, pinçait la lèvre à l'italienne et roulait la prunelle à l'espagnole, avait dans sa garde-robe trois mille habits et toilettes, dont plusieurs costumes de Minerve et d'Amphitrite, estimait les irlandais pour la largeur de leurs épaules, couvrait son vertugadin de paillons et de passequilles, adorait les roses, jurait, sacrait, trépignait, cognait du poing ses filles d'honneur, envoyait au diable Dudley, battait le chancelier Burleigh, qui pleurait, la vieille bête, crachait sur Mathew, colletait Hatton, souffletait Essex, montrait sa cuisse Bassompierre, était vierge.

Ce qu'elle avait fait pour Bassompierre, la reine de Saba l'avait fait pour Salomon. Donc, c'était correct, l'écriture sainte ayant créé le précédent. Ce qui est biblique peut être anglican.

Le précédent biblique va même jusqu'à faire un enfant qui s'appelle Ebnehaquem ou Melilechet, c'est-à-dire le Fils du Sage.

Regina Saba coram rege crura denudavit. Schicklardus In Prooemio Tarich. Jersici F. 65.

Pourquoi pas ces moeurs? Cynisme vaut bien hypocrisie.

Aujourd'hui l'Angleterre, qui a un Loyola appelé Wesley, baisse un peu les yeux devant ce passé. Elle en est contrariée, mais fière.

Dans ces moeurs-là, le goût du difforme existait, particulièrement chez les femmes, et singulièrement chez les belles. A quoi bon être belle, si l'on n'a pas un magot? Que sert d'être reine, si l'on n'est pas tutoyée par un poussah?

Marie Stuart avait eu des «bontés» pour un cron, Rizzio.
Marie-Thérèse d'Espagne avait été «un peu familière» avec un nègre. D'où l'abbesse noire. Dans les alcôves du grand siècle la bosse était bien portée; témoin le maréchal de Luxembourg.

Et avant Luxembourg, Condé, «ce petit homme tant joli».

Les belles elles-mêmes pouvaient, sans inconvénient, être contrefaites. C'était accepté. Anne de Boleyn avait un sein plus gros que l'autre, six doigts à une main, et une surdent. La Vallière était bancale. Cela n'empêcha pas Henri VIII d'être insensé et Louis XIV d'être éperdu.

Au moral, mêmes déviations. Presque pas de femme dans les hauts rangs qui ne fût un cas tératologique. Agnès contenait Mélusine.
On était femme le jour et goule la nuit. On allait en grève baiser sur le pieu de fer des têtes fraîches coupées. Marguerite de Valois, une aïeule des précieuses, avait porté à sa ceinture sous cadenas, dans des boîtes de fer-blanc cousues à son corps de jupe, tous les coeurs de ses amants morts.
Henri IV s'était caché sous ce vertugadin-là.

Au dix-huitième siècle la duchesse de Berry, fille du régent, résuma toutes ces créatures dans un type obscène et royal.

En outre les belles dames savaient le latin. C'était, depuis le seizième siècle, une grâce féminine. Jane Grey avait pouss l'élégance jusqu'à savoir l'hébreu.

La duchesse Josiane latinisait. De plus, autre belle manière, elle était catholique. En secret, disons-le, et plutôt comme son oncle Charles II que comme son père Jacques II. Jacques, à son catholicisme, avait perdu sa royauté, et Josiane ne voulait point risquer sa pairie. C'est pourquoi, catholique dans l'intimité et entre raffinés et raffinées, elle était protestante extérieure.
Pour la canaille.

Cette façon d'entendre la religion est agréable; on jouit de tous les biens attachés à l'église officielle épiscopale, et plus tard on meurt, comme Grotius, en odeur de catholicisme, et l'on a la gloire que le père Petau dise une messe pour vous.

Quoique grasse et bien portante, Josiane était, insistons-y, une précieuse parfaite.

Par moments, sa façon dormante et voluptueuse de traîner la fin des phrases imitait les allongements de pattes d'une tigresse marchant dans les jongles.

L’utilité d’être précieuse, c’est que cela déclasse le genre humain. On ne lui fait plus l’honneur d’en être.

Avant tout, mettre l’espèce humaine à distance, voilà ce qui importe.

Quand on n’a pas l’olympe, on prend l’hôtel de Rambouillet.

Junon se résout en Araminte. Une prétention de divinité non admise crée la mijaurée. A défaut de coups de tonnerre, on a l’impertinence. Le temple se ratatine en boudoir. Ne pouvant être déesse, on est idole.

Il y a en outre dans le précieux une certaine pédanterie qui plaît aux femmes.

La coquette et le pédant sont deux voisins. Leur adhérence est visible dans le fat.

Le subtil dérive du sensuel. La gourmandise affecte la délicatesse. Une grimace dégoûtée sied à la convoitise,

Et puis le côté faible de la femme se sent gardé par toute cette casuistique de la galanterie qui tient lieu de scrupules aux précieuses. C’est une circonvallation avec fossé. Toute précieuse a un air de répugnance. Cela protège.

On consentira, mais on méprise. En attendant.

Josiane avait un for intérieur inquiétant. Elle se sentait une telle pente à l’impudeur qu’elle était bégueule. Les reculs de fierté en sens inverse de nos vices nous mènent aux vices contraires. L’excès d’effort pour être chaste la faisait prude.

Être trop sur la défensive, cela indique un secret désir d’attaque. Qui est farouche n’est pas sévère.

Elle s’enfermait dans l’exception arrogante de son rang et de sa naissance, tout en préméditant peut-être, nous l’avons dit, quelque brusque sortie.

On était à l’aurore du dix-huitième siècle. L’Angleterre ébauchait ce qui a été en France la régence. Walpole et Dubois se tiennent. Marlborough se battait contre son ex-roi Jacques II auquel il avait, disait-on, vendu sa soeur Churchill. On voyait briller Bolingbroke et poindre Richelieu. La galanterie trouvait commode une certaine mêlée des rangs; le plain-pied se faisait par les vices. Il devait se faire plus tard par les idées.

L’encanaillement, prélude aristocratique, commençait ce que la révolution devait achever. On n’était pas très loin de Jélyotte publiquement assis en plein jour sur le lit de la marquise d’Épinay. Il est vrai, car les moeurs se font écho, que le seizième siècle avait vu le bonnet de nuit de Smeton sur l’oreiller d’Anne de Boleyn.

Si femme signifie faute, comme je ne sais plus quel concile l’a affirmé, jamais la femme n’a plus été femme qu’en ces temps-là.

Jamais, couvrant sa fragilité de son charme, et sa faiblesse de sa toute-puissance, elle ne s’est plus impérieusement fait absoudre. Faire du fruit défendu le fruit permis, c’est la chute d’Eve; mais faire du fruit permis le fruit défendu, c’est son triomphe. Elle finit par là. Au dix-huitième siècle, la femme tire le verrou sur le mari. Elle s’enferme dans l’éden avec Satan. Adam est dehors.

Tous les instincts de Josiane inclinaient plutôt à se donner galamment qu’à se donner légalement. Se donner par galanterie implique de la littérature, rappelle Ménalque et Amaryllis, et est presque une action docte.

Mademoiselle de Scudéry, l’attrait de la laideur pour la laideur mis à part, n’avait pas eu d’autre motif pour céder à Pélisson.

La fille souveraine et la femme sujette, telles sont les vieilles coutumes anglaises. Josiane différait le plus qu’elle pouvait l’heure de cette sujétion. Qu’il fallût en venir au mariage avec lord David, puisque le bon plaisir royal l’exigeait, c’était une nécessité sans doute, mais quel dommage! Josiane agréait et éconduisait lord David. Il y avait entre eux accord tacite pour ne point conclure et pour ne point rompre. Ils s’éludaient.

Cette façon de s’aimer, avec un pas en avant et deux pas en arrière, est exprimée par les danses du temps, le menuet et la gavotte. Être des gens mariés, cela ne va pas à l’air du visage, cela fane les rubans qu’on porte, cela vieillit. L’épousaille, solution désolante de clarté. La livraison d’une femme par un notaire, quelle platitude! La brutalité du mariage crée des situations définitives, supprime la volonté, tue le choix, a une syntaxe comme la grammaire, remplace l’inspiration par l’orthographe, fait de l’amour une dictée, met en déroute le mystérieux de la vie, inflige la transparence aux fonctions périodiques et fatales, ôte du nuage l’aspect en chemise de la femme, donne des droits diminuants pour qui les exerce comme pour qui les subit, dérange par un penchement de balance tout d’un côté le charmant équilibre du sexe robuste et du sexe puissant, de la force et de la beauté, et fait ici un maître et là une servante, tandis que, hors du mariage, il y a un esclave et une reine. Prosaïser le lit jusqu’à le rendre décent, conçoit-on rien de plus grossier? Qu'il n'y ait plus de mal du tout s'aimer, est-ce assez bête!

Lord David mûrissait. Quarante ans, c'est une heure qui sonne.

Il ne s'en apercevait pas. Et de fait il avait toujours l'air de ses trente ans. Il trouvait plus amusant de désirer Josiane que de la posséder. Il en possédait d'autres; il avait des femmes.

Josiane, de son côté, avait des songes.

Les songes étaient pires.

La duchesse Josiane avait cette particularité, moins rare du reste qu'on ne croit, qu'un de ses yeux était bleu et l'autre noir. Ses prunelles étaient faites d'amour et de haine, de bonheur et de malheur. Le jour et la nuit étaient mêlés dans son regard.

Son ambition était ceci: se montrer capable de l'impossible.

Un jour elle avait dit à Swift:

— Vous vous figurez, vous autres, que votre mépris existe.

Vous autres, c'était le genre humain.

Elle était papiste à fleur de peau. Son catholicisme ne dépassait point la quantité nécessaire pour l'élégance. Ce serait du puséysme aujourd'hui. Elle portait de grosses robes de velours, ou de satin, ou de moire, quelques-unes amples de quinze et seize aunes, et des entoilages d'or et d'argent, et autour de sa ceinture force noeuds de perles alternés avec des noeuds de pierreries. Elle abusait des galons. Elle mettait parfois une veste de drap passementé comme un bachelier. Elle allait cheval sur une selle d'homme, en dépit de l'invention des selles de femme introduite en Angleterre au quatorzième siècle par Anne, femme de Richard II. Elle se lavait le visage, les bras, les épaules et la gorge avec du sucre candi délayé dans du blanc d'oeuf, à la mode castillane. Elle avait, après qu'on avait spirituellement parlé auprès d'elle, un rire de réflexion d'une grâce singulière.

Du reste, aucune méchanceté. Elle était plutôt bonne.

MAGISTER ELEGANTIARUM

Josiane s’ennuyait, cela va sans dire.

Lord David Dirry-Moir avait une situalion magistrale dans la vie joyeuse de Londres. Nobility et gentry le vénéraient.

Enregistrons une gloire de lord David, il osait porter ses cheveux. La réaction contre la perruque commençait. De même qu’en 1821 Eugène Devéria osa le premier laisser pousser sa barbe, en 1702 Price Devereux osa le premier hasarder en public, sous la dissimulation d’une frisure savante, sa chevelure naturelle. Risquer sa chevelure, c’était presque risquer sa tête. L’indignation fut universelle; pourtant Price Devereux était vicomte Hereford, et pair d’Angleterre. Il fut insulté, et le fait est que la chose en valait la peine. Au plus fort de la huée, lord David parut tout à coup, lui aussi, avec ses cheveux et sans perruque. Ces choses-là annoncent la fin des sociétés.

Lord David fut honni plus encore que le vicomte Hereford. Il tint bon. Price Devereux avait été le premier, David Dirry-Moir fut le second. Il est quelquefois plus difficile d’être le second que le premier. Il faut moins de génie, mais plus de courage. Le premier, enivré par l’innovation, a pu ignorer le danger; le second voit l’abîme, et s’y précipite. Cet abîme, ne plus porter perruque, David Dirry-Moir s’y jeta. Plus tard on les imita, on eut, après ces deux révolutionnaires, l’audace de se coiffer de ses cheveux, et la poudre vint, comme circonstance atténuante.

Pour fixer en passant cet important point d’histoire, disons que la vraie priorité dans la guerre à la perruque appartiendrait une reine, Christine de Suède, laquelle mettait des habits d’homme, et s’était montrée dès 1680 avec ses cheveux châtains naturels, poudrés et hérissés sans coiffure en tête naissante.

Elle avait en outre «quelques poils de barbe», dit Misson.

Le pape, de son côté, par sa bulle de mars 1691, avait un peu déconsidéré la perruque en l’ôtant de la tête des évêques et des prêtres, et en ordonnant aux gens d’église de laisser pousser leurs cheveux.

Lord David donc ne portait pas perruque et mettait des bottes de peau de vache.

Ces grandes choses le désignaient à l’admiration publique. Pas un club dont il ne fut le leader; pas une boxe où on ne le souhaitât pour referee. Le referee, c’est l’arbitre.

Il avait rédigé les chartes de plusieurs cercles de la high life; il avait fait des fondations d’élégance dont une, Lady Guinea, existait encore à Pall Mall en 1772. Lady Guinea était un cercle où foisonnait toute la jeune lordship. On y jouait. Le moindre enjeu était un rouleau de cinquante guinées, et il n’y avait jamais moins de vingt mille guinées sur la table. Près de chaque joueur se dressait un guéridon pour poser la tasse de th et la sébile de bois doré où l’on met les rouleaux de guinées.

Les joueurs avaient, comme les valets quand ils fourbissent les couteaux, des manches de cuir, lesquelles protégeaient leurs dentelles, des plastrons de cuir qui garantissaient leurs fraises, et sur la tête, pour abriter leurs yeux, à cause de la grande lumière des lampes, et maintenir en ordre leur frisure, de larges chapeaux de paille couverts de fleurs. Ils étaient masqués, pour qu’on ne vît pas leur émotion, surtout au jeu de quinze, Tous avaient sur le dos leurs habits à l’envers, afin d’attirer la chance.

Lord David élait du Beefsteak Club, du Surly Club, et du Split-farthing Club, du Club des Bourrus et du Club des Gratte-Sous, du Noeud Scellé, Sealed Knot, club des royalistes, et du Martinus Scribblerus, fondé par Swift, en remplacement de la Rota, fondée par Milton.

Quoique beau, il était du Club des Laids. Ce club était dédi la difformité. On y prenait l’engagement de se battre, non pour une belle femme, mais pour un homme laid. La salle du club avait pour ornement des portraits hideux, Thersite, Triboulet, Duns, Hudibras, Scarron; sur la cheminée était Ésope entre deux borgnes, Coclès et Camoëns; Coclès étant borgne de l’oeil gauche et Camoëns de l’oeil droit, chacun était sculpté de son côt borgne; et ces deux profils sans yeux se faisaient vis-à-vis. Le jour où la belle madame Visart eut la petite vérole, le Club des Laids lui porta un toast. Ce club florissait encore au commencement du dix-neuvième siècle; il avait envoyé un diplôme de membre honoraire à Mirabeau.

Depuis la restauration de Charles II, les clubs révolutionnaires étaient abolis. On avait démoli, dans la petite rue avoisinant Moorfields, la taverne où se tenait le Calf’s Head Club, club de la Tête de Veau, ainsi nommé parce que le 30 janvier 1649, jour où coula sur l’échafaud le sang de

Charles Ier, on y avait bu dans un crâne de veau du vin rouge à la santé de Cromwell.

Aux clubs républicains avaient succédé les clubs monarchiques.

On s'y amusait décemment.

Il y avait le She romps Club. On prenait dans la rue une femme, une passante, une bourgeoise, aussi peu vieille et aussi peu laide que possible; on la poussait dans le club, de force, et on la faisait marcher sur les mains, les pieds en l'air, le visage voilé par ses jupes retombantes. Si elle y mettait de la mauvaise grâce, on cinglait un peu de la cravache ce qui n'était plus voilé. C'était sa faute. Les écuyers de ce genre de manège s'appelaient «les sauteurs». Il y avait le Club des Éclairs de chaleur, métaphoriquement Merry-dances. On y faisait danser par des nègres et des blanches les danses des picantes et des timtirimbas du Pérou, notamment la Mozamala, «mauvaise fille», danse qui a pour triomphe la danseuse s'asseyant sur un tas de son auquel en se relevant elle laisse une empreinte callipyge.
On s'y donnait pour spectacle un vers de Lucrèce,

Tunc Venus in sylvis jungebat corpora amantum.

Il y avait le Hellfire Club, «Club des Flammes», où l'on jouait être impie. C'était la joute des sacrilèges. L'enfer y était l'enchère du plus gros blasphème.

Il y avait le Club des Coups de Tête, ainsi nommé parce qu'on y donnait des coups de tête aux gens. On avisait quelque portefaix à large poitrail et à l'air imbécile. On lui offrait, et au besoin on le contraignait d'accepter, un pot de porter pour se laisser donner quatre coups de tête dans la poitrine. Et là-dessus on pariait. Une fois, un homme, une grosse brute de gallois nommé Gogangerdd, expira au troisième coup de tête. Ceci parut grave. Il y eut enquête, et le jury d'indictement rendit ce verdict: «Mort d'un gonflement de coeur causé par excès de boisson». Gogangerdd avait en effet bu le pot de porter.

Il y avait le Fun Club. Fun est, comme cant, comme humour, un mot spécial intraduisible. Le fun est à la farce ce que le piment est au sel. Pénétrer dans une maison, y briser une glace de prix, y balafrer les portraits de famille, empoisonner le chien, mettre un chat dans la volière, cela s'appelle «tailler une pièce de fun.» Donner une fausse mauvaise nouvelle qui fait prendre aux personnes le deuil à tort, c'est du fun. C'est le fun qui a fait un trou carré dans un Holbein à Hampton-Court. Le fun serait fier si c'était lui qui avait cassé les bras à la Vénus de Milo. Sous Jacques II, un jeune lord millionnaire qui avait mis le feu la nuit à une chaumière fit rire Londres aux éclats et fut proclamé roi du fun. Les pauvres diables de la chaumière s'étaient sauvés en chemise. Les membres du Fun Club, tous de la plus haute aristocratie, couraient Londres à l'heure où les bourgeois dorment, arrachaient les gonds des volets, coupaient les tuyaux des pompes, défonçaient les citernes, décrochaient les enseignes, saccageaient les cultures, éteignaient les réverbères, sciaient les poutres d'étai des maisons, cassaient les carreaux des fenêtres, surtout dans les quartiers indigents. C'étaient les riches qui faisaient cela aux misérables. C'est pourquoi nulle plainte possible. D'ailleurs c'était de la comédie. Ces moeurs n'ont pas tout à fait disparu.

Sur divers points de l'Angleterre ou des possessions anglaises, Guernesey par exemple, de temps en temps on vous dévaste un peu votre maison la nuit, on vous brise une clôture, ou vous arrache le marteau de votre porte, etc. Si c'étaient des pauvres, on les enverrait au bagne; mais ce sont d'aimables jeunes gens.

Le plus distingué des clubs était présidé par un empereur qui portait un croissant sur le front et qui s'appelait «le grand Mohock». Le mohock dépassait le fun. Faire le mal pour le mal, tel était le programme. Le Mohock Club avait ce but grandiose, nuire. Pour remplir cette fonction, tous les moyens étaient bons. En devenant mohock, on prêtait serment d'être nuisible.

Nuire à tout prix, n'importe quand, à n'importe qui, et n'importe comment, était le devoir. Tout membre du Mohock Club devait avoir un talent. L'un était «maître de danse», c'est-à-dire faisait gambader les manants en leur lardant les mollets de son épée. D'autres savaient «faire suer», c'est-à-dire improviser autour d'un bélître quelconque une ronde de six ou huit gentilshommes la rapière à la main; étant entouré de toutes parts, il était impossible que le bélître ne tournât pas le dos quelqu'un; le gentilhomme à qui l'homme montrait le dos l'en châtiait par un coup de pointe qui le faisait pirouetter, un nouveau coup de pointe aux reins avertissait le quidam que quelqu'un de noble était derrière lui, et ainsi de suite, chacun piquant à son tour; quand l'homme, enfermé dans ce cercle d'épées, et tout ensanglanté, avait assez tourné et dansé, on le faisait bâtonner par des laquais pour changer le cours de ses idées. D'autres «tapaient le lion», c'est-à-dire arrêtaient en riant un passant, lui écrasaient le nez d'un coup de poing, et lui enfonçaient leurs deux pouces dans les deux yeux. Si les yeux étaient crevés, on les lui payait.

C’étaient là, au commencement du dix-huitième siècle, les passe-temps des opulents oisifs de Londres. Les oisifs de Paris en avaient d’autres. M. de Charolais lâchait son coup de fusil un bourgeois sur le seuil de sa porte. De tout temps la jeunesse s’est amusée.

Lord David Dirry-Moir apportait dans ces diverses institutions de plaisir son esprit magnifique et libéral. Tout comme un autre, il brûlait gaîment une cabane de chaume et de bois, et roussissait un peu ceux qui étaient dedans, mais il leur rebâtissait leur maison en pierre. Il lui arriva de faire danser sur les mains deux femmes dans le She romps Club. L’une était fille, il la dota; l’autre était mariée, il fit nommer son mari chapelain.

Les combats de coq lui durent de louables perfectionnements. C’était merveille de voir lord David habiller un coq pour le combat. Les coqs se prennent aux plumes comme les hommes aux cheveux. Aussi lord David faisait-il son coq le plus chauve possible. Il lui coupait avec des ciseaux toutes les plumes de la queue et, de la tête aux épaules, toutes les plumes du cou. — Autant de moins pour le bec de l’ennemi, disait-il. Puis il étendait les ailes de son coq, et taillait en pointe chaque plume l’une après l’autre, et cela faisait les ailes garnies de dards. — Voilà pour les yeux de l’ennemi, disait-il. Ensuite, il lui grattait les pattes avec un canif, lui aiguisait les ongles, lui emboîtait dans le maître ergot un éperon d’acier aigu et tranchant, lui crachait sur la tête, lui crachait sur le cou, l’oignait de salive comme on frottait d’huile les athlètes, et le lâchait, terrible, en s’écriant: — Voilà comment d’un coq on fait un aigle, et comment la bête de basse-cour devient une bête de la montagne!

Lord David assistait aux boxes, et il en était la règle vivante. Dans les grandes performances, c’était lui qui faisait planter les pieux et tendre les cordes, et qui fixait le nombre de toises qu’aurait le carré de combat. S’il était second, il suivait pied à pied son boxeur, une bouteille dans une main, une éponge dans l’autre, lui criait: Strike fair, lui suggérait les ruses, le conseillait combattant, l’essuyait sanglant, le ramassait renversé, le prenait sur ses genoux, lui mettait le goulot entre les dents, et de sa propre bouche pleine d’eau lui soufllait une pluie fine dans les yeux et dans les oreilles, ce qui ranime le mourant. S’il était arbitre, il présidait à la loyauté des coups, interdisait à qui que ce fût, hors les seconds, d’assister les combattants, déclarait vaincu le champion qui ne se plaçait pas bien en face de l’adversaire, veillait à ce que le temps des ronds ne dépassât pas une demi-minute, faisait obstacle au butting, donnait tort à qui cognait avec la tête, empêchait de frapper l’homme tombé à terre. Toute cette science ne le faisait point pédant et n’ôtait rien à son aisance dans le monde.

Frappe ferme.

Ce n’est pas quand il était referee d’une boxe que les partenaires hâlés, bourgeonnés et velus de celui-ci ou de celui-là, se fussent permis, pour venir en aide à leurs boxeurs faiblissants et pour culbuter la balance des paris, d’enjamber la palissade, d’entrer dans l’enceinte, de casser les cordes, d’arracher les pieux, et d’intervenir violemment dans le combat.

Lord David était du petit nombre des arbitres qu’on n’ose rosser.

Personne n’entraînait comme lui. Le boxeur dont il consentait être le «trainer» était sûr de vaincre. Lord David choisissait un Hercule, massif comme une roche, haut comme une tour, et en faisait son enfant. Faire passer de l’état défensif à l’état offensif cet écueil humain, tel était le problème. Il y excellait. Une fois le cyclope adopté, il ne le quittait plus.

Il devenait nourrice. Il lui mesurait le vin, il lui pesait la viande, il lui comptait le sommeil. Ce fut lui qui inventa cet admirable régime d’athlète, renouvelé depuis par Moreley: le matin un oeuf cru et un verre de sherry, à midi gigot saignant et thé, à quatre heures pain grillé et thé, le soir pale ale et pain grillé. Après quoi il déshabillait l’homme, le massait et le couchait. Dans la rue il ne le perdait pas de vue, écartant de lui tous les dangers, les chevaux échappés, les roues de voitures, les soldats ivres, les jolies filles. Il veillait sur sa vertu. Cette sollicitude maternelle apportait sans cesse quelque nouveau perfectionnement à l’éducation du pupille. Il lui enseignait le coup de poing qui casse les dents et le coup de pouce qui fait jaillir l’oeil. Rien de plus touchant.

Il se préparait de la sorte à la vie politique, à laquelle il devait plus tard être appelé. Ce n’est pas une petite affaire que de devenir un gentilhomme accompli.

Lord David Dirry-Moir aimait passionnément les exhibitions de carrefours, les tréteaux à parade, les circus à bêtes curieuses, les baraques de saltimbanques, les clowns, les tartailles, les pasquins, les farces en plein vent et les prodiges de la foire.

Le vrai seigneur est celui qui goûte de l’homme du peuple; c’est pourquoi lord David hantait les tavernes et les cours des miracles de Londres et des Cinq-Ports. Afin de pouvoir au besoin, sans compromettre son rang dans l'escadre blanche, se colleter avec un gabier ou un calfat, il mettait, quand il allait dans ces bas-fonds, une jaquette de matelot. Pour ces transformations, ne pas porter perruque lui était commode, car, même sous Louis XIV, le peuple a gardé ses cheveux, comme le lion sa crinière. De cette façon, il était libre. Les petites gens, que lord David rencontrait dans ces cohues et auxquelles il se mêlait, le tenaient en haute estime, et ne savaient pas qu'il fût lord. On l'appelait Tom-Jim-Jack. Sous ce nom il était populaire, et fort illustre dans cette crapule. Il s'encanaillait en maître. Dans l'occasion, il faisait le coup de poing. Ce côté de sa vie élégante était connu et fort appréci de Lady Josiane.

V

LA REINE ANNE

I

Au-dessus de ce couple, il y avait Anne, reine d'Angleterre.

La première femme venue, c'était la reine Anne. Elle était gaie, bienveillante, auguste, à peu près. Aucune de ses qualités n'atteignait à la vertu, aucune de ses imperfections n'atteignait au mal. Son embonpoint était bouffi, sa malice était épaisse, sa bonté était bête. Elle était tenace et molle. Epouse, elle était infidèle et fidèle, ayant des favoris auxquels elle livrait son coeur, et un consort auquel elle gardait son lit.

Chrétienne, elle était hérétique et bigote. Elle avait une beauté, le cou robuste d'une Niobé. Le reste de sa personne était mal réussi. Elle était gauchement coquette, et honnêtement. Sa peau était blanche et fine, elle la montrait beaucoup. C'est d'elle que venait la mode du collier de grosses perles serré au cou. Elle avait le front étroit, les lèvres sensuelles, les joues charnues, l'oeil gros, la vue basse. Sa myopie s'étendait à son esprit. A part ça et là un éclat de jovialité, presque aussi pesante que sa colère, elle vivait dans une sorte de gronderie taciturne et de silence grognon. Il lui échappait des mots qu'il fallait deviner. C'était un mélange de la bonne femme et de la méchante diablesse. Elle aimait l'inattendu, ce qui est profondément féminin. Anne était un échantillon à peine dégrossi de l'Eve universelle. A cette ébauche était échu ce hasard, le trône. Elle buvait. Son mari était un danois, de race.

Tory, elle gouvernait par les whighs. En femme, en folle. Elle avait des rages. Elle était casseuse. Pas de personne plus maladroite pour manier les choses de l'état. Elle laissait tomber à terre les événements. Toute sa politique était fêlée.

Elle excellait à faire de grosses catastrophes avec de petites causes. Quand une fantaisie d'autorité lui prenait, elle appelait cela: donner le coup de poker.

Elle disait avec un air de profonde rêverie des paroles telles que celles-ci: «Aucun pair ne peut être couvert devant le roi, excepté Courcy, baron Kinsale, pair d'Irlande.» Elle disait: «Ce serait une injustice que mon mari ne fût pas lord-amiral, puisque mon père l'a été.» — Et elle faisait George de Danemark haut-amiral d'Angleterre, «and of all Her Majesty's Plantations».

Elle était perpétuellement en transpiration de mauvaise humeur; elle n'exprimait pas sa pensée, elle l'exsudait. Il y avait du sphinx dans cette oie.

Elle ne haïssait point le fun, la farce taquine et hostile. Si elle eût pu faire Apollon bossu, c'eût été sa joie. Mais elle l'eût laissé dieu. Bonne, elle avait pour idéal de ne désespérer personne, et d'ennuyer tout le monde. Elle avait souvent le mot cru, et, un peu plus, elle eût juré, comme Elisabeth. De temps en temps, elle prenait dans une poche d'homme qu'elle avait à sa jupe une petite boîte ronde d'argent repoussé, sur laquelle était son portrait de profil, entre les deux lettres Q. A., ouvrait cette boîte, et en tirait avec le bout de son doigt un peu de pommade dont elle se rougissait les lèvres. Alors, ayant arrang sa bouche, elle riait. Elle était très friande des pains d'épice plats de Zélande. Elle était fière d'être grasse.

Queen Ann.

Puritaine plutôt qu'autre chose, elle eût pourtant volontiers donné dans les spectacles. Elle eut une velléité d'académie de musique, copiée sur celle de France. En 1700, un français nomm Fortcroche voulut construire à Paris un «Cirque Royal» coûtant quatre cent mille livres, à quoi d'Argenson s'opposa; ce Fortcroche passa en Angleterre, et proposa à la reine Anne, qui en fut un moment séduite, l'idée de bâtir à Londres un théâtre machines, plus beau que celui du roi de France, et ayant un quatrième dessous. Comme Louis XIV, elle aimait que son carrosse galopât. Ses attelages et ses relais faisaient quelquefois en moins de cinq quarts d'heure le trajet de Windsor à Londres.

II

Du temps d'Anne, pas de réunion sans l'autorisation de deux juges de paix. Douze personnes assemblées, fut-ce pour manger des huîtres et boire du porter, étaient en félonie.

Sous ce règne, pourtant relativement débonnaire, la presse pour la flotte se fit avec une extrême violence; sombre preuve que l'anglais est plutôt sujet que citoyen. Depuis des siècles le roi d'Angleterre avait là un procédé de tyran qui démentait toutes les vieilles chartes de franchise, et dont la France en particulier triomphait et s'indignait. Ce qui diminue un peu ce triomphe, c’est que, en regard de la presse des matelots en Angleterre, il y avait en France la presse des soldats. Dans toutes les grandes villes de France, tout homme valide allant par les rues à ses affaires était exposé à être poussé par les racoleurs dans une maison appelée four. Là on l’enfermait pêle-mele avec d’autres, on triait ceux qui étaient propres au service, et les recruteurs vendaient ces passants aux officiers.

En 1695, il y avait à Paris trente fours.

Les lois contre l’Irlande, émanées de la reine Anne, furent atroces.

Anne était née en 1664, deux ans avant l’incendie de Londres, sur quoi les astrologues — (il y en avait encore, témoin Louis XIV, qui naquit assisté d’un astrologue et emmaillotté dans un horoscope) — avaient prédit qu’étant «la soeur aînée du feu», elle serait reine. Elle le fut, grâce à l’astrologie, et à la révolution de 1688. Elle était humiliée de n’avoir pour parrain que Gilbert, archevêque de Cantorbéry. Être filleule du pape n’était plus possible en Angleterre. Un simple primat est un parrain médiocre. Anne dut s’en contenter. C’était sa faute.

Pourquoi était-elle protestante?

Le Danemark avait payé sa virginité, virginitas empta, comme disent les vieilles chartes, d’un douaire de six mille deux cent cinquante livres sterling de rente, pris sur le bailliage de Wardinbourg et sur l’île de Fehmarn.

Anne suivait, par conviction et par routine, les traditions de Guillaume. Les anglais, sous cette royauté née d’une révolution, avaient tout ce qui peut tenir de liberté entre la Tour de Londres où l’on mettait l’orateur et le pilori où l’on mettait l’écrivain. Anne parlait un peu danois, pour ses aparté avec son mari, et un peu français, pour ses aparté avec Bolingbroke. Pur baragouin; mais c’était, à la cour surtout, la grande mode anglaise de parler français. Il n’y avait de bon mot qu’en français. Anne se préoccupait des monnaies, surtout des monnaies de cuivre, qui sont les basses et les populaires; elle voulait y faire grande figure. Six farlhings furent frappés sous son règne. Au revers des trois premiers, elle fit mettre simplement un trône; au revers du quatrième, elle voulut un char de triomphe, et au revers du sixième une déesse tenant d’une main l’épée et de l’autre l’olivier avec l’exergue Bello et Pace.

Fille de Jacques II, qui était ingénu et féroce, elle était brutale.

Et en même temps au fond elle était douce. Contradiction qui n’est qu’apparente. Une colère la métamorphosait. Chauffez le sucre, il bouillonnera.

Anne était populaire. L’Angleterre aime les femmes régnantes.
Pourquoi? la France les exclut. C’est déjà une raison.
Peut-être même n’y en a-t-il point d’autres. Pour les historiens anglais, Elisabeth, c’est la grandeur, Anne, c’est la bonté.
Comme on voudra. Soit. Mais rien de délicat dans ces règnes féminins. Les lignes sont lourdes. C’est de la grosse grandeur et de la grosse bonté. Quant à leur vertu immaculée, l’Angleterre y tient, nous ne nous y opposons point. Elisabeth est une vierge tempérée par Essex, et Anne est une épouse compliquée de Bolingbroke.

Une habitude idiote qu’ont les peuples, c’est d’attribuer au roi ce qu’ils font. Ils se battent. A qui la gloire? au roi. Ils paient. Qui est magnifique? le roi. Et le peuple l’aime d’être si riche. Le roi reçoit des pauvres un écu et rend aux pauvres un liard. Qu’il est généreux! Le colosse piédestal contemple le pygmée fardeau. Que Myrmidon est grand! il est sur mon dos. Un nain a un excellent moyen d’être plus haut qu’un géant, c’est de se jucher sur ses épaules. Mais que le géant laisse faire, c’est là le singulier; et qu’il admire la grandeur du nain, c’est là le bête. Naïveté humaine.

La statue équestre, réservée aux rois seuls, figure très bien la royauté; le cheval, c’est le peuple. Seulement ce cheval se transfigure lentement. Au commencement c’est un âne, à la fin c’est un lion. Alors il jette par terre son cavalier, et l’on a 1642 en Angleterre et 1789 en France, et quelquefois il le dévore, et l’on a en Angleterre 1649 et en France 1793.

Que le lion puisse redevenir baudet, cela étonne, mais cela est.
Cela se voyait en Angleterre. On avait repris le bât de l’idolâtrie royaliste. La Queen Ann, nous venons de le dire, était populaire. Que faisait elle pour cela? rien. Rien, c’est là tout ce qu’on demande au roi d’Angleterre. Il reçoit pour ce rien-là une trentaine de millions par an. En 1705, l’Angleterre, qui n’avait que treize vaisseaux de guerre sous Elisabeth et trente-six sous Jacques Ier, en comptait cent cinquante. Les anglais avaient trois armées, cinq mille hommes en Catalogne, dix mille en Portugal, cinquante mille en Flandre, et en outre ils payaient quarante millions par an à l’Europe monarchique et diplomatique, sorte de fille publique que le peuple anglais a toujours entretenue. Le parlement ayant volé un emprunt patriotique de trente-quatre millions de rentes viagères, il y avait eu presse à l'échiquier pour y souscrire. L'Angleterre envoyait une escadre aux Indes orientales, et une escadre sur les côtes d'Espagne avec l'amiral Leake, sans compter un en-cas de quatre cents voiles sous l'amiral Showell. L'Angleterre venait de s'amalgamer l'Ecosse. On était entre Hochstett et Ramillies, et l'une de ces victoires faisait entrevoir l'autre.

L'Angleterre, dans ce coup de filet de Hochstett, avait fait prisonniers vingt-sept bataillons et quatre régiments de dragons, et ôté cent lieues de pays à la France, reculant éperdue du Danube au Rhin. L'Angleterre étendait la main vers la Sardaigne et les Baléares. Elle ramenait triomphalement dans ses ports dix vaisseaux de ligne espagnols et force galions chargés d'or. La baie et le détroit d'Hudson étaient déjà à demi lâchés par Louis XIV; on sentait qu'il allait lâcher aussi l'Acadie, Saint-Christophe et Terre-Neuve, et qu'il serait trop heureux si l'Angleterre tolérait au cap Breton le roi de France, pêchant la morue. L'Angleterre allait lui imposer cette honte de démolir lui-même les fortifications de Dunkerque. En attendant elle avait pris Gibraltar et elle prenait Barcelone. Que de grandes choses accomplies! Comment ne pas admirer la reine Anne qui se donnait la peine de vivre pendant ce temps-là?

A un certain point de vue, le règne d'Anne semble une réverbération du règne de Louis XIV. Anne, un moment parallèle ce roi dans cette rencontre qu'on appelle l'histoire, a avec lui une vague ressemblance de reflet. Comme lui elle joue au grand règne; elle a ses monuments, ses arts, ses victoires, ses capitaines, ses gens de lettres, sa cassette pensionnant les renommées, sa galerie de chefs-d'oeuvre latérale à sa majesté.

Sa cour, à elle aussi, fait cortège et a un aspect triomphal, un ordre et une marche. C'est une réduction en petit de tous les grands hommes de Versailles, déjà pas très grands. Le trompe-l'oeil y est; qu'on y ajoute le God save the queen, qui eût pu dès lors être pris à Lulli, et l'ensemble fait illusion.

Pas un personnage ne manque. Christophe Wren est un Mansard fort passable; Somers vaut Lamoignon. Anne a un Racine qui est Dryden, un Boileau qui est Pope, un Colbert qui est Godolphin, un Louvois qui est Pembroke, et un Turenne qui est Marlborough.

Grandissez les perruques pourtant, et diminuez les fronts. Le tout est solennel et pompeux, et Windsor, à cet instant-là, aurait presque un faux air de Marly. Pourtant tout est féminin, et le père Tellier d'Anne s'appelle

Sarah Jennings. Du reste, un commencement d'ironie, qui cinquante ans plus tard sera la philosophie, s'ébauche dans la littérature, et le Tartuffe protestant est démasqué par Swift, de même que le Tartuffe catholique a été dénoncé par Molière. Bien qu'à cette époque l'Angleterre querelle et batte la France, elle l'imite et elle s'en éclaire; et ce qui est sur la façade de l'Angleterre, c'est de la lumière française. C'est dommage que le règne d'Anne n'ait duré que douze ans, sans quoi les anglais ne se feraient pas beaucoup prier pour dire le siècle d'Anne, comme nous disons le siècle de Louis XIV. Anne apparaît en 1702, quand Louis XIV décline. C'est une des curiosités de l'histoire que le lever de cet astre pâle coïncide avec le coucher de l'astre de pourpre, et qu'à l'instant où la France avait le roi Soleil, l'Angleterre ait eu la reine Lune.

Détail qu'il faut noter. Louis XIV, bien qu'on fût en guerre avec lui, était fort admiré en Angleterre. C'est le roi qu'il faut à la France, disaient les anglais. L'amour des anglais pour leur liberté se complique d'une certaine acceptation de la servitude d'autrui. Cette bienveillance pour les chaînes qui attachent le voisin va quelquefois jusqu'à l'enthousiasme pour le despote d'à côté.

En somme, Anne a rendu son peuple hureux, comme le dit à trois reprises et avec une gracieuse insistance, pages 6 et 9 de sa dédicace, et page 3 de sa préface, le traducteur français du livre de Beeverell.

IV

La reine Anne en voulait un peu à la duchesse Josiane, pour deux raisons.

Premièrement, parce qu'elle trouvait la duchesse Josiane jolie.

Deuxièmement, parce qu'elle trouvait joli le fiancé de la duchesse Josiane.

Deux raisons pour être jalouse suffisent à une femme; une seule suffit à une reine.

Ajoutons ceci. Elle lui en voulait d'être sa soeur.

Anne n'aimait pas que les femmes fussent jolies. Elle trouvait cela contraire aux moeurs.

Quant à elle, elle était laide.

Non par choix pourtant.

Une partie de sa religion venait de cette laideur.

Josiane, belle et philosophe, importunait la reine.

Pour une reine laide, une jolie duchesse n’est pas une soeur agréable.

Il y avait un autre grief, la naissance improper de Josiane.

Anne était fille d’Anne Hyde, simple lady, légitimement, mais fâcheusement épousée par Jacques II, lorsqu’il était duc d’York. Anne, ayant de ce sang inférieur dans les veines, ne se sentait qu’à demi royale, et Josiane, venue au monde tout à fait irrégulièrement, soulignait l’incorrection, moindre, mais réelle, de la naissance de la reine. La fille de la mésalliance voyait sans plaisir, pas très loin d’elle, la fille de la bâtardise. Il y avait là une ressemblance désobligeante. Josiane avait le droit de dire à Anne: ma mère vaut bien la vôtre. A la cour on ne le disait pas, mais évidemment on le pensait. C’était ennuyeux pour la majesté royale. Pourquoi cette Josiane? Quelle idée avait-elle eue de naître? A quoi bon une Josiane? De certaines parentés sont diminuantes.

Pourtant Anne faisait bon visage à Josiane.

Peut-être l’eût-elle aimée, si elle n’eût été sa soeur.

VI

BARKILPHEDRO

Il est utile de connaître les actions des personnes, et quelque surveillance est sage.

Josiane faisait un peu espionner lord David par un homme à elle, en qui elle avait confiance, et qui se nommait Barkilphedro.

Lord David faisait discrètement observer Josiane par un homme lui, dont il était sûr, et qui se nommait Barkilphedro.

La reine Anne, de son côté, se faisait secrètement tenir au courant des faits et gestes de la duchesse Josiane, sa soeur bâtarde, et de lord David, son futur beau-frère de la main gauche, par un homme à elle, sur qui elle comptait pleinement, et qui se nommait Barkilphedro.

Ce Barkilphedro avait sous la main ce clavier: Josiane, lord David, la reine. Un homme entre deux femmes. Que de modulations possibles! Quel amalgame d’âmes!

Barkilphedro n’avait pas toujours eu cette situation magnifique de parler bas à trois oreilles.

C’était un ancien domestique du duc d’York. Il avait tâch d’être homme d’église, mais avait échoué. Le duc d’York, prince anglais et romain, composé de papisme royal et d’anglicanisme légal, avait sa maison catholique et sa maison protestante, et eût pu pousser Barkilphedro dans l’une ou l’aulre hiérarchie, mais il ne le jugea point assez catholique pour le faire aumônier, et pas assez protestant pour le faire chapelain. De sorte que Barkilphedro se trouva entre deux religions l’âme par terre.

Ce n’est point une posture mauvaise pour de certaines âmes reptiles.

De certains chemins ne sont faisables qu’à plat ventre. Une domesticité obscure, mais nourrissante, fut longtemps toute l’existence de Barkilphedro. La domesticité, c’est quelque chose, mais il voulait de plus la puissance. Il allait peut-être y arriver quand Jacques II tomba. Tout était à recommencer. Rien à faire sous Guillaume III, maussade, et ayant dans sa façon de régner une pruderie qu’il croyait de la probité.

Barkilphedro, son protecteur Jacques détrôné, ne fut pas tout de suite en guenilles. Un je ne sais quoi qui survit aux princes déchus alimente et soutient quelque temps leurs parasites. Le reste de sève épuisable fait vivre deux ou trois jours au bout des branches les feuilles de l’arbre déraciné; puis tout à coup la feuille jaunit et sêche, et le courtisan aussi.

Grâce à cet embaumement qu’on nomme légitimité, le prince, lui, quoique tombé et jeté au loin, persiste et se conserve; il n’en est pas de même du courtisan, bien plus mort que le roi. Le roi là-bas est momie, le courtisan ici est fantôme. Être l’ombre d’une ombre, c’est là une maigreur extrême. Donc Barkilphedro devint famélique. Alors il prit la qualité d’homme de lettres.

Mais on le repoussait même des cuisines. Quelquefois il ne savait où coucher. — Qui me tirera de la belle étoile? disait-il.

Et il luttait. Tout ce que la patience dans la détresse a d’intéressant, il l’avait. Il avait de plus le talent du termite, savoir faire une trouée de bas en haut. En s’aidant du nom de Jacques II, des souvenirs, de la fidélité, de l’attendrissement, etc., il perça jusqu’à la duchesse Josiane.

Josiane prit en gré cet homme qui avait de la misère et de l’esprit, deux choses qui émeuvent. Elle le présenta à lord Dirry-Moir, lui donna gîte dans ses communs, le tint pour de sa maison, fut bonne pour lui, et quelquefois même lui parla.

Barkilphedro n’eut plus ni faim, ni froid. Josiane le tutoyait.

C’était la mode des grandes dames de tutoyer les gens de lettres, qui se laissaient faire. La marquise de Mailly recevait, couchée, Roy qu’elle n’avait jamais vu, et lui disail: C’est toi qui as fait l’Année galante? Bonjour. Plus tard, les gens de lettres rendirent le tutoiement. Un jour vint où Fabre d’Églantine dit à la duchesse de Rohan:

— N’es-tu pas la Chabot?

Pour Barkilphedro, être tutoyé, c’était un succès. Il en fut ravi. Il avait ambitionné cette familiarilé de haut en bas.

— Lady Josiane me tutoie! se disait-il. Et il se frottait les mains.

Il profita de ce tutoiement pour gagner du terrain. Il devint une sorte de familier des petits appartements de Josiane, point gênant, inaperçu; la duchesse eût presque changé de chemise devant lui. Tout cela pourtant était précaire, Barkilphedro visait à une situation. Une duchesse, c’est à moitié chemin.

Une galerie souterraine qui n’arrivait pas jusqu’à la reine, c’était de l’ouvrage manqué.

Un jour Barkilphedro dit à Josiane:

— Votre grâce voudrait-elle faire mon bonheur?

— Qu’est-ce que tu veux? demanda Josiane.

— Un emploi.

— Un emploi! à toi!

— Oui, madame.

— Quelle idée as-tu de demander un emploi? tu n’es bon à rien.

— C’est pour cela.

Josiane se mit à rire.

— Dans les fonctions auxquelles tu n’es pas propre, laquelle désires-tu?

— Celle de déboucheur de bouteilles de l’océan.

Le rire de Josiane redoubla.

— Qu’est-ce que cela? Tu te moques.

— Non, madame.

— Je vais m’amuser à te répondre sérieusement, dit la duchesse. Qu’est-ce que tu veux être? Répète.

— Déboucheur de bouteilles de l’océan.

— Tout est possible à la cour. Est-ce qu’il y a un emploi comme cela?

— Oui, madame.

— Apprends-moi des choses nouvelles. Continue.

— C’est un emploi qui est.

— Jure-le moi sur l’âme que tu n’as pas.

— Je le jure.

— Je ne te crois point.

— Merci, madame.

— Donc tu voudrais?... Recommence.

— Décacheter les bouteilles de la mer.

— Voilà une fonction qui ne doit pas donner grande fatigue. C’est comme peigner le cheval de bronze.

— A peu près.

— Ne rien faire. C’est en effet la place qu’il te faut. Tu es bon à cela.

— Vous voyez que je suis propre à quelque chose.

— Ah çà! tu bouffonnes. La place existe-t-elle? Barkilphedro prit l’attitude de la gravité déférente.

— Madame, vous avez un père auguste, Jacques II, roi, et un beau-frère illustre, Georges de Danemark, duc de Cumberland. Votre père a été et votre beau-frère est lord-amiral d’Angleterre.

— Sont-ce là les nouveautés que tu viens m'apprendre? Je sais cela aussi bien que toi.

— Mais voici ce que votre grâce ne sait pas. Il y a dans la mer trois sortes de choses: celles qui sont au fond de l'eau, Lagon; celles qui flottent sur l'eau, Flotson; et celles que l'eau rejette sur la terre, Jetson.

— Après?

— Ces trois choses-là, Lagon, Flotson, Jetson, appartiennent au lord haut-amiral.

— Après?

— Votre grâce comprend?

— Non.

— Tout ce qui est dans la mer, ce qui s'engloutit, ce qui surnage et ce qui s'échoue, tout appartient à l'amiral d'Angleterre?

— Tout. Soit. Ensuite?

— Excepté l'esturgeon, qui appartient au roi.

— J'aurais cru, dit Josiane, que tout cela appartenait à Neptune.

— Neptune est un imbécile. Il a tout lâché. Il a laissé tout prendre aux anglais.

— Conclus.

— Les prises de mer; c'est le nom qu'on donne à ces trouvailles-là.

— Soit.

— C'est inépuisable. Il y a toujours quelque chose qui flotte, quelque chose qui aborde. C'est la contribution de la mer. La mer paie impôt à l'Angleterre.

— Je veux bien. Mais conclus.

— Votre grâce comprend que de cette façon l'océan crée un bureau.

— Où ça?

— A l'amirauté.

— Quel bureau?

— Le bureau des prises de mer.

— Eh bien?

— Le bureau se subdivise en trois offices, Lagon, Flotson, Jetson; et pour chaque office il y a un officier.

— Et puis?

— Un navire en pleine mer veut donner un avis quelconque à la terre, qu'il navigue en telle latitude, qu'il rencontre un monstre marin, qu'il est en vue d'une côte, qu'il est en détresse, qu'il va sombrer, qu'il est perdu, et coetera, le patron prend une bouteille, met dedans un morceau de papier où il a écrit la chose, cachette le goulot, et jette la bouteille à la mer. Si la bouteille va au fond, cela regarde l'officier Lagon; si elle flotte, cela regarde l'officier Flotson; si elle est portée à terre par les vagues, cela regarde l'officier Jetson.

— Et tu voudrais être l'officier Jetson?

— Précisément.

— Et c'est ce que tu appelles être déboucheur de bouteilles de l'océan?

— Puisque la place existe.

— Pourquoi désires-tu cette dernière place plutôt que les deux autres?

— Parce qu'elle est vacante en ce moment.

— En quoi consiste l'emploi?

— Madame, en 1598, une bouteille goudronnée trouvée par un pêcheur de congre dans les sables d'échouage d'Epidium Promontorium fut portée à la reine Elisabeth, et un parchemin qu'on tira de cette bouteille fit savoir à l'Angleterre que la Hollande avait pris sans rien dire un pays inconnu, la nouvelle Zemble, Nova Zemla, que cette prise avait eu lieu en juin 1596, que dans ce pays-là on était mangé par les ours, et que la manière d'y passer l'hiver était indiquée sur un papier enferm dans un étui de mousquet suspendu dans la cheminée de la maison de bois bâtie dans l'île et laissée par les hollandais qui étaient tous morts, et que cette cheminée était faite d'un tonneau défoncé, emboîté dans le toit.

— Je comprends peu ton amphigouri.

— Soit. Élisabeth comprit. Un pays de plus pour la Hollande, c'était un pays de moins pour l'Angleterre. La bouteille qui avait donné l'avis fut tenue pour chose importante. Et à partir de ce jour, ordre fut intimé à quiconque trouverait une bouteille cachetée au bord de la mer de la porter à l'amiral d'Angleterre, sous peine de potence. L'amiral commet pour ouvrir ces bouteilles-là un officier, lequel informe du contenu sa majesté, s'il y a lieu.

— Arrive-t-il souvent de ces bouteilles à l'amirauté?

— Rarement. Mais c'est égal. La place existe. Il y a pour la fonction chambre et logis à l'amirauté.

— Et cette manière de ne rien faire, combien la paie-t-on?

— Cent guinées par an.

— Tu me déranges pour cela?

— C'est de quoi vivre.

— Gueusement.

— Comme il sied à ceux de ma sorte.

— Cent guinées, c’est une fumée.

— Ce qui vous fait vivre une minute nous fait vivre un an, nous autres. C’est l’avantage qu’ont les pauvres.

— Tu auras la place.

Huit jours après, grâce à la bonne volonté de Josiane, grâce au crédit de lord David Dirry-Moir, Barkilphedro, sauvé désormais, tiré du provisoire, posant maintenant le pied sur un terrain solide, logé, défrayé, renté de cent guinées, était install l’amirauté.

VII

BARKILPHEDRO PERCE

Il y a d'abord une chose pressée; c'est d'être ingrat.

Barkilphedro n'y manqua point.

Ayant reçu tant de bienfaits de Josiane, naturellement il n'eut qu'une pensée, s'en venger.

Ajoutons que Josiane était belle, grande, jeune, riche, puissante, illustre, et que Barkilphedro était laid, petit, vieux, pauvre, protégé, obscur. Il fallait bien aussi qu'il se vengeât de cela.

Quand on n'est fait que de nuit, comment pardonner tant de rayons?

Barkilphedro était un irlandais qui avait renié l'Irlande; mauvaise espèce.

Barkilphedro n'avait qu'une chose en sa faveur; c'est qu'il avait un très gros ventre.

Un gros ventre passe pour signe de bonté. Mais ce ventre s'ajoutait à l'hypocrisie de Barkilphedro. Car cet homme était très méchant.

Quel âge avait Barkilphedro? aucun. L'âge nécessaire à son projet du moment. Il était vieux par les rides et les cheveux gris, et jeune par l'agilité d'esprit. Il était leste et lourd; sorte d'hippopotame singe. Royaliste, certes; républicain, qui sait? catholique, peut-être; protestant, sans doute. Pour Stuart, probablement; pour Brunswick, évidemment, Être Pour n'est une force qu'à la condition d'être en même temps Contre, Barkilphedro pratiquait cette sagesse.

La place de «déboucheur de bouteilles de l'océan» n'était pas aussi risible qu'avait semblé le dire Barkilphedro. Les réclamations, qu'aujourd'hui on qualifierait déclamations, de Garcie-Ferrandez dans son Routier de la mer contre la spoliation des échouages, dite droit de bris, et contre le pillage des épaves par les gens des côtes, avaient fait sensation en Angleterre et avaient amené pour les naufragés ce progrès que leurs biens, effets et propriétés, au lieu d'être volés par les paysans, étaient confisqués par le lord-amiral.

Tous les débris de mer jetés à la rive anglaise, marchandises, carcasses de navires, ballots, caisses, etc., appartenaient au lord-amiral; mais, et ici se révélait l'importance de la place sollicitée par Barkilphedro, les récipients flottants contenant des messages et des informations éveillaient particulièrement l’attention de l’amirauté. Les naufrages sont une des graves préoccupations de l’Angleterre. La navigation étant sa vie, le naufrage est son souci. L’Angleterre a la perpétuelle inquiétude de la mer. La petite fiole de verre que jette aux vagues un navire en perdition contient un renseignement suprême, précieux tous les points de vue. Renseignement sur le bâtiment, renseignement sur l’équipage, renseignement sur le lieu, l’époque et le mode du naufrage, renseignement sur les vents qui ont bris le vaisseau, renseignement sur les courants qui ont porté la fiole flottante à la côte. La fonction que Barkilphedro occupait a été supprimée il y a plus d’un siècle, mais elle avait une véritable utilité. Le dernier titulaire fut William Hussey, de Doddington en Lincoln. L’homme qui tenait cet office était une sorte de rapporteur des choses de la mer. Tous les vases fermés et cachetés, bouteilles, fioles, jarres, etc., jetés au littoral anglais par le flux, lui étaient remis; il avait seul droit de les ouvrir; il était le premier dans le secret de leur contenu; il les classait et les étiquetait dans son greffe; l’expression loger un panier au greffe, encore usitée dans les îles de la Manche, vient de là. A la vérité, une précaution avait ét prise. Aucun de ces récipients ne pouvait être décacheté et débouché qu’en présence de deux jurés de l’amirauté assermentés au secret, lesquels signaient, conjointement avec le titulaire de l’office Jeston, le procès-verbal d’ouverture. Mais ces jurés étant tenus au silence, il en résultait, pour Barkilphedro, une certaine latitude discrétionnaire; il dépendait de lui, jusqu’ un certain point, de supprimer un fait, ou de le mettre en lumière.

Ces fragiles épaves étaient loin d’être, comme Barkilphedro l’avait dit à Josiane, rares et insignifiantes. Tantôt elles atteignaient la terre assez vite; tantôt après des années. Cela dépendait des vents et des courants. Cette mode des bouteilles jetées à vau-l’eau a un peu passé comme celle des ex-voto; mais, dans ces temps religieux, ceux qui allaient mourir envoyaient volontiers de cette façon leur dernière pensée à Dieu et aux hommes, et parfois ces missives de la mer abondaient l’amirauté. Un parchemin conservé au château d’Audlyene (vieille orthographe), et annoté par le comte de Suffolk, grand trésorier d’Angleterre sous Jacques Ier, constate qu’en la seule année 1615, cinquante-deux gourdes, ampoules, et fibules goudronnées, contenant des mentions de bâtiments en perdition, furent apportées et enregistrées au greffe du lord-amiral.

Les emplois de cour sont la goutte d’huile, ils vont toujours s’élargissant. C’est ainsi que le portier est devenu le chancelier et que le palefrenier est devenu le connétable.

L’officier spécial chargé de la fonction souhaitée et obtenue par Barkelphedro était habituellement un homme de confiance.

Elisabeth l’avait voulu ainsi. A la cour, qui dit confiance dit intrigue, et qui dit intrigue dit croissance. Ce fonctionnaire avait fini par être un peu un personnage. Il était clerc, et prenait rang immédiatement après les deux grooms de l’aumônerie.

Il avait ses entrées au palais, pourtant, disons-le, ce qu’on appelait «l’entrée humble» humilis introïtus, et jusque dans la chambre de lit. Car l’usage était qu’il informât la personne royale, quand l’occasion en valait la peine, de ses trouvailles, souvent très curieuses, testaments de désespérés, adieux jetés la patrie, révélations de barateries et de crimes de mer, legs la couronne, etc., qu’il maintînt son greffe en communication avec la cour, et qu’il rendît de temps en temps compte à sa majesté de ce décachetage de bouteilles sinistres. C’était le cabinet noir de l’océan.

Elisabeth, qui parlait volontiers latin, demandait à Tamfeld de Coley en Berkshire, l’officier Jetson de son temps, lorsqu’il lui apportait quelqu’une de ces paperasses sorties de la mer: Quid mihi scribit Neptunus? Qu’est-ce que Neptune m’écrit?

La percée était faite. Le termite avait réussi. Barkilphedro approchait la reine.

C’était tout ce qu’il voulait.

Pour faire sa fortune?

Non.

Pour défaire celle des autres.

Bonheur plus grand.

Nuire, c’est jouir.

Avoir en soi un désir de nuire, vague mais implacable, et ne le jamais perdre de vue, ceci n’est pas donné à tout le monde.

Barkilphedro avait cette fixîté.

L’adhérence de gueule qu’a le boule-dogue, sa pensée l’avait.

Se sentir inexorable lui donnait un fond de satisfaction sombre.

Pourvu qu’il eût une proie sous la dent, ou dans l’âme une certitude de mal faire, rien ne lui manquait.

Il grelottait content, dans l'espoir du froid d'autrui. Être méchant, c'est une opulence. Tel homme qu'on croit pauvre, et qui l'est en effet, a toute sa richesse en malice, et la préfère ainsi. Tout est dans le contentement qu'on a. Faire un mauvais tour, qui est la même chose qu'un bon tour, c'est plus que de l'argent. Mauvais pour qui l'endure, bon pour qui le fait.
Katesby, le collaborateur de Guy Fawkes dans le complot papiste des poudres, disait: Voir sauter le parlement les quatre fers en l'air, je ne donnerais pas cela pour un million sterling.

Qu'était-ce que Barkilphedro? Ce qu'il y a de plus petit et ce qu'il y a de plus terrible. Un envieux.

L'envie est une chose dont on a toujours le placement à la cour.

La cour abonde en impertinents, en désoeuvrés, en riches fainéants affamés de commérages, en chercheurs d'aiguilles dans les bottes de foin, en faiseurs de misères, en moqueurs moqués, en niais spirituels, qui ont besoin de la conversation d'un envieux.

Quelle chose rafraîchissante que le mal qu'on vous dit des autres!

L'envie est une bonne étoffe à faire un espion.

Il y a une profonde analogie entre cette passion naturelle, l'envie, et cette fonction sociale, l'espionnage. L'espion chasse pour le compte d'autrui, comme le chien; l'envieux chasse pour son propre compte, comme le chat.

Un moi féroce, c'est là tout l'envieux.

Autres qualités, Barkilphedro était discret, secret, concret. Il gardait tout, et se creusait de sa haine. Une énorme bassesse implique une énorme vanité. Il était aimé de ceux qu'il amusait, et haï des autres; mais il se sentait dédaigné par ceux qui le haïssaient, et méprisé par ceux qui l'aimaient. Il se contenait.
Tous ses froissements bouillonnaient sans bruit dans sa résignation hostile. Il était indigné, comme si les coquins avaient ce droit-là. Il était silencieusement en proie aux furies. Tout avaler, c'était son talent. Il avait de sourds courroux intérieurs, des frénésies de rage souterraine, des flammes couvées et noires, dont on ne s'apercevait pas; c'était un colérique fumivore. La surface souriait. Il était obligeant, empressé, facile, aimable, complaisant. N'importe qui, et n'importe où, il saluait. Pour un souffle de vent, il s'inclinait jusqu'à terre. Avoir un roseau dans la colonne vertébrale, quelle source de fortune!

Ces êtres cachés et vénéneux ne sont pas si rares qu'on le croit.
Nous vivons entourés de glissements sinistres. Pourquoi les malfaisants?

Question poignante. Le rêveur se la pose sans cesse, et le penseur ne la résout jamais. De là l’oeil triste des pbilosopbes toujours fixé sur cette montagne de ténèbres qui est la destinée, et du haut de laquelle le colossal spectre du mal laisse tomber des poignées de serpents sur la terre.

Barkilphedro avait le corps obèse et le visage maigre. Torse gras et face osseuse. Il avait les ongles cannelés et courts, les doigts noueux, les pouces plats, les cheveux gros, beaucoup de distance d’une tempe à l’autre, et un front de meurtrier, large et bas. L’oeil bridé cachait la petitesse de son regard sous une broussaille de sourcils. Le nez long, pointu, bossu et mou, s’appliquait presque sur la bouche. Barkilphedro, convenablement vêtu en empereur, eût un peu ressemblé à Domitien.

Sa face d’un jaune rance était comme modelée dans une pâte visqueuse; ses joues immobiles semblaient de mastic; il avait toutes sortes de vilaines rides réfractaires, l’angle de la mâchoire massif, le menton lourd, l’oreille canaille. Au repos, de profil, sa lèvre supérieure relevée en angle aigu laissait voir deux dents. Ces dents avaient l’air de vous regarder. Les dents regardent, de même que l’oeil mord.

Patience, tempérance, continence, réserve, retenue, aménité, déférence, douceur, politesse, sobriété, chasteté, complétaient et achevaient Barkilphedro. Il calomniait ces vertus en les ayant.

En peu de temps Barkilphedro prit pied à la cour.

VIII

INFERI

On peut, à la cour, prendre pied de deux façons: dans les nuées, on est auguste; dans la boue, on est puissant.

Dans le premier cas, on est de l'olympe. Dans le second cas, on est de la garde-robe.

Qui est de l'olympe n'a que la foudre; qui est de la garde-robe a la police.

La garde-robe contient tous les instruments de règne, et parfois, car elle est traître, le châtiment. Héliogabale y vient mourir.

Alors elle s'appelle les latrines.

D'habitude elle est moins tragique. C'est là qu'Albéroni admire Vendôme. La garde-robe est volontiers le lieu d'audience des personnes royales. Elle fait fonction de trône. Louis XIV y reçoit la duchesse de Bourgogne; Philippe V y est coude à coude avec la reine. Le prêtre y pénètre. La garde-robe est parfois une succursale du confessionnal.

C'est pourquoi il y a à la cour les fortunes du dessous. Ce ne sont pas les moindres.

Si vous voulez, sous Louis XI, être grand, soyez Pierre de Rohan, maréchal de France; si vous voulez, être influent, soyez Olivier le Daim, barbier, Si vous voulez, sous Marie de Médicis, être glorieux, soyez Sillery, chancelier; si vous voulez être considérable, soyez la Hannon, femme de chambre. Si vous voulez, sous Louis XV, être illustre, soyez Choiseul, ministre; si vous voulez être redoutable, soyez Lebel, valet. Étant donné Louis XIV, Bontemps qui lui fait son lit est plus puissant que Louvois qui lui fait ses armées et que Turenne qui lui fait ses victoires. De Richelieu ôtez le père Joseph, voilà Richelieu presque vide. Il a de moins le mystère. L'éminence rouge est superbe, l'éminence grise est terrible. Être un ver, quelle force! Tous les Narvaez amalgamés avec tous les O'Donnell font moins de besogne qu'une soeur Patrocinio.

Par exemple, la condition de cette puissance, c'est la petitesse.

Si vous voulez rester fort, restez chétif. Soyez le néant. Le serpent au repos, couché en rond, figure à la fois l'infini et zéro.

Une de ces fortunes vipérines était échue à Barkilphedro.

Il s'était glissé où il voulait.

Les bêtes plates entrent partout. Louis XIV avait des punaises dans son lit et des jésuites dans sa politique.

D'incompatibilité, point.

En ce monde tout est pendule. Graviter, c'est osciller. Un pôle vaut l'autre. François Ier veut Triboulet; Louis XV veut Lebel.

Il existe une affinité profonde entre cette extrême hauteur et cet extrême abaissement.

C'est l'abaissement qui dirige. Rien de plus aisé à comprendre.

Qui est dessous tient les fils.

Pas de position plus commode.

On est l'oeil, et on a l'oreille.

On est l'oeil du gouvernement.

On a l'oreille du roi.

Avoir l'oreille du roi, c'est tirer et pousser à sa fantaisie le verrou de la conscience royale, et fourrer dans cette conscience ce qu'on veut. L'esprit du roi, c'est votre armoire. Si vous êtes chiffonnier, c'est votre hotte. L'oreille des rois n'est pas aux rois; c'est ce qui fait qu'en somme ces pauvres diables sont peu responsables. Qui ne possède pas sa pensée, ne possède pas son action. Un roi, cela obéit.

A quoi?

A une mauvaise âme quelconque qui du dehors lui bourdonne dans l'oreille. Mouche sombre de l'abîme.

Ce bourdonnement commande. Un règne est une dictée.

La voix haute, c'est le souverain; la voix basse, c'est la souveraineté.

Ceux qui dans un règne savent distinguer cette voix basse et entendre ce qu'elle souffle à la voix haute, sont les vrais historiens.

IX

HAÏR EST AUSSI FORT QU’AIMER

La reine Anne avait autour d’elle plusieurs de ces voix basses.

Barkilphedro en était une.

Outre la reine, il travaillait, influençait et pratiquait sourdement lady Josiane et lord David. Nous l’avons dit, il parlait bas à trois oreilles. Une oreille de plus que Dangeau.

Dangeau ne parlait bas qu’à deux, du temps où, passant sa tête entre Louis XIV épris d’Henriette sa belle-soeur, et Henriette éprise de Louis XIV son beau-frère, secrétaire de Louis à l’insu d’Henriette et d’Henriette à l’insu de Louis, situé au beau milieu de l’amour des deux marionnettes, il faisait les demandes et les réponses.

Barkilphedro était si riant, si acceptant, si incapable de prendre la défense de qui que ce soit, si peu dévoué au fond, si laid, si méchant, qu’il était tout simple qu’une personne royale en vînt à ne pouvoir se passer de lui. Quand Anne eut gouté de Barkilphedro, elle ne voulut pas d’autre flatteur. Il la flattait comme on flattait Louis le Grand, par la piqûre autrui. — Le roi étant ignorant, dit madame de Montchevreuil, on est obligé de bafouer les savants.

Empoisonner de temps en temps la piqûre, c’est le comble de l’art. Néron aime à voir travailler Locuste.

Les palais royaux sont très pénétrables; ces madrépores ont une voirie intérieure vite devinée, pratiquée, fouillée, et au besoin évidée, par ce rongeur qu’on nomme le courtisan. Un prétexte pour entrer suffit. Barkilphedro ayant ce prétexte, sa charge, fut en très peu de temps chez la reine ce qu’il était chez la duchesse Josiane, l’animal domestique indispensable. Un mot qu’il hasarda un jour le mit tout de suite au fait de la reine; il sut à quoi s’en tenir sur la bonté de sa majesté. La reine aimait beaucoup son lord stewart, William Cavendish, duc de Devonshire, qui était très imbécile. Ce lord, qui avait tous les grades d’Oxford et ne savait pas l’orthographe, fit un beau matin la bêtise de mourir. Mourir, c’est fort imprudent à la cour, car personne ne se gêne plus pour parler de vous. La reine, Barkilphedro présent, se lamenta, et finit par s’écrier en soupirant: —

C’est dommage que tant de vertus fussent portées et servies par une si pauvre intelligence!

— Dieu veuille avoir son âne! murmura Barkilpbedro, à demi-voix et en français.

La reine sourit. Barkilphedro enregistra ce sourire.

Il en conclut: Mordre plaît.

Congé était donné à sa malice.

A partir de ce jour, il fourra sa curiosité partout, sa malignit aussi. On le laissait faire, tant on le craignait. Qui fait rire le roi fait trembler le reste.

C’était un puissant drôle.

Il faisait chaque jour des pas en avant, sous terre. On avait besoin de Barkilphedro. Plusieurs grands l’honoraient de leur confiance au point de le charger dans l’occasion d’une commission honteuse.

La cour est un engrenage. Barkilphedro y devint moteur.

Avez-vous remarqué dans certains mécanismes la petitesse de la roue motrice?

Josiane, en particulier, qui utilisait, nous l’avons indiqué, le talent d’espion de Barkilphedro, avait en lui une telle confiance, qu’elle n’avait pas hésité à lui remettre une des clefs secrètes de son appartement, au moyen de laquelle il pouvait entrer chez elle à toute heure. Cette excessive livraison de sa vie intime était une mode au dix-septième siècle.

Cela s’appelait: donner la clef. Josiane avait donné deux de ces clefs de confiance; lord David avait l’une, Barkilphedro avait l’autre.

Du reste, pénétrer d’emblée jusqu’aux chambres à coucher était dans les vieilles moeurs une chose nullement surprenante. De l des incidents. La Ferté, tirant brusquement les rideaux du lit de mademoiselle Lafont, y trouvait Sainson, mousquetaire noir, etc., etc.

Barkilphedro excellait à faire de ces découvertes sournoises qui subordonnent et soumettent les grands aux petits. Sa marche dans l’ombre était tortueuse, douce et savante. Comme tout espion parfait, il était composé d’une inclémence de bourreau et d’une patience de micrographe.

Il était courtisan né. Tout courtisan est un noctambule. Le courtisan rôde dans cette nuit qu’on appelle la toute-puisssance. Il a une lanterne sourde à la main.

Il éclaire le point qu’il veut, et reste ténébreux. Ce qu’il cherche avec cette lanterne, ce n’est pas un homme; c’est une bête. Ce qu’il trouve, c’est le roi.

Les rois n'aiment pas qu'on prétende être grand autour d'eux.
L'ironie à qui n'est pas eux les charme. Le talent de Barkilphedro consistait en un rapetissement perpétuel des lords et des princes, au profit de la majesté royale, grandie d'autant.

La clef intime qu'avait Barkilphedro était faite, ayant deux jeux, un à chaque extrémité, de façon à pouvoir ouvrir les petits appartements dans les deux résidences favorites de Josiane, Hunkerville-house à Londres, Corleone-lodge à Windsor. Ces deux hôtels faisaient partie de l'héritage Clancharlie.

Hunkerville-house confinait à Oldgate. Oldgate à Londres était une porte par où l'on venait de Harwick, et où l'on voyait une statue de Charles II ayant sur sa tête un ange peint, et sous ses pieds un lion et une licorne sculptés. De Hunkerville-house, par le vent d'est, on entendait le carillon de Sainte-Marylebone.

Corleone-lodge était un palais florentin en brique et en pierre avec colonnade de marbre, bâti sur pilotis à Windsor, au bout du pont de bois, et ayant une des plus superbes cours d'honneur de l'Angleterre.

Dans ce dernier palais, contigu au château de Windsor, Josiane était à portée de la reine. Josiane s'y plaisait néanmoins.

Presque rien au dehors, toute en racines, telle était l'influence de Barkilphedro sur la reine. Rien de plus difficile à arracher que ces mauvaises herbes de cour; elles s'enfoncent très avant et n'offrent aucune prise extérieure. Sarcler Roquelaure, Triboulet ou Brummel, est presque impossible.

De jour en jour, et de plus en plus, la reine Anne prenait en gr Barkilphedro.

Sarah Jennings est célèbre; Barkilphedro est inconnu; sa faveur resta obscure. Ce nom, Barkilphedro, n'est pas arrivé jusqu' l'histoire. Toutes les taupes ne sont pas prises par le taupier.

Barkilphedro, ancien candidat clergyman, avait un peu étudi tout; tout effleuré donne pour résultat rien. On peut être victime de l'omnis res scibilis. Avoir sous le crâne le tonneau des Danaïdes, c'est le malheur de toute une race de savants qu'on peut appeler les stériles. Ce que Barkilphedro avait mis dans son cerveau l'avait laissé vide.

L'esprit, comme la nature, a horreur du vide. Dans le vide, la nature met l'amour; l'esprit, souvent, y met la haine. La haine occupe.

Là haine pour la haine existe. L’art pour l’art est dans la nature, plus qu’on ne croit.

On hait. Il faut bien faire quelque chose.

La haine gratuite, mot formidable. Cela veut dire la haine qui est à elle-même son propre paiement.

L’ours vit de se lécher la griffe.

Indéfiniment, non. Cette griffe, il faut la ravitailler. Il faut mettre quelque chose dessous.

Haïr indistinctement est doux et suffit quelque temps; mais il faut finir par avoir un objet. Une animosité diffuse sur la création épuise, comme toute jouissance solitaire. La haine sans objet ressemble au tir sans cible. Ce qui intéresse le jeu, c’est un coeur à percer.

On ne peut pas haïr uniquement pour l’honneur. Il faut un assaisonnement, un homme, une femme, quelqu’un à détruire.

Ce service d’intéresser le jeu, d’offrir un but, de passionner la haine en la fixant, d’amuser le chasseur par la vue de la proie vivante, de faire espérer au guetteur le bouillonnement tiède et fumant du sang qui va couler, d’épanouir l’oiseleur par la crédulité inutilement ailée de l’alouette, d’être une bête couvée à son insu pour le meurtre par un esprit, ce service exquis et horrible dont n’a pas conscience celui qui le rend, Josiane le rendit à Barkilphedro.

La pensée est un projectile. Barkilphedro, dès le premier jour, s’était mis à viser Josiane avec les mauvaises intentions qu’il avait dans l’esprit. Une intention et une escopette, cela se ressemble. Barkilphedro se tenait en arrêt, dirigeant contre la duchesse toute sa méchanceté secrète. Cela vous étonne? Que vous a fait l’oiseau à qui vous tirez un coup de fusil? C’est pour le manger, dites-vous. Barkilphedro aussi.

Josiane ne pouvait guère être frappée au coeur, l’endroit où est une énigme est difficilement vulnérable mais elle pouvait être atteinte à la tête, c’est-à-dire à l’orgueil.

C’est par là qu’elle se croyait forte et qu’elle était faible.

Barkilphedro s’en était rendu compte.

Si Josiane avait pu voir clair dans la nuit de Barkilphedro, si elle avait pu distinguer ce qui était embusqué derrière ce sourire, cette fière personne, si haut située, eût probablement tremblé. Heureusement pour la tranquillité de ses sommeils, elle ignorait absolument ce qu’il y avait dans cet homme.

L’inattendu fuse on ne sait d’où. Les profonds dessous de la vie sont redoutables. Il n’y a point de haine petite. La haine est toujours énorme. Elle conserve sa stature dans le plus petit être, et reste monstre. Une haine est toute la haine. Un éléphant que hait une fourmi est en danger.

Même avant d’avoir frappé, Barkilphedro sentait avec joie un commencement de saveur de l’action mauvaise qu’il voulait commettre. Il ne savait encore ce qu’il ferait contre Josiane.

Mais il était décidé à faire quelque chose. C’était déj beaucoup qu’un tel parti pris.

Anéantir Josiane, c’eût été trop de succès. Il ne l’espérait point. Mais l’humilier, l’amoindrir, la désoler, rougir de larmes de rage ces yeux superbes, voilà une réussite. Il y comptait. Tenace, appliqué, fidèle au tourment d’autrui, inarrachable, la nature ne l’avait pas fait ainsi pour rien. Il entendait bien trouver le défaut de l’armure d’or de Josiane, et faire ruisseler le sang de celte olympienne. Quel bénéfice, insistons-y, y avait-il là pour lui? Un bénéfice énorme. Faire du mal à qui nous a fait du bien.

Qu’est-ce qu’un envieux? C’est un ingrat. Il déteste la lumière qui l’éclaire et le réchauffe. Zoile hait ce bienfait, Homère.

Faire subir à Josiane ce qu’on appellerait aujourd’hui une vivisection, l’avoir, toute convulsive, sur sa table d’anatomie, la disséquer, vivante, à loisir dans une chirurgie quelconque, la déchiqueter en amateur pendant qu’elle hurlerait, ce rêve charmait Barkilphedro.

Pour arriver à ce résultat, il eût fallu souffrir un peu, qu’il l’eût trouvé bon. On peut se pincer à sa tenaille. Le couteau en se reployant vous coupe les doigts; qu’importe! Être un peu pris dans la torture de Josiane lui eût été égal. Le bourreau, manieur de fer rouge, a sa part de brûlure, et n’y prend pas garde. Parce que l’autre souffre davantage, on ne sent rien.

Voir le supplicié se tordre vous ôte votre douleur.

Fais ce qui nuit, advienne que pourra.

La construction du mal d’autrui se complique d’une acceptation de responsabilité obscure. On se risque soi-même dans le danger qu’on fait courir à un autre, tant les enchaînements de tout peuvent amener d’écroulements inattendus. Ceci n’arrête point le vrai méchant. Il ressent en joie ce que le patient éprouve en angoisse. Il a le chatouillement de ce déchirement; l’homme mauvais ne s’épanouit qu’affreusement. Le supplice se réverbère sur lui en bien-être. Le duc d’Albe se chauffait les mains aux bûchers. Foyer, douleur; reflet, plaisir. Que de telles transpositions soient possibles, cela fait frissonner. Notre côté ténèbres est insondable. Supplice exquis, l'expression est dans Bodin, ayant peut-être ce triple sens terrible: recherche du tourment, souffrance du tourmenté, volupté du tourmenteur. Ambition, appétit, tous ces mots signifient quelqu'un sacrifié à quelqu'un satisfait. Chose triste, que l'espérance puisse être perverse. En vouloir à une créature, c'est lui vouloir du mal. Pourquoi pas du bien? Serait-ce que le principal versant de notre volonté serait du côté du mal? Un des plus rudes labeurs du juste, c'est de s'extraire continuellement de l'âme une malveillance difficilement épuisable. Presque toutes nos convoitises, examinées, contiennent de l'inavouable. Pour le méchant complet, et cette perfection hideuse existe, Tant pis pour les autres signifie Tant mieux pour moi. Ombre de l'homme. Cavernes.

Livre IV, page 100.

Josiane avait cette plénitude de sécurité que donne l'orgueil ignorant, fait du mépris de tout. La faculté féminine de dédaigner est extraordinaire. Un dédain inconscient, involontaire et confiant, c'était là Josiane. Barkilphedro était pour elle à peu près une chose. On l'eût bien étonnée, si on lui eût dit que Barkilphedro, cela existait.

Elle allait, venait et riait, devant cet homme qui la contemplait obliquement.

Lui, pensif, il épiait une occasion.

A mesure qu'il attendait, sa détermination de jeter dans la vie de celte femme un désespoir quelconque, augmentait.

Affût inexorable.

D'ailleurs il se donnait à lui-même d'excellentes raisons. Il ne faut pas croire que les coquins ne s'estiment pas. Ils se rendent des comptes dans des monologues altiers, et ils le prennent de très haut. Comment! cette Josiane lui avait fait l'aumône! Elle avait émietté sur lui, comme sur un mendiant, quelques liards de sa colossale richesse! Elle l'avait rivé et cloué à une fonclion inepte! Si, lui Barkilphedro, presque homme d'église, capacité variée et profonde, personnage docte, ayant l'étoffe d'un révérend, il avait pour emploi d'enregistrer des tessons bons à racler les pustules de Job, s'il passait sa vie dans un galetas de greffe à déboucher gravement de stupides bouteilles incrustées de toutes les saletés de la mer, et déchiffrer des parchemins moisis, des pourritures de grimoires, des ordures de testaments, on ne sait quelles balivernes illisibles, c’était la faute de cette Josiane! Comment! cette créature le tutoyait!

Et il ne se vengerait pas!

Et il ne punirait pas cette espèce!

Ah ça mais! il n’y aurait donc plus de justice ici-bas!

X

FLAMBOIEMENTS QU’ON VERRAIT SI L’HOMME ÉTAIT TRANSPARENT

Quoi! cette femme, cette extravagante, cette songeuse lubrique, vierge jusqu’à l’occasion, ce morceau de chair n’ayant pas encore fait sa livraison, cette effronterie à couronne princière, cette Diane par orgueil, pas encore prise par le premier venu, soit, peut-être, on le dit, j’y consens, faute d’un hasard, cete bâtarde d’une canaille de roi qui n’avait pas eu l’esprit de rester en place, cette duchesse de raccroc, qui, grande dame, jouait à la déesse, et qui, pauvre, eût été fille publique, cette lady à peu près, cette voleuse des biens d’un proscrit, cette hautaine gueuse, parce qu’un jour, lui Barkilphedro, n’avait pas de quoi dîner, et qu’il était sans asile, avait eu l’impudence de l’asseoir chez elle à un bout de table, et de le nicher dans un trou quelconque de son insupportable palais, ou ça? n’importe où, peut-être au grenier, peut-être à la cave, qu’est-ce que cela fait? un peu mieux que les valets, un peu plus mal que les chevaux! Elle avait abusé de sa détresse, à lui, Barkilphedro, pour se dépêcher de lui rendre traîtreusement service, ce que font les riches afin d’humilier les pauvres, et de se les attacher comme des bassets qu’on mène en laisse! Qu’est-ce que ce service lui coûtait d’ailleurs? Un service vaut ce qu’il coûte. Elle avait des chambres de trop dans sa maison. Venir en aide à Barkilphedro! le bel effort qu’elle avait fait là!

avait-elle mangé une cuillerée de soupe à la tortue de moins?

s’élait-elle privée de quelque chose dans le débordement haïssable de son superflu? Non. Elle avait ajouté à ce superflu une vanité, un objet de luxe, une bonne action en bague au doigt, un homme d’esprit secouru, un clergyman patronné! Elle pouvait prendre des airs, dire: je prodigue les bienfaits, je donne la becquée à des gens de lettres, faire sa protectrice! Est-il heureux de m’avoir trouvée, ce misérable! Quelle amie des arts je suis! Le tout pour avoir dressé un lit de sangle dans un méchant bouge sous les combles! Quant à la place à l’amirauté, Barkilphedro la tenait de Josiane, parbleu! jolie fonction!

Josiane avait fait Barkilphedro ce qu’il était. Elle l’avait créé, soit. Oui, créé rien. Moins que rien. Car il se sentait, dans cette charge ridicule, ployé, ankylosé et contrefait. Que devait-il à Josiane? La reconnaissance du bossu pour sa mère qui l’a fait difforme. Voilà ces privilégiés, ces gens comblés, ces parvenus, ces préférés de la hideuse marâtre fortune! Et l’homme à talents, et Barkilphedro, était forcé de se ranger dans les escaliers, de saluer des laquais, de grimper le soir un tas d’étages, et d’être courtois, empressé, gracieux, déférent, agréable, et d’avoir toujours sur le museau une grimace respectueuse! S’il n’y a pas de quoi grincer de rage! Et pendant ce temps-la elle se mettait des perles au cou, et elle prenait des poses d’amoureuse avec son imbécile de lord David Dirry-Moir, la drôlesse!

Ne vous laissez jamais rendre service. On en abusera. Ne vous laissez pas prendre en délit d’inanition, On vous soulagerait.

Parce qu’il était sans pain, cette femme avait trouvé le prétexte suffisant pour lui donner à manger! Désormais il était son domestique! Une défaillance d’estomac, et vous voilà à la chaîne pour la vie! Être obligé, c’est être exploité. Les heureux, les puissants, profitent du moment où vous tendez la main pour vous mettre un sou dedans, et de la minute où vous êtes lâche pour vous faire esclave, et esclave de la pire espèce, esclave d’une charité, esclave forcé d’aimer! quelle infamie! quelle indélicatesse, quelle surprise à notre fierté! Et c’est fini, vous voilà condamné, à perpétuité, à trouver bon cet homme, trouver belle cette femme, à rester au second plan du subalterne, à approuver, à applaudir, à admirer, à encenser, à vous prosterner, à mettre à vos rotules le calus de l’agenouillement, à sucrer vos paroles, quand vous êtes rongé de colère, quand vous mâchez des cris de fureur, et quand vous avez, en vous plus de soulèvement sauvage et plus d’écume amère que l’océan.

C’est ainsi que les riches font prisonnier le pauvre.

Cette glu de la bonne action commise sur vous vous barbouille et vous embourbe pour toujours.

Une aumône est irrémédiable. Reconnaissance, c’est paralysie.

Le bienfait a une adhérence visqueuse et répugnante qui vous ôte vos libres mouvements. Les odieux êtres opulents et gavés dont la pitié a sévi sur vous le savent. C’est dit. Vous êtes leur chose. Ils vous ont acheté. Combien? un os, qu’ils ont retir à leur chien pour vous l’offrir. Ils vous ont lancé cet os à la tête. Vous avez été lapidé autant que secouru. C’est égal.

Avez-vous rongé l’os, oui ou non? Vous avez eu aussi votre part de la niche. Donc remerciez. Remerciez à jamais. Adorez, vos maîtres. Génuflexion indéfinie. Le bienfait implique un sous-entendu d’infériorité acceptée par vous. Ils exigent que vous vous sentiez pauvre diable et que vous les sentiez dieux.

Votre diminution les augmente. Votre courbure les redresse. Il y a dans leur son de voix une douce pointe impertinente. Leurs événements de famille, mariages, baptêmes, la femelle pleine, les petits qu'on met bas, cela vous regarde. Il leur naît un louveteau, bien, vous composerez un sonnet. Vous êtes poëte pour être plat. Si ce n'est pas à faire crouler les astres! Un peu plus, ils vous feraient user leurs vieux souliers!

— Qu'est-ce que vous avez donc là chez vous, ma chère? qu'il est laid! qu'est-ce que c'est que cet homme? — Je ne sais pas, c'est un grimaud que je nourris. — Ainsi dialoguent ces dindes. Sans même baisser la voix. Vous entendez, et vous restez mécaniquement aimable. Du reste, si vous êtes malade, vos maîtres vous envoient le médecin. Pas le leur. Dans l'occasion, ils s'informent. N'étant pas de la même espèce que vous, et l'inaccessible étant de leur côté, ils sont affables. Leur escarpement les fait abordables. Ils savent que le plain-pied est impossible. A force de dédain, ils sont polis. A table, ils vous font un petit signe de tête. Quelquefois ils savent l'orthographe de votre nom. Ils ne vous font pas sentir qu'ils sont vos protecteurs autrement qu'en marchant naïvement sur tout ce que vous avez de susceptible et de délicat. Ils vous traitent avec bonté!

Est-ce assez abominable?

Certes, il était urgent de châtier la Josiane. Il fallait lui apprendre à qui elle avait eu affaire! Ah! messieurs les riches, parce que vous ne pouvez pas tout consommer, parce que l'opulence aboutirait à l'indigestion, vu la petitesse de vos estomacs égaux aux nôtres, après tout, parce qu'il vaut mieux distribuer les restes que les perdre, vous érigez, cette pâtée jetée aux pauvres en magnificence! Ah! vous nous donnez du pain, vous nous donnez, un asile, vous nous donnez, des vêtements, vous nous donnez un emploi, et vous poussez l'audace, la folie, la cruauté, l'ineptie et l'absurdité jusqu'à croire que nous sommes vos obligés! Ce pain, c'est un pain de servitude, cet asile, c'est une chambre de valet, ces vêtements, c'est une livrée, cet emploi, c'est une dérision, payée, soit, mais abrutissante! Ah! vous vous croyez le droit de nous flétrir avec du logement et de la nourriture, vous vous imaginez, que nous vous sommes redevables, et vous comptez sur de la reconnaissance! Eh bien! nous vous mangerons le ventre! Eh bien! nous vous détripaillerons, belle madame, et nous vous dévorerons toute en vie, et nous vous couperons les attaches du coeur avec nos dents!

Cette Josiane! n’était-ce pas monstrueux? quel mérite avait-elle? Elle avait fait ce chef-d’oeuvre de venir au monde en témoignage de la bêtise de son père et de la honte de sa mère, elle nous faisait la grâce d’exister, et cette complaisance qu’elle avait d’être un scandale public, on la lui payait des millions, elle avait des terres et des châteaux, des garennes, des chasses, des lacs, des forêts, est-ce que je sais, moi? et avec cela elle faisait sa sotte! et on lui adressait des vers!

et lui, Barkilphedro, qui avait étudié et travaillé, qui s’était donné de la peine, qui s’était fourré de gros livres dans les yeux et dans la cervelle, qui avait pourri dans les bouquins et dans la science, qui avait énormément d’esprit, qui commanderait très bien des armées, qui écrirait des tragédies comme Otway et Dryden, s’il voulait, lui qui était fait pour être empereur, il avait été réduit à permettre à cette rien du tout de l’empêcher de crever de faim! L’usurpation de ces riches, exécrables élus du hasard, peut-elle aller plus loin! Faire semblant d’être généreux avec nous, et nous protéger, et nous sourire à nous qui boirions leur sang et qui nous lècherions les lèvres ensuite!

Que la basse femme de cour ait l’odieuse puissance d’être bienfaitrice, et que l’homme supérieur puisse être condamn ramasser de telles bribes tombant d’une telle main, quelle plus épouvantable iniquité! Et quelle sociélé que celle qui a à ce point pour base la disproportion et l’injustice! Ne serait-ce pas le cas de tout prendre par les quatre coins, et d’envoyer pêle-mêle au plafond la nappe et le festin et l’orgie, et l’ivresse et l’ivrognerie, et les convives, et ceux qui sont deux coudes sur la table, et ceux qui sont à quatre pattes dessous, et les insolents qui donnent et les idiots qui acceptent, et de recracher tout au nez de Dieu, et de jeter au ciel toute la terre! En attendant, enfonçons nos griffes dans Josiane.

Ainsi songeait Barkilphedro. C’étaient là les rugissements qu’il avait dans l’âme. C’est l’habitude de l’envieux de s’absoudre en amalgamant à son grief personnel le mal public. Toutes les formes farouches des passions haineuses allaient et venaient dans cette intelligence féroce. A l’angle des vieilles mappemondes du quinzième siècle, on trouve un large espace vague sans forme et sans nom où sont écrits ces trois mots: Hic sunt leones. Ce coin sombre est aussi dans l’homme. Les passions rôdent et grondent quelque part en nous, et l’on peut dire aussi d’un côt obscur de notre âme: Il y a ici des lions.

Cet échafaudage de raisonnements fauves était-il absolument absurde? cela manquait-il d'un certain jugement? Il faut bien le dire, non.

Il est effrayant de penser que cette chose qu'on a en soi, le jugement, n'est pas la justice. Le jugement, c'est le relatif.
La justice, c'est l'absolu. Réfléchissez à la différence entre un juge et un juste.

Les méchants malmènent la conscience avec autorité. Il y a une gymnastique du faux. Un sophiste est un faussaire, et dans l'occasion ce faussaire brutalise le bon sens. Une certaine logique très souple, très implacable et très agile est au service du mal et excelle à meurtrir la vérité dans les ténèbres. Coups de poing sinistres de Satan à Dieu.

Tel sophiste, admiré des niais, n'a pas d'autre gloire que d'avoir fait des «bleus» à la conscience humaine.

L'affligeant, c'est que Barkilphedro pressentait un avortemcnt.
Il entreprenait un vaste travail, et en somme, il le craignait du moins, pour peu de ravage. Être un homme corrosif, avoir en soi une volonté d'acier, une haine de diamant, une curiosité ardente de la catastrophe, et ne rien brûler, ne rien décapiter, ne rien exterminer! Être ce qu'il était, une force de dévastation, une animosité vorace, un rongeur du bonheur d'autrui, avoir ét créé — (car il y a un créateur, le diable ou Dieu, n'importe qui!) avoir été créé de toutes pièces Barkilphedro pour ne réaliser peut-être qu'une chiquenaude; est-ce possible! Barkilphedro manquerait son coup! Être un ressort à lancer des quartiers de rocher, et lâcher toute sa détente pour faire à une mijaurée une bosse au front! une catapulte faisant le dégât d'une pichenette! accomplir une besogne de Sisyphe pour un résultat de fourmi!
suer toute la haine pour à peu près rien! Est-ce assez humiliant quand on est un mécanisme d'hostilité à broyer le monde! Mettre en mouvement tous ses engrenages, faire dans l'ombre un fracas de machine de Marly, pour réussir peut-être à pincer le bout d'un petit doigt rose! Il allait tourner et retourner des blocs pour arriver, qui sait? à rider un peu la surface plate de la cour!
Dieu a cette manie de dépenser grandement les forces. Un remuement de montagne aboutit au déplacement d'une taupinière.

En outre, la cour étant donnée, terrain bizarre, rien n'est plus dangereux que de viser son ennemi, et de le manquer. D'abord cela vous démasque à votre ennemi, et cela l'irrite; ensuite, et surtout, cela déplaît au maître. Les rois goûtent peu les maladroits. Pas de contusions; pas de gourmades laides.

Égorgez, tout le monde, ne faites saigner du nez à personne. Qui tue est habile, qui blesse est inepte. Les rois n'aiment pas qu'on écloppe leurs domestiques. Ils vous en veulent si vous fêlez une porcelaine sur leur cheminée ou un courtisan dans leur cortège. La cour doit rester propre. Cassez, et remplacez; c'est bien.

Ceci se concilie du reste parfaitement avec le goût des médisances qu'ont les princes. Dites du mal, n'en faites point.
Ou, si vous en faites, que ce soit en grand.

Poignardez, mais n'égratignez pas. A moins que l'épingle ne soit empoisonnée. Circonstance atténuante. C'était, rappelons-le, le cas de Barkilphedro.

Tout pygmée haineux est la fiole où est enfermé le dragon de Salomon. Fiole microscopique, dragon démesuré. Condensation formidable attendant l'heure gigantesque de la dilatation. Ennui consolé par la préméditation de l'explosion. Le contenu est plus grand que le contenant. Un géant latent, quelle chose étrange!
un acarus dans lequel il y a une hydre! Être cette affreuse boîte à surprise, avoir en soi Léviathan, c'est pour le nain une torture et une volupté.

Aussi rien n'eût fait lâcher prise à Barkilphedro. Il attendait son heure. Viendrait-elle? Qu'importe? il l'attendait. Quand on est très mauvais, l'amour-propre s'en mêle. Faire des trous et des sapes à une fortune de cour, plus haute que nous, la miner à ses risques et périls, tout souterrain et tout caché qu'on est, insistons-y, c'est intéressant. On se passionne à un tel jeu. On s'éprend de cela comme d'un poëme épique qu'on ferait. Être très petit et s'attaquer à quelqu'un de très grand est une action d'éclat. C'est beau d'être la puce d'un lion.

L'altière bête se sent piquée et dépense son énorme colère contre l'atome. Un tigre rencontré l'ennuierait moins. Et voilà les rôles changés. Le lion humilié a dans sa chair le dard de l'insecte, et la puce peut dire: j'ai en moi du sang de lion.

Pourtant, ce n'étaient là pour l'orgueil de Barkilphedro que de demi-apaisements. Consolations. Palliatifs. Taquiner est une chose, torturer vaudrait mieux. Barkilphedro, pensée désagréable qui lui revenait sans cesse, n'aurait vraisemblablement pas d'autre succès que d'entamer chétivement l'épiderme de Josiane.
Que pouvait-il espérer de plus, lui si infime contre elle si radieuse? Une égratignure, que c'est peu, à qui voudrait toute la pourpre de l'écorchure vive, et les rugissements de la femme plus que nue, n'ayant même plus cette chemise, la peau! avec de telles envies, que c'est fâcheux d'être impuissant! Hélas! rien n'est parfait.

En somme il se résignait. Ne pouvant mieux, il ne rêvait que la moitié de son rêve. Faire une farce noire, c'est là un but après tout.

Celui qui se venge d'un bienfait, quel homme! Barkilphedro était ce colosse. Ordinairement l'ingratitude est de l'oubli; chez ce privilégié du mal, elle était de la fureur. L'ingrat vulgaire est rempli de cendre. De quoi était plein Barkilphedro? d'une fournaise. Fournaise murée de haine, de colère, de silence, de rancune, attendant pour combustible Josiane. Jamais un homme n'avait à ce point abhorré une femme sans raison. Quelle chose terrible! Elle était son insomnie, sa préoccupation, son ennui, sa rage.

Peut-être en était-il un peu amoureux.

XI

BARKILPHEDRO EN EMBUSCADE

Trouver l’endroit sensible de Josiane et la frapper là; telle était, pour toutes les causes que nous venons de dire, la volont imperturbable de Barkilphedro.

Vouloir ne suffit pas; il faut pouvoir.

Comment s’y prendre?

Là était la question.

Les chenapans vulgaires font soigneusement le scenario de la coquinerie qu’ils veulent commettre. Ils ne se sentent pas assez forts pour saisir l’incident au passage, pour en prendre possession de gré ou de force, et pour le contraindre à les servir. De là des combinaisons préliminaires que les méchants profonds dédaignent. Les méchants profonds ont pour tout a priori leur méchanceté; ils se bornent à s’armer de toutes pièces, préparent plusieurs en-cas variés, et, comme Barkilphedro, épient tout bonnement l’occasion. Ils savent qu’un plan façonné d’avance court risque de mal s’emboîter dans l’événement qui se présentera. On ne se rend pas comme cela maître du possible et l’on n’en fait point ce qu’on veut. On n’a point de pourparler préalable avec la destinée. Demain ne nous obéit pas. Le hasard a une certaine indiscipline.

Aussi le guettent-ils pour lui demander sans préambule, d’autorité, et sur-le-champ, sa collaboration. Pas de plan, pas d’épure, pas de maquette, pas de soulier tout fait chaussant mal l’inattendu. Ils plongent à pic dans la noirceur. La mise profit immédiate et rapide du fait quelconque qui peut aider, c’est là l’habileté qui distingue le méchant efficace, et qui élève le coquin à la dignité de démon. Brusquer le sort, c’est le génie.

Le vrai scélérat vous frappe comme une fronde, avec le premier caillou venu.

Les malfaiteurs capables comptent sur l’imprévu, cet auxiliaire stupéfait de tant de crimes.

Empoigner l’incident, sauter dessus; il n’y a pas d’autre Art poétique pour ce genre de talent.

Et, en attendant, savoir à qui l’on a affaire. Sonder le terrain.

Pour Barkilphedro, le terrain était la reine Anne.

Barkilphedro approchait la reine.

De si près que, parfois, il s'imaginait entendre les monologues de sa majesté.

Quelquefois, il assistait, point compté, aux conversations des deux soeurs. On ne lui défendait pas le glissement d'un mot. Il en profitait pour s'amoindrir. Façon d'inspirer confiance.

C'est ainsi qu'un jour, à Hampton-Court, dans le jardin, étant derrière la duchesse, qui était derrière la reine, il entendit Anne, se conformant lourdement à la mode, émettre des sentences.

— Les bêtes sont heureuses, disait la reine, elles ne risquent pas d'aller en enfer.

— Elles y sont, répondit Josiane.

Cette réponse, qui substituait brusquement la philosophie à la religion, déplut. Si par hasard c'était profond, Anne se sentait choquée.

— Ma chère, dit-elle à Josiane, nous parlons de l'enfer comme deux sottes. Demandons à Barkilphedro ce qu'il en est. Il doit savoir ces choses-là.

— Comme diable? demanda Josiane.

— Comme bête, répondit Barkilphedro.

Et il salua.

— Madame, dit la reine à Josiane, il a plus d'esprit que nous.

Pour un homme comme Barkilphedro, approcher la reine, c'était la tenir. Il pouvait dire: Je l'ai. Maintenant il lui fallait la manière de s'en servir.

Il avait pied en cour. Être posté, c'est superbe. Aucune chance ne pouvait lui échapper. Plus d'une fois il avait fait sourire méchamment la reine. C'était avoir un permis de chasse.

Mais n'y avait-il aucun gibier réservé? Ce permis de chasse allait-il jusqu'à casser l'aile ou la patte à quelqu'un comme la propre soeur de sa majesté?

Premier point à éclaircir. La reine aimait-elle sa soeur?

Un faux pas peut tout perdre. Barkilphedro observait.

Avant d'entamer la partie, le joueur regarde ses cartes. Quels atouts a-t-il? Barkilphedro commença par examiner l'âge des deux femmes: Josiane, vingt-trois ans; Anne, quarante et un ans.

C'était bien. Il avait du jeu.

Le moment où la femme cesse de compter par printemps et commence à compter par hivers, est irritant. Sourde rancune contre le temps, qu'on a en soi. Les jeunes belles épanouies, parfums pour les autres, sont pour vous épines, et de toutes ces roses vous sentez la piqûre. Il semble que toute cette fraîcheur vous est prise, et que la beauté ne décroît en vous que parée qu'elle croît chez les autres.

Exploiter cette mauvaise humeur secrète, creuser la ride d'une femme de quarante ans qui est reine, cela était indiqu Barkilphedro.

L'envie excelle à exciter la jalousie comme le rat à faire sortir le crocodile.

Barkilphedro attachait sur Anne son regard magistral.

Il voyait dans la reine comme on voit dans une stagnation. Le marécage a sa transparence. Dans une eau sale on voit des vices; dans une eau trouble on voit des inepties. Anne n'était qu'une eau trouble.

Des embryons de sentiments et des larves d'idées se mouvaient dans cette cervelle épaisse.

C'était peu distinct. Cela avait à peine des contours.

C'étaient des réalités pourtant, mais informes. La reine pensait ceci. La reine désirait cela. Préciser quoi était difficile.

Les transformations confuses qui s'opèrent dans l'eau croupissante sont malaisées à étudier.

La reine, habituellement obscure, avait par instants des échappées bêtes et brusques. C'était là ce qu'il fallait saisir.

Il fallait la prendre sur le fait.

Qu'est-ce que la reine Anne, dans son for intérieur, voulait à la duchesse Josiane? Du bien, ou du mal?

Problème. Barkilphedro se le posa.

Ce problème résolu, on pourrait aller plus loin.

Divers hasards servirent Barkilphedro. Et surtout sa ténacité au guet.

Anne était, du côté de son mari, un peu parente de la nouvelle reine de Prusse, femme du roi aux cent chambellans, de laquelle elle avait un portrait peint sur émail d'après le procédé de Turquet de Mayerne. Cette reine de Prusse avait, elle aussi, une soeur cadette illégitime, la baronne Drika.

Un jour, Barkilphedro présent, Anne fit à l'ambassadeur de Prusse des questions sur cette Drika.

— On la dit riche?

— Très riche, répondit l'ambassadeur.

— Elle a des palais?

— Plus magnifiques que ceux de la reine sa soeur.

— Qui doit-elle épouser?

— Un très grand seigneur, le comte Gormo.

— Joli?

— Charmant.

— Elle est jeune?

— Toute jeune.

— Aussi belle que la reine.

L’ambassadeur baissa la voix et répondit:

— Plus belle.

— Ce qui est insolent, murmura Barkilphedro.

La reine eut un silence, puis s’écria:

— Ces bâtardes!

Barkilphedro nota ce pluriel.

Une autre fois, à une sortie de chapelle où Barkilphedro se tenait assez près déjà reine derrière les deux grooms de l’aumônerie, lord David Dirry-Moir, traversant des rangées de femmes, fit sensation par sa bonne mine. Sur son passage éclatait un brouhaha d’exclamations féminines: — Qu’il est élégant! — Qu’il est galant! — Qu’il a grand air! — Qu’il est beau!

— Comme c’est désagréable! grommela la reine.

Barkilphedro entendit.

Il était fixé.

On pouvait nuire à la duchesse sans déplaire à la reine.

Le premier problème était résolu.

Maintenant le deuxième se présentait.

Comment faire pour nuire à la duchesse?

Quelle ressource pouvait, pour un but si ardu, lui offrir son misérable emploi?

Aucune, évidemment.

XII

ÉCOSSE, IRLANDE ET ANGLETERRE

Indiquons un détail: Josiane «avait le tour».

On le comprendra en réfléchissant qu'elle était, quoique du petit côté, soeur de la reine, c'est-à-dire personne princière.

Avoir le tour. Qu'est cela?

Le vicomte de Saint-John — prononcez Bolingbroke — écrivait Thomas Lennard, comte de Sussex: «Deux choses font qu'on est grand. En Angleterre avoir le tour; en France avoir le pour.

Le pour, en France, c'était ceci: quand le roi était en voyage, le fourrier de la cour, le soir venu, au débotté à l'étape, assignait leur logement aux personnes suivant sa majesté. Parmi ces seigneurs, quelques-uns avaient un privilège immense: «Ils ont le pour, dit le Journal historique de l'année 1694, page 6, c'est-à-dire que le fourrier qui marque les logis met Pour avant leur nom, comme: Pour M. le prince de Soubise, au lieu que, quand il marque le logis d'une personne qui n'est point prince, il ne met point de Pour, mais simplement son nom, par exemple: Le duc de Gesvres, le duc de Mazarin, etc.» Ce Pour sur une porte indiquait un prince ou un favori. Favori, c'est pire que prince. Le roi accordait le pour comme le cordon bleu ou la pairie.

«Avoir le tour» en Angleterre était moins vaniteux, mais plus réel. C'était un signe de véritable approche de la personne régnante. Quiconque était, par naissance ou faveur, en posture de recevoir des communications directes de sa majesté, avait dans le mur de sa chambre de lit un tour où était ajusté un timbre.

Le timbre sonnait, le tour s'ouvrait, une missive royale apparaissait sur une assiette d'or ou sur un coussin de velours, puis le tour se refermait. C'était intime et solennel. Le mystérieux dans le familier. Le tour ne servait à aucun autre usage. Sa sonnerie annonçait un message royal. On ne voyait pas qui l'apportait. C'était du reste tout simplement un page de la reine ou du roi. Leicester avait le tour sous Elisabeth, et Buckingham sous Jacques Ier. Josiane l'avait sous Anne, quoique peu favorite. Qui avait le tour était comme quelqu'un qui serait en relation directe avec la petite poste du ciel, et chez qui Dieu enverrait de temps en temps son facteur porter une lettre. Pas d’exception plus enviée. Ce privilège entraînait plus de servilité. On en était un peu plus valet. A la cour, ce qui élève abaisse. «Avoir le tour», cela se disait en français; ce détail d’étiquette anglaise étant probablement une ancienne platitude française.

Lady Josiane, vierge pairesse comme Elisabeth avait été vierge reine, menait, tantôt à la ville, tantôt à la campagne, selon la saison, une existence quasi princière, et tenait à peu près une cour dont lord David était courtisan, avec plusieurs. N’étant pas encore mariés, lord David et lady Josiane pouvaient sans ridicule se montrer ensemble en public, ce qu’ils faisaient volontiers. Ils allaient souvent aux spectacles et aux courses dans le même carrosse et dans la même tribune. Le mariage, qui leur était permis et même imposé, les refroidissait; mais en somme leur attrait était de se voir. Les privautés permises aux «engaged» ont une frontière aisée à franchir. Ils s’en abstenaient, ce qui est facile étant de mauvais goût.

Les plus belles boxes d’alors avaient lieu à Lambeth, paroisse o le lord archevêque de Cantorbéry a un palais, quoique l’air y soit malsain, et une riche bibliothèque ouverte à de certaines heures aux honnêtes gens. Une fois, c’était en hiver, il y eut là, dans une prairie fermée à clef, un assaut de deux hommes auquel assista Josiane, menée par David. Elle avait demandé: Est-ce que les femmes sont admises? et David avait répondu: Sunt faeminae magnates. Traduction libre: Pas les bourgeoises. Traduction littérale: Les grandes dames existent. Une duchesse entre partout. C’est pourquoi lady Josiane vit la boxe.

Lady Josiane fit seulement la concession de se vêtir en cavalier, chose fort usitée alors. Les femmes ne voyageaient guère autrement. Sur six personnes que contenait le coach de Windsor, il était rare qu’il n’y eût point une ou deux femmes habillées en hommes. C’était signe de gentry.

Lord David, étant en compagnie d’une femme, ne pouvait figurer dans le match, et devait rester simple assistant.

Lady Josiane ne trahissait sa qualité que par ceci, qu’elle regardait à travers une lorgnette, ce qui était acte de gentilhomme.

La «noble rencontre» était présidée par lord Germaine, arrière-grand-père ou grand-oncle de ce lord Germaine qui, vers la fin du dix-huitième siècle, fut colonel, lâcha pied dans une bataille, puis fut ministre de la guerre, et n’échappa aux biscayens de l’ennemi que pour tomber sous les sarcasmes de Sheridan, mitraille pire. Force gentilshommes pariaient; Harry Belew de Carleton, ayant des prétentions à la pairie éteinte de Bella-Aqua, contre Henry, lord Hyde, membre du parlement pour le bourg de Dunhivid, qu'on appelle aussi Launceston; l'honorable Peregrine Bertie, membre pour le bourg de Truro, contre sir Thomas Colepeper, membre pour Maidstone; le laird de Lamyrbau, qui est de la marche de Lothian, contre Samuel Trefusis, du bourg de Penryn; sir Bartholomew Gracedieu, du bourg Saint-Yves, contre le très honorable Charles Bodville, qui s'appelle lord Robartes, et qui est Custos Rotulorum du comté de Cornouailles. D'autres encore.

Les deux boxeurs étaient un irlandais de Tipperary nommé du nom de sa montagne natale Phelem-ghe-madone, et un écossais appel Helmsgail. Cela mettait deux orgueils nationaux en présence.

Irlande et Ecosse allaient se cogner; Erin allait donner des coups de poing à Gajothel. Aussi les paris dépassaient quarante mille guinées, sans compter les jeux fermes.

Les deux champions étaient nus avec une culotte très courte bouclée aux hanches, et des brodequins à semelles cloutées, lacés aux chevilles.

Helmsgail, l'écossais, était un petit d'à peine dix-neuf ans, mais il avait déjà le front recousu; c'est pourquoi on tenait pour lui deux et un tiers. Le mois précédent il avait enfonc une côte et crevé les deux yeux au boxeur Sixmileswater; ce qui expliquait l'enthousiasme. Il y avait eu pour ses parieurs gain de douze mille livres sterling. Outre son front recousu, Helmsgail avait la mâchoire ébréchée. Il était leste et alerte.

Il était haut comme une femme petite, ramassé, trapu, d'une stature basse et menaçante, et rien n'avait été perdu de la pâte dont il avait été fait; pas un muscle qui n'allât au but, le pugilat. Il y avait de la concision dans son torse ferme, luisant et brun comme l'airain. Il souriait, et trois dents qu'il avait de moins s'ajoutaient à son sourire.

Son adversaire était vaste et large, c'est-à-dire faible.

C'était un homme de quarante ans. Il avait six pieds de haut, un poitrail d'hippopotame, et l'air doux. Son coup de poing fendait le pont d'un navire, mais il ne savait pas le donner.

L'irlandais Phelem-ghe-madone était surtout une surface et semblait être dans les boxes plutôt pour recevoir que pour rendre. Seulement on sentait qu'il durerait longtemps. Espèce de rostbeef pas assez cuit, difficile à mordre et impossible manger. Il était ce qu'on appelle, en argot local, de la viande crue, raw flesh. Il louchait. Il semblait résigné.

Ces deux hommes avaient passé la nuit précédente côte à côte dans le même lit, et dormi ensemble. Ils avaient bu dans le même verre chacun trois doigts de vin de Porto.

Ils avaient l’un et l’autre leur groupe de souteneurs, gens de rude mine, menaçant au besoin les arbitres. Dans le groupe pour Helmsgail, on remarquait John Gromane, fameux pour porter un boeuf sur son dos, et un nommé John Bray qui un jour avait pris sur ses épaules dix boisseaux de farine à quinze gallons par boisseau, plus le meunier, et avait marché avec cette charge plus de deux cents pas plus loin. Du côté de Phelem-ghe-madone, lord Hyde avait amené de Launceston un certain Kilter, lequel demeurait au Château-Vert, et lançait par-dessus son épaule une pierre de vingt livres plus haut que la plus haute tour du château. Ces trois hommes, Kilter, Bray et Gromane, étaient de Cornouailles, ce qui honore le comté.

D’autres souteneurs étaient des garnements brutes, au râble solide, aux jambes arquées, aux grosses pattes noueuses, à la face inepte, en haillons, et ne craignant rien, étant presque tous repris de justice.

Beaucoup s’entendaient admirablement à griser les gens de police.
Chaque profession doit avoir ses talents.

Le pré choisi était plus loin que le Jardin des Ours, où l’on faisait autrefois battre les ours, les taureaux et les dogues, au delà des dernières bâtisses en construction, à côté de la masure du prieuré de Sainte-Marie Over Ry, ruiné par Henri VIII. Vent du nord et givre était le temps; une pluie fine tombait, vite figée en verglas. On reconnaissait dans les gentlemen présents ceux qui étaient pères de famille, parce qu’ils avaient ouvert leurs parapluies.

Du côté de Phelem-ghe-madone, colonel Moncreif, arbitre, et Kilter, pour tenir le genou.

Du côté de Helmsgail, l’honorable Pughe Beaumaris, arbitre, et lord Desertum, qui est de Kilcarry, pour tenir le genou.

Les deux boxeurs furent quelques instants immobiles dans l’enceinte pendant qu’on réglait les montres. Puis ils marchèrent l’un à l’autre et se donnèrent la main.

Phelem-ghe-madone dit à Helmsgail: — J’aimerais m’en aller chez moi.

Helmsgail répondit avec honnêteté: — Il faut que la gentry se soit dérangée pour quelque chose.

Nus comme ils étaient, ils avaient froid. Phelem-ghe-madone tremblait. Ses mâchoires claquaient.

Docteur Eleanor Sharp, neveu de l’archevêque d’York, leur cria: Tapez-vous, mes drôles. Ça vous réchauffera.

Cette parole d’aménité les dégela.

Ils s’attaquèrent.

Mais ni l’un ni l’autre n’étaient en colère. On compta trois reprises molles. Révérend Docteur Gumdraith, un des quarante associés d’All Souls Colleges, cria: Qu’on leur entonne du gin!

Collège de Toutes-les-Ames

Mais les deux referees et les deux parrains, juges tous quatre, maintinrent la règle. Il faisait pourtant bien froid.

On entendit le cri: first blood! Le premier sang était réclamé.

On les replaça bien en face l’un de l’autre.

Ils se regardèrent, s’approchèrent, allongèrent les bras, se touchèrent les poings, puis reculèrent. Tout à coup, Helmsgail, le petit homme, bondit.

Le vrai combat commença.

Phelem-ghe-madone fut frappé en plein front entre les deux sourcils.

Tout son visage ruissela de sang. La foule cria: Helmsgail a fait couler le bordeaux! On applaudit.

Phelem-ghe-madone, tournant ses bras comme un moulin ses ailes, se mit à démener ses deux poings au hasard.

Hemlsgail has tapped his claret.

L’honorable Peregrine Berti dit: — Aveuglé. Mais pas encore aveugle.

Crève-lui les quinquets.

En somme, les deux champions étaient vraiment bien choisis, et, quoique le temps fut peu favorable, on comprit que le match réussirait. Le quasi-géant Phelem-ghe-madone avait les inconvénients de ses avantages; il se mouvait pesamment. Ses bras étaient massue, mais son corps était masse. Le petit courait, frappait, sautait, grinçait, doublait la vigueur par la vitesse, savait les ruses. D’un côté le coup de poing primitif, sauvage, inculte, à l’état d’ignorance; de l’autre le coup de poing de la civilisation, Helmsgail combattait autant avec ses nerfs qu’avec ses muscles et avec sa méchanceté qu’avec sa force; Phelem-ghe-madone était une espèce d’assommeur inerte, un peu assommé au préalable. C’était l’art contre la nature. C’était le féroce contre le barbare.

Il était clair que le barbare serait battu. Mais pas très vite.
De là l'intérêt.

Un petit contre un grand. La chance est pour le petit. Un chat a raison d'un dogue. Les Goliath sont toujours vaincus par les David.

Une grêle d'apostrophes tombait sur les combattants: — Bravo, Helmsgail! good! well done, highlander! — Now, Phelem!

Bravo, Helmsgail! bon! c'est bien, montagnard! A ton tour Phelem!

Et, les amis de Helmsgail lui répétaient avec bienveillance l'exhortation: — Crève-lui les quinquets!

Helmsgail fit mieux, brusquement baissé et redressé avec une ondulation de reptile, il frappa Phelem-ghe-madone au sternum.

Le colosse chancela.

— Mauvais coup! cria le vicomte Barnard,

Phelem-ghe-madone s'affaissa sur le genou de Kilter en disant: — Je commence à me réchauffer.

Lord Desertum consulta les referees, et dit: — Il y aura cinq minutes de rond.

Suspension.

Phelem-ghe-madone défaillait. Kilter lui essuya le sang des yeux et la sueur du corps avec une flanelle et lui mit un goulot dans la bouche. On était à la onzième passe. Phelem-ghe-madone, outre sa plaie au front, avait les pectoraux déformés de coups, le ventre tuméfié et le sinciput meurtri. Helmsgail n'avait rien.

Un certain tumulte éclatait parmi les gentlemen.

Lord Barnard répétait: — Mauvais coup.

— Pari nul, dit le laird de Lamyrbau.

— Je réclame mon enjeu, reprit sir Thomas Colepeper.

Et l'honorable membre pour le bourg Sainl-Yves, sir Bartholomew Gracedieu, ajouta:

— Qu'on me rende mes cinq cents guinées, je m'en vais.

— Cessez le match, cria l'assistance.

Mais Phelem-ghe-madone se leva presque aussi branlant qu'un homme ivre, et dit:

— Continuons le match, à une condition. J'aurai aussi, moi, le droit de donner un mauvais coup.

On cria de toutes parts: — Accordé.

Helmsgail haussa les épaules.

Les cinq minutes passées, la reprise se fit.

Le combat, qui était une agonie pour Phelem-ghe-madone, était un jeu pour Helmsgail.

Ce que c’est que la science! le petit homme trouva moyen de mettre le grand en chancery, c’est-à-dire que tout à coup Helmsgail prit sous son bras gauche courbé comme un croissant d’acier la grosse tête de Phelem-ghe-madone, et le tint là sous son aisselle, cou ployé et nuque basse, pendant que de son poing droit, tombant et retombant comme un marteau sur un clou, mais de bas en haut et en dessous, il lui écrasait à l’aise la face. Quand Phelem-ghe-madone, enfin lâché, releva la tête, il n’avait plus de visage.

Ce qui avait été un nez, des yeux et une bouche, n’était plus qu’une apparence d’épongé noire trempée dans le sang. Il cracha.

On vit à terre quatre dents.

Puis il tomba. Kilter le reçut sur son genou.

Helmsgail était à peine touché. Il avait quelques bleus insignifiants et une égratignure à une clavicule.

Personne n’avait plus froid. On faisait seize et un quart pour Helmsgail contre Phelem-ghe-madone.

Harry de Carleton cria:

— Il n’y a plus de Phelem-ghe-madone. Je parie pour Helmsgail ma pairie de Bella-Aqua et mon titre de lord Bellew contre une vieille perruque de l’archevêque de Cantorbery.

— Donne ton mufle, dit Kilter à Phelem-ghe-madone, et, fourrant sa flanelle sanglante dans la bouteille, il le débarbouilla avec du gin. On revit la bouche, et Phelem-ghe-madone ouvrit une paupière. Les tempes semblaient fêlées.

— Encore une reprise, ami, dit Kilter. Et il ajouta: — Pour l’honneur de la basse ville.

Les gallois et les irlandais s’entendent; pourtant Phelem-ghe-madone, ne fit aucun signe pouvant indiquer qu’il avait encore quelque chose dans l’esprit.

Phelem-ghe-madone se releva, Kilter le soutenant. C’était la vingt-cinquième reprise. A la manière dont ce cyclope, car il n’avait plus qu’un oeil, se remit en posture, on comprit que c’était la fin et personne ne douta qu’il ne fût perdu. Il posa sa garde au-dessus du menton, gaucherie de moribond. Helmsgail, à peine en sueur, cria: Je parie pour moi. Mille contre un.

Helmsgail, levant le bras, frappa, et, ce fut étrange, tous deux tombèrent. On entendit un grognement gai.

C'était Phelem-ghe-madone qui était content.

Il avait profité du coup terrible qu'Helmsgail lui avait donn sur le crâne pour lui en donner un, mauvais, au nombril.

Helmsgail, gisant, râlait.

L'assistance regarda Helmsgail à terre et dit: — Remboursé.

Tout le monde battit des mains, même les perdants.

Phelem-ghe-madone avait rendu mauvais coup pour mauvais coup, et agi dans son droit.

On emporta Helmsgail sur une civière. L'opinion était qu'il n'en reviendrait point. Lord Robartes s'écria: Je gagne douze cents guinées. Phelem-ghe-madone était évidemment estropié pour la vie.

En sortant, Josiane prit le bras de lord David, ce qui est tolér entre «engaged». Elle lui dit:

— C'est très beau. Mais...

— Mais quoi?

— J'aurais cru que cela m'ôterait mon ennui. Eh bien, non.

Lord David s'arrêta, regarda Josiane, ferma la bouche et enfla les joues en secouant la tête, ce qui signifie: attention! et dit à la duchesse:

— Pour l'ennui il n'y a qu'un remède.

— Lequel?

— Gwynplaine.

La duchesse demanda:

— Qu'est-ce que c'est que Gwynplaine?

GWINPLAINE ET DEA

I

OU L’ON VOIT LE VISAGE DE CELUI DONT ON N’A ENCORE VU QUE LES ACTIONS

La nature avait été prodigue de ses bienfaits envers Gwynplaine.
Elle lui avait donné une bouche s’ouvrant jusqu’aux oreilles, des oreilles se repliant jusque sur les yeux, un nez informe fait pour l’oscillation des lunettes de grimacier, et un visage qu’on ne pouvait regarder sans rire. Nous venons de le dire, la nature avait comblé Gwynplaine de ses dons. Mais était-ce la nature?

Ne l’avait-on pas aidée?

Deux yeux pareils à des jours de souffrance, un hiatus pour bouche, une protubérance camuse avec deux trous qui étaient les narines, pour face un écrasement, et tout cela ayant pour résultante le rire, il est certain que la nature ne produit pas toute seule de tels chefs-d’oeuvre.

Seulement, le rire est-il synonyme de la joie?

Si, en présence de ce bateleur, — car c’était un bateleur, — on laissait se dissiper la première impression de gaîté, et si l’on observait cet homme avec attention, on y reconnaissait la trace de l’art. Un pareil visage n’est pas fortuit, mais voulu. Être à ce point complet n’est pas dans la nature. L’homme ne peut rien sur sa beauté, mais peut tout sur sa laideur. D’un profil hottentot vous ne ferez pas un profil romain, mais d’un nez grec vous pouvez faire un nez kalmouck. Il suffit d’oblitérer la racine du nez et d’épater les narines. Le bas latin du moyen âge n’a pas créé pour rien le verbe denasare. Gwynplaine enfant avait-il été assez digne d’attention pour qu’on s’occupât de lui au point de modifier son visage? Pourquoi pas? ne fut-ce que dans un but d’exhibition et de spéculation. Selon toute apparence, d’industrieux manieurs d’enfants avaient travaill cette figure. Il semblait évident qu’une science mystérieuse, probablement occulte, qui était à la chirurgie ce que l’alchimie est à la chimie, avait ciselé cette chair, à coup sûr dans le très bas âge, et créé, avec préméditation, ce visage. Cette science, habile aux sections, aux obtusions et aux ligatures, avait fendu la bouche, débridé les lèvres, dénudé les gencives, distendu les oreilles, décloisonné les cartilages, désordonné les sourcils et les joues, élargi le muscle zygomatique, estompé les coutures et les cicatrices, ramené la peau sur les lésions, tout en maintenant la face à l'état béant, et de cette sculpture puissante et profonde était sorti ce masque, Gwynplaine.

On ne naît pas ainsi.

Quoi qu'il en fût, Guynplaine était admirablement réussi.

Gwynplaine était un don fait par la providence à la tristesse des hommes. Par quelle providence? Y a-t-il une providence Démon comme il y a une providence Dieu? Nous posons la question sans la résoudre.

Gwynplaine était saltimbanque. Il se faisait voir en public.

Pas d'effet comparable au sien. Il guérissait les hypocondries rien qu'en se montrant. Il était à éviter pour des gens en deuil, confus et forcés, s'ils l'apercevaient, de rire indécemment. Un jour le bourreau vint, et Gwynplaine le fit rire. On voyait Gwynplaine, on se tenait les côtes; il parlait, on se roulait à terre. Il était le pôle opposé du chagrin.

Spleen était à un bout, et Gwynplaine à l'autre.

Aussi était-il parvenu rapidement, dans les champs de foire et dans les carrefours, à une fort satisfaisante renommée d'homme horrible.

C'est en riant que Guynplaine faisait rire. Et pourtant il ne riait pas. Sa face riait, sa pensée non. L'espèce de visage inouï que le hasard ou une industrie bizarrement spéciale lui avait façonné, riait tout seul. Gwynplaine ne s'en mêlait pas.

Le dehors ne dépendait pas du dedans. Ce rire qu'il n'avait point mis sur son front, sur ses joues, sur ses sourcils, sur sa bouche, il ne pouvait l'en ôter. On lui avait à jamais appliqu le rire sur le visage. C'était un rire automatique, et d'autant plus irrésistible qu'il était pétrifié. Personne ne se dérobait à ce rictus. Deux convulsions de la bouche sont communicatives, le rire et le bâillement. Par la vertu de la mystérieuse opération probablement subie par Gwynplaine enfant, toutes les parties de son visage contribuaient à ce rictus, toute sa physionomie y aboutissait, comme une roue se concentre sur le moyeu; toutes ses émotions, quelles qu'elles fussent, augmentaient cette étrange figure de joie, disons mieux, l'aggravaient. Un étonnement qu'il aurait eu, une souffrance qu'il aurait ressentie, une colère qui lui serait survenue, une pitié qu'il aurait éprouvée, n'eussent fait qu'accroître cette hilarité des muscles; s'il eût pleuré, il eût ri; et, quoi que fit Gwynplaine, quoi qu'il voulût, quoi qu'il pensât, dès qu'il levait la tête, la foule, si la foule était là, avait devant les yeux cette apparition, l'éclat de rire foudroyant.

Qu’on se figure une tête de Méduse gaie.

Tout ce qu’on avait dans l’esprit était mis en déroute par cet inattendu, et il fallait rire.

L’art antique appliquait jadis au fronton des théâtres de la Grèce une face d’airain joyeuse. Cette face s’appelait la Comédie. Ce bronze semblait rire et faisait rire, et était pensif. Toute la parodie, qui aboutit à la démence, toute l’ironie, qui aboutit à la sagesse, se condensaient et s’amalgamaient sur cette figure; la somme des soucis, des désillusions, des dégoûts et des chagrins se faisait sur ce front impassible, et donnait ce total lugubre, la gaîté; un coin de la bouche était relevé, du côté du genre humain, par la moquerie, et l’autre coin, du côté des dieux, par le blasphème; les hommes venaient confronter à ce modèle du sarcasme idéal l’exemplaire d’ironie que chacun a en soi; et la foule, sans cesse renouvelée autour de ce rire fixe, se pâmait d’aise devant l’immobilit sépulcrale du ricanement. Ce sombre masque mort de la comédie antique ajusté à un homme vivant, on pourrait presque dire que c’était là Gwynplaine. Cette tête infernale de l’hilarit implacable, il l’avait sur le cou. Quel fardeau pour les épaules d’un homme, le rire éternel!

Rire éternel. Entendons-nous, et expliquons-nous. A en croire les manichéens, l’absolu plie par moments, et Dieu lui-même a des intermittences. Entendons-nous aussi sur la volonté. Qu’elle puisse jamais être tout à fait impuissante, nous ne l’admettons pas. Toute existence ressemble à une lettre, que modifie le post-scriptum. Pour Gwynplaine, le post-scriptum était ceci: force de volonté, en y concentrant toute son attention, et à la condition qu’aucune émotion ne vînt le distraire et détendre la fixité de son effort, il pouvait parvenir à suspendre l’éternel rictus de sa face et à y jeter une sorte de voile tragique, et alors on ne riait plus devant lui, on frissonnait.

Cet effort, Gwyynplaine, disons-le, ne le faisait presque jamais, car c’était une fatigue douloureuse et une tension insupportable.
Il suffisait d’ailleurs de la moindre distraction et de la moindre émotion pour que, chassé un moment, ce rire, irrésistible comme un reflux, reparût sur sa face, et il était d’autant plus intense que l’émotion, quelle qu’elle fût, était plus forte.

A cette restriction près, le rire de Gwynplaine était éternel.

On voyait Gwynplaine, on riait. Quand on avait ri, on détournait la tête. Les femmes surtout avaient horreur. Cet homme était effroyable. La convulsion bouffonne était comme un tribut payé; on la subissait joyeusement, mais presque mécaniquement. Après quoi, une fois le rire refroidi, Gwynplaine, pour une femme, était insupportable à voir et impossible à regarder.

Il était du reste grand, bien fait, agile, nullement difforme, si ce n’est de visage. Ceci était une indication de plus parmi les présomptions qui laissaient entrevoir dans Gwynplaine plutôt une création de l’art qu’une oeuvre de la nature. Gwynplaine, beau de corps, avait probablement été beau de figure. En naissant, il avait dû être un enfant comme un autre. On avait conservé le corps intact et seulement retouché la face. Gwynplaine avait ét fait exprès.

C’était là du moins la vraisemblance.

On lui avait laissé les dents. Les dents sont nécessaires au rire. La tête de mort les garde.

L’opération faite sur lui avait dû être affreuse. Il ne s’en souvenait pas, ce qui ne prouvait point qu’il ne l’eût pas subie.

Cette sculpture chirurgicale n’avait pu réussir que sur un enfant tout petit, et par conséquent ayant peu conscience de ce qui lui arrivait, et pouvant aisément prendre une plaie pour une maladie.

En outre, dès ce temps-là, on se le rappelle, les moyens d’endormir le patient et de supprimer la souffrance étaient connus. Seulement, à cette époque, on les appelait magie.

Aujourd’hui on les appelle anesthésie.

Outre ce visage, ceux qui l’avaient élevé lui avaient donné des ressources de gymnaste et d’athlète; ses articulations, utilement disloquées, et propres à des flexions en sens inverse, avaient reçu une éducation de clown et pouvaient, comme des gonds de porte, se mouvoir dans tous les sens. Dans son appropriation au métier de saltimbanque rien n’avait été négligé.

Ses cheveux avaient été teints couleur d’ocre une fois pour toutes; secret qu’on a retrouvé de nos jours. Les jolies femmes en usent; ce qui enlaidissait autrefois est aujourd’hui jugé bon pour embellir. Gwynplaine avait les cheveux jaunes. Cette peinture des cheveux, apparemment corrosive, les avait laissés laineux et bourrus au toucher. Ce hérissement fauve, plutôt crinière que chevelure, couvrait et cachait un profond crâne fait pour contenir de la pensée, L’opération quelconque, qui avait ôt l’harmonie au visage et mis toute cette chair en désordre, n’avait pas eu prise sur la boîte osseuse. L'angle facial de Gwynplaine était puissant et surprenant. Derrière ce rire il y avait une âme, faisant, comme nous tous, un songe.

Du reste, ce rire était pour Gwynplaine tout un talent. Il n'y pouvait rien, et il en tirait parti. Au moyen de ce rire, il gagnait sa vie.

Gwynplaine — on l'a sans doute déjà reconnu — était cet enfant abandonné un soir d'hiver sur la côte de Portland, et recueilli dans une pauvre cahute roulante à Weymouth.

II

DEA

L’enfant était à cette heure un homme. Quinze ans s’étaient écoulés. On était en 1705. Gwynplaine touchait à ses vingt-cinq ans.

Ursus avait gardé avec lui les deux enfants. Cela avait fait un groupe nomade.

Ursus et Homo avaient vieilli. Ursus était devenu tout à fait chauve. Le loup grisonnait. L’âge des loups n’est pas fix comme l’âge des chiens. Selon Molin, il y a des loups qui vivent quatrevingts ans, entre autres le petit koupara, caviae vorus, et le loup odorant, canis nubilus de Say.

La petite fille trouvée sur la femme morte était maintenant une grande créature de seize ans, pâle avec des cheveux bruns, mince, frêle, presque tremblante à force de délicatesse et donnant la peur de la briser, admirablement belle, les yeux pleins de lumière, aveugle.

La fatale nuit d’hiver, qui avait renversé la mendiante et son enfant dans la neige, avait fait coup double. Elle avait tué la mère et aveuglé la fille.

La goutte sereine avait à jamais paralysé les prunelles de cette fille, devenue femme à son tour. Sur son visage, à travers lequel le jour ne passait point, les coins des lèvres tristement abaissés exprimaient ce désappointement amer. Ses yeux, grands et clairs, avaient cela d’étrange qu’éteints pour elle, pour les autres ils brillaient. Mystérieux flambeaux allumés n’éclairant que le dehors. Elle donnait de la lumière, elle qui n’en avait pas. Ces yeux disparus resplendissaient. Cette captive des ténèbres blanchissait le milieu sombre où elle était. Du fond de son obscurité incurable, de derrière ce mur noir qu’on nomme la cécité, elle jetait un rayonnement. Elle ne voyait pas hors d’elle le soleil et l’on voyait en elle son âme.

Son regard mort avait on ne sait quelle fixité céleste.

Elle était la nuit, et de cette ombre irrémédiable amalgamée elle-même, elle sortait astre.

Ursus, maniaque de noms latins, l’avait baptisée Dea. Il avait un peu consulté son loup; il lui avait dit: Tu représentes l’homme, je représente la bête; nous sommes le monde d’en bas; cette petite représentera le monde d’en haut. Tant de faiblesse, c’est la toute-puissance. De cette façon l’univers complet, humanité, bestialité, divinité, sera dans notre cahute. — Le loup n’avait pas fait d’objection.

Et c’est ainsi que l’enfant trouvé s’appelait Dea.

Quant à Gwynplaine, Ursus n’avait pas eu la peine de lui inventer un nom. Le matin même du jour où il avait constaté le défigurement du petit garçon et la cécité de la petite fille, il avait demandé: — Boy, comment t’appelles-tu?

Et le garçon avait répondu: — On m’appelle Gwynplaine.

— Va pour Gwynplaine, avait dit Ursus.

Dea assistait Gwynplaine dans ses exercices.

Si la misère humaine pouvait être résumée, elle l’eût été par Gwynplaine et Dea. Ils semblaient être nés chacun dans un compartiment du sépulcre; Gwynplaine dans l’horrible, Dea dans le noir. Leurs existences étaient faites avec des ténèbres d’espèce différente, prises dans les deux côtés formidables de la vie.

Ces ténèbres, Dea les avait en elle et Gwynplaine les avait sur lui. Il y avait du fantôme dans Dea et du spectre dans Gwynplaine. Dea était dans le lugubre, et Gwynplaine dans le pire. Il y avait pour Gwynplaine voyant, une possibilit poignante qui n’existait pas pour Dea aveugle, se comparer aux autres hommes. Or, dans une situation comme celle de Gwynplaine, en admettant qu’il cherchât à s’en rendre compte, se comparer, c’était ne plus se comprendre. Avoir, comme Dea, un regard vide d’où le monde est absent, c’est une suprême détresse, moindre pourtant que celle-ci: être sa propre énigme; sentir aussi quelque chose d’absent qui est soi-même; voir l’univers et ne pas se voir. Dea avait un voile, la nuit, et Gwynplaine avait un masque, sa face. Chose inexprimable, c’était avec sa propre chair que Gwynplaine était masqué. Quel était son visage, il l’ignorait. Sa figure était dans l’évanouissement. On avait mis sur lui un faux lui-même. Il avait pour face une disparition.

Sa tête vivait et son visage était mort. Il ne se souvenait pas de l’avoir vu.

Le genre humain, pour Dea comme pour Gwynplaine, était un fait extérieur; ils en étaient loin; elle était seule, il était seul; l’isolement de Dea était funèbre, elle ne voyait rien; l’isolement de Gwynplaine était sinistre, il voyait tout.

Pour Dea, la création ne dépassait point l’ouïe et le toucher; le réel était borné, limité, court, tout de suite perdu; elle n’avait pas d’autre infini que l’ombre. Pour Gwynplaine, vivre, c’était avoir à jamais la foule devant soi et hors de soi. Dea était la proscrite de la lumière; Gwynplaine était le banni de la vie. Certes, c’étaient là deux désespérés. Le fond de la calamité possible était touché. Ils y étaient, lui comme elle.

Un observateur qui les eût vus eût senti sa rêverie s’achever en une incommensurable pitié. Que ne devaient-ils pas souffrir? Un décret de malheur pesait visiblement sur ces deux créatures humaines, et jamais la fatalité, autour de deux êtres qui n’avaient rien fait, n’avait mieux arrangé la destinée en torture et la vie en enfer.

Ils étaient dans un paradis.

Ils s’aimaient.

Gwynplaine adorait Dea. Dea idolâtrait Gwynplaine.

— Tu es si beau! lui disait-elle.

«OCULOS NON HABET ET VIDET

Une seule femme sur la terre voyait Gwynplaiae. C’était cette aveugle.

Ce que Gwynplaine avait été pour elle, elle le savait par Ursus, à qui Gwynplaine avait raconté sa rude marche de Portland Weymouth, et les agonies mêlées à son abandon, Elle savait que, toute petite, expirante sur sa mère expirée, tétant un cadavre, un être, un peu moins petit qu’elle, l’avait ramassée; que cet être, éliminé et comme enseveli sous le sombre refus universel, avait entendu son cri; que, tous étant sourds pour lui, il n’avait pas été sourd pour elle; que cet enfant, isolé, faible, rejeté, sans point d’appui ici-bas, se traînant dans le désert, épuisé de fatigue, brisé, avait accepté des mains de la nuit ce fardeau, un autre enfant; que lui, qui n’avait point de part attendre dans cette distribution obscure qu’on appelle le sort, il s’était chargé d’une destinée; que, dénûment, angoisse et détresse, il s’était fait providence; que, le ciel se fermant, il avait ouvert son coeur; que, perdu, il avait sauvé; que, n’ayant pas de toit ni d’abri, il avait été asile; qu’il s’était fait mère et nourrice; que, lui qui était seul au monde, il avait répondu au délaissement par une adoption; que, dans les ténèbres, il avait donné cet exemple; que, ne se trouvant pas assez accablé, il avait bien voulu de la misère d’un autre par surcroît; que sur cette terre où il semblait qu’il n’y eût rien pour lui, il avait découvert le devoir; que là où tous eussent hésité, il avait avancé; que là où tous eussent reculé, il avait consenti; qu’il avait mis sa main dans l’ouverture du sépulcre et qu’il l’en avait retirée, elle, Dea; que, demi-nu, il lui avail donné son bâillon, parce qu’elle avait froid; qu’affamé, il avait songé à la faire boire et manger; que pour cette petite, ce petit avait combattu la mort; qu’il l’avait combattue sous toutes les formes, sous la forme hiver et neige, sous la forme solitude, sous la forme terreur, sous la forme froid, faim et soif, sous la forme ouragan; que pour elle, Dea, ce titan de dix ans avait livré bataille à l’immensité nocturne. Elle savait qu’il avait fait cela, enfant, et que maintenant, homme, il était sa force elle débile, sa richesse à elle indigente, sa guérison à elle malade, son regard à elle aveugle. A travers les épaisseurs inconnues par qui elle se sentait tenue à distance, elle distinguait nettement ce dévouement, cette abnégalion, ce courage. L’héroïsme, dans la région immatérielle, a un contour.

Elle saisissait ce contour sublime; dans l’inexprimable abstraction où vit une pensée que n’éclaire pas le soleil, elle percevait ce mystérieux linéament de la vertu. Dans cet entourage de choses obscures mises en mouvement qui était la seule impression que lui fît la réalité, dans cette stagnation inquiète de la créature passive toujours au guet du péril possible, dans cette sensation d’être là sans défense qui est toute la vie de l’aveugle, elle constatait au-dessus d’elle Gwynplaine, Guynplaine jamais refroidi, jamais absent, jamais éclipsé, Gwynplaine attendri, secourable et doux; Dea tressaillait de certitude et de reconnaissance, son anxiét rassurée aboutissait à l’extase, et de ses yeux pleins de ténèbres elle contemplait au zénith de son abîme cette bonté, lumière profonde.

Dans l’idéal, la bonté, c’est le soleil; et Gwynplaine éblouissait Dea.

Pour la foule, qui a trop de têtes pour avoir une pensée et trop d’yeux pour avoir un regard, pour la foule qui, surface elle-même, s’arrête aux surfaces, Gwynplaine était un clown, un bateleur, un saltimbanque, un grotesque, un peu plus et un peu moins qu’une bête. La foule ne connaissait que le visage.

Pour Dea, Gwynplaine était le sauveur qui l’avait ramassée dans la tombe et emportée dehors, le consolateur qui lui faisait la vie possible, le libérateur dont elle sentait la main dans la sienne en ce labyrinthe qui est la cécité; Gwynplaine était le frère, l’ami, le guide, le soutien, le semblable d’en haut, l’époux ailé et rayonnant, et là où la multitude voyait le monstre, elle voyait l’archange.

C’est que Dea, aveugle, apercevait l’âme.

IV

LES AMOUREUX ASSORTIS

Ursus, philosophe, comprenait. Il approuvait la fascination de Dea.

— L'aveugle voit l'invisible.

Il disait:

— La conscience est vision.

Il regardait Gwynplaine, et il grommelait:

— Demi-monstre, mais demi-dieu.

Gwynplaine, de son côté, était enivré de Dea. Il y a l'oeil invisible, l'esprit, et l'oeil visible, la prunelle. Lui, c'est avec l'oeil visible qu'il la voyait. Dea avait l'éblouissement idéal, Gwynplaine avait l'éblouissement réel. Gwynplaine n'était pas laid, il était effrayant; il avait devant lui son contraste.

Autant il était terrible, autant Dea était suave. Il était l'horreur, elle était la grâce. Il y avait du rêve en Dea. Elle semblait un songe ayant un peu pris corps. Il y avait dans toute sa personne, dans sa structure éolienne, dans sa fine et souple taille inquiète comme le roseau, dans ses épaules peut-être invisiblement ailées, dans les rondeurs discrètes de son contour indiquant le sexe, mais à l'âme plutôt qu'aux sens, dans sa blancheur qui était presque de la transparence, dans l'auguste occlusion sereine de son regard divinement fermé à la terre, dans l'innocence sacrée de son sourire, un voisinage exquis de l'ange, et elle était tout juste assez femme.

Gwynplaine, nous l'avons dit, se comparait, et il comparait Dea.

Son existence, telle qu'elle était, était le résultat d'un double choix inouï. C'était le point d'intersection des deux rayons d'en bas et d'en haut, du rayon noir et du rayon blanc. La même miette peut être becquetée à la fois par les deux becs du mal et du bien, l'un donnant la morsure, l'autre le baiser. Gwynplaine était cette miette, atome meurtri et caressé. Gwynplaine était le produit d'une fatalité, compliquée d'une providence. Le malheur avait mis le doigt sur lui, le bonheur aussi. Deux destinées extrêmes composaient son sort étrange. Il y avait sur lui un anathème et une bénédiction. Il était le maudit élu. Qui était-il? Il ne le savait. Quand il se regardait, il voyait un inconnu. Mais cet inconnu était monstrueux.

Gwynplaine vivait dans une sorte de décapitation, ayant un visage qui n'était pas lui. Ce visage était épouvantable, si épouvantable qu'il amusait. Il faisait tant peur qu'il faisait rire. Il était infernalement bouffon. C'était le naufrage de la figure humaine dans un mascaron bestial. Jamais on n'avait vu plus totale éclipse de l'homme sur le visage humain, jamais parodie n'avait été plus complète, jamais ébauche plus affreuse n'avait rican dans un cauchemar, jamais tout ce qui peut repousser une femme n'avait été plus hideusement amalgamé dans un homme; l'infortun coeur, masqué et calomnié par cette face, semblait à jamais condamné à la solitude sous ce visage comme sous un couvercle de tombe. Eh bien, non! où s'était épuisée la méchanceté inconnue, la bonté invisible à son tour se dépensait. Dans ce pauvre déchu, tout à coup relevé, à côté de tout ce qui repousse elle mettait ce qui attire, dans l'écueil elle mettait l'aimant, elle faisait accourir à tire d'aile vers cet abandonné une âme, elle chargeait la colombe de consoler le foudroyé, et elle faisait adorer la difformité par la beaulé.

Pour que cela fût possible, il fallait que la belle ne vît pas le défiguré. Pour ce bonheur, il fallait ce malheur. La providence avait fait Dea aveugle.

Gwynplaine se sentait vaguement l'objet d'une rédemption. Pourquoi la persécution? il l'ignorait. Pourquoi le rachat? il l'ignorait. Une auréole était venue se poser sur sa flétrissure; c'est tout ce qu'il savait. Ursus, quand Gwynplaine avait été en âge de comprendre, lui avait lu et expliqué le texte du docteur Conquest de Denasatis, et, dans un autre in-folio, Hugo Plagon, le passage nares habens mutilas; mais Ursus s'était prudemment abstenu «d'hypothèses», et s'était bien gardé de conclure quoi que ce soit. Des suppositions étaient possibles, la probabilité d'une voie de fait sur l'enfance de Gwynplaine était entrevue; mais pour Gwynplaine il n'y avait qu'une évidence, le résultat. Sa destinée était de vivre sous un stigmate. Pourquoi ce stigmate? pas de réponse. Silence et solitude autour de Gwynplainwe. Tout était fuyant dans les conjectures qu'on pouvait ajuster à cette réalité tragique, et, excepté le fait terrible, rien n'était certain. Dans cet accablement, Dea intervenait; sorte d'interposition céleste entre Gwynplaine et le désespoir. Il percevait, ému et comme réchauffé, la douceur de cette fille exquise tournée vers son horreur; l'étonnement paradisiaque attendrissait sa face draconienne; fait pour l'effroi, il avait cette exception prodigieuse d'être admiré et adoré dans l'idéal par la lumière, et, monstre, il sentait sur lui la contemplation d'une étoile.

Versio Gallica Will, Tyrii, bb. II, cap. xxiii.

Gwynplaine et Dea, c’était un couple, et ces deux coeurs pathétiques s’adoraient. Un nid, et deux oiseaux; c’était l leur histoire. Ils avaient fait leur rentrée dans la loi universelle qui est de se plaire, de se chercher et de se trouver. De sorte que la haine s’était trompée. Les persécuteurs de Gwynplaine, quels qu’ils fussent, l’énigmatique acharnement, de quelque part qu’il vînt, avaient manqué leur but.

On avait voulu faire un désespéré, on avait fait un enchanté. On l’avait d’avance fiancé à une plaie guérissante. On l’avait prédestiné à être consolé par une affliction. La tenaille de bourreau s’était doucement faite main de femme. Gwynplaine était horrible, artificiellement horrible, horrible de la main des hommes; on avait espéré l’isoler à jamais, de la famille d’abord, s’il avait une famille, de l’humanité ensuite; enfant, on avait fait de lui une ruine, mais cette ruine, la nature l’avait reprise comme elle reprend toutes les ruines; cette solitude, la nature l’avait consolée comme elle console toutes les solitudes; la nature vient au secours de tous les abandons; là où tout manque, elle se redonne tout entière; elle refleurit et reverdit sur tous les écroulements; elle a le lierre pour les pierres et l’amour pour les hommes. Générosité profonde de l’ombre.

V

LE BLEU DANS LE NOIR

Ainsi vivaient l’un par l’autre ces infortunés, Déa appuyée, Gwynplaine accepté.

Cette orpheline avait cet orphelin. Cette infirme avait ce difforme.

Ces veuvages s’épousaient.

Une ineffable action de grâces se dégageait de ces deux détresses. Elles remerciaient.

Qui?

L’immensité obscure.

Remercier devant soi, c’est assez. L’action de grâces a des ailes et va où elle doit aller. Votre prière en sait plus long que vous.

Que d’hommes ont cru prier Jupiter et ont prié Jéhovah! Que de croyants aux amulettes sont écoutés par l’infini! Combien d’athées ne s’aperçoivent pas que, par le seul fait d’être bons et tristes, ils prient Dieu!

Gwynplaine et Dea étaient reconnaissants.

La difformité, c’est l’expulsion. La cécité, c’est le précipice.

L’expulsion était adoptée; le précipice était habitable.

Gwynplaine voyait descendre vers lui en pleine lumière, dans un arrangement de destinée qui ressemblait à la mise en perspective d’un songe, une blanche nuée de beauté ayant la forme d’une femme, une vision radieuse dans laquelle il y avait un coeur, et cette apparition, presque nuage et pourtant femme, l’étreignait, et cette vision l’embrassait, et ce coeur voulait bien de lui; Gwynplaine n’était plus difforme, étant aimé; une rose demandait la chenille en mariage, sentant dans cette chenille le papillon divin; Gwynplaine, le rejeté, était choisi.

Avoir son nécessaire, tout est là. Gwynplaine avait le sien.

Dea avait le sien.

L’abjection du défiguré, allégée et comme sublimée, se dilatait en ivresse, en ravissement, en croyance; et une main venait au-devant de la sombre hésitation de l’aveugle dans la nuit.

C’était la pénétration de deux détresses dans l’idéal, celle-ci absorbant celle-là. Deux exclusions s’admettaient. Deux lacunes se combinaient pour se compléter. Ils se tenaient par ce qui leur manquait. Par où l’un était pauvre, l’autre était riche.

Le malheur de l’un faisait le trésor de l’autre. Si Dea n’eût pas été aveugle, eût-elle choisi Gwynplaine? Si Gwynplaine n’eût pas été défiguré, eût-il préféré Dea? Elle probablement n’eût pas plus voulu du difforme que lui de l’infirme. Quel bonheur pour Dea que Gwynplaine fût hideux! Quelle chance pour Gwynplaine que Dea fût aveugle! En dehors de leur appareillement providentiel, ils étaient impossibles. Un prodigieux besoin l’un de l’autre était au fond de leur amour. Gwynplaine sauvait Dea.

Dea sauvait Gwynplaine. Rencontre de misères produisant l’adhérence. Embrassement d’engloutis dans le gouffre. Rien de plus étroit, rien de plus désespéré, rien de plus exquis.

Gwynplaine avait une pensée:

— Que serais-je sans elle?

Dea avait une pensée:

— Que serais-je sans lui?

Ces deux exils aboutissaient à une patrie; ces deux fatalités incurables, le stigmate de Gwynplaine, la cécité de Dea, opéraient leur jonction dans le contentement. Ils se suffisaient, ils n’imaginaient rien au delà d’eux-mêmes; se parler était un délice, s’approcher était une béatitude; à force d’intuition réciproque, ils en étaient venus à l’unité de rêverie; ils pensaient à deux la même pensée. Quand Gwynplaine marchait, Dea croyait entendre un pas d’apothéose, Ils se serraient l’un contre l’autre dans une sorte de clair-obscur sidéral plein de parfums, de lueurs, de musiques, d’architectures lumineuses, de songes; ils s’appartenaient; ils se savaient ensemble à jamais dans la même joie et dans la même extase; et rien n’était étrange comme cette construction d’un éden par deux damnés.

Ils étaient inexprimablement heureux.

Avec leur enfer ils avaient fait du ciel; telle est votre puissance, amour!

Dea entendait rire Gwynplaine. Et Gwynplaine voyait Dea sourire.

Ainsi la félicité idéale était trouvée, la joie parfaite de la vie était réalisée, le mystérieux problème du bonheur était résolu. Et par qui? par deux misérables.

Pour Gwynplaine Dea était la splendeur. Pour Dea Gwynplaine était la présence.

La présence, profond mystère qui divinise l’invisible et d’o résulte cet autre mystère, la confiance. Il n’y a dans les religions que cela d’irréductible. Mais cet irréductible suffit.

On ne voit pas l’immense être nécessaire; on le sent.

Gwynplaine était la religion de Dea.

Parfois, éperdue d’amour, elle se mettait à genoux devant lui, sorte de belle prêtresse adorant un gnome de pagode, épanoui.

Figurez-vous l’abîme, et au milieu de l’abîme une oasis de clarté, et dans cette oasis ces deux êtres hors de la vie, s’éblouissant.

Pas de pureté comparable à ces amours. Dea ignorait ce que c’était qu’un baiser, bien que peut-être elle le désirât; car la cécité, surtout d’une femme, a ses rêves, et, quoique tremblante devant les approches de l’inconnu, ne les hait pas toutes. Quant à Gwynplaine, la jeunesse frissonnante le rendait pensif; plus il se sentait ivre, plus il était timide; il eût pu tout oser avec cette compagne de son premier âge, avec cette ignorante de la faute comme de la lumière, avec cette aveugle qui voyait une chose, c’est qu’elle l’adorait. Mais il eût cru voler ce qu’elle lui eût donné; il se résignait avec une mélancolie satisfaite aimer angéliquement, et le sentiment de sa difformité se résolvait en une pudeur auguste.

Ces heureux habitaient l’idéal. Ils y étaient époux à distance comme les sphères. Ils échangeaient dans le bleu l’effluve profond qui dans l’infini est l’attraction et sur la terre le sexe. Ils se donnaient des baisers d’âme.

Ils avaient toujours eu la vie commune. Ils ne se connaissaient pas autrement qu’ensemble. L’enfance de Dea avait coïncidé avec l’adolescence de Gwynplaine. Ils avaient grandi côte à côte.

Ils avaient longtemps dormi dans le même lit, la cahute n’étant point une vaste chambre à coucher. Eux sur le coffre, Ursus sur le plancher; voilà quel était l’arrangement. Puis un beau jour, Dea étant encore petite, Gwynplaine s’était vu grand, et c’est du côté de l’homme qu’avait commencé la honte. Il avait dit Ursus: Je veux dormir à terre, moi aussi. Et, le soir venu, il s’était étendu près du vieillard, sur la peau d’ours. Alors Dea avait pleuré. Elle avait réclamé son camarade de lit. Mais Gwynplaine, devenu inquiet, car il commençait à aimer, avait tenu bon. A partir de ce moment, il s’était mis à coucher sur le plancher avec Ursus. L’été, dans les belles nuits, il couchait dehors, avec Homo. Dea avait treize ans qu’elle n’était pas encore résignée. Souvent le soir elle disait; Gwynplaine, viens près de moi; cela me fera dormir. Un homme à côté d’elle était un besoin du sommeil de l’innocente. La nudité, c’est de se voir nu; aussi ignorait-elle la nudité. Ingénuité d’Arcadie ou d’Otaïti. Dea sauvage faisait Gwynplaine farouche. Il arrivait parfois à Dea, étant déjà presque jeune fille, de se peigner ses longs cheveux, assise sur son lit, sa chemise défaite et à demi tombante, laissant voir la statue féminine ébauchée et un vague commencement d'Eve, et d'appeler Gwynplaine. Gwynplaine rougissait, baissait les yeux, ne savait que devenir devant cette chair naïve, balbutiait, détournait la tête, avait peur, et s'en allait, et ce Daphnis des ténèbres prenait la fuite devant cette Chloë de l'ombre.

Telle était cette idylle éclose dans une tragédie.

Ursus leur disait:

— Vieilles brutes, adorez-vous.

VI

URSUS INSTITUTEUR, ET URSUS TUTEUR

Ursus ajoutait:

— Je leur ferai un de ces jours un mauvais tour. Je les marierai.

Ursus faisait à Gwynplaine la théorie de l’amour. Il lui disait:

— L’amour, sais-tu comment le bon Dieu allume ce feu-là? Il met la femme en bas, le diable entre deux; l’homme sur le diable.

Une allumette, c’est-à-dire un regard, et voilà que tout flambe.

— Un regard n’est pas nécessaire, répondait Guynplaine, songeant à Dea.

Et Ursus répliquait:

— Dadais! est-ce que les âmes, pour se regarder, ont besoin des yeux?

Parfois Ursus était bon diable. Gwynplaine, par moments, éperdu de Dea jusqu’à en devenir sombre, se garait d’Ursus comme d’un témoin. Un jour Ursus lui dit:

— Bah! ne te gêne pas. En amour le coq se montre.

— Mais l’aigle se cache, répondit Gwynplaine. Dans d’autres instants, Ursus se disait en aparté:

— Il est sage de mettre des bâtons dans les roues du char de Cythérée. Ils s’aiment trop. Cela peut avoir des inconvénients.

Obvions à l’incendie. Modérons ces coeurs.

Et Ursus avait recours à des avertissements de ce genre, parlant à Gwynplaine quand Dea dormait, et à Dea quand Gwynplaine avait le dos tourné:

— Dea, il ne faut pas trop t’attacher à Gwynplaine. Vivre dans un autre est périlleux. L’égoïsme est une bonne racine du bonheur. Les hommes, ça échappe aux femmes. Et puis, Gwynplaine peut finir par s’infatuer. Il a tant de succès! tu ne le figures pas le succès qu’il a!

— Gwynplaine, les disproportions ne valent rien. Trop de laideur d’un côté, trop de beauté de l’autre, cela doit donner réfléchir. Tempère ton ardeur, mon boy. Ne t’enthousiasme pas trop de Dea. Te crois-tu sérieusement fait pour elle? Mais considère donc ta difformité et sa perfection. Vois la distance entre elle et toi. Elle a tout, cette Dea! quelle peau blanche, quels cheveux, des lèvres qui sont des fraises, et son pied!

quant à sa main! Ses épaules sont d'une courbe exquise, le visage est sublime, elle marche, il sort d'elle de la lumière, et ce parler grave avec ce son de voix charmant! et avec tout cela songer que c'est une femme! elle n'est pas si sotte que d'être un ange. C'est la beauté absolue. Dis-toi tout cela pour te calmer.

De là des redoublements d'amour entre Dea et Gwynplaine, et Ursus s'étonnait de son insuccès, un peu comme quelqu'un qui dirait:

— C'est singulier, j'ai beau jeter de l'huile sur le feu, je ne parviens pas à l'éteindre.

Les éteindre, moins même, les refroidir, le voulait-il? non certes. Il eût été bien attrapé s'il avait réussi. Au fond, cet amour, flamme pour eux, chaleur pour lui, le ravissait. Mais il faut bien taquiner un peu ce qui nous charme. Cette taquinerie-là, c'est ce que les hommes appellent la sagesse,

Ursus avait été pour Gwynplaine et Dea à peu près père et mère. Tout en murmurant, il les avait élevés; tout en grondant, il les avait nourris. Cette adoption ayant fait la cahute roulante plus lourde, il avait du s'atteler plus fréquemment avec Homo pour la traîner.

Disons que, les premières années passées, quand Gywnplaine fut presque grand et Ursus tout à fait vieux, c'avait été le tour de Gwynplaine de traîner Ursus.

Ursus, en voyant grandir Gwynplaine, avait tiré l'horoscope de sa difformité. — On a fait ta fortune, lui avait-il dit.

Cette famille d'un vieillard, de deux enfants et d'un loup, avait formé, tout en rôdant, un groupe de plus en plus étroit.

La vie errante n'avait pas empêché l'éducation. Errer, c'est croître, disait Ursus. Gwynplaine étant évidemment fait pour être «montré dans les foires», Ursus avait cultivé en lui le saltimbanque, et dans ce saltimbanque il avait incrusté de son mieux la science et la sagesse. Ursus, en arrêt devant le masque ahurissant de Gwynplaine, grommelait: Il a été bien commencé. C'est pourquoi il l'avait complété par tous les ornements de la philosophie et du savoir.

Il répétait souvent à Gwynplaine: — Sois un philosophe. Être sage, c'est être invulnérable. Tel que tu me vois, je n'ai jamais pleuré. Force de ma sagesse. Crois-tu que, si j'avais voulu pleurer, j'aurais manqué d'occasion?

Ursus, dans ses monologues écoutés par le loup, disait: — J'ai enseigné à Gwynplaine Tout, y compris le latin, et à Dea Rien, y compris la musique. — Il leur avait appris à tous deux à chanter.

Il avait lui-même un joli talent sur la muse de blé, une petite flûte de ce temps-là. Il en jouait agréablement, ainsi que de la chiffonie, sorte de vielle de mendiant, que la chronique de Bertrand Duguesclin qualifie «instrument truand», et qui est le point de départ de la symphonie. Ces musiques attiraient le monde. Ursus montrait à la foule sa chiffonie et disait: — En latin organistrum.

Il avait enseigné à Dea et à Gwynplaine le chant selon la méthode d'Orphée et d'Égide Binchois. Il lui était arrivé plus d'une fois de couper les leçons de ce cri d'enthousiasme: — Orphée, musicien de la Grèce! Binchois, musicien de la Picardie!

Ces complications d'éducation soignée n'avaient pas occupé les deux enfants au point de les empêcher de s'adorer. Ils avaient grandi en mêlant leurs coeurs, comme deux arbrisseaux plantés près, en devenant arbres, mêlent leurs branches.

— C'est égal, murmurait Ursus, je les marierai.

Et il bougonnait en aparté:

— Il m'ennuient avec leur amour,

Le passé, le peu qu'ils en avaient du moins, n'existait point pour Guynplaine et Dea. Ils en savaient ce qu'Ursus leur en avait dit. Ils appelaient Ursus «Père».

Gwynplaine n'avait souvenir de son enfance que comme d'un passage de démons sur son berceau. Il en avait une impression comme d'avoir été trépigné dans l'obscurité sous des pieds difformes.

Était-ce exprès, ou sans le vouloir? il l'ignorait. Ce qu'il se rappelait nettement, et dans les moindres détails, c'était la tragique aventure de son abandon. La trouvaille de Dea faisait pour lui de cette nuit lugubre une date radieuse.

La mémoire de Dea était, plus encore que celle de Gwynplaine, dans la nuée. Si petite, tout s'était dissipé. Elle se rappelait sa mère comme une chose froide. Avait-elle vu le soleil? Peut-être. Elle faisait effort pour replonger son esprit dans cet évanouissement qui était derrière elle. Le soleil? qu'était-ce? Elle se souvenait d'on ne sait quoi de lumineux et de chaud que Gwynplaine avait remplacé.

Ils se disaient des choses à voix basse. Il est certain que roucouler est ce qu'il y a de plus important sur la terre. Dea disait à Gwynplaine: La lumière, c'est quand tu parles.

Une fois, n’y tenant plus, Gwynplaine, apercevant à travers une manche de mousseline le bras de Dea, effleura de ses lèvres cette transparence. Bouche difforme, baiser idéal. Dea sentit un ravissement profond. Elle devint toute rose. Ce baiser d’un monstre fit l’aurore sur ce beau front plein de nuit. Cependant Gwynplaine soupirait avec une sorte de terreur, et, comme la gorgère de Dea s’entre-bâillait, il ne pouvait s’empêcher de regarder des blancheurs visibles par cette ouverture de paradis.

Dea releva sa manche et tendit à Gwynplaine son bras nu en disant: Encore! Gwynplaine se tira d’affaire par l’évasion.

Le lendemain ce jeu recommençait, avec des variantes. Glissement céleste dans ce doux abîme qui est l’amour.

Ce sont là des choses auxquelles le bon Dieu, en sa qualité de vieux philosophe, sourit.

LA CÉCITÉ DONNE DES LEÇONS DE CLAIRVOYANCE

Parfois Gwynplaine s’adressait des reproches. Il se faisait de son bonheur un cas de conscience. Il s’imaginait que se laisser aimer par cette femme qui ne pouvait le voir, c’était la tromper.
Que dirait-elle si ses yeux s’ouvraient tout à coup? comme ce qui l’attire la repousserait! comme elle reculerait devant son effroyable amant! quel-cri! quelles mains voilant son visage!
quelle fuite! Un pénible scrupule le harcelait. Il se disait que, monstre, il n’avait pas droit à l’amour. Hydre idolâtrée par l’astre, il était de son devoir d’éclairer cette étoile aveugle.

Une fois il dit à Dea:

— Tu sais que je suis très laid.

— Je sais que tu es sublime, répondit-elle.

Il reprit:

— Quand tu entends tout le monde rire, c’est de moi qu’on rit, parce que je suis horrible.

— Je t’aime, lui dit Dea.

Après un silence, elle ajouta:

— J’étais dans la mort; tu m’as remise dans la vie. Toi là, c’est le ciel à côté de moi. Donne-moi ta main, que je touche Dieu!

Leurs mains se cherchèrent et s’étreignirent, et ils ne dirent plus une parole, rendus silencieux par la plénitude de s’aimer.

Ursus, bourru, avait entendu. Le lendemain, comme ils étaient tous trois ensemble, il dit:

— D’ailleurs Dea est laide aussi.

Le mot manqua son effet. Dea et Gwynplaine n’écoutaient pas. Absorbés l’un dans l’autre, ils percevaient rarement les épiphonèmes d’Ursus. Ursus était profond en pure perte.

Cette fois pourtant la précaution d’Ursus «Dea est laide aussi indiquait chez cet homme docte une certaine science de la femme.
Il est certain que Gwynplaine avait fait, loyalement, une imprudence. Dit à une toute autre femme et à une toute autre aveugle que Dea, le mot: Je suis laid eût pu être dangereux.

Être aveugle et amoureux, c'est être deux fois aveugle. Dans cette situation-là on fait des songes; l'illusion est le pain du songe; ôter l'illusion à l'amour, c'est lui ôter l'aliment. Tous les enthousiasmes entrent utilement dans sa formation; aussi bien l'admiration physique que l'admiration morale. D'ailleurs, il ne faut jamais dire à une femme de mot difficile à comprendre. Elle rêve là-dessus. Et souvent elle rêve mal. Une énigme dans une rêverie fait du dégât. La percussion d'un mot qu'on a laiss tomber désagrège ce qui adhérait. Il arrive parfois que, sans qu'on sache comment, parce qu'il a reçu le choc obscur d'une parole en l'air, un coeur se vide insensiblement. L'être qui aime s'aperçoit d'une baisse dans son bonheur. Rien n'est redoutable comme cette exsudation lente de vase fêlé.

Heureusement Dea n'était point de cette argile. La pâte à faire toutes les femmes n'avait point servi pour elle. C'était une nature rare que Dea. Le corps était fragile, le coeur non. Ce qui était le fond de son être, c'était une divine persévérance d'amour.

Tout le creusement que produisit en elle le mot de Gwynplaine aboutit à lui faire dire un jour cette parole:

— Être laid, qu'est-ce que cela? c'est faire du mal. Gwynplaine ne fait que du bien. Il est beau.

Puis, toujours sous cette forme d'interrogation familière aux enfants et aux aveugles, elle reprit:

— Voir? qu'appelez-vous voir, vous autres! moi, je ne vois pas, je sais. Il paraît que voir, cela cache.

— Que veux-tu dire? demanda Gwynplaine.

Dea répondit:

— Voir est une chose qui cache le vrai.

— Non, dit Gwynplaine.

— Mais si! répliqua Dea, puisque tu dis que tu es laid!

Elle songea un moment, et ajouta:

— Menteur!

Et Gwynplaine avait cette joie d'avoir avoué et de n'être pas cru. Sa conscience était en repos, son amour aussi.

Ils étaient arrivés ainsi, elle à seize ans, lui à près de vingt-cinq.

Ils n'étaient pas, comme on dirait aujourd'hui, «plus avancés que le premier jour. Moins; puisque, l'on s'en souvient, ils avaient eu leur nuit de noces, elle âgée de neuf mois, lui de dix ans. Une sorte de sainte enfance continuait dans leur amour; c’est ainsi qu’il arrive parfois que le rossignol attard prolonge son chant de nuit jusque dans l’aurore.

Leurs caresses n’allaient guère au delà des mains pressées, et parfois du bras nu effleuré. Une volupté doucement bégayante leur suffisait.

Vingt-quatre ans, seize ans. Cela fit qu’un matin, Ursus, ne perdant pas de vue son «mauvais tour», leur dit:

— Un de ces jours vous choisirez une religion.

— Pourquoi faire? demanda Gwynplaine.

— Pour vous marier.

— Mais c’est fait, répondit Dea.

Dea ne comprenait point qu’on pût être mari et femme plus qu’ils ne l’étaient.

Au fond, ce contentement chimérique et virginal, ce naïf assouvissement de l’âme par l’âme, ce célibat pris pour mariage, ne déplaisait point à Ursus. Ce qu’il en disait, c’était parce qu’il faut bien parler. Mais le médecin qu’il y avait en lui trouvait Dea, sinon trop jeune, du moins trop délicate et trop frêle pour ce qu’il appelait «l’hyménée en chair et en os».

Cela viendrait toujours assez tôt.

D’ailleurs, mariés, ne l’étaient-ils point? Si l’indissoluble existait quelque part, n’était-ce pas dans cette cohésion, Gwynplaine et Dea? Chose admirable, ils étaient adorablement jetés dans les bras l’un de l’autre par le malheur. Et comme si ce n’était pas assez de ce premier lien, sur le malheur était venu se rattacher, s’enrouler et se serrer l’amour. Quelle force peut jamais rompre la chaîne de fer consolidée par le noeud de fleurs?

Certes, les inséparables étaient là.

Dea avait la beauté; Gwynplaine avait la lumière. Chacun apportait sa dot; et ils faisaient plus que le couple, ils faisaient la paire; séparés seulement par l’innocence, interposition sacrée.

Cependant Gwynplaine avait beau rêver et s’absorber le plus qu’il pouvait dans la contemplation de Dea et dans le for intérieur de son amour, il était homme. Les lois fatales ne s’éludent point.

Il subissait, comme toute l’immense nature, les fermentations obscures voulues par le créateur. Cela parfois, quand il paraissait en public, lui faisait regarder les femmes qui étaient dans la foule; mais il détournait tout de suite ce regard en contravention, et il se hâtait de rentrer, repentant, dans son âme.

Ajoutons que l’encouragement manquait. Sur le visage de toutes les femmes qu’il regardait il voyait l’aversion, l’antipathie, la répugnance, le rejet. Il était clair qu’aucune autre que Dea n’était possible pour lui. Cela l’aidait à se repentir.

VIII

NON SEULEMENT LE BONHEUR, MAIS LA PROSPÉRIT

Que de choses vraies dans les contes! La brûlure du diable invisible qui vous touche, c’est le remords d’une mauvaise pensée.

Chez Gwynplaine, la mauvaise pensée ne parvenait point à éclore, et il n’y avait jamais de remords. Mais il y avait parfois regret.

Vagues brumes de la conscience.

Qu’était-ce? Rien.

Leur bonheur était complet. Tellement complet qu’ils n’étaient même plus pauvres.

De 1689 à 1704 une transfiguration avait eu lieu.

Il arrivait parfois, en cette année 1704, qu’à la nuit tombante, dans telle ou telle petite ville du littoral, un vaste et lourd fourgon, traîné par deux chevaux robustes, faisait son entrée.

Cela ressemblait à une coque de navire qu’on aurait renversée, la quille pour toit, le pont pour plancher, et mise sur quatre roues. Les roues étaient égales toutes quatre et hautes comme des roues de fardier. Roues, timon et fourgon, tout était badigeonné en vert, avec une gradation rhythmique de nuances qui allait du vert bouteille pour les roues au vert pomme pour la toiture. Cette couleur verte avait fini par faire remarquer cette voiture, et elle était connue dans les champs de foire; on l’appelait la Green-Box, ce qui veut dire la Boîte-Verte. Cette Green-Box n’avait que deux fenêtres, une à chaque extrémité, et l’arrière une porte avec marchepied. Sur le toit, d’un tuyau peint en vert comme le reste, sortait une fumée. Cette maison en marche était toujours vernie à neuf et lavée de frais. A l’avant, sur un strapontin adhérent au fourgon, et ayant pour porte la fenêtre, au-dessus de la croupe des chevaux, à côté d’un vieillard qui tenait les guides et dirigeait l’attelage, deux femmes bréhaignes, c’est-à-dire bohémiennes, vêtues en déesses, sonnaient de la trompette. L’ébahissement des bourgeois contemplait et commentait cette machine, fièrement cahotante.

C’était l’ancien établissement d’Ursus, amplifié par le succès, et de tréteau promu théâtre.

Une espèce d’être entre chien et loup était enchaîné sous le fourgon. C’était Homo.

Le vieux cocher qui menait les hackneys était la personne même du philosophe.

D’où venait cette croissance de la cahute misérable en berlingot olympique?

De ceci: Gwynplaine était célèbre.

C’était avec un flair vrai de ce qui est la réussite parmi les hommes qu’Ursus avait dit à Gwynplaine: On a fait ta fortune.

Ursus, on s’en souvient, avait fait de Gwynplaine son élève. Des inconnus avaient travaillé le visage. Il avait, lui, travaill l’intelligence, et derrière ce masque si bien réussi il avait mis le plus qu’il avait pu de pensée. Dès que l’enfant grandi lui en avait paru digne, il l’avait produit sur la scène, c’est-à-dire sur le devant de la cahute. L’effet de cette apparition avait été extraordinaire. Tout de suite les passants avaient admiré. Jamais on n’avait rien vu de comparable à ce surprenant mime du rire. On ignorait comment ce miracle d’hilarité communîcable était obtenu, les uns le croyaient naturel, les autres le déclaraient artificiel, et, les conjectures s’ajoutant à la réalité, partout, dans les carrefours, dans les marchés, dans toutes les stations de foire et de fête, la foule se ruait vers Gwynplaine. Grâce à cette «great attraction», il y avait eu dans la pauvre escarcelle du groupe nomade pluie de liards d’abord, ensuite de gros sous, et enfin de shellings. Un lieu de curiosité épuisé, on passait à l’autre. Rouler n’enrichit pas une pierre, mais enrichit une cahute; et d’année en année, de ville en ville, avec l’accroissement de la taille et de la laideur de Gwynplaine, la fortune prédite par Ursus était venue.

— Quel service on t’a rendu là, mon garçon! disait Ursus.

Cette «fortune» avait permis à Ursus, administrateur du succès de Gwynplaine, de faire construire la charrette de ses rêves, c’est-à-dire un fourgon assez vaste pour porter un théâtre et semer la science et l’art dans les carrefours. De plus, Ursus avait pu ajouter au groupe composé de lui, d’Homo, de Gwynplaine et de Dea, deux chevaux et deux femmes, lesquelles étaient dans la troupe déesses, nous venons de le dire, et servantes. Un frontispice mythologique était utile alors à une baraque de bateleurs. — Nous sommes un temple errant, disait Ursus.

Ces deux bréhaignes, ramassées par le philosophe dans le pêle-mêle nomade des bourgs et faubourgs, étaient laides et jeunes, et s’appelaient, par la volonté d'Ursus, l'une Phoebé et l'autre Vénus. Lisez: Fibi et Vinos. Attendu qu'il est convenable de se conformer à la prononciation anglaise.

Phoebé faisait la cuisine et Vénus scrobait le temple.

De plus, les jours de performance, elles habillaient Dea.

En dehors de ce qui est, pour les bateleurs comme pour les princes, «la vie publique», Dea était comme Fibi et Vinos, vêtue d'une jupe florentine en toile fleurie et d'un capingot de femme qui, n'ayant pas de manches, laissait les bras libres. Ursus et Gwynplaine portaient des capingots d'hommes, et, comme les matelots de guerre, de grandes chausses à la marine. Gwynplaine avait en outre, pour les travaux et les exercices de force, autour du cou et sur les épaules une esclavine de cuir. Il soignait les chevaux. Ursus et Homo avaient soin l'un de l'autre.

Dea, à force d'être habituée à la Green-Box, allait et venait dans l'intérieur de la maison roulante presque avec aisance, et comme si elle y voyait.

L'oeil qui eût pu pénétrer dans la structure intime et dans l'arrangement de cet édifice ambulant eût aperçu dans un angle, amarrée aux parois et immobile sur ses quatre roues, l'antique cahute d'Ursus mise à la retraite, ayant permission de se rouiller, et désormais dispensée de rouler comme Homo de traîner.

Celte cahute, rencognée à l'arrière à droite de la porte, servait de chambre et de vestiaire à Ursus et à Gwynplaine. Elle contenait maintenant deux lits. Dans le coin vis-à-vis était la cuisine.

Un aménagement de navire n'est pas plus concis et plus précis que ne l'était l'appropriation intérieure de la Green-Box. Tout y était casé, rangé, prévu, voulu.

Le berlingot était coupé en trois compartiments cloisonnés. Les compartiments communiquaient par des baies libres et sans porte.
Une pièce d'étoffe tombante les fermait à peu près. Le compartiment d'arrière était le logis des hommes, le compartiment d'avant était le logis des femmes, le compartiment du milieu, séparant les deux sexes, était le théâtre. Les effets d'orchestre et de machines étaient dans la cuisine. Une soupente sous la voussure du toit contenait les décors, et en ouvrant une trappe à cette soupente on démasquait des lampes qui produisaient des magies d'éclairage.

Ursus était le poëte de ces magies. C'était lui qui faisait les pièces.

Il avait des talents divers, il faisait des tours de passe-passe très particuliers. Outre les voix qu'il faisait entendre, il produisait toules sortes de choses inattendues, des chocs de lumière et d'obscurité, des formations spontanées de chiffres ou de mots à volonté sur une cloison, des clairs-obscurs mêlés d'évanouissements de figures, force bizarreries parmi lesquelles, inattentif à la foule qui s'émerveillait, il semblait méditer.

Un jour, Gwynplaine lui avait dit:

— Père, vous avez l'air d'un sorcier.

Et Ursus avait répondu:

— Cela tient peut-être à ce que je le suis.

La Green-Box, fabriquée sur la savante épure d'Ursus, offrait ce raffinement ingénieux qu'entre les deux roues de devant et de derrière, le panneau central de la façade de gauche tournait sur charnière à l'aide d'un jeu de chaînes et de poulies, et s'abattait à volonté comme un pont-levis. En s'abattant il mettait en liberté trois supports fléaux à gonds qui, gardant la verticale pendant que le panneau s'abaissait, venaient se poser droits sur le sol comme les pieds d'une table, et soutenaient au-dessus du pavé, ainsi qu'une estrade, le panneau devenu plateau. En même temps le théâtre apparaissait, augmenté du plateau qui en faisait l'avant-scène. Celle ouverture ressemblait absolument à une bouche de l'enfer, au dire des prêcheurs puritains en plein vent qui s'en détournaient avec horreur. Il est probable que c'est pour une invention impie de ce genre que Solon donna des coups de bâton à Thespis.

Thespis du reste a duré plus longtemps qu'on ne croit. La charrette-théâtre existe encore. C'est sur des théâtres roulants de ce genre qu'au seizième et au dix-septième siècle on a joué en Angleterre les ballets et ballades d'Amner et de Pilkington, en France les pastorales de Gilbert Colin, en Flandre, aux kermesses, les doubles-choeurs de Clément, dit Non Papa, en Allemagne l'Adam et Eve de Theiles, et en Italie les parades vénitiennes d'Animuccia et de Ca-Fossis, les sylves de Gesualdo, prince de Venouse, le Satyre de Laura Guidiccioni, le Désespoir de Philène, la Mort d'Ugolin de Vincent Galilée, père de l'astronome, lequel Vincent Galilée chantait lui-même sa musique en s'accompagnant de la viole de gambe, et tous ces premiers essais d'opéra italien qui, dès 1580, ont substitu l'inspiration libre au genre madrigalesque.

Le chariot couleur d'espérance qui portait Ursus, Gwynplaine et leur fortune, et en tête duquel Fibi et Vinos trompettaient comme deux renommées, faisait partie de tout ce grand ensemble bohémien et littéraire. Thespis n'eût pas plus désavoué Ursus que Congrio n'eût désavoué Gwynplaine.

A l'arrivée, sur les places des villages et des villes, dans les intervalles de la fanfare de Fibi et de Vinos, Ursus commentait les trompettes par des révélations instructives.

— Cette symphonie est grégorienne, s'écriait-il. Citoyens bourgeois, le sacramentaire grégorien, ce grand progrès, s'est heurté en Italie contre le rit ambrosien, et en Espagne contre le rit mozarabique, et n'en a triomphé que difficilement.

Après quoi, la Green-Box s'arrêtait dans un lieu quelconque du choix d'Ursus, et, le soir venu, le panneau avant-scène s'abaissait, le théâtre s'ouvrait, et la performance commençait.

Le théâtre de la Green-Box représentait un paysage peint par Ursus qui ne savait pas peindre, ce qui fait qu'au besoin le paysage pouvait représenter un souterrain.

Le rideau, ce que nous appelons la toile, était une triveline de soie à carreaux contrastés.

Le public était dehors, dans la rue, sur la place, arrondi en demi-cercle devant le spectacle, sous le soleil, sous les averses, disposition qui faisait la pluie moins désirable pour les théâtres de ce temps-là que pour les théâtres d'à présent.

Quand on le pouvait, on donnait les représentations dans une cour d'auberge, ce qui faisait qu'on avait autant de rangs de loges que d'étages de fenêtres. De cette manière, le théâtre étant plus clos, le public était plus payant.

Ursus était de tout, de la pièce, de la troupe, de la cuisine, de l'orchestre. Vinos battait du carcaveau, dont elle maniait merveille les baguettes, et Fibi pinçait de la morache, qui est une sorte de guiterne. Le loup avait été promu utilité. Il faisait décidément partie de «la compagnie», et jouait dans l'occasion des bouts de rôle. Souvent, quand ils paraissaient côte à côte sur le théâtre, Ursus et Homo, Ursus dans sa peau d'ours bien lacée, Homo dans sa peau de loup mieux ajustée encore, on ne savait lequel des deux était la bête; ce qui flattait Ursus.

IX

EXTRAVAGANCES QUE LES GENS SANS GOUT APPELLENT POÉSIE

Les pièces d’Ursus étaient des interludes, genre un peu passé de mode aujourd’hui. Une de ces pièces, qui n’est pas venue jusqu’ nous, était intitulée Ursus Rursus. Il est probable qu’il y jouait le principal rôle. Une fausse sortie suivie d’une rentrée, c’était vraisemblablement le sujet, sobre et louable.

Le titre des interludes d’Ursus était quelquefois en latin, comme on le voit, et la poésie quelquefois en espagnol. Les vers espagnols d’Ursus étaient rimés comme presque tous les sonnets castillans de ce temps-là. Cela ne gênait point le peuple.

L’espagnol était alors une langue courante, et les marins anglais parlaient castillan de même que les soldats romains parlaient carthaginois. Voyez Plaute. D’ailleurs, au spectacle comme à la messe, la langue latine ou autre que l’auditoire ne comprenait pas, n’embarrassait personne. On s’en tirait en l’accompagnant gaîment de paroles connues. Notre vieille France gauloise particulièrement avait cette manière-là d’être dévote. A l’église, sur un Immolatus les fidèles chantaient Liesse prendrai, et sur un Sanctus, Baise-moi, ma mie. Il fallut le concile de Trente pour mettre fin à ces familiarités.

Ursus avait fait spécialement pour Gwynplaine un interlude, dont il était content. C’était son oeuvre capitale. Il s’y était mis tout entier. Donner sa somme dans son produit, c’est le triomphe de quiconque crée. La crapaude qui fait un crapaud fait un chef-d’oeuvre. Vous doutez? Essayez d’en faire autant.

Ursus avait heaucoup léché cet interlude. Cet ourson était intitulé: Chaos vaincu.

Voici ce que c’était:

Un effet de nuit. Au moment où la triveline s’écartait, la foule massée devant la Green-Box ne voyait que du noir. Dans ce noir se mouvaient, à l’état reptile, trois formes confuses, un loup, un ours et un homme. Le loup était le loup, Ursus était l’ours, Gwynplaine était l’homme. Le loup et l’ours représentaient les forces féroces de la nature, les faims inconscientes, l'obscurit sauvage, et tous deux se ruaient sur Gwynplaine, et c'était le chaos combattant l'homme. On ne distinguait la figure d'aucun. Gwynplaine se débatait couvert d'un linceul, et son visage était caché par ses épais cheveux tombants. D'ailleurs tout était ténèbres. L'ours grondait, le loup grinçait, l'homme criait.

L'homme avait le dessous, les deux bêtes l'accablaient; il demandait aide et secours, il jetait dans l'inconnu un profond appel. Il râlait. On assistait à cette agonie de l'homme ébauche, encore à peine distinct des brutes; c'était lugubre, la foule regardait haletante; une minute de plus, les fauves triomphaient, et le chaos allait résorber l'homme. Lutte, cris, hurlements, et tout à coup silence. Un chant dans l'ombre. Un souffle avait passé, on entendait une voix. Des musiques mystérieuses flottaient, accompagnant ce chant de l'invisible, et subitement, sans qu'on sut d'où ni comment, une blancheur surgissait. Cette blancheur était une lumière, cette lumière était une femme, cette femme était l'esprit. Dea, calme, candide, belle, formidable de sérénité et de douceur, apparaissait au centre d'un nimbe. Silhouette de clarté dans de l'aurore. La voix, c'était elle. Voix légère, profonde, ineffable. D'invisible faite visible, dans cette aube elle chantait. On croyait entendre une chanson d'ange ou un hymne d'oiseau. A cette apparition, l'homme, dressé dans un sursaut d'éblouissement, abattait ses deux poings sur les deux brutes terrassées.

Alors la vision, portée sur un glissement difficile à comprendre et d'autant plus admiré, chantait ces vers, d'une puret espagnole suffisante pour les matelots anglais qui écoutaient:

Ora! Hora!
De palabra Nace razon, Da luze el son.

Prie! pleure! Du verbe naît la raison. Le chant crée la lumière.

Puis elle baissait les yeux au-dessous d'elle comme si elle eût vu un gouffre, et reprenait:

Noche quitta te de alli El alba canta hallali.

Nuit! va-t'en! L'aube chante hallali!

A mesure qu'elle chantait, l'homme se levait de plus en plus, et, de gisant, il était maintenant agenouillé, les mains levées vers la vision, ses deux genoux posés sur les deux bêtes immobiles et comme foudroyées. Elle continuait, tournée vers lui:

Es menester a cielos ir, Y tu que llorabas reir.

Il faut aller au ciel, — et rire, toi qui pleurais.

Et s'approchant, avec une majesté d'astre, elle ajoutait:

Gebra barzon!
Dexa, monstro, A tu negro Caparazon.

Brise le joug! — quitte, monstre, — ta noire — carapace.

Et elle lui posait la main sur le front.

Alors une autre voix s'élevait, plus profonde et par conséquent plus douce encore, voix navrée et ravie, d'une gravité tendre et farouche, et c'était le chant humain répondant au chant sidéral.

Gwynplaine, toujours agenouillé dans l'obscurité sur l'ours et le loup vaincus, la tète sous la main de Dea, chantait:

O ven! ama!
Eres alma, Soy corazon.

Oh! viens! aime! — tu es âme, — je suis coeur.

Et brusquement, dans cette ombre, un jet de lumière frappait Gwynplaine en pleine face,

On voyait dans ces ténèbres le monstre épanoui.

Dire la commotion de la foule est impossible. Un soleil de rire surgissant, tel était l'effet. Le rire naît de l'inattendu, et rien de plus inattendu que ce dénoûment. Pas de saisissement comparable à ce soufflet de lumière sur ce masque bouffon et terrible. On riait autour de ce rire; partout, en haut, en bas, sur le devant, au fond, les hommes, les femmes, les vieilles faces chauves, les roses figures d'enfants, les bons, les méchants, les gens gais, les gens tristes, tout le monde; et même dans la rue, les passants, ceux qui ne voyaient pas, en entendant rire, riaient. Et ce rire s'achevait en battements de mains et en trépignements. La triveline refermée, on rappelait Gwynplaine avec frénésie. De là un succès énorme. Avez-vous vu Chaos vaincu? On courait à Gwynplaine. Les insouciances venaient rire, les mélancolies venaient rire, les mauvaises consciences venaient rire. Rire si irrésistible que par moments il pouvait sembler maladif. Mais s'il y a une peste que l'homme ne fuit pas, c'est la contagion de la joie. Le succès au surplus ne dépassait point la populace. Grosse foule, c'est petit peuple.

On voyait Chaos vaincu pour un penny. Le beau monde ne va pas où l'on va pour un sou.

Ursus ne haïssait point cette oeuvre, longtemps couvée par lui.

— C’est dans le genre d’un nommé Shakespeare, disait-il avec modestie.

La juxtaposition de Dea ajoutait à l’inexprimable effet de Gwynplaine. Cette blanche figure à côté de ce gnome représentait ce qu’on pourrait appeler l’étonnement divin. Le peuple regardait Dea avec une sorte d’anxiété mystérieuse. Elle avait ce je ne sais quoi de suprême de la vierge et de la prêtresse, qui ignore l’homme et connaît Dieu. On voyait qu’elle était aveugle et l’on sentait qu’elle était voyante. Elle semblait debout sur le seuil du surnaturel. Elle paraissait être à moiti dans notre lumière et à moitié dans l’autre clarté. Elle venait travailler sur la terre, et travailler de la façon dont travaille le ciel, avec de l’aurore. Elle trouvait une hydre et faisait une âme. Elle avait l’air de la puissance créatrice, satisfaite et stupéfaite de sa création; on croyait voir sur son visage adorablement effaré la volonté de la cause et la surprise du résultat. On sentait qu’elle aimait son monstre. Le savait-elle monstre? Oui, puisqu’elle le touchait. Non, puisqu’elle l’acceptait. Toute cette nuit et tout ce jour mêlés se résolvaient dans l’esprit du spectateur en un clair-obscur o apparaissaient des perspectives infinies. Comment la divinit adhère à l’ébauche, de quelle façon s’accomplit la pénétration de l’âme dans la matière, comment le rayon solaire est un cordon ombilical, comment le défiguré se transfigure, comment l’informe devient paradisiaque, tous ces mystères entrevus compliquaient d’une émotion presque cosmique la convulsion d’hilarité soulevée par Gwynplaine. Sans aller au fond, car le spectateur n’aime point la fatigue de l’approfondissement, on comprenait quelque chose au delà de ce qu’on apercevait, et ce spectacle étrange avait une transparence d’avatar.

Quant à Dea, ce qu’elle éprouvait échappe à la parole humaine.

Elle se sentait au milieu d’une foule, et ne savait ce que c’était qu’une foule.

Elle entendait une rumeur, et c’est tout.

Pour elle une foule était un souffle; et au fond ce n’est que cela. Les générations sont des baleines qui passent. L’bomme respire, aspire et expire. Dans cette foule, Dea se sentait seule, et avait le frisson d’une suspension au-dessus d’un précipice. Tout à coup, dans ce trouble de l’innocent en détresse prêt à accuser l’inconnu, dans ce mécontentement de la chute possible, Dea, sereine pourtant, et supérieure à la vague angoisse du péril, mais intérieurement frémissante de son isolement, retrouvait sa certitude et son support; elle ressaisissait son fil de sauvetage dans l’univers des ténèbres, elle posait sa main sur la puissante tête de Gwynplaine. Joie inouïe! elle appuyait ses doigts roses sur cette forêt de cheveux crépus. La laine touchée éveille une idée de douceur.

Dea touchait un mouton qu’elle savait être un lion. Tout son coeur se fondait en un ineffable amour. Elle se sentait hors de danger, elle trouvait le sauveur. Le public croyait voir le contraire. Pour les spectateurs, l’être sauvé, c’était Gwynplaine, et l’être sauveur, c’était Dea. Qu’importe! pensait Ursus, pour qui le coeur de Dea était visible. Et Dea, rassurée, consolée, ravie, adorait l’ange, pendant que le peuple contemplait le monstre, et subissait, fasciné lui aussi, mais en sens inverse, cet immense rire prométhéen.

L’amour vrai ne se blase point. Étant tout âme, il ne peut s’attiédir. Une braise se couvre de cendre, une étoile non. Ces impressions exquises se renouvelaient tous les soirs pour Dea, et elle était prête à pleurer de tendresse pendant qu’on se tordait de rire. Autour d’elle, on n’était que joyeux; elle, elle était heureuse.

Du reste l’effet de gaîté, dû au rictus imprévu et stupéfiant de Gwynplaine, n’était évidemment pas voulu par Ursus. Il eût préféré plus de sourire et moins de rire, et une admiration plus littéraire. Mais triomphe console. Il se réconciliait tous les soirs avec son succès excessif, en comptant combien les piles de farthings faisaient de shellings, et combien les piles de shellings faisaient de pounds. Et puis il se disait qu’après tout, ce rire passé, Chaos vaincu se retrouvait au fond des esprits et qu’il leur en restait quelque chose. Il ne se trompait peut-être point tout à fait; le tassement d’une oeuvre se fait dans le public. La vérité est que cette populace, attentive à ce loup, à cet ours, à cet homme, puis à cette musique, à ces hurlements domptés par l’harmonie, à cette nuit dissipée par l’aube, à ce chant dégageant la lumière, acceptait avec une sympathie confuse et profonde, et même avec un certain respect attendri, ce drame-poëme de Chaos vaincu, cette victoire de l’esprit sur la matière, aboutissant à la joie de l’homme.

Tels étaient les plaisirs grossiers du peuple.

Ils lui suffisaient. Le peuple n’avait pas le moyen d’aller aux «nobles matches» de la gentry, et ne pouvait, comme les seigneurs et gentilshommes, parier mille guinées pour Helmsgail contre Phelem-ghe-madone.

X

COUP D'OEIL DE CELUI QUI EST HORS DE TOUT SUR LES CHOSES ET SUR LES HOMMES

L'homme a une pensée, se venger du plaisir qu'on lui fait. De l le mépris pour le comédien.

Cet être me charme, me divertit, m'enseigne, m'enchante, me console, me verse l'idéal, m'est agréable et utile, quel mal puis-je lui rendre? L'humiliation. Le dédain, c'est le soufflet à distance. Souffletons-le. Il me plaît, donc il est vil. Il me sert, donc je le hais. Où y a-t-il une pierre que je la lui jette? Prêtre, donne la tienne. Philosophe, donne la tienne. Bossuet, excommunie-le. Rousseau, insulte-le. Orateur, crache-lui les cailloux de ta bouche. Ours, lance-lui ton pavé. Lapidons l'arbre, meurtrissons le fruit, et mangeons-le. Bravo! et A bas! Dire les vers des poëtes, c'est être pestiféré. Histrion, va! mettons-le au carcan dans son succès. Achevons-lui son triomphe en huée. Qu'il amasse la foule et qu'il crée la solitude. Et c'est ainsi que les classes riches, dites hautes classes, ont inventé pour le comédien cette forme d'isolement, l'applaudissement.

La populace est moins féroce. Elle ne haïssait point Gwynplaine. Elle ne le méprisait pas non plus. Seulement le dernier calfat du dernier équipage de la dernière caraque amarrée dans le dernier des ports d'Angleterre se considérait comme incommensurablement supérieur à cet amuseur de «la canaille», et estimait qu'un calfat est autant audessus d'un saltimbanque qu'un lord est au-dessus d'un calfat.

Gwynplaine était donc, comme tous les comédiens, applaudi et isolé. Du reste, ici-bas tout succès est crime, et s'expie. Qui a la médaille a le revers.

Pour Gwynplaine il n'y avait point de revers. En ce sens que les deux côtés de son succès lui agréaient. Il était satisfait de l'applaudissement, et content de l'isolement. Par l'applaudissement, il était riche; par l'isolement, il était heureux.

Être riche, dans ces bas-fonds, c'est n'être plus misérable. C'est n'avoir plus de trous à ses vêtements, plus de froid dans son âtre, plus de vide dans son estomac. C'est manger à son appétit et boire à sa soif.

C’est avoir tout le nécessaire, y compris un sou a donner a un pauvre. Cette richesse indigente, suffisante à la liberté, Gwynplaine l’avait.

Du côté de l’âme, il était opulent. Il avait l’amour. Que pouvait-il désirer?

Il ne désirait rien.

La difformité de moins, il semble que ce pouvait être là une offre à lui faire. Comme il l’eût repoussée! Quitter ce masque et reprendre son visage, redevenir ce qu’il avait été peut-être, beau et charmant, certes, il n’eût pas voulu! Et avec quoi eût-il nourri Dea? que fût devenue la pauvre et douce aveugle qui l’aimait? Sans ce rictus qui faisait de lui un clown unique, il ne serait plus qu’un saltimbanque comme un autre, le premier équilibriste venu, un ramasseur de liards entre les fentes des pavés, et Dea n’aurait peut-être pas du pain tous les jours! Il se sentait avec un profond orgueil de tendresse le protecteur de cette infirme céleste. Nuit, Solitude, Dénûment, Impuissance, Ignorance, Faim et Soif, les sept gueules béantes de la misère se dressaient autour d’elle, et il était le saint Georges combattant ce dragon. Et il triomphait de la misère. Comment? par sa difformité. Par sa difformité, il était utile, secourable, victorieux, grand. Il n’avait qu’à se montrer, et l’argent venait. Il était le maître des foules; il se constatait le souverain des populaces. Il pouvait tout pour Dea. Ses besoins, il y pourvoyait; ses désirs, ses envies, ses fantaisies, dans la sphère limitée des souhaits possibles à un aveugle, il les contentait. Gwynplaine et Dea étaient, nous l’avons montré déjà, la providence l’un de l’autre. Il se sentait enlevé sur ses ailes, elle se sentait portée dans ses bras. Protéger qui vous aime, donner le nécessaire à qui vous donne les étoiles, il n’est rien de plus doux. Gwynplaine avait cette félicité suprême. Et il la devait à sa difformité. Cette difformité le faisait supérieur à tout. Par elle il gagnait sa vie, et la vie des autres; par elle il avait l’indépendance, la liberté, la célébrité, la satisfaction intime, la fierté. Dans cette difformité il était inaccessible. Les fatalités ne pouvaient rien contre lui au delà de ce coup où elles s’étaient épuisées, et qui lui avait tourné en triomphe. Ce fond du malheur était devenu un sommet élyséen. Gwynplaine était emprisonné dans sa difformité, mais avec Dea. C’était, nous l’avons dit, être au cachot dans le paradis. Il y avait entre eux et le monde des vivants une muraille. Tant mieux. Cette muraille les parquait, mais les défendait. Que pouvait-on contre Dea, que pouvait-on contre Gwynplaine, avec une telle fermeture de la vie autour d’eux? Lui ôter le succès? impossible. Il eût fallu lui ôter sa face. Lui ôter l’amour?

impossible. Dea ne le voyait point.

L’aveuglement de Dea était divinement incurable. Quel inconvénient avait pour Gwynplaine sa difformité? Aucun. Quel avantage avait-elle? Tous. Il était aimé malgré cette horreur, et peut-être à cause d’elle. Infirmité et difformité s’étaient, d’instinct, rapprochées et accouplées. Être aimé, est-ce que ce n’est pas tout? Gwynplaine ne songeait à sa défiguration qu’avec reconnaissance. Il était béni dans ce stigmate. Il le sentait avec joie imperdable et éternel, Quelle chance que ce bienfait fût irrémédiable! Tant qu’il y aurait des carrefours, des champs de foire, des routes où aller devant soi, du peuple en bas, du ciel en haut, on serait sûr de vivre, Dea ne manquerait de rien, on aurait l’amour! Gwynplaine n’eût pas changé de visage avec Apollon. Être monstre était pour lui la forme du bonheur.

Aussi disions-nous en commençant que la destinée l’avait comblé.

Ce réprouvé était un préféré.

Il était si heureux qu’il en venait à plaindre les hommes autour de lui. Il avait de la pitié de reste. C’était d’ailleurs son instinct de regarder un peu dehors, car aucun homme n’est tout d’une pièce et une nature n’est pas une abstraction; il était ravi d’être muré, mais de temps en temps il levait la tête par-dessus le mur. Il n’en rentrait qu’avec plus de joie dans son isolement près de Dea, après avoir comparé.

Que voyait-il autour de lui? Qu’était-ce que ces vivants dont son existence nomade lui montrait tous les échantillons, chaque jour remplacés par d’autres? Toujours de nouvelles foules, et toujours la même multitude. Toujours de nouveaux visages et toujours les mêmes infortunes. Une promiscuité de ruines.

Chaque soir toutes les fatalités sociales venaient faire cercle autour de sa félicité.

La Green-Box était populaire.

Le bas prix appelle la basse classe. Ce qui venait à lui c’étaient les faibles, les pauvres, les petits. On allait Gwynplaine comme on va au gin. On venait acheter pour deux sous d’oubli. Du haut de son tréteau, Gwynplaine passait en revue le sombre peuple. Son esprit s’emplissait de toutes ces apparitions successives de l’immense misère. La physionomie humaine est faite par la conscience et par la vie, et est la résultante d’une foule de creusements mystérieux. Pas une souffrance, pas une colère, pas une ignominie, pas un désespoir, dont Gwynplaine ne vît la ride. Ces bouches d’enfants n’avaient pas mangé. Cet homme était un père, cette femme était une mère, et derrière eux on devinait des familles en perdition. Tel visage sortait du vice et entrait au crime; et l’on comprenait le pourquoi: ignorance et indigence. Tel autre offrait une empreinte de bont première raturée par l’accablement social et devenue haine. Sur ce front de vieille femme on voyait la famine; sur ce front de jeune fille on voyait la prostitution. Le même fait, offrant chez la jeune la ressource, et plus lugubre là. Dans cette cohue il y avait des bras, mais pas d’outils; ces travailleurs ne demandaient pas mieux, mais le travail manquait. Parfois près de l’ouvrier un soldat venait s’asseoir, quelquefois un invalide, et Gwynplaine apercevait ce spectre, la guerre. Ici Gwynplaine lisait chômage, là exploitation, là servitude. Sur certains fronts il constatait on ne sait quel refoulement vers l’animalité, et ce lent retour de l’homme à la bête produit en bas par la pression des pesanteurs obcures du bonheur d’en haut.

Dans ces ténèbres, il y avait pour Gwynplaine un soupirail. Ils avaient, lui et Dea, du bonheur par un jour de souffrance. Tout le reste était damnation. Gwynplaine sentait au-dessus de lui le piétinement inconscient des puissants, des opulents, des magnifiques, des grands, des élus du hasard; au-dessous, il distinguait le tas de faces pâles des déshérités; il se voyait, lui et Dea, avec leur tout petit bonheur, si immense, entre deux mondes; en haut le monde allant et venant, libre, joyeux, dansant, foulant aux pieds; en haut, le monde qui marche; en bas, le monde sur qui l’on marche. Chose fatale, et qui indique un profond mal social, la lumière écrase l’ombre! Gwynplaine constatait ce deuil. Quoi! une destinée si reptile! L’homme se traînant ainsi! une telle adhérence à la poussière et à la fange, un tel dégoût, une telle abdication, et une telle abjection, qu’on a envie de mettre le pied dessus! de quel papillon cette vie terrestre est-elle donc la chenille? Quoi!
dans cette foule qui a faim et qui ignore, partout, devant tous, le point d’interrogation du crime ou de la honte!
l’inflexibilité des lois produisant l’amollissement des consciences! pas un enfant qui ne croisse pour le rapetissement!
pas une vierge qui ne grandisse pour l’offre! pas une rose qui ne naisse pour la bave! Ses yeux parfois, curieux d’une curiosité émue, cherchaient à voir jusqu’au fond de cette obscurité où agonisaient tant d’efforts inutiles et où luttaient tant de lassitudes, familles dévorées par la société, moeurs torturées par les lois, plaies faites gangrènes par la pénalité, indigences rongées par l’impôt, intelligences à vau-l’eau dans un engloutissement d’ignorance, radeaux en détresse couverts d’affamés, guerres, disettes, râles, cris, disparitions; et il sentait le vague saisissement de cette poignante angoisse universelle. Il avait la vision de toute cette écume du malheur sur le sombre pêle-mêle humain. Lui, il était au port, et il regardait autour de lui ce naufrage. Par moment, il prenait dans ses mains sa tête défigurée, et songeait.

Quelle folie que d'être heureux! comme on rêve! il lui venait des idées. L'absurde lui traversait le cerveau. Parce qu'il avait autrefois secouru un enfant, il sentait des velléités de secourir le monde. Des nuages de rêverie lui obscurcissaient parfois sa propre réalité; il perdait le sentiment de la proportion jusqu'à se dire: Que pourrait-on faire pour ce pauvre peuple? Quelquefois son absorption était telle qu'il le disait tout haut. Alors Ursus haussait les épaules et le regardait fixement. Et Gwynplaine continuait de rêver: — Oh! si j'étais puissant, comme je viendrais en aide aux malheureux! Mais que suis-je? un atome. Que puis-je? rien.

Il se trompait. Il pouvait beaucoup pour les malheureux. Il les faisait rire.

Et, nous l'avons dit, faire rire, c'est faire oublier. Quel bienfaiteur sur la terre, qu'un distributeur d'oubli!

XI

GWYNPLAINE EST DANS LE JUSTE, URSUS EST DANS LE VRAI

Un philosophe est un espion. Ursus, guetteur de rêves, étudiait son élève. Nos monologues ont sur notre front une vague réverbération distincte au regard du physionomiste. C’est pourquoi ce qui se passait en Gwynplaine n’échappait point Ursus. Un jour que Gwynplaine méditait, Ursus, le tirant par son capingot, s’écria:

— Tu me fais l’effet d’un observateur, imbécile! Prends-y garde, cela ne te regarde pas. Tu as une chose à faire, aimer Dea. Tu es heureux de deux bonheurs: le premier, c’est que la foule voit ton museau, le second, c’est que Dea ne le voit pas. Ce bonheur que tu as, tu n’y as pas droit Nulle femme, voyant ta bouche, n’acceptera ton baiser. Et cette bouche qui fait ta fortune, cette face qui fait ta richesse, ça n’est pas à toi. Tu n’étais pas né avec ce visage-là. Tu l’as pris à la grimace qui est au fond de l’infini. Tu as volé son masque au diable. Tu es hideux, contente-toi de ce quine. Il y a dans ce monde, qui est une chose très bien faite, les heureux de droit et les heureux de raccroc. Tu es un heureux de raccroc. Tu es dans une cave où se trouve prise une étoile. La pauvre étoile est à toi. N’essaie pas de sortir de ta cave, et garde ton astre, araignée! Tu as dans la toile l’escarboucle Vénus. Fais-moi le plaisir d’être satisfait. Je te vois rêvasser, c’est idiot. Écoute, je vais te parler le langage de la vraie poésie: que Dea mange des tranches de boeuf et des côtelelles de mouton, dans six mois elle sera forte comme une turque; épouse-la tout net, et fais-lui un enfant, deux enfants, trois enfants, une ribambelle d’enfants.

Voilà ce que j’appelle philosopher. De plus, on est heureux, ce qui n’est pas bête. Avoir des petits, c’est là le bleu. Aie des mioches, torche-les, mouche-les, couche-les, barbouille-les et débarbouille-les, que tout cela grouille autour de toi; s’ils rient, c’est bien; s’ils gueulent, c’est mieux; crier, c’est vivre; regarde-les téter à six mois, ramper à un an, marcher deux ans, grandir à quinze ans, aimer à vingt ans. Qui a ces joies, a tout. Moi, j’ai manqué cela, c’est ce qui fait que je suis une brûte. Le bon Dieu, un faiseur de beaux poêmes, et qui est le premier des hommes de lettres, a dicté à son collaborateur Moïse: Multipliez! Tel est le texte. Multiplie, animal.

Quant au monde, il est ce qu’il est; il n’a pas besoin de toi pour aller mal.

N’en prends pas souci. Ne t’occupe pas de ce qui est dehors. Laisse l’horizon tranquille. Un comédien est fait pour être regardé, non pour regarder. Sais-tu ce qu’il y a dehors? les heureux de droit. Toi, je te le répète, tu es l’heureux du hasard. Tu es le filou du bonheur dont ils sont les propriétaires. Ils sont les légitimes, tu es l’intrus, tu vis en concubinage avec la chance. Que veux-tu de plus que ce que tu as? Que Schiboleth me soit en aide! ce polisson est un maroufle. Se multiplier par Dea, c’est pourtant agréable. Une telle félicité ressemble à une escroquerie. Ceux qui ont le bonheur ici-bas par privilège de là-haut n’aiment pas qu’on se permette d’avoir tant de joie audessous d’eux. S’ils te demandaient: de quel droit es-tu heureux? tu ne saurais que répondre. Tu n’as pas de patente, eux ils en ont une. Jupiter, Allah, Vishnou, Sabaoth, n’importe, leur a donné le visa pour être heureux. Crains-les. Ne te mêle pas d’eux afin qu’ils ne se mêlent pas de toi. Sais-tu ce que c’est, misérable, que l’heureux de droit? C’est un être terrible, c’est le lord. Ah!
le lord, en voilà un qui a dû intriguer dans l’inconnu du diable avant d’être au monde, pour entrer dans la vie par cette porte-là! Comme il a dû lui être difficile de naître! Il ne s’est donné que cette peine-là, mais, juste ciel! c’en est une!
obtenir du destin, ce butor aveugle, qu’il vous fasse d’emblée au berceau maître des hommes! corrompre ce buraliste pour qu’il vous donne la meilleure place au spectacle! Lis le memento qui est dans la cahute que j’ai mise à la retraite, lis ce bréviaire de ma sagesse, et tu verras ce que c’est que le lord. Un lord, c’est celui qui a tout et qui est tout. Un lord est celui qui existe au-dessus de sa propre nature; un lord est celui qui a, jeune, les droits du vieillard, vieux, les bonnes fortunes du jeune homme, vicieux, le respect des gens de bien, poltron, le commandement des gens de coeur, fainéant, le fruit du travail, ignorant, le diplôme de Cambridge et d’Oxford, bête, l’admiration des poëtes, laid, le sourire des femmes, Thersite, le casque d’Achille, lièvre, la peau du lion. N’abuse pas de mes paroles, je ne dis pas qu’un lord soit nécessairement ignorant, poltron, laid, bête et vieux; je dis seulement qu’il peut être tout cela sans que cela lui fasse du tort. Au contraire. Les lords sont les princes. Le roi d’Angleterre n’est qu’un lord, le premier seigneur de la seigneurie; c’est tout, c’est beaucoup. Les rois jadis s’appelaient lords; le lord de Danemark, le lord d’Irlande, le lord des Iles. Le lord de Norvège ne s’est appelé roi que depuis trois cents ans. Lucius, le plus ancien roi d’Angleterre, était qualifié par saint Télesphore milord

Lucius. Les lords sont pairs, c’est-à-dire égaux. De qui? du roi. Je ne fais pas la faute de confondre les lords avec le parlement. L’assemblée du peuple, que les saxons, avant la conquête, intitulaient wittenagemot, les normands, après la conquête, l’ont intitulée parliamentum. Peu à peu on a mis le peuple à la porte. Les lettres closes du roi convoquant les communes portaient jadis ad consilium impendendum, elles portent aujourd’hui ad consentiendum. Les communes ont le droit de consentement. Dire oui est leur liberté. Les pairs peuvent dire non. Et la preuve, c’est qu’ils l’ont dit. Les pairs peuvent couper la tête au roi, le peuple point. Le coup de hache à Charles Ier est un empiétement, non sur le roi, mais sur les pairs, et l’on a bien fait de mettre aux fourches la carcasse de Cromwell. Les lords ont la puissance, pourquoi? parce qu’ils ont la richesse. Qui est-ce qui a feuilleté le Doomsday-book? C’est la preuve que les lords possèdent l’Angleterre, c’est le registre des biens des sujets dressé sous Guillaume le Conquérant, et il est sous la garde du chancelier de l’échiquier. Pour y copier quelque chose, on paie quatre sous par ligne. C’est un fier livre. Sais-tu que j’ai été docteur domestique chez un lord qui s’appelait Marmaduke et qui avait neuf cent mille francs de France de rente par an?

Tire-toi de là, affreux crétin. Sais-tu que rien qu’avec les lapins des garennes du comte Lindsey on nourrirait toute la canaille des Cinq-ports? Aussi frottez-vous-y. On y met bon ordre. Tout braconnier est pendu. Pour deux longues oreilles poilues qui passaient hors de sa gibecière, j’ai vu accrocher la potence un père de six enfants. Telle est la seigneurie. Le lapin d’un lord est plus que l’homme du bon Dieu. Les seigneurs sont, entends-tu, maraud? et nous devons le trouver bon. Et puis si nous le trouvons mauvais, qu’est-ce que cela leur fait?

Le peuple faisant des objections! Plante lui-même n’approcherait pas de ce comique. Un philosophe serait plaisant s’il conseillait à cette pauvre diablesse de multitude de se récrier contre la largeur et la lourdeur des lords. Autant faire discuter par la chenille la patte de l’éléphant. J’ai vu un jour un hippopotame marcher sur une taupinière; il écrasait tout; il était innocent. Il ne savait même pas qu’il y eût des taupes, ce gros bonasse de mastodonte. Mon cher, des taupes qu’on écrase, c’est le genre humain. L’écrasement est une loi. Et crois-tu que la taupe elle-même n’écrase rien? Elle est le mastodonte du ciron, qui est le mastodonte du volvoce. Mais ne raisonnons pas.

Mon garçon, les carrosses existent. Le lord est dedans, le peuple est sous la roue, le sage se range. Mets-toi de côté, et laisse passer. Quant à moi, j'aime les lords, et je les évite.

J'ai vécu chez un. Cela suffit à la beauté de mes souvenirs. Je me rappelle son château, comme une gloire dans un nuage. Moi, mes rêves sont en arrière. Rien de plus admirable que Marmaduke-Lodge pour la grandeur, la belle symétrie, les riches revenus, les ornements et les accompagnements de l'édifice. Du reste, les maisons, hôtels et palais des lords offrent un recueil de ce qu'il y a de plus grand et magnifique dans ce florissant royaume. J'aime nos seigneurs. Je les remercie d'être opulents, puissants et prospères. Moi qui suis vêtu de ténèbres, je vois avec intérêt et plaisir cet échantillon de l'azur céleste qu'on appelle un lord. On entrait à Marmaduke-Lodge par une cour extrêmement spacieuse, qui faisait un carré long partagé en huit carreaux, fermés de balustrades, laissant de tous côtés un large chemin ouvert, avec une superbe fontaine hexagone au milieu, deux bassins, couverte d'un dôme d'un ouvrage exquis à jour, qui était suspendu sur six colonnes. C'est là que j'ai connu un docte français, M. l'abbé du Cros, qui était de la maison des Jacobins de la rue Saint-Jacques. Il y avait à Marmaduke-Lodge une moitié de la bibliothèque d'Erpenius, dont l'autre moitié est à l'auditoire de théologie de Cambridge. J'y lisais des livres, assis sous le portail qui est enjolivé. Ces choses-là ne sont ordinairement vues que par un petit nombre de voyageurs curieux.

Sais-tu, ridicule boy, que monseigneur William North, qui est lord Gray de Rolleston, et qui siège le quartorzième au banc des barons, a plus d'arbres de haute futaie dans sa montagne que tu n'as de cheveux sur ton horrible caboche? Sais-tu que lord Norreys de Rycott, qui est la même chose que le comte d'Abingdon, a un donjon carré de deux cents pieds de haut portant cette devise Virtus ariete fortior, ce qui a l'air de vouloir dire la vertu est plus forte qu'un bélier, mais ce qui veut dire, imbécile! le courage est plus fort qu'une machine de guerre? Oui, j'honore, accepte, respecte et révère nos seigneurs. Ce sont les lords qui, avec la majesté royale, travaillent procurer et à conserver les avantages de la nation. Leur sagesse consommée éclate dans les conjonctures épineuses. La préséance sur tous, je voudrais bien voir qu'ils ne l'eussent pas. Ils l'ont. Ce qui s'appelle en Allemagne principauté et en Espagne grandesse, s'appelle pairie en Angleterre et en France. Comme on était en droit de trouver ce monde assex, misérable, Dieu a senti ou le bât le blessait, il a voulu prouver qu'il savait faire des gens heureux, et il a créé les lords pour donner satisfaction aux philosophes.

Cette création-là corrige l’autre, et tire d’affaire le bon Dieu. C’est pour lui une sortie décente d’une fausse position. Les grands sont grands. Un pair en parlant de lui-même dit nos. Un pair est un pluriel. Le roi qualifie les pairs consanguinei nostri. Les pairs ont fait une foule de lois sages, entre autres celle qui condamne à mort l’homme qui coupe un peuplier de trois ans. Leur suprématie est telle qu’ils ont une langue à eux. En style héraldique, le noir, qui s’appelle sable pour le peuple des nobles, s’appelle saturne pour les princes et diamant pour les pairs. Poudre de diamant, nuit étoilée, c’est le noir des heureux. Et, même entre eux, ils ont des nuances, ces hauts seigneurs. Un baron ne peut laver avec un vicomte sans sa permission. Ce sont là des choses excellentes, et qui conservent les nations. Que c’est beau pour un peuple d’avoir vingt-cinq ducs, cinq marquis, soixante-seize comtes, neuf vicomtes et soixante et un barons, qui font cent soixante-seize pairs, qui les uns sont grâce et les autres seigneurie! Après cela, quand il y aurait quelques haillons par-ci par-là! Tout ne peut pas être en or. Haillons, soit; est-ce que ne voilà pas de la pourpre? L’un achète l’autre. Il faut bien que quelque chose soit construit avec quelque chose.

Eh bien, oui, il y a des indigents, la belle affaire! Ils étoffent le bonheur des opulents. Morbleu! nos lords sont notre gloire. La meute de Charles Mohun, baron Mohun, coûte à elle seule autant que l’hôpital des lépreux de Mooregate, et que l’hôpital de Christ, fondé pour les enfants en 1553 par Édouard VI. Thomas Osborne, duc de Leeds, dépense par an, rien que pour ses livrées, cinq mille guinées d’or. Les grands d’Espagne ont un gardien nommé par le roi qui les empêche de se ruiner. C’est pleutre. Nos lords, à nous, sont extravagants et magnifiques.

J’estime cela. Ne déblatérons pas comme des envieux. Je sais gré à une belle vision qui passe. Je n’ai pas la lumière, mais j’ai le reflet. Reflet sur mon ulcère, diras-tu. Va-t’en au diable. Je suis un Job heureux de contempler Trimalcion. Oh!

la belle planète radieuse là-haut! c’est quelque chose que d’avoir ce clair de lune. Supprimer les lords, c’est une opinion qu’Oreste n’oserait soutenir, tout insensé qu’il était. Dire que les lords sont nuisibles ou inutiles, cela revient à dire qu’il faut ébranler les états, et que les hommes ne sont pas faits pour vivre comme les troupeaux, broutant l’herbe et mordus par le chien. Le pré est tondu par le mouton, le mouton est tondu par le berger. Quoi de plus juste? A tondeur, tondeur et demi.

Moi, tout m’est égal; je suis un philosophe, et je tiens à la vie comme une mouche. La vie n’est qu’un pied à terre. Quand je pense que Henry Bowes Howard, comte de Berkshire, a dans ses écuries vingt-quatre carrosses de gala, dont un à harnais d’argent et un autre à harnais d’or! Mon Dieu, je sais bien que tout le monde n’a pas vingt-quatre carrosses de gala, mais il ne faut point déclamer. Parce que tu as eu froid une nuit, ne voilà-t-il pas! Il n’y a pas que toi. D’autres aussi ont froid et faim. Sais-tu que sans ce froid Dea ne serait pas aveugle, et que si Dea n’était pas aveugle, elle ne t’aimerait pas!

raisonne, buse! Et puis, si tous les gens qui sont épars se plaignaient, ce serait un beau vacarme. Silence, voilà la règle.

Je suis convaincu que le bon Dieu ordonne aux damnés de se taire, sans quoi ce serait Dieu qui serait damné, d’entendre un cri éternel. Le bonheur de l’Olympe est au prix du silence du Cocyte. Donc, peuple, tais-toi. Je fais mieux, moi, j’approuve et j’admire. Tout à l’heure, j’énumérais les lords, mais il faut y ajouter deux archevêques et vingt-quatre évêques! En vérité, je suis attendri quand j’y songe. Je me rappelle avoir vu, chez le dîmeur du révérend doyen de Raphoë, lequel doyen fait partie de la seigneurie et de l’église, une vaste meule du plus beau bl prise aux paysans d’alentour et que le doyen n’avait pas eu la peine de faire pousser. Cela lui laissait le temps de prier Dieu. Sais-tu que lord Marmaduke mon maître était lord grand trésorier d’Irlande, et haut sénéchal de la souveraineté de Knaresburg dans le comté d’York! Sais-tu que le lord haut chambellan, qui est un office héréditaire dans la famille des ducs d’Ancaster, habille le roi le jour du couronnement, et reçoit pour sa peine quarante aunes de velours cramoisi, plus le lit où le roi a dormi; et que l’huissier de la verge noire est son député! Je voudrais bien te voir faire résistance à ceci, que le plus ancien vicomte d’Angleterre est le sire Robert Brent, créé vicomte par Henri V. Tous les titres des lords indiquent une souveraineté sur une terre, le comte Rivers excepté, qui a pour titre son nom de famille. Comme c’est admirable ce droit qu’ils ont de taxer les autres, et de prélever, par exemple, comme en ce moment-ci, quatre shellings par livre sterling de rente, ce qu’on vient de continuer pour un an, et tous ces beaux impôts sur les esprits distillés, sur les accises du vin et de la bière, sur le tonnage et le pondage, sur le cidre, le poiré, le mum, le malt et l’orge préparé, et sur le charbon de terre et cent autres semblables! Vénérons ce qui est. Le clergé lui-même relève des lords. L’évêque de Man est le sujet du comte de Derby. Les lords ont des bêtes féroces à eux qu’ils mettent dans leurs armoiries. Comme Dieu n’en a pas fait assez, ils en inventent. Ils ont crée le sanglier héraldique qui est autant au-dessus du sanglier que le sanglier est au-dessus du porc, et que le seigneur est au-dessus du prêtre. Ils ont créé le griffon, qui est aigle aux lions et lion aux aigles, et qui fait peur aux lions par ses ailes et aux aigles par sa crinière. Ils ont la guivre, la licorne, la serpente, la salamandre, la tarasque, la drée, le dragon, l'hippogriffe. Tout cela, terreur pour nous, leur est ornement et parure. Ils ont une ménagerie qui s'appelle le blason, et où rugissent les monstres inconnus.

Pas de forêt comparable pour l'inattendu des prodiges à leur orgueil. Leur vanité est pleine de fantômes qui s'y promènent comme dans une nuit sublime, armés, casqués, cuirassés, éperonnés, le bâton d'empire à la main, et disant d'une voix grave: Nous sommes les aïeux! Les scarabées mangent les racines, et les panoplies mangent le peuple. Pourquoi pas? Allons-nous changer les lois? La seigneurie fait partie de l'ordre. Sais-tu qu'il y a un duc en Écosse qui galope trente lieues sans sortir de chez lui? Sais-lu que le lord archevêque de Canterbury a un million de France de revenu? Sais-tu que sa majesté a par an sept cent mille livres sterling de liste civile, sans compter les châteaux, forêts, domaines, fiefs, tenances, alleux, prébendes, dîmes et redevances, confiscations et amendes, qui dépassent un million sterling? Ceux qui ne sont pas contents sont difficiles.

— Oui, murmura Gwynplaine pensif, c'est de l'enfer des pauvres qu'est fait le paradis des riches.

URSUS LE POËTE ENTRAINE URSUS LE PHILOSOPHE

Puis Dea entra; il la regarda, et ne vit plus qu'elle. L'amour est ainsi; on peut être envahi un moment par une obsession de pensées quelconques; la femme qu'on aime arrive, et fait brusquement évanouir tout ce qui n'est pas sa présence, sans se douter qu'elle efface peut-être en nous un monde.

Disons ici un détail. Dans Chaos vaincu, un mot, monstre, adressé à Gwynplaine, déplaisait à Dea. Quelquefois, avec le peu d'espagnol que tout le monde savait dans ce temps-là, elle faisait le petit coup de tête de le remplacer par quiero, qui signifie je le veux, Ursus tolérait, non sans quelque impatience, ces altérations du texte. Il eût volontiers dit Dea, comme de nos jours Moëssard à Vissot: Tu manques de respect au répertoire.

«L'Homme qui rit». Telle était la forme qu'avait prise la célébrité de Gwynplaine. Son nom, Gwynplaine, à peu près ignoré, avait disparu sous ce sobriquet, de même que sa face sous le rire. Sa popularité était comme son visage un masque.

Son nom pourtant se lisait sur un large écriteau placard l'avant de la Green-Box, lequel offrait à la foule cette rédaction due à Ursus:

«Ici l'on voit Gwynplaine, abandonné à l'âge de dix ans, la nuit du 29 janvier 1690, par les scélérats comprachicos, au bord de la mer à Portland, de petit devenu grand, et aujourd'hui appel

«L'HOMME QUI RIT.

L'existence de ces saltimbanques était une existence de lépreux dans une ladrerie et de bienheureux dans une atlanlide. C'était chaque jour un brusque passage de l'exhibition foraine la plus bruyante à l'abstraction la plus complète. Tous les soirs ils faisaient leur sortie de ce monde. C'étaient comme des morts qui s'en allaient, quitte à renaître le lendemain. Le comédien est un phare à éclipses, apparition, puis disparition, et il n'existe guère pour le public que comme fantôme et lueur dans cette vie feux tournants.

Au carrefour succédait la claustration. Sitôt le spectacle fini, pendant que l'auditoire se désagrégeait et que le brouhaha de satisfaction de la foule se dissipait dans la dispersion des rues, la Green-Box redressait son panneau comme une forteresse son pont-levis, et la communication avec le genre humain était coupée. D’un côté l’univers et de l’autre cette baraque; et dans cette baraque il y avait la liberté, la bonne conscience, le courage, le dévouement, l’innocence, le bonheur, l’amour, toutes les constellations.

La cécité voyante et la difformité aimée s’asseyaient côte côte, la main pressant la main, le front touchant le front, et, ivres, se parlaient tout bas.

Le compartiment du milieu était à deux fins; pour le public théâtre, pour les acteurs salle à manger.

Ursus, toujours satisfait de placer une comparaison, profitait de celle diversité de destination pour assimiler le compartiment central de la Green-Box à l’arradash d’une hutte abyssinienne.

Ursus comptait la recette, puis l’on soupait. Pour l’amour tout est de l’idéal, et boire et manger ensemble quand on aime, cela admet toutes sortes de douces promiscuités furtives qui font qu’une bouchée devient un baiser. On boit l’ale ou le vin au même verre, comme on boirait la rosée au même lys. Deux âmes, dans l’agape, ont la même grâce que deux oiseaux. Gwynplaine servait Dea, lui coupait les morceaux, lui versait à boire, s’approchait trop près.

— Hum! disait Ursus, et il détournait son grondement achev malgré lui en sourire.

Le loup, sous la table, soupait, inattentif à ce qui n’était point son os.

Vinos et Fibi partageaient le repas, mais gênaient peu. Ces deux vagabondes, à demi sauvages et restées effarées, parlaient bréhaigne entre elles.

Ensuite Dea rentrait au gynécée avec Fibi et Vinos. Ursus allait mettre Homo à la chaîne sous la Green-Box, et Gwynplaine s’occupait des chevaux, et d’amant devenait palefrenier, comme s’il eût été un héros d’Homère ou un paladin de Charlemagne. A minuit, tout dormait, le loup excepté, qui de temps en temps, pénétré de sa responsabilité, ouvrait un oeil.

Le lendemain, au réveil, on se retrouvait; on déjeunait ensemble, habituellement de jambon et de thé; le thé, en Angleterre, date de 1678. Puis Dea, à la mode espagnole, et par le conseil d’Ursus qui la trouvait délicate, dormait quelques heures, pendant que Gwynplaine et Ursus faisaient tous les petits travaux du dehors et du dedans qu’exigé la vie nomade.

Il était rare que Gwynplaine rôdât hors de la Green-Box, except dans les routes désertes et les lieux solitaires. Dans les villes, il ne sortait qu'à la nuit, caché par un large chapeau rabattu, afin de ne point user son visage dans la rue.

On ne le voyait à face découverte que sur le théâtre.

Du reste la Green-Box avait peu fréquenté les villes; Gwynplaine, à vingt-quatre ans, n'avait guère vu de plus grandes cités que les Cinq-ports. Sa renommée cependant croissait. Elle commençait à déborder la populace, et elle montait plus haut.

Parmi les amateurs de bizarreries foraines et les coureurs de curiosités et de prodiges, on savait qu'il existait quelque part, à l'état de vie errante, tantôt ici, tantôt là, un masque extraordinaire. On en parlait, on le cherchait, on se demandait: Où est-ce? L'Homme qui Rit devenait décidément fameux. Un certain lustre, en rejaillissait sur Chaos vaincu.

Tellement qu'un jour Ursus, ambitieux, dit

— Il faut aller à Londres.

COMMENCEMENT DE LA FÊLURE

I

L’INN TADCASTER

Londres n’avait à cette époque qu’un pont, le Pont de Londres, avec des maisons dessus. Ce pont reliait à Londres Southwark, faubourg pavé et caillouté avec des galets de la Tamise, tout en ruettes et ruelles, ayant des lieux fort serrés et, comme la cité, quantité de bâtisses, logis et cahutes de bois, pêle-mêle combustible où l’incendie a ses aises. 1666 l’avait prouvé.

Southwark alors se prononçait Soudric; aujourd’hui on prononce Sousouorc, à peu près. Du reste, une excellente manière de prononcer les noms anglais, c’est de ne pas les prononcer du tout. Ainsi, Southampton, dites Stpntn.

C’était le temps où Chatam se prononçait Je t’aime.

Le Southwark de ce temps-là ressemble au Southwark d’aujourd’hui comme Vaugirard ressemble à Marseille. C’était un bourg; c’est une ville. Pourtant il s’y faisait un grand mouvement de navigation. Dans un long vieux mur cyclopéen sur la Tamise étaient scellés des anneaux où s’amarraient les coches de rivière. Ce mur s’appelait le mur d’Effroc ou Effroc-Stone.

York, quand elle était saxonne, s’appelait Effroc. La légende contait qu’un duc d’Effroc s’était noyé au pied de ce mur. L’eau en effet y était assez profonde pour un duc. A mer basse il y avait encore six bonnes brasses. L’excellence de ce petit mouillage attirait les navires de mer, et la vieille panse de Hollande, dite la Vograat, venait s’amarrer à l’Effroc-Stone. La Vograat faisait directement une fois par semaine la traversée de Londres à Rotterdam et de Rotterdam à Londres. D’autres coches partaient deux fois par jour, soit pour Deptfort, soit pour Greenwich, soit pour Gravesend, descendant par une marée et remontant par l’autre. Le trajet jusqu’à Gravesend, quoique de vingt milles, se faisait en six heures.

La Vograat était d’un modèle qu’on ne voit plus aujourd’hui que dans les musées de marine. Cette panse était un peu une jonque.

En ce temps-là, pendant que la France copiait la Grèce, la Hollande copiait la Chine. La Vograat, lourde coque à deux mâts, était cloisonnée étanche perpendiculairement, avec une chambre très creuse au milieu du bâtiment et deux tillacs, l’un l’avant, l’autre à l’arrière, pontés ras, comme les vaisseaux de fer à tourelle d’aujourd’hui, ce qui avait l’avantage de diminuer la prise du flot sur le navire dans les gros temps, et l’inconvénient d’exposer l’équipage aux coups de mer, à cause de l’absence de parapet. Rien n’arrêtait au bord celui qui allait tomber. De là de fréquentes chutes et des pertes d’hommes qui ont fait abandonner ce gabarit. La pause Vograat allait droit en Hollande et ne faisait même pas escale à Gravesend.

Une antique corniche de pierre, roche autant que maçonnerie, longeait le bas de l’Effroc-Stone, et, praticable à toute mer, facilitait l’abord des bateaux amarrés au mur. Le mur était de distance en distance coupé d’escaliers. Il marquait la pointe sud de Southwark. Un remblai permettait aux passants de s’accouder au haut de l’Effroc-Stone comme au parapet d’un quai.

De là on voyait la Tamise. De l’autre côté de l’eau, Londres cessait. Il n’y avait plus que des champs.

En amont de l’Effroc-Stone, au coude de la Tamise, presque vis-à-vis le palais de Saint-James, derrière Lambeth-House, non loin de la promenade appelée alors Foxhall (vaux-hall probablement), il y avait, entre une poterie où l’on faisait de la porcelaine et une verrerie où l’on faisait des bouteilles peintes, un de ces vastes terrains vagues où l’herbe pousse, appelés autrefois en France cultures et mails, et en Angleterre bowling-greens. De bowling-green, tapis vert à rouler une boule, nous avons fait boulingrin. On a aujourd’hui ce pré-là dans sa maison; seulement on le met sur une table, il est en drap au lieu d’être en gazon, et on l’appelle billard.

Du reste, on ne voit pas pourquoi, ayant boulevard (boule-vert), qui est le même mot que bowling-green, nous nous sommes donné boulingrin. Il est surprenant qu’un personnage grave comme le dictionnaire ait de ces luxes inutiles.

Le bowling-green de Southwark s’appelait Tarrinzeau-field, pour avoir appartenu jadis aux barons Hastings, qui sont barons Tarrinzeau and Mauchline. Des lords Hastings, le Tarrinzeau-field avait passé aux lords Tadcaster, lesquels l’avaient exploité en lieu public, ainsi que plus tard un duc d’Orléans a exploité le Palais-Royal. Puis le Tarrinzeau-field était devenu vaine pâture et propriété paroissiale.

Le Tarrinzeau-field était une sorte de champ de foire permanent, encombré d’escamoteurs, d’équilibristes, de bateleurs, et de musiques sur des tréteaux, et toujours plein d’imbéciles qui «viennent regarder le diable», comme disait l’archevêque Sharp.

Regarder le diable, c’est aller au spectacle.

Plusieurs inns, qui prenaient et envoyaient du public à ces théâtres forains, s’ouvraient sur cette place fériée toute l’année et y prospéraient. Ces inns étaient de simples échoppes, habitées seulement le jour. Le soir le tavernier mettait dans sa poche la clef de la taverne, et s’en allait. Un seul de ces inns était une maison. Il n’y avait pas d’autre logis dans tout le bowling-green, les baraques du champ de foire pouvant toujours disparaître d’un moment à l’autre, vu l’absence d’attache et le vagabondage de tous ces saltimbanques. Les bateleurs ont une vie déracinée.

Cet inn, appelé l’inn Tadcaster, du nom des anciens seigneurs, plutôt auberge que taverne, et plutôt hôtellerie qu’auberge, avait une porte cochère et une assez grande cour.

La porte cochère, ouvrant de la cour sur la place, était la porte légitime de l’auberge Tadcaster, et avait à côté d’elle une porte bâtarde par où l’on entrait. Qui dit bâtarde dit préférée.

Cette porte basse était la seule par où l’on passât. Elle donnait dans le cabaret proprement dit, qui était un large galetas enfumé, garni de tables et bas de plafond. Elle était surmontée d’une fenêtre au premier étage, aux ferrures de laquelle était ajustée et pendue l’enseigne de l’inn. La grande porte, barrée et verrouillée à demeure, restait fermée.

Il fallait traverser le cabaret pour entrer dans la cour.

Il y avait dans l’inn Tadcaster un maître et un boy. Le maître s’appelait maître Nicless. Le boy s’appelait Govicum. Maître Nicless, — Nicolas sans doute, qui devient par la prononciation anglaise Nicless, — était un veuf avare et tremblant et ayant le respect des lois. Du reste, poilu aux sourcils et sur les mains.

Quant au garçon de quatorze ans qui versait à boire et répondait au nom de Govicum, c’était une grosse tête joyeuse avec un tablier. Il était tondu ras, signe de servitude.

Il couchait au rez-de-chaussée, dans un réduit où l’on avait jadis mis un chien. Ce réduit avait pour fenêtre une lucarne ouvrant sur le bowling-green.

II

ÉLOQUENCE EN PLEIN VENT

Un soir qu’il faisait grand vent, et assez froid, et qu’on avait toutes les raisons du monde de se hâter dans la rue, un homme qui cheminait dans le Tarrinzeau-field, sous le mur de l’auberge Tadcaster, s’arrêta brusquement. On était dans les derniers mois de l’hiver de 1704 à 1705. Cet homme, dont les vêtements indiquaient un matelot, était de bonne mine et de belle taille, ce qui est prescrit aux gens de cour et n’est pas défendu aux gens du peuple. Pourquoi s’était-il arrêté? Pour écouter.

Qu’écoutait-il? Une voix qui parlait probablement dans une cour, de l’autre côté du mur, voix un peu sénile, mais pourtant si haute, qu’elle venait jusqu’aux passants dans la rue. En même temps, on entendait, dans l’enclos où la voix pérorait, un bruit de foule. Cette voix disait:

— Hommes et femmes de Londres, me voici. Je vous félicite cordialement d’être anglais. Vous êtes un grand peuple. Je dis plus, vous êtes une grande populace. Vos coups de poing sont encore plus beaux que vos coups d’épée. Vous avez de l’appétit.

Vous êtes la nation qui mange les autres. Fonction magnifique.

Cette succion du monde classe à part l’Angleterre. Comme politique et philosophie, et maniement des colonies, populations, et industries, et comme volonté de faire aux autres du mal qui est pour soi du bien, vous êtes particuliers et surprenants. Le moment approche où il y aura sur la terre deux écriteaux; sur l’un on lira: Côté des hommes; sur l’autre on lira: Côté des anglais. Je constate ceci à votre gloire, moi qui ne suis ni anglais, ni homme, ayant l’honneur d’être un docteur. Cela va ensemble. Gentlemen, j’enseigne. Quoi? Deux espèces de choses, celles que je sais et celles que j’ignore. Je vends des drogues et je donne des idées. Approchez, et écoutez. La science vous y convie. Ouvrez votre oreille. Si elle est petite, elle tiendra peu de vérité; si elle est grande, beaucoup de stupidité y entrera. Donc, attention. J’enseigne la Pseudodoxia Epidemica.

J’ai un camarade qui fait rire, moi je fais penser. Nous habitons la même boîte, le rire étant d’aussi bonne famille que le savoir. Quand on demandait à Démocrite: Comment savez-vous?

il répondait: Je ris. Et moi, si l'on me demande: Pourquoi riez-vous? je répondrai: Je sais. Du reste, je ne ris pas. Je suis le rectificateur des erreurs populaires. J'entreprends le nettoyage de vos intelligences. Elles sont malpropres. Dieu permet que le peuple se trompe et soit trompé. Il ne faut pas avoir de pudeurs bêtes; j'avoue franchement que je crois en Dieu, même quand il a tort. Seulement, quand je vois des ordures, — les erreurs sont des ordures, — je les balaie. Comment sais-je ce que je sais? Cela ne regarde que moi. Chacun prend la science comme il peut. Lactance faisait des questions à une tête de Virgile en bronze qui lui répondait; Sylvestre II dialoguait avec les oiseaux; les oiseaux parlaient-ils? le pape gazouillait-il? Questions. L'enfant mort du rabbin Éléazar causait avec saint Augustin. Entre nous, je doute de tous ces faits, excepté du dernier. L'enfant mort parlait, soit; mais il avait sous la langue une lame d'or, où étaient gravées diverses constellations.

Donc il trichait. Le fait s'explique. Vous voyez ma modération.

Je sépare le vrai du faux. Tenez, voici d'autres erreurs que vous partagez sans doute, pauvres gens du peuple, et dont je désire vous dégager. Dioscoride croyait qu'il y avait un dieu dans la jusquiame, Chrysippe dans le cynopaste, Josèphe dans la racine bauras, Homère dans la plante moly. Tous se trompaient.

Ce qui est dans ces herbes, ce n'est pas un dieu, c'est un démon.

Je l'ai vérifié. Il n'est pas vrai que le serpent qui tenta Ève eût, comme Cadmus, une face humaine. Garcias de Horto, Cadamosto et Jean Hugo, archevêque de Trèves, nient qu'il suffise de scier un arbre pour prendre un éléphant. J'incline à leur avis.

Citoyens, les efforts de Lucifer sont la cause des fausses opinions. Sous le règne d'un tel prince, il doit paraître des météores d'erreur et de perdition. Peuple, Claudius Pulcher ne mourut pas parce que les poulets refusèrent de sortir du poulailler; la vérité est que Lucifer ayant prévu la mort de Claudius Pulcher prit soin d'empêcher ces animaux de manger. Que Belzébuth ait donné à l'empereur Vespasien la vertu de redresser les boiteux et de rendre la vue aux aveugles en les touchant, c'était une action louable en soi, mais dont le motif était coupable. Gentlemen, défiez-vous des faux savants qui exploitent la racine de brioine et la couleuvrée blanche, et qui font des collyres avec du miel et du sang de coq. Sachez voir clair dans les mensonges. Il n'est point exact qu'Orion soit né d'un besoin naturel de Jupiter; la vérité est que ce fut Mercure qui produisit cet astre de cette façon. Il n'est pas vrai qu'Adam eût un nombril. Quand saint Georges a tué un dragon, il n'avait pas près de lui la fille d'un saint. Saint Jérôme dans son cabinet n'avait pas sur sa cheminée une pendule; premièrement, parce qu'étant dans une grotte, il n'avait pas de cabinet; deuxièmement, parce qu'il n'avait pas de cheminée; troisièmement, parce que les pendules n'existaient pas. Rectifions.

Rectifions. O gentils qui m'écoutez, si l'on vous dit que quiconque flaire l'herbe valériane, il lui naît un lézard dans le cerveau, que dans sa putréfaction le boeuf se change en abeilles et le cheval en frelons, que l'homme pèse plus mort que vivant, que le sang de bouc dissout l'émeraude, qu'une chenille, une mouche et une araignée aperçues sur le même arbre annoncent la famine, la guerre et la peste, qu'on guérit le mal caduc au moyen d'un ver qu'on trouve dans la tête du chevreuil, n'en croyez rien, ce sont des erreurs. Mais voici des vérités: la peau de veau marin garantit du tonnerre; le crapaud se nourrit de terre, ce qui lui fait venir une pierre dans la tête; la rose de Jéricho fleurit la veille de Noël; les serpents ne peuvent supporter l'ombre du frêne; l'éléphant n'a pas de jointures et est forcé de dormir debout contre un arbre; faites couver par un crapaud un oeuf de coq, vous aurez un scorpion qui vous fera une salamandre; un aveugle recouvre la vue en mettant une main sur le côté gauche de l'autel et l'autre main sur ses yeux; la virginité n'exclut pas la maternité. Braves gens, nourrissez-vous de ces évidences.

Sur ce, vous pouvez croire en Dieu de deux façons, ou comme la soif croit à l'orange, ou comme l'âne croit au fouet. Maintenant je vais vous présenter mon personnel.

Ici un coup de vent assez violent secoua les chambranles, et les volets de l'inn, qui était une maison isolée. Cela fit une espèce de long murmure céleste. L'orateur attendit un moment, puis reprit le dessus.

— Interruption. Soit. Parle, aquilon. Gentlemen, je ne me fâche pas. Le vent est loquace, comme tous les solitaires.

Personne ne lui tient compagnie là-haut. Alors il bavarde. Je reprends mon fil. Vous contemplez ici des artistes associés.

Nous sommes quatre. A lupo principium. Je commence par mon ami qui est un loup. Il ne s'en cache pas. Voyez-le. Il est instruit, grave et sagace. La providence a probablement eu un moment l'idée d'en faire un docteur d'université; mais il faut pour cela être un peu bête, et il ne l'est pas. J'ajoute qu'il est sans préjugés et point aristocrate. Il cause dans l'occasion avec une chienne, lui qui aurait droit à une louve. Ses dauphins, s'il en a eu, mêlent probablement avec grâce le jappement de leur mère au hurlement de leur père. Car il hurle.

Il faut hurler avec les hommes. Il aboie aussi, par condescendance pour la civilisation. Adoucissement magnanime.

Homo est un chien perfectionné. Vénérons le chien. Le chien, — quelle drôle de bête! — a sa sueur sur sa langue et son sourire dans sa queue. Gentlemen, Homo égale en sagesse et surpasse en cordialité le loup sans poil du Mexique, l'admirable xoloitzeniski. J'ajoute qu'il est humble. Il a la modestie d'un loup utile aux humains. Il est secourable et charitable, silencieusement. Sa patte gauche ignore la bonne action qu'a faite sa patte droite. Tels sont ses mérites. De cet autre, mon deuxième ami, je ne dis qu'un mot; c'est un monstre. Vous l'admirerez. Il fut jadis abandonné par des pirates sur les bords du sauvage océan. Celle-ci est une aveugle. Est-ce une exception? Non. Nous sommes tous des aveugles. L'avare est un aveugle; il voit l'or et ne voit pas la richesse. Le prodigue est un aveugle; il voit le commencement et ne voit pas la fin.

La coquette est une aveugle; elle ne voit pas ses rides. Le savant est un aveugle; il ne voit pas son ignorance. L'honnête homme est un aveugle; il ne voit pas le coquin. Le coquin est un aveugle; il ne voit pas Dieu. Dieu est un aveugle; le jour où il a créé le monde, il n'a pas vu que le diable se fourrait dedans.

Moi je suis un aveugle; je parle, et je ne vois pas que vous êtes des sourds. Cette aveugle-ci, qui nous accompagne, est une prêtresse mystérieuse. Vesta lui eût confié son tison. Elle a dans le caractère des obscurités douces comme les hiatus qui s'ouvrent dans la laine d'un mouton. Je la crois fille de roi, sans l'affirmer. Une louable défiance est l'attribut du sage.

Quant à moi, je ratiocine et je médicamente. Je pense et je panse. Chirurgus sum. Je guéris les fièvres, miasmes et pestes. Presque toutes nos phlegmasies et souffrances sont des exutoires, et, bien soignées, nous débarrassent gentiment d'autres maux qui seraient pires. Nonobstant, je ne vous conseille pas d'avoir un anthrax, autrement dit carbuncle. C'est une maladie bête qui ne sert à rien. On en meurt, mais c'est tout. Je ne suis pas inculte ni rustique. J'honore l'éloquence et la poésie, et je vis avec ces déesses dans une intimit innocente. Et je termine par un avis. Gentlemen et gentlewomen, en vous, du côté d'où vient la lumière, cultivez la vertu, la modestie, la probité, la justice et l'amour. Chacun ici-bas peut, comme cela, avoir son petit pot de fleurs sur sa fenêtre.

Milords et messieurs, j’ai dit. Le spectacle va commencer.

L’homme, matelot probable, qui écoutait du dehors, entra dans la salle basse de l’inn, la traversa, paya quelque monnaie qu’on lui demanda, pénétra dans une cour pleine de public, aperçut au fond de la cour une baraque à roues, toute grande ouverte, et vit sur ce tréteau un homme vieux vêtu d’une peau d’ours, un homme jeune qui avait l’air d’un masque, une fille aveugle, et un loup.

— Vivedieu! s’écria-t-il, voilà d’admirables gens.

OU LE PASSANT REPARAIT

La Green-Box, on vient de la reconnaître, était arrivée Londres. Elle s'était établie à Southwark. Ursus avait ét attiré par le bowling-green, lequel avait cela d'excellent, que la foire n'y chômait jamais; pas même en hiver.

Voir le dôme de Saint-Paul avait été agréable à Ursus.

Londres, à tout prendre, est une ville qui a du bon. Avoir dédi une cathédrale à saint Paul, c'est de la bravoure. Le vrai saint cathédral est saint Pierre. Saint Paul est suspect d'imagination, et, en matière ecclésiastique, imagination signifie hérésie. Saint Paul n'est saint qu'avec des circonstances atténuantes. Il n'est entré au ciel que par la porte des artistes.

Une cathédrale est une enseigne. Saint Pierre indique Rome, la ville du dogme; saint Paul signale Londres, la ville du schisme.

Ursus, dont la philosophie avait de si grands bras qu'elle contenait tout, était homme à apprécier ces nuances, et son attrait pour Londres venait peut-être d'un certain goût pour saint Paul.

La grande cour de l'inn Tadcaster avait fixé le choix d'Ursus.

La Green-Box semblait prévue par cette cour; c'était un théâtre tout construit. Cette cour était carrée, et bâtie de trois côtés, avec un mur faisant vis-à-vis aux étages, et auquel on adossa la Green-Box, introduite grâce aux vastes dimensions de la porte cochère. Un grand balcon de bois, couvert d'un auvent et porté sur poteaux, lequel desservait les chambres du premier étage, s'appliquait sur les trois pans de la façade intérieure de cette cour, avec deux retours en équerre. Les fenêtres du rez-de-chaussée firent les baignoires, le pavé de la cour fit le parterre, et le balcon fit le balcon. La Green-Box, rangée contre le mur, avait devant elle cette salle de spectacle. Cela ressemblait beaucoup au Globe, où furent joués Othello, le Roi Lear et la Tempête.

Dans un recoin, en arrière de la Green-Box, il y avait une écurie.

Ursus avait pris ses arrangements avec le tavernier, maître Nicless, qui, vu le respect des lois, n'admit le loup qu'en payant plus cher. L'écriteau «GWYNPLAINE — L'HOMME QUI RIT», décroché de la Green-Box, avait été accroché près de l'enseigne de l'inn. La salle-cabaret avait, on le sait, une porte intérieure qui donnait sur la cour. A côté de cette porte fut improvisée, au moyen d'un tonneau éventré, une logette pour «la buraliste», qui était tantôt Fibi, tantôt Vinos. C'était à peu près comme aujourd'hui. Qui entre paie. Sous l'écriteau L'HOMME QUI RIT fut pendue à deux clous une planche peinte en blanc, portant, charbonné en grosses lettres, le titre de la grande pièce d'Ursus, Chaos vaincu.

Au centre du balcon, précisément en face de la Green-Box, un compartiment, qui avait pour entrée principale une porte-fenêtre, avait été réservé entre deux cloisons «pour la noblesse».

Il était assez large pour contenir, sur deux rangs, dix spectateurs.

— Nous sommes à Londres, avait dit Ursus. Il faut s'attendre de la gentry.

Il avait fait meubler cette «loge» des meilleures chaises de l'inn, et placer au centre un grand fauteuil de velours d'Utrecht bouton d'or à dessins cerise pour le cas où quelque femme d'alderman viendrait.

Les représentations avaient commencé.

Tout de suite, la foule vint.

Mais le compartiment pour la noblesse resta vide.

A cela près, le succès fut tel que de mémoire de saltimbanque on n'en avait pas vu de pareil. Tout Southwark accourut en cohue admirer l'Homme qui Rit.

Les baladins et bateleurs de Tarrinzeau-field furent effarés de Gwynplaine. Un épervier s'abattant dans une cage de chardonnerets et leur becquetant leur mangeoire, tel fut l'effet.

Gwynplaine leur dévora leur public.

Outre le menu peuple des avaleurs de sabres et des grimaciers, il y avait sur le bowling-green de vrais spectacles. Il y avait un circus à femmes retentissant du matin au soir d'une sonnerie magnifique de toutes sortes d'instruments, psaltérions, tambours, rubèbes, micamons, timbres, chalumelles, dulcaynes, gingues, chevrettes, cornemuses, cornets d'Allemagne, eschaqueils d'Angleterre, pipes, fistules, flajos et flageolets. Il y avait sous une large tente ronde des sauteurs que n'eussent point égalés nos coureurs actuels des Pyrénées, Dulma, Bordenave et Meylonga, lesquels du pic de Pierrefitte descendent au plateau du Limaçon, ce qui est presque tomber. Il y avait une ménagerie ambulante où l'on voyait un tigre bouffe, qui, fouaillé par un belluaire, tâchait de lui happer son fouet et d'en avaler la mèche. Ce comique à gueules et à griffes fut lui-même éclipsé.

Curiosité, applaudissements, recettes, foule, l'Homme qui Rit prit tout. En un clin d'oeil ce fut fait. Il n'y eut plus que la Green-Box.

— Chaos vaincu est Chaos vainqueur, disait Ursus, se mettant de moitié dans le succès de Gwynplaine, et tirant la nappe à lui, comme on dit en langue cabotine.

Le succès de Gwynplaine fut prodigieux. Pourtant il resta local.
Passer l'eau est difficile pour une renommée. Le nom de Shakespeare a mis cent trente ans à venir d'Angleterre en France; l'eau est une muraille, et si Voltaire, ce qu'il a bien regrett plus tard, n'avait pas fait à Shakespeare la courte échelle, Shakespeare, à l'heure qu'il est, serait peut-être encore de l'autre côté du mur, en Angleterre, captif d'une gloire insulaire.

La gloire de Gwynplaine ne passa point le pont de Londres. Elle ne prit point les dimensions d'un écho de grande ville. Du moins dans les premiers temps. Mais Southwark peut suffire l'ambition d'un clown. Ursus disait: — La sacoche des recettes, comme une fille qui a fait une faute, grossit à vue d'oeil.

On jouait Ursus Rursus, puis Chaos vaincu.

Dans les entr'actes, Ursus justifiait sa qualité d'engastrimythe et faisait de la ventriloquie transcendante; il imitait toute voix qui s'offrait dans l'assistance, un chant, un cri, à ébahir par la ressemblance le chanteur ou le crieur lui-même, et parfois il copiait le brouhaha du public, et il soufflait comme s'il eût été à lui seul un tas de gens. Talents remarquables.

En outre, il haranguait, on vient de le voir, comme Cicéron, vendait des drogues, soignait les maladies et même guérissait les malades.

Southwark était captivé.

Ursus était satisfait des applaudissements de Southwark, mais il n'en était point étonné.

— Ce sont les anciens trinobantes, disait-il.

Et il ajoutait:

— Que je ne confonds point, pour la délicatesse du goût, avec les atrobates qui ont peuplé Berks, les belges qui ont habité le Somerset, et les parisiens qui ont fondé York.

A chaque représentation, la cour de l'inn, transformée en parterre, s'emplissait d'un auditoire déguenillé et enthousiaste.
C'étaient des bateliers, des porte-chaises, des charpentiers de bord, des cochers de coches de rivière, des matelots frais débarqués dépensant leur solde en ripailles et en filles. Il y avait des estafiers, des ruffians, et des gardes noirs, qui sont des soldats condamnés pour quelque faute disciplinaire à porter leur habit rouge retourné du côté de la doublure noire, et nommés pour cela blackquards, d'où nous avons fait blagueurs. Tout cela affluait de la rue dans le théâtre et refluait du théâtre dans la salle à boire. Les chopes bues ne nuisaient pas au succès.

Parmi ces gens qu'on est convenu d'appeler «la lie», il y en avait un plus haut que les autres, plus grand, plus fort, moins pauvre, plus carré d'épaules, vêtu comme le commun du peuple, mais pas déchiré, admirateur à tout rompre, se faisant place coups de poing, ayant une perruque à la diable, jurant, criant, gouaillant, point malpropre, et au besoin pochant un oeil et payant bouteille.

Cet habitué était le passant dont on a entendu tout à l'heure le cri d'enthousiasme.

Ce connaisseur immédiatement fasciné avait tout de suite adopt l'Homme qui Rit. Il ne venait pas à toutes les représentations. Mais quand il venait, il était le «traîner» du public; les applaudissements se changeaient en acclamations; le succès allait, non aux frises, il n'y en avait pas, mais aux nues, il y en avait. Mais ces nues, vu l'absence de plafond, pleuvaient quelquefois sur le chef-d'oeuvre d'Ursus.

Si bien qu'Ursus remarqua cet homme et que Gwynplaine le regarda.

C'était un fier ami inconnu qu'on avait là!

Ursus et Gwynplaine voulurent le connaître, ou du moins savoir qui c'était.

Ursus un soir, de la coulisse, qui était la porte de la cuisine de la Green-Box, ayant par hasard maître Nicless l'hôtelier près de lui, lui montra l'homme mêlé à la foule, et lui demanda:

— Connaissez-vous cet homme?

— Sans doute.

— Qu'est-ce?

— Un matelot.

— Comment s'appelle-t-il? dit Gwynplaine, intervenant.

— Tom-Jim-Jack, répondit l'hôtelier.

Puis, tout en redescendant l'escalier marchepied de l'arrière de la Green-Box pour rentrer dans l'inn, maître Nicless laissa tomber cette réflexion, profonde à perte de vue:

— Quel dommage qu'il ne soit pas lord! ce serait une fameuse canaille.

Du reste, quoique installé dans une hôtellerie, le groupe de la Green-Box n'avait rien modifié de ses moeurs, et maintenait son isolement. A cela près de quelques mots échangés ça et là avec le tavernier, ils ne se mêlaient point aux habitants, permanents ou passagers, de l'auberge, et ils continuaient de vivre entre eux.

Depuis qu'on était à Southwark, Gwynplaine avait pris l'habitude, après le spectacle, après le souper des gens et des chevaux, d'aller, pendant qu'Ursus et Dea se couchaient chacun de son côté, respirer un peu le grand air dans le bowling-green entre onze heures et minuit. Un certain vague qu'on a dans l'esprit pousse aux promenades nocturnes et aux flâneries étoilées; la jeunesse est une attente mystérieuse; c'est pourquoi on marche volontiers la nuit, sans but. A cette heure-là, il n'y avait plus personne dans le champ de foire, tout au plus quelques titubations d'ivrognes faisant des silhouettes chancelantes dans les coins obscurs; les tavernes vides se fermaient, la salle basse de l'auberge Tadcaster s'éteignait, ayant à peine dans quelque angle une dernière chandelle éclairant un dernier buveur, une lueur indistincte sortait entre les chambranles de l'inn entr'ouvert, et Gwynplaine, pensif, content, songeant, heureux d'un divin bonheur trouble, allait et venait devant cette porte entre-bâillée. A quoi pensait-il? à Dea, à rien, à tout, aux profondeurs. Il s'écartait peu de l'auberge, retenu, comme par un fil, près de Dea. Faire quelques pas dehors lui suffisait.

Puis il rentrait, trouvait toute la Green-Box endormie, et s'endormait.

LES CONTRAIRES FRATERNISENT DANS LA HAINE

Le succès n'est pas aimé, surtout par ceux dont il est la chute.

Il est rare que les mangés adorent les mangeurs. L'Homme qui Rit, décidément, faisait événement. Les bateleurs d'alentour étaient indignés. Un succès de théâtre est un siphon, pompe la foule, et fait le vide autour de lui. La boutique en face est éperdue. A la hausse des recettes de la Green-Box avait tout de suite correspondu, nous l'avons dit, une baisse dans les recettes environnantes. Brusquement, les spectacles, jusqu'alors fêtés, chômèrent. Ce fut comme un étiage se marquant en sens inverse, mais avec une concordance parfaite, la crue ici, la diminution là. Tous les théâtres connaissent ces effets de marée; elle n'est haute chez celui-ci qu'à la condition d'être basse chez celui-là. La fourmilière foraine, qui exhibait ses talents et ses fanfares sur les tréteaux circonvoisins, se voyant ruinée par l'Homme qui Rit, entra en désespoir, mais fut éblouie. Tous les grimes, tous les clowns, tous les bateleurs enviaient Gwynplaine.

En voilà un qui est heureux d'avoir un mufle de bête féroce! Des mères baladines et danseuses de cordes, qui avaient de jolis enfants, les regardaient avec colère en montrant Gwynplaine et en disant: Quel dommage que tu n'aies pas une figure comme cela!

Quelques-unes battaient leurs petits de fureur de les trouver beaux. Plus d'une, si elle eût su le secret, eût arrangé son fils «à la Gwynplaine». Une tête d'ange qui ne rapporte rien ne vaut pas une face de diable lucrative. On entendit un jour la mère d'un petit qui était un chérubin de gentillesse et qui jouait les cupidons, s'écrier: — On nous a manqué nos enfants. Il n'y a que ce Gwynplaine de réussi. Et, montrant le poing à son fils, elle ajouta: — Si je connaissais ton père, je lui ferais une scène!

Gwynplaine était une poule aux oeufs d'or. Quel merveilleux phénomène! Ce n'était qu'un cri dans toutes les baraques. Les saltimbanques, enthousiasmés et exaspérés, contemplaient Gwynplaine en grinçant des dents. La rage admire, cela s'appelle l'envie. Alors elle hurle. Ils essayèrent de troubler Chaos vaincu, firent cabale, sifflèrent, grognèrent, huèrent. Cela fut pour Ursus un motif de harangues hortensiennes à la populace, et pour l'ami Tom-Jim-Jack une occasion de donner quelques-uns de ces coups de poing qui rétablissent l'ordre. Les coups de poing de Tom-Jim-Jack achevèrent de le faire remarquer par Gwynplaine et estimer par Ursus. De loin, du reste; car le groupe de la Green-Box se suffisait à lui-même et se tenait à distance de tout, et quant à Tom-Jim-Jack, ce leader de la canaille faisait l'effet d'une sorte d'estafier suprême, sans liaison, sans intimité, casseur de vitres, meneur d'hommes, paraissant, disparaissant, camarade de tout le monde et compagnon de personne.

Ce déchaînement d'envie contre Gwynplaine ne se tint pas pour battu, pour quelques giffles de Tom-Jim-Jack. Les huées ayant avorté, les saltimbanques du Tarrinzeau-field rédigèrent une supplique. Ils s'adressèrent à l'autorité. C'est la marche ordinaire. Contre un succès qui nous gêne, on ameute la foule, puis on implore le magistrat.

Aux bateleurs se joignirent les révérends. L'Homme qui Rit avait porté coup aux prêches. Le vide ne s'était pas fait seulement dans les baraques, mais dans les églises. Les chapelles des cinq paroisses de Southwark n'avaient plus d'auditoire. On délaissait le sermon pour aller à Gwynplaine. Chaos vaincu, la Green-Box, l'Homme qui Rit, toutes ces abominations de Baal l'emportaient sur l'éloquence de la chaire. La voix qui harangue dans le désert, vox clamantis in deserto, n'est pas contente, et adjure volontiers le gouvernement. Les pasteurs des cinq paroisses se plaignirent à l'évêque de Londres, lequel se plaignit à sa majesté.

La plainte des bateleurs se fondait sur la religion. Ils la déclaraient outragée. Ils signalaient Gwynplaine comme sorcier et Ursus comme impie.

Les révérends, eux, invoquaient l'ordre social. Ils prenaient fait et cause pour les actes du parlement violés, laissant l'orthodoxie de côté. C'était plus malin. Car on était l'époque de M. Locke, mort depuis six mois à peine, le 28 octobre 1704, et le scepticisme, que Bolingbroke allait insuffler à Voltaire, commençait. Wesley devait plus tard venir restaurer la bible comme Loyola a restauré le papisme.

De cette façon, la Green-Box était battue en brèche des deux côtés, par les bateleurs au nom du pentateuque, par les chapelains au nom des règlements de police. D'une part le ciel, d'autre part la voirie, les révérends tenant pour la voirie, et les saltimbanques pour le ciel. La Green-Box était dénoncée par les prêtres comme encombrante, et par les baladins comme sacrilège.

Y avait-il prétexte? donnait-elle prise? Oui. Quel était son crime? Ceci: elle avait un loup. Un loup en Angleterre est un proscrit. Le dogue, soit; le loup, point. L'Angleterre admet le chien qui aboie et non le chien qui hurle; nuance entre la basse-cour et la forêt. Les recteurs et vicaires des cinq paroisses de Southwark rappelaient dans leurs requêtes les nombreux statuts royaux et parlementaires mettant le loup hors la loi. Ils concluaient à quelque chose comme l'incarcération de Gwynplaine et la mise en fourrière du loup, ou tout au moins l'expulsion. Question d'intérêt public, de risque pour les passants, etc. Et là-dessus, ils faisaient appel à la Faculté.
Ils citaient le verdict du collège des Quatrevingts médecins de Londres, corps docte qui date de Henri VIII, qui a un sceau comme l'état, qui élève les malades à la dignité de justiciables, qui a le droit d'emprisonner ceux qui enfreignent ses lois et contreviennent à ses ordonnances, et qui, entre autres constatations utiles à la santé des citoyens, a mis hors de doute ce fait acquis à la science: — Si un loup voit un homme le premier, l'homme est enroué pour la vie. — De plus, on peut être mordu.

Donc Homo était le prétexte.

Ursus, par l'hôtelier, avait vent de ces menées. Il était inquiet. Il craignait ces deux griffes, police et justice. Pour avoir peur de la magistrature, il suffit d'avoir peur; il n'est pas nécessaire d'être coupable. Ursus souhaitait peu le contact des shériffs, prévôts, baillis et coroners. Son empressement de contempler de près ces visages officiels était nul. Il avait de voir des magistrats la même curiosité que le lièvre de voir des chiens d'arrêt.

Il commençait à regretter d'être venu à Londres.

— Le mieux est ennemi du bien, murmurait-il en aparté. Je croyais ce proverbe déconsidéré, j'ai eu tort. Les vérités bêtes sont les vérités vraies.

Contre tant de puissances coalisées, saltimbanques prenant en main la cause de la religion, chapelains s'indignant au nom de la médecine, la pauvre Green-Box, suspecte de sorcellerie en Gwynplaine et d'hydrophobie en Homo, n'avait pour elle qu'une chose, mais qui est une grande force en Angleterre, l'inertie municipale. C'est du laisser-faire local qu'est sortie la liberté anglaise. La liberté en Angleterre se comporte comme la mer autour de l'Angleterre. C'est une marée. Peu à peu les moeurs montent sur les lois. Une épouvantable législation engloutie, l'usage dessus, un code féroce encore visible sous la transparence de l'immense liberté, c'est là l'Angleterre.

L’Homme qui Rit, Chaos vaincu, Homo, pouvaient avoir contre eux les bateleurs, les prédicants, les évêques, la chambre des communes, la chambre des lords, sa majesté, et Londres, et toute l’Angleterre, et rester tranquilles tant que Southwark serait pour eux. La Green-Box était l’amusement préféré du faubourg, et l’autorité locale semblait indifférente. En Angleterre, indifférence, c’est protection. Tant que le shériff du comté de Surrey, à qui ressortit Southwark, ne bougerait pas, Ursus respirait, et Homo pouvait dormir sur ses deux oreilles de loup.

A la condition de ne point aboutir au coup de pouce, ces haines servaient le succès. La Green-Box pour l’instant ne s’en portait pas plus mal. Au contraire. Il transpirait dans le public qu’il y avait des intrigues. L’Homme qui Rit en devenait plus populaire. La foule a le flair des choses dénoncées, et les prend en bonne part. Être suspect recommande. Le peuple adopte d’instinct ce que l’index menace. La chose dénoncée, c’est un commencement de fruit défendu; on se hâte d’y mordre. Et puis un applaudissement qui taquine quelqu’un, surtout quand ce quelqu’un est l’autorité, c’est doux. Faire, en passant une soirée agréable, acte d’adhésion à l’opprimé et d’opposition l’oppresseur, cela plaît. On protège en même temps qu’on s’amuse. Ajoutons que les baraques théâtrales du bowling-green continuaient de huer et de cabaler contre l’Homme qui Rit. Rien de meilleur pour le succès. Les ennemis font un bruit efficace qui aiguise et avive le triomphe. Un ami est plus vite las de louer qu’un ennemi d’injurier. Injurier n’est pas nuire. Voil ce que les ennemis ignorent. Ils ne peuvent pas ne point insulter, et c’est là leur utilité. Ils ont une impossibilité de se taire qui entretient l’éveil public. La foule grossissait Chaos vaincu.

Ursus gardait pour lui ce que lui disait maître Nicless des intrigues et des plaintes en haut lieu, et n’en parlait pas Gwynplaine, pour ne point troubler la sérénité des représentations par des préoccupations. S’il arrivait malheur, on le saurait toujours assez tôt.

V

LE WAPENTAKE

Une fois pourtant il crut devoir déroger à cette prudence, par prudence même, et il jugea utile de tâcher d’inquiéter Gwynplaine. Il est vrai qu’il s’agissait d’une chose beaucoup plus grave encore, dans la pensée d’Ursus, que les cabales de foire et d’église. Gwynplaine, en ramassant un farthing tomb terre dans un moment où l’on comptait la recette, s’était mis l’examiner, et, en présence de l’hôtelier, avait tiré du contraste entre le farthing, représentant la misère du peuple, et l’empreinte représentant, sous la figure d’Anne, la magnificence parasite du trône, un propos mal sonnant. Ce propos, répété par maître Nicless, avait fait tant de chemin qu’il était revenu Ursus par Fibi et Vinos. Ursus en eut la fièvre. Paroles séditieuses. Lèse-majesté. Il admonesta rudement Gwynplaine.

— Veille sur ton abominable gueule. Il y a une règle pour les grands, ne rien faire; et une règle pour les petits, ne rien dire. Le pauvre n’a qu’un ami, le silence. Il ne doit prononcer qu’un monosyllabe: oui. Avouer et consentir, c’est tout son droit. Oui, au juge. Oui, au roi. Les grands, si bon leur semble, nous donnent des coups de bâton, j’en ai reçu, c’est leur prérogative, et ils ne perdent nullement de leur grandeur en nous rompant les os. L’ossifrage est une espèce d’aigle. Vénérons le sceptre qui est le premier des bâtons. Respect, c’est prudence, et platitude, c’est égoïsme. Qui outrage son roi se met en même danger qu’une fille coupant témérairement la jube à un lion. On m’informe que tu as jasé sur le compte du farthing, qui est la même chose que le liard, et que tu as médit de cette médaille auguste moyennant laquelle on nous octroie au marché le demi-quart d’un hareng salé. Prends garde. Deviens sérieux.

Apprends qu’il existe des punitions. Imprègne-toi des vérités législatives. Tu es dans un pays où celui qui scie un petit arbre de trois ans est paisiblement mené au gibet. Les jureurs, on leur met les pieds aux ceps. L’ivrogne est enfermé dans une barrique défoncée par en bas pour qu’il marche, avec un trou en haut du tonneau par où passe sa tête et deux trous dans la bonde par où passent ses mains, de sorte qu’il ne peut se coucher. Qui frappe quelqu’un dans la salle de Westminster est en prison pour sa vie, et ses biens confisqués. Qui frappe quelqu’un dans le palais du roi a la main droite tranchée. Une chiquenaude sur un nez qui saigne, et te voilà manchot. Le convaincu d'hérésie en cour d'évêque est brûlé vif. C'est pour pas grand'chose que Cuthbert Simpson a été écartelé au tourniquet. Voilà trois ans, en 1702, ce n'est pas loin, comme tu vois, on a tourné au pilori un scélérat appelé Daniel de Foë, lequel avait eu l'audace d'imprimer les noms des membres des communes qui avaient parlé la veille au parlement. Celui qui est félon à sa majesté, on l'éventre vivant et on lui arrache le coeur dont on lui soufflette les deux joues. Inculque-toi ces notions de droit et de justice. Ne jamais se permettre un mot, et, à la plus petite inquiétude, prendre sa volée; telle est la bravoure que je pratique et que je conseille. En fait de témérité, imite les oiseaux, et en fait de bavardage, imite les poissons. Du reste, l'Angleterre a cela d'admirable que sa législation est fort douce.

Son admonition faite, Ursus fut inquiet quelque temps; Gwynplaine point. L'intrépidité de la jeunesse se compose de défaut d'expérience. Toutefois il sembla que Gwynplaine avait eu raison d'être tranquille, car les semaines s'écoulèrent pacifiquement, et il ne parut pas que le propos sur la reine eût des suites.

Ursus, on le sait, manquait d'apathie, et, comme le chevreuil au guet, était en éveil de tous les côtés.

Un jour, peu de temps après sa semonce à Gwynplaine, en regardant par la lucarne du mur qui avait vue sur le dehors, Ursus devint pâle.

— Gwynplaine?

— Quoi?

— Regarde.

— Où?

— Dans la place.

— Et puis?

— Vois-tu ce passant?

— Cet homme en noir?

— Oui.

— Qui a une espèce de masse au poing?

— Oui.

— Eh bien?

— Eh bien, Gwynplaine, cet homme est le wapentake.

— Qu'est-ce que c'est que le wapentake?

— C’est le bailli de la centaine.

— Qu’est-ce que c’est que le bailli de la centaine?

— C’est le praepositus hundredi.

— Qu’est-ce que c’est que le praepositus hundredi?

— C’est un officier terrible.

— Qu’est-ce qu’il a à la main?

— C’est l’iron-weapon.

— Qu’est-ce que l’iron-weapon?

— C’est une chose en fer.

— Qu’est-ce qu’il fait de ça?

— D’abord il jure dessus. Et c’est pour cela qu’on l’appelle le wapentake.

— Ensuite?

— Ensuite il vous touche avec.

— Avec quoi?

— Avec l’iron-weapon.

— Le wapentake vous touche avec l’iron-weapon?

— Oui.

— Qu’est-ce que cela veut dire?

— Cela veut dire: suivez-moi.

— Et il faut le suivre?

— Oui.

— Où?

— Est-ce que je sais, moi?

— Mais il vous dit où il vous mène?

— Non.

— Mais on peut bien le lui demander?

— Non.

— Comment?

— Il ne vous dit rien, et vous ne lui dites rien.

— Mais...

— Il vous touche de l’iron-weapon, tout est dit. Vous devez marcher.

— Mais où?

— Derrière lui.

— Mais où?

— Où bon lui semble, Gwynplaine.

— Et si l’on résiste?

— On est pendu.

Ursus remit la tête à la lucarne, respira largement, et dit:

— Dieu merci, le voilà passé! ce n’est pas chez nous qu’il vient.

Ursus s’effrayait probablement plus que de raison des indiscrétions et des rapports possibles au sujet des paroles inconsidérées de Gwynplaine.

Maître Nicless, qui les avait entendues, n’avait aucun intérêt compromettre les pauvres gens de la Green-Box. Il tirait latéralement de l’Homme qui Rit une bonne petite fortune. Chaos vaincu avait deux réussites; en même temps qu’il faisait triompher l’art dans la Green-Box, il faisait prospérer l’ivrognerie dans la taverne.

VI

LA SOURIS INTERROGÉE PAR LES CHATS

Ursus eut encore une autre alerte, assez terrible. Cette fois, c’était lui qui était en question. Il fut mandé à Bishopsgate devant une commission composée de trois visages désagréables.

Ces trois visages étaient trois docteurs, qualifiés préposés; l’un était un docteur en théologie, délégué du doyen de Westminster, l’autre était un docteur en médecine, délégué du collège des Quatrevingts, l’autre était un docteur en histoire et droit civil, délégué du collège de Gresham. Ces trois experts in onmi re scibili avaient la police des paroles prononcées en public dans tout le territoire des cent trente paroisses de Londres, des soixante-treize de Middlesex, et, par extension, des cinq de Southwark. Ces juridictions théologales subsistent encore en Angleterre, et sévissent utilement. Le 23 décembre 1868, par sentence de la cour des Arches, confirmée par arrêt des lords du conseil privé, le révérend Mackonochie a été condamné au blâme, plus aux dépens, pour avoir allumé des chandelles sur une table. La liturgie ne plaisante pas.

Ursus donc un beau jour reçut des docteurs délégués un ordre de comparution qui, heureusement, lui fut remis en mains propres et qu’il put tenir secret. Il se rendit, sans mot dire, à la sommation, frémissant à la pensée qu’il pouvait être considér comme donnant prise jusqu’au point d’avoir l’air de pouvoir être soupçonné d’être peut-être, dans une certaine mesure, téméraire.

Lui qui recommandait tant le silence aux autres, il avait là une rude leçon. Garrule, sana te ipsum.

Les trois docteurs préposés et délégués siégeaient à Bishopsgate au fond d’une salle de rez-de-chaussée, sur trois chaises à bras en cuir noir, avec les trois bustes de Minos, d’Éaque et de Rhadamante au-dessus de leur tête dans la muraille, une table devant eux, et à leurs pieds une sellette.

Ursus, introduit par un estafier paisible et sévère, entra, les aperçut, et, sur-le-champ, dans sa pensée, donna à chacun d’eux le nom d’un juge d’enfer que le personnage avait au-dessus de sa tête.

Minos, le premier des trois, le préposé à la théologie, lui fit signe de s'asseoir sur la sellette.

Ursus salua correctement, c'est-à-dire jusqu'à terre, et, sachant qu'on enchante les ours avec du miel et les docteurs avec du latin, dit, en restant à demi courbé par respect:

— Tres faciunt capitulum.

Et tête basse, la modestie désarme, il vint s'asseoir sur le tabouret.

Chacun des trois docteurs avait devant lui sur la table un dossier de notes qu'il feuilletait.

Minos commença:

— Vous parlez en public.

— Oui, répondit Ursus.

— De quel droit?

— Je suis philosophe.

— Ce n'est pas là un droit.

— Je suis aussi saltimbanque, fit Ursus.

— C'est différent.

Ursus respira, mais humblement. Minos reprit:

— Comme saltimbanque, vous pouvez parler, mais comme philosophe, vous devez vous taire.

— Je tâcherai, dit Ursus.

Et il songea en lui-même: — Je puis parler, mais je dois me taire. Complication.

Il était fort effrayé.

Le préposé à Dieu continua:

— Vous dites des choses mal sonnantes. Vous outragez la religion. Vous niez les vérités les plus évidentes. Vous propagez de révoltantes erreurs. Par exemple, vous avez dit que la virginité excluait la maternité.

Ursus leva doucement les yeux.

— Je n'ai pas dit cela. J'ai dit que la maternité excluait la virginité.

Minos fut pensif et grommela:

— Au fait, c'est le contraire.

C'était la même chose. Mais Ursus avait paré le premier coup.

Minos, méditant la réponse d'Ursus, s'enfonça dans la profondeur de son imbécillité, ce qui fit un silence.

Le préposé à l'histoire, celui qui pour Ursus était Rhadamante, masqua la déroute de Minos par cette interpellation:

— Inculpé, vos hardiesses et vos erreurs sont de toutes sortes. Vous avez nié que la bataille de Pharsale eût été perdue parce que Brutus et Cassius avaient rencontré un nègre.

— J’ai dit, murmura Ursus, que cela tenait aussi à ce que César était un meilleur capitaine.

L’homme de l’histoire passa sans transition à la mythologie.

— Vous avez excusé les infamies d’Actéon.

— Je pense, insinua Ursus, qu’un homme n’est pas déshonoré pour avoir vu une femme nue.

— Et vous avez tort, dit le juge sévèrement. Rhadamante rentra dans l’histoire.

— A propos des accidents arrivés à la cavalerie de Mithridate, vous avez contesté les vertus des herbes et des plantes. Vous avez nié qu’une herbe, comme la securiduca, pût faire tomber les fers des chevaux.

— Pardon, répondit Ursus. J’ai dit que cela n’était possible qu’à l’herbe sferra-cavallo. Je ne nie la vertu d’aucune herbe.

Et il ajouta à demi-voix:

— Ni d’aucune femme.

Par ce hors-d’oeuvre ajouté à sa réponse, Ursus se prouvait lui-même que, si inquiet qu’il fût, il n’était pas désarçonné. Ursus était composé de terreur et de présence d’esprit.

— J’insiste, reprit Rhadamante. Vous avez déclaré que ce fut une simplicité à Scipion, quand il voulut ouvrir les portes de Carthage, de prendre pour clef l’herbe Aethiopis, parce que l’herbe Aethiopis n’a pas la propriété de rompre les serrures.

— J’ai simplement dit qu’il eût mieux fait de se servir de l’herbe Lunaria.

— C’est une opinion, murmura Rhadamante touché à son tour.

Et l’homme de l’histoire se tut.

L’homme de la théologie, Minos, revenu à lui, questionna de nouveau Ursus. Il avait eu le temps de consulter le cahier de notes.

— Vous avez classé l’orpiment parmi les produits arsenicaux, et vous avez dit qu’on pouvait empoisonner avec de l’orpiment. La bible le nie.

— La bible le nie, soupira Ursus, mais l’arsenic l’affirme.

Le personnage en qui Ursus voyait Éaque, qui était le prépos la médecine et qui n’avait pas encore parlé, intervint, et, les yeux superbement fermés à demi, appuya Ursus de très haut. Il dit:

— La réponse n’est pas inepte.

Ursus remercia de son sourire le plus avili.

Minos fit une moue affreuse.

— Je continue, reprit Minos. Répondez. Vous avez dit qu’il était faux que le basilic soit roi des serpents sous le nom de Cocatrix.

— Très révérend, dit Ursus, j’ai si peu voulu nuire au basilic que j’ai dit qu’il était certain qu’il avait une tête d’homme.

— Soit, répliqua sévèrement Minos, mais vous avez ajouté que Poerius en avait vu un qui avait une tête de faucon.
Pourriez-vous le prouver?

— Difficilement, dit Ursus.

Ici il perdit un peu de terrain.

Minos, ressaisissant l’avantage, poussa.

— Vous avez dit qu’un juif qui se fait chrétien ne sent pas bon.

— Mais j’ai ajouté qu’un chrétien qui se fait juif sent mauvais.

Minos jeta un regard sur le dossier dénonciateur.

— Vous affirmez et propagez des choses invraisemblables. Vous avez dit qu’Elien avait vu un éléphant écrire des sentences.

— Non pas, très révérend. J’ai simplement dit qu’Oppien avait entendu un hippopotame discuter un problème philosophique.

— Vous avez déclaré qu’il n’est pas vrai qu’un plat de bois de hêtre se couvre de lui-même de tous les mets qu’on peut désirer.

— J’ai dit que, pour qu’il eût cette vertu, il faut qu’il vous ait été donné par le diable.

— Donné à moi!

— Non, à moi, révérend! — Non! à personne! à tout le monde!

Et, à part, Ursus songea: Je ne sais plus ce que je dis. Mais son trouble extérieur, bien qu’extrême, n’était pas trop visible.
Ursus luttait.

— Tout ceci, repartit Minos, implique une certaine foi au diable.

Ursus tint bon.

— Très révérend, je ne suis pas impie au diable. La foi au diable est l’envers de la foi en Dieu. L’une prouve l’autre.
Qui ne croit pas un peu au diable ne croit pas beaucoup en Dieu.
Qui croit au soleil doit croire à l’ombre. Le diable est la nuit de Dieu.
Qu’est-ce que la nuit? la preuve du jour.

Ursus improvisait ici une insondable combinaison de philosophie et de religion. Minos redevint pensif et refit un plongeon dans le silence.

Ursus respira de nouveau.

Une brusque attaque eut lieu. Éaque, le délégué de la médecine, qui venait de protéger dédaigneusement Ursus contre le prépos la théologie, se fit subitement d'auxiliaire assaillant. Il posa son poing fermé sur son dossier, qui était épais et chargé.

Ursus reçut de lui en plein torse cette apostrophe:

— Il est prouvé que le cristal est de la glace sublimée et que le diamant est du cristal sublimé; il est avéré que la glace devient cristal en mille ans, et que le cristal devient diamant en mille siècles. Vous l'avez nié.

— Point, répliqua Ursus avec mélancolie. J'ai seulement dit qu'en mille ans la glace avait le temps de fondre, et que mille siècles, c'était malaisé à compter.

L'interrogatoire continua, les demandes et les réponses faisant comme un cliquetis d'épées.

— Vous avez nié que les plantes pussent parler.

— Nullement. Mais il faut pour cela qu'elles soient sous un gibet.

— Avouez-vous que la mandragore crie?

— Non, mais elle chante.

— Vous avez nié que le quatrième doigt de la main gauche eût une vertu cordiale.

— J'ai seulement dit qu'éternuer à gauche était un signe malheureux.

— Vous avez témérairement et injurieusement parlé du phénix.

— Docte juge, j'ai simplement dit que, lorsqu'il a écrit que le cerveau du phénix était un morceau délicat, mais qui causait des maux de tête, Plutarque s'était fort avancé, attendu que le phénix n'a jamais existé.

— Parole détestable. Le cinnamalque qui fait son nid avec des bâtons de cannelle, le rhintace que Parysatis employait à ses empoisonnements, le manucodiate qui est l'oiseau de paradis, et la semenda dont le bec a trois tuyaux, ont passé à tort pour le phénix; mais le phénix a existé.

— Je ne m'y oppose pas.

— Vous êtes une bourrique.

— Je ne demande pas mieux.

— Vous avez confessé que le sureau guérissait l'esquinancie, mais vous avez ajouté que ce n'était pas parce qu'il avait dans sa racine une excroissance fée.

— J’ai dit que c’était parce que Judas s’était pendu à un sureau.

— Opinion plausible, grommela le théologien Minos, satisfait de rendre son coup d’épingle au médecin Êaque.

L’arrogance froissée est tout de suite colère. Eaque s’acharna.

— Homme nomade, vous errez par l’esprit autant que par les pieds. Vous avez des tendances suspectes et surprenantes. Vous côtoyez la sorcellerie. Vous êtes en relation avec des animaux inconnus. Vous parlez aux populaces d’objets qui n’existent que pour vous seul, et qui sont d’une nature ignorée, tels que l’hoemorrhoüs.

— L’hoemorrhoüs est une vipère qu’a vue Tremellius.

Cette riposte produisit un certain désarroi dans la science irritée du docteur Éaque.

Ursus ajouta:

— L’hoemorrhoüs est tout aussi réel que l’hyène odoriférante et que la civette décrite par Castellus.

Éaque s’en tira par une charge à fond.

— Voici des paroles textuelles de vous, et très diaboliques. Écoutez.

L’oeil sur le dossier, Éaque lut:

— «Deux plantes, la thalagssigle et l’aglaphotis sont lumineuses le soir. Fleurs le jour, étoiles la nuit.

Et regardant fixement Ursus:

— Qu’avez-vous à dire?

Ursus répondit:

— Toute plante est lampe. Le parfum est de la lumière.

Éaque feuilleta d’autres pages.

— Vous avez nié que les vésicules de loutre fussent équivalentes au castoreum.

— Je me suis borné à dire qu’il fallait peut-être se défier d’Aétius sur ce point.

Éaque devint farouche.

— Vous exercez la médecine?

— Je m’exerce à la médecine, soupira timidement Ursus.

— Sur les vivants?

— Plutôt que sur les morts, fit Ursus.

Ursus ripostait avec solidité, mais avec platitude; mélange admirable où la suavité dominait. Il parlait avec tant de douceur que le docteur Éaque sentit le besoin de l’insulter.

— Que nous roucoulez-vous là? dit-il rudement.

Ursus fut ébahi et se borna à répondre:

— Le roucoulement est pour les jeunes et le gémissement pour les vieux. Hélas! je gémis.

Éaque répliqua:

— Soyez averti de ceci: si un malade est soigné par vous, et s’il meurt, vous serez puni de mort.

Ursus hasarda une question.

— Et s’il guérit?

— En ce cas-là, répondit le docteur, adoucissant sa voix, vous serez puni de mort.

— C’est peu varié, dit Ursus.

Le docteur reprit:

— S’il y a mort, on punit l’ânerie. S’il y a guérison, on punit l’outrecuidance. La potence dans les deux cas.

— J’ignorais ce détail, murmura Ursus. Je vous remercie de me renseigner. On ne connaît pas toutes les beautés de la législation.

— Prenez garde à vous.

— Religieusement, dit Ursus.

— Nous savons ce que vous faites.

— Moi, pensa Ursus, je ne le sais pas toujours.

— Nous pouvons vous envoyer en prison.

— Je l’entrevois, messeigneurs.

— Vous ne pouvez nier vos contraventions et vos empiétements.

— Ma philosophie demande pardon.

— On vous attribue des audaces.

— On a énormément tort.

— On dit que vous guérissez les malades?

— Je suis victime des calomnies.

La triple paire de sourcils horrifiques braquée sur Ursus se fronça; les trois savantes faces se rapprochèrent et chuchotèrent. Ursus eut la vision d’un vague bonnet d’âne s’esquissant au-dessus de ces trois têtes autorisées; le bougonnement intime et compétent de cette trinité dura quelques minutes, pendant lesquelles Ursus sentit toutes les glaces et toutes les braises de l’angoisse; enfin Minos, qui était le praeses, se tourna vers lui et lui dit d’un air furieux:

— Allez-vous-en.

Ursus eut un peu la sensation de Jonas sortant du ventre de la baleine.

Minos continua:

— On vous relaxe!

Ursus se dit:

— Si l'on m'y reprend! — Bonsoir la médecine!

Et il ajouta dans son for intérieur:

— Désormais je laisserai soigneusement crever les gens.

Ployé en deux, il salua tout, les docteurs, les bustes, la table et les murs, et se dirigea vers la porte à reculons, disparaissant presque comme de l'ombre qui se dissipe.

Il sortit de la salle lentement, comme un innocent, et de la rue rapidement, comme un coupable. Les gens de justice sont d'une approche si singulière et si obscure, que, même absous, on s'évade.

Tout en s'enfuyant, il grommelait:

— Je l'ai échappé belle. Je suis le savant sauvage, eux sont les savants domestiques. Les docteurs tracassent les doctes. La fausse science est l'excrément de la vraie; et on l'emploie à la perte des philosophes. Les philosophes, en produisant les sophistes, produisent leur propre malheur. De la fiente de la grive naît le gui, avec lequel on fait la glu, avec laquelle on prend la grive. Turdus sibi malum cacat.

Nous ne donnons pas Ursus pour un délicat. Il avait l'effronterie de se servir des mots qui rendaient sa pensée. Il n'avait pas plus de goût que Voltaire.

Ursus rentra à la Green-Box, raconta à maître Nicless qu'il s'était attardé à suivre une jolie femme, et ne souffla mot de son aventure.

— Seulement le soir il dit tout bas à Homo:

— Sache ceci. J'ai vaincu les trois têtes de Cerbère.

VII

QUELLES RAISONS PEUT AVOIR UN QUADRUPLE POUR VENIR S'ENCANAILLER PARMI LES GROS SOUS?

Une diversion survint.

L'inn Tadcaster était de plus en plus une fournaise de joie et de rire. Pas de plus gai tumulte. L'hôtelier et son boy ne suffisaient pas à verser l'ale, le stout et le porter. Le soir, la salle basse, toutes vitres éclairées, n'avait pas une table vide. On chantait, on criait; le grand vieil âtre en cul de four, grillé de fer et gorgé de houille, flambait. C'était comme une maison de feu et de bruit.

Dans la cour, c'est-à-dire dans le théâtre, plus de foule encore.

Tout le public de faubourg que pouvait donner Southwark abondait à tel point aux représentations de Chaos vaincu que, sitôt le rideau levé, c'est-à-dire sitôt le panneau de la Green-Box abaissé, il était impossible de trouver une place. Les fenêtres regorgeaient de spectateurs; le balcon était envahi. On ne voyait plus un seul des pavés de la cour, tous remplacés par des visages.

Seulement le compartiment pour la noblesse restait toujours vide.

Cela faisait, à cet endroit, qui était le centre du balcon, un trou noir, ce qu'on appelle, en métaphore d'argot «un four».

Personne. Foule partout, excepté là.

Un soir, il y eut quelqu'un.

C'était un samedi, jour où les anglais se dépêchent de s'amuser, ayant à s'ennuyer le dimanche. La salle était comble.

Nous disons salle. Shakespeare aussi n'a eu longtemps pour théâtre qu'une cour d'hôtellerie, et il l'appelait salle.

Hall.

Au moment où la triveline s'écarta sur le prologue de Chaos vaincu, Ursus, Homo et Gwynplaine étant en scène, Ursus jeta, comme d'habitude, un coup d'oeil sur l'assistance, et eut une commotion.

Le compartiment «pour la noblesse» était occupé.

Une femme était assise, seule, au milieu de la loge, sur le fauteuil de velours d'Utrecht.

Elle était seule, et elle emplissait la loge.

De certains êtres ont de la clarté. Cette femme, comme Dea, avait sa lueur à elle, mais autre. Dea était pâle, cette femme était vermeille. Dea était l'aube, cette femme était l'aurore.

Dea était belle, cette femme était superbe. Dea était l'innocence, la candeur, la blancheur, l'albâtre; cette femme était la pourpre, et l'on sentait qu'elle ne craignait pas la rougeur. Son irradiation débordait la loge, et elle siégeait au centre, immobile, dans on ne sait quelle plénitude d'idole.

Au milieu de cette foule sordide, elle avait le rayonnement supérieur de l'escarboucle, elle inondait ce peuple de tant de lumière qu'elle le noyait d'ombre, et toutes ces faces obscures subissaient son éclipse. Sa splendeur était l'effacement de tout.

Tous les yeux la regardaient.

Tom-Jim-Jack était mêlé à la cohue. Il disparaissait comme les autres dans le nimbe de cette personne éclatante.

Cette femme absorba d'abord l'attention du public, fit concurrence au spectacle, et nuisit un peu aux premiers effets de Chaos vaincu.

Quel que fût son air de rêve, pour ceux qui étaient près d'elle, elle était réelle. C'était bien une femme. C'était peut-être même trop une femme. Elle était grande et forte, et se montrait magnifiquement le plus nue qu'elle pouvait. Elle portait de volumineux pendants d'oreilles en perles où étaient mêlés ces bijoux bizarres dits clefs d'Angleterre. Sa robe de dessus était de mousseline de Siam brodée en or passé, grand luxe, car telle de ces robes de mousseline valait alors six cents écus.

Une large agrafe de diamants fermait sa chemise qu'on voyait fleur de gorge, mode lascive du temps, et qui était de cette toile de Frise dont Anne d'Autriche avait des draps si fins qu'ils passaient à travers une bague. Cette femme avait comme une cuirasse de rubis, quelques-uns cabochons, et des pierreries cousues partout à son corps de jupe. De plus, les deux sourcils noircis à l'encre de Chine, et les bras, les coudes, les épaules, le menton, le dessous des narines, le dessus des paupières, le lambeau des oreilles, la paume des mains, le bout des doigts, touchés avec le fard et ayant on ne sait quelle pointe rouge et provocante. Et sur tout cela une implacable volonté d'être belle. Elle l'était au point d'être farouche. C'était la panthère, pouvant être chatte, et caresser. Un de ses yeux était bleu, l'autre était noir.

Gwynplaine, comme Ursus, considérait cette femme.

La Green-Box était un peu un spectacle fantasmagorique, Chaos vaincu était plutôt un songe qu'une pièce, ils étaient habitués à faire sur le public un effet de vision; cette fois l'effet de vision revenait sur eux, la salle renvoyait au théâtre la surprise, et c'était leur tour d'être effarés. Ils avaient le ricochet de la fascination.

Cette femme les regardait, et ils la regardaient.

Pour eux, à la distance où ils étaient, et dans la brume lumineuse que fait la pénombre théâtrale, les détails s'effaçaient; et c'était comme une hallucination. C'était une femme sans doute, mais n'était-ce pas aussi une chimère? Cette entrée d'une lumière dans leur obscurité les stupéfiait. C'était comme l'arrivée d'une planète inconnue. Cela venait du monde des heureux. L'irradiation amplifiait cette figure. Cette femme avait sur elle des scintillations nocturnes, comme une voie lactée. Ces pierreries semblaient des étoiles. Cette agrafe de diamants était peut-être une pléiade. Le modelé splendide de son sein semblait surnaturel. On sentait, en voyant cette créature astrale, l'approche momentanée et glaciale des régions de félicité. C'était des profondeurs d'un paradis que se penchait sur la chétive Green-Box et sur son misérable public cette face de sérénité inexorable. Curiosité suprême qui se satisfaisait, et qui, en même temps, donnait pâture à la curiosité populaire.

En haut permettait à En bas de le regarder.

Ursus, Gwynplaine, Vinos, Fibi, la foule, tous, avaient la secousse de cet éblouissemcnt, excepté Dea, ignorante dans sa nuit.

Il y avait, dans cette présence, de l'apparition, mais aucune des idées qu'éveillé ordinairement ce mot n'était réalisée par cette figure; elle n'avait rien de diaphane, rien d'indécis, rien de flottant; aucune vapeur; c'était une apparition rose et fraîche, bien portante. Et pourtant, dans les conditions d'optique o étaient placés Ursus et Gwynplaine, c'était visionnaire. Les fantômes gras, qu'on nomme les vampires, existent. Telle belle reine qui, elle aussi, est pour la foule une vision, et qui mange trente millions par an au peuple des pauvres, a cette santé-là.

Derrière cette femme, dans la pénombre, on apercevait son mousse, el mozo, un petit homme enfantin, blanc et joli, à l'air sérieux. Un groom très jeune et très grave était la mode de ce temps-là. Ce mousse était vêtu, chaussé et coiffé de velours couleur feu, et avait sur sa calotte galonnée d'or un bouquet de plumes de tisserin, ce qui est le signe d'une haute domesticité, et indique qu'on est le valet d'une très grande dame.

Le laquais fait partie du seigneur, et il était impossible de ne pas remarquer dans l'ombre de cette femme ce page porte-queue.
La mémoire prend des notes souvent à notre insu; et, sans que Gwynplaine s'en doutât, les joues rondes, la mine sérieuse, la calotte galonnée et le bouquet de plumes du mousse de la dame laissèrent une trace quelconque dans son esprit. Ce groom du reste ne faisait rien pour se faire regarder; attirer l'attention, c'est manquer de respect; il se tenait debout et passif au fond de la loge, et reculé aussi loin que le permettait la porte fermée.

Quoique son muchacho porte-queue fût là, cette femme n'en était pas moins seule dans le compartiment, attendu qu'un valet ne compte pas.

Si puissante que fût la diversion produite par cette personne qui faisait l'effet d'un personnage, le dénoûment de Chaos vaincu fut plus puissant encore. L'impression fut, comme toujours, irrésistible. Peut-être même y eut-il dans la salle, à cause de la radieuse spectatrice, car quelquefois le spectateur s'ajoute au spectacle, un surcroît d'électricité. La contagion du rire de Gwynplaine fut plus triomphante que jamais. Toute l'assistance se pâma dans une indescriptible épilepsie d'hilarité, où l'on distinguait le rictus sonore et magistral de Tom-Jim-Jack.

Seule, la femme inconnue qui regardait ce spectacle dans une immobilité de statue et avec des yeux de fantôme, ne rit pas.

Spectre, mais solaire.

La représentation finie, le panneau relevé, l'intimité refaite dans la Green-Box, Ursus ouvrit et vida sur la table du souper le sac de la recette. C'était une cohue de gros sous parmi laquelle ruissela subitement une once d'or d'Espagne.

— Elle! s'écria Ursus.

Cette once d'or au milieu de ces sous vert-de-grisés, c'était en effet cette femme au milieu de ce peuple.

— Elle a payé sa place un quadruple! reprit Ursus enthousiasmé.

En ce moment l'hôtelier entra dans la Green-Box, passa son bras par la fenêtre de l'arrière, ouvrit dans le mur auquel la Green-Box s'adossait un vasistas dont nous avons parlé, qui permettait de voir dans la place, et qui était à la hauteur de cette fenêtre, puis fit silencieusement signe à Ursus de regarder dehors. Un carrosse empanaché de laquais à plumes portant des torches, et magnifiquement attelé, s'éloignait au grand trot.

Ursus prit respectueusement le quadruple entre son pouce et son index, le montra à maître Nicless et dit:

— C’est une déesse.

Puis ses yeux tombèrent sur le carrosse prêt à tourner le coin de la place, et sur l’impériale duquel les torches des valets éclairaient une couronne d’or à huit fleurons.

Et il s’écria:

— C’est plus. C’est une duchesse.

Le carrosse disparut. Le bruit du roulement s’éteignit.

Ursus demeura quelques instants extatique, faisant entre ses deux doigts, devenus ostensoir, l’élévation du quadruple comme on ferait l’élévation de l’hostie.

Puis il le posa sur la table, et, tout en le contemplant, se mit à parler de «la madame». L’hôtelier lui donnait la réplique.

C’était une duchesse. Oui. On savait le titre. Mais le nom?

on l’ignorait. Maître Nicless avait vu de près le carrosse, tout armorié, et les laquais, tout galonnés. Le cocher avait une perruque à croire voir un lord chancelier. Le carrosse était de cette forme rare nommée en Espagne coche-tumbonu, variét splendide qui a un couvercle de tombe, ce qui est un support magnifique pour une couronne. Le mousse était un échantillon d’homme si mignon qu’il pouvait se tenir assis sur l’étrier du carrosse en dehors de la portière. On emploie ces jolis êtres-l à porter les queues des dames; ils portent aussi leurs messages.

Et avait-on remarqué le bouquet de plumes de tisserin de ce mousse? Voilà qui est grand. On paie l’amende si l’on porte ces plumes-là sans droit.

Maître Nicless avait aussi regardé la dame de près. Une espèce de reine.

Tant de richesse donne de la beauté. La peau est plus blanche, l’oeil est plus fier, la démarche est plus noble, la grâce est plus insolente. Rien n’égale l’élégance impertinente de ces mains qui ne travaillent pas. Maître Nicless racontait cette magnificence de la chair blanche avec des veines bleues, ce cou, ces épaules, ces bras, ce fard partout, ces pendeloques de perles, cette coiffure poudrée d’or, ces profusions de pierreries, ces rubis, ces diamants.

— Moins brillants que les yeux, murmura Ursus.

Gwynplaine se taisait.

Dea écoutait.

— Et savez-vous, dit le tavernicr, le plus étonnant?

— Quoi? demanda Ursus.

— C’est que je l’ai vue monter en carrosse.

— Après?

— Elle n’y est pas montée seule.

— Bah!

— Quelqu’un est monté avec elle.

— Qui?

— Devinez.

— Le roi? dit Ursus.

— D’abord, fit maître Nicless, il n’y a pas de roi pour le moment. Nous ne sommes pas sous un roi. Devinez qui est mont dans le carrosse de cette duchesse.

— Jupiter, dit Ursus.

L’hôtelier répondit:

— Tom-Jim-Jack.

Gwynplaine, qui n’avait pas articulé un mot, rompit le silence.

— Tom-Jim-Jack! s’écria-t-il.

Il y eut une pause d’étonnement pendant laquelle on put entendre Dea dire à voix basse:

— Est-ce qu’on ne pourrait pas empêcher cette femme-là de venir?

VIII

SYMPTOMES D’EMPOISONNEMENT

«L’apparition» ne revint pas.

Elle ne revint pas dans la salle, mais elle revint dans l’esprit de Gwynplaine.

Gwynplaine fut, dans une certaine mesure, troublé.

Il lui sembla que, pour la première fois de sa vie, il venait de voir une femme.

Il fit tout de suite cette demi-chute de songer étrangement. Il faut prendre garde à la rêverie qui s’impose. La rêverie a le mystère et la subtilité d’une odeur. Elle est à la pensée ce que le parfum est à la tubéreuse. Elle est parfois la dilatation d’une idée vénéneuse, et elle a la pénétration d’une fumée. On peut s’empoisonner avec des rêveries comme avec des fleurs. Suicide enivrant, exquis et sinistre.

Le suicide de l’âme, c’est de penser mal. C’est l l’empoisonnement. La rêverie attire, enjôle, leurre, enlace, puis fait de vous son complice. Elle vous met de moitié dans les tricheries qu’elle fait à la conscience. Elle vous charme. Puis vous corrompt. On peut dire de la rêverie ce qu’on dit du jeu. On commence par être dupe, on finit par être fripon.

Gwynplaine songea.

Il n’avait jamais vu la Femme.

Il en avait vu l’ombre dans toutes les femmes du peuple, et il en avait vu l’âme dans Dea.

Il venait d’en voir la réalité.

Une peau tiède et vivante, sous laquelle on sentait couler un sang passionné, des contours ayant la précision du marbre et l’ondulation de la vague, un visage hautain et impassible, mêlant le refus à l’attrait, et se résumant en un resplendissement, des cheveux colorés comme d’un reflet d’incendie, une galanterie de parure ayant et donnant le frisson des voluptés, la nudit ébauchée trahissant le souhait dédaigneux d’être possédée distance par la foule, une coquetterie inexpugnable, l’impénétrable ayant du charme, la tentation assaisonnée de perdition entrevue, une promesse aux sens et une menace l’esprit, double anxiété, l’une qui est le désir, l’autre qui est la crainte. Il venait de voir cela. Il venait de voir une femme.

Il venait de voir plus et moins qu’une femme, une femelle.

Et en même temps une olympienne.

Une femelle de dieu.

Ce mystère, le sexe, venait de lui apparaître.

Et où? dans l’inaccessible.

A une distance infinie.

Destinée ironique, l’âme, cette chose céleste, il la tenait, il l’avait dans sa main, c’était Dea; le sexe, cette chose terrestre, il l’apercevait au plus profond du ciel, c’était cette femme.

Une duchesse.

Plus qu’une déesse, avait dit Ursus.

Quel escarpement!

Le rêve lui-même reculerait devant une telle escalade.

Allait-il faire la folie de songer à cette inconnue? Il se débattait.

Il se rappelait tout ce qu’Ursus lui avait dit de ces hautes existences quasi royales; les divagations du philosophe, qui lui avaient semblé inutiles, devenaient pour lui des jalons de méditation; nous n’avons souvent dans la mémoire qu’une couche d’oubli très mince, laquelle, dans l’occasion, laisse tout à coup voir ce qui est dessous; il se représentait ce monde auguste, la seigneurie, dont était cette femme, inexorablement superposé au monde infime, le peuple, dont il était. Et même était-il du peuple? N’était-il pas, lui bateleur, au-dessous de ce qui est au-dessous? Pour la première fois, depuis qu’il avait l’âge de réflexion, il eut vaguement le coeur serré de sa bassesse, que nous appellerions aujourd’hui abaissement. Les peintures et les énumérations d’Ursus, ses inventaires lyriques, ses dithyrambes de châteaux, de parcs, de jets d’eau et de colonnades, ses étalages de la richesse et de la puissance, revivaient dans la pensée de Gwynplaine avec le relief d’une réalité mêlée aux nuées. Il avait l’obsession de ce zénith. Qu’un homme pût être un lord, cela lui semblait chimérique. Cela était pourtant. Chose incroyable! il y avait des lords! mais étaient-ils de chair et d’os, comme nous? C’était douteux. Il se sentait, lui, au fond de l’ombre, avec de la muraille tout autour lui, et il apercevait dans un lointain suprême, au-dessus de sa tête, comme par l’ouverture d’un puits au fond duquel il serait, cet éblouissant pêle-mêle d’azur, de figures et de rayons qui est l’olympe. Au milieu de cette gloire resplendissait la duchesse.

Il sentait de cette femme on ne sait quel besoin bizarre compliqué d’impossible.

Et ce contre-sens poignant se retournait sans cesse malgré lui dans son esprit: voir auprès de lui, à sa portée, dans la réalit étroite et tangible, l'âme, et dans l'insaisissable, au fond de l'idéal, la chair.

Aucune de ces pensées ne lui arrivait à l'état de précision.
C'était du brouillard qu'il avait en lui. Cela changeait chaque instant de contour et flottait. Mais c'était un profond obscurcissement.

Du reste, l'idée qu'il y eût là quoi que ce soit d'abordable n'effleura pas un instant son esprit. Il n'ébaucha, pas même en songe, aucune ascension vers la duchesse. Heureusement.

Le tremblement de ces échelles-là, une fois qu'on a mis le pied dessus, peut vous rester à jamais dans le cerveau; on croit monter à l'olympe, et l'on arrive à Bedlam. Une convoitise distincte, qui eût pris forme en lui, l'eût terrifié. Il n'éprouva rien de pareil.

D'ailleurs reverrait-il jamais cette femme? probablement non.
S'éprendre d'une lueur qui passe à l'horizon, la démence ne va point jusque-là. Faire les yeux doux à une étoile, à la rigueur, cela se comprend, on la revoit, elle reparaît, elle est fixe.
Mais est-ce qu'on peut être amoureux d'un éclair?

Il avait un va-et-vient de rêves. L'idole au fond de la loge, majestueuse et galante, s'estompait lumineusement dans la diffusion de ses idées, puis s'effaçait. Il y pensait, n'y pensait pas, s'occupait d'autre chose, y retournait. Il subissait un bercement, rien de plus.

Cela l'empêcha de dormir plusieurs nuits. L'insomnie est aussi pleine de songes que le sommeil.

Il est presque impossible d'exprimer dans leurs limites exactes les évolutions abstruses qui se font dans le cerveau.
L'inconvénient des mots, c'est d'avoir plus de contour que les idées. Toutes les idées se mêlent par les bords; les mots, non.
Un certain côté diffus de l'âme leur échappe toujours.
L'expression a des frontières, la pensée n'en a pas.

Notre sombre immensité intérieure est telle que ce qui se passait en Gwynplaine touchait à peine, dans sa pensée, à Dea. Dea était au centre de son esprit, sacrée. Rien ne pouvait approcher d'elle.

Et pourtant, ces contradictions sont toute l'âme humaine, il y avait en lui un conflit. En avait-il conscience? tout au plus.

Il sentait dans son for intérieur, à l'endroit des fêlures possibles, nous avons tous cet endroit-là, un choc de velléités.

Pour Ursus, c’eût été clair; pour Gwynplaine, c’était indistinct.

Deux instincts, l’un l’idéal, l’autre le sexe, combattaient en lui. Il y a de ces luttes entre l’ange blanc et l’ange noir sur le pont de l’abîme.

Enfin l’ange noir fut précipité.

Un jour, tout à coup, Gwynplaine ne pensa plus à la femme inconnue.

Le combat entre les deux principes, le duel entre son côt terrestre et son côté céleste, s’était passé au plus obscur de lui-même, et à de telles profondeurs qu’il ne s’en était que très confusément aperçu.

Ce qui est certain, c’est qu’il n’avait pas cessé une minute d’adorer Dea.

Il y avait eu en lui, et très avant, un désordre, son sang avait eu une fièvre, mais c’était fini. Dea seule demeurait.

On eût même bien étonné Gwynplaine si on lui eut dit que Dea avait pu être un moment en danger.

En une semaine ou deux le fantôme qui avait semblé menacer ces âmes s’effaça.

Il n’y eut plus dans Gwynplaine que le coeur, foyer, et l’amour, flamme.

Du reste, nous l’avons dit, «la duchesse» n’était pas revenue.

Ce qu’Ursus trouva tout simple. «La dame au quadruple» est un phénomène. Cela entre, paie, et s’évanouit. Ce serait trop beau si cela revenait.

Quant à Dea, elle ne fit même pas allusion à cette femme qui avait passé. Elle écoutait probablement, et était suffisamment renseignée par des soupirs d’Ursus, et, ça et là, par quelque exclamation significative comme: on n’a pas des onces d’or tous les jours! Elle ne parla plus de «la femme». C’est là un instinct profond. L’âme prend de ces précautions obscures, dans le secret desquelles elle n’est pas toujours elle-même. Se taire sur quelqu’un, il semble que c’est l’éloigner. En s’informant, on craint d’appeler. Ou met du silence de son côté comme on fermerait une porte.

L’incident s’oublia.

Était-ce même quelque chose? Cela avait-il existé? Pouvait-on dire qu’une ombre eût flotté entre Gwynplaine et Dea? Dea ne le savait pas, et Gwynplaine ne le savait plus. Non. Il n’y avait rien eu. La duchesse elle-même s’estompa dans la perspective lointaine comme une illusion. Ce ne fut rien qu’une minute de songe traversée par Gwynplaine, et dont il était hors. Une dissipation de rêverie, comme une dissipation de brume, ne laisse point trace, et, le nuage passé, l’amour n’est pas plus diminu dans le coeur que le soleil dans le ciel.

ABYSSUS ABYSSUM VOCAT

Une autre figure disparue, ce fut Tom-Jim-Jack. Brusquement il cessa de venir dans l’inn Tadcaster.

Les personnes situées de façon à voir les deux versants de la vie élégante des grands seigneurs de Londres purent noter peut-être qu’à la même époque la Gazette de la Semaine, entre deux extraits de registres de paroisses, annonça le «départ de lord David Dirry-Moir, sur l’ordre de sa majesté d’aller reprendre, dans l’escadre blanche en croisière sur les côtes de Hollande, le commandement de sa frégate».

Ursus s’aperçut que Tom-Jim-Jack ne venait plus; il en fut très préoccupé. Tom-Jim-Jack n’avait point reparu depuis le jour o il était parti dans le même carrosse que la dame au quadruple.

C’était, certes, une énigme que ce Tom-Jim-Jack qui enlevait des duchesses à bras tendu! Quel approfondissement intéressant faire! que de questions à poser! que de choses à dire! C’est pourquoi Ursus ne dit pas un mot.

Ursus, qui avait vécu, savait quelles cuissons donnent les curiosités téméraires. La curiosité doit toujours être proportionnée au curieux. A écouter, on risque l’oreille; guetter, on risque l’oeil. Ne rien entendre et ne rien voir est prudent. Tom-Jim-Jack était monté dans ce carrosse princier, l’hôtelier avait été témoin de cette ascension. Ce matelot s’asseyant à côté de cette lady avait un aspect de prodige qui rendait Ursus circonspect. Les caprices de la vie d’en haut doivent être sacrés pour les personnes basses. Tous ces reptiles qu’on appelle les pauvres n’ont rien de mieux à faire que de se tapir dans leur trou quand ils aperçoivent quelque chose d’extraordinaire. Se tenir coi est une force. Fermez vos yeux, si vous n’avez pas le bonheur d’être aveugle; bouchez vos oreilles, si vous n’avez pas la chance d’être sourd; paralysez votre langue, si vous n’avez pas la perfection d’être muet. Les grands sont ce qu’ils veulent, les petits sont ce qu’ils peuvent, laissons passer l’inconnu. N’importunons point la mythologie; n’ennuyons point les apparences; ayons un profond respect pour les simulacres. Ne dirigeons pas nos commérages vers les rapetissements ou les grossissements qui s’opèrent dans les régions supérieures pour des motifs que nous ignorons. Ce sont la plupart du temps, pour nous chétifs, des illusions d’optique.

Les métamorphoses sont l’affaire des dieux; les transformations et les désagrégations des grands personnages éventuels qui flottent au-dessus de nous, sont des nuages impossibles comprendre et périlleux à étudier. Trop d’attention impatiente les olympiens dans leurs évolutions d’amusement et de fantaisie, et un coup de tonnerre pourrait bien vous apprendre que ce taureau trop curieusement examiné par vous est Jupiter.

N’entre-bâillons pas les plis du manteau couleur de muraille des puissants terribles. Indifférence, c’est intelligence. Ne bougez point, cela est salubre. Faites le mort, on ne vous tuera pas. Telle est la sagesse de l’insecte. Ursus la pratiquait.

L’hôtelier, intrigué de son côté, interpella un jour Ursus.

— Savez-vous qu’on ne voit plus Tom-Jim-Jack?

— Tiens, dit Ursus, je ne l’avais pas remarqué.

Maître Nicless fit à demi-voix une réflexion, sans doute sur la promiscuité du carrosse ducal avec Tom-Jim-Jack, observation probablement irrévérente et dangereuse, qu’Ursus eut soin de ne pas écouter.

Ursus néanmoins était trop artiste pour ne point regretter Tom-Jim-Jack. Il eut un certain désappointement. Il ne fit part de son impression qu’à Homo, seul confident de la discrétion duquel il fût sûr. Il dit tout bas à l’oreille du loup:

— Depuis que Tom-Jim-Jack ne vient plus, je sens un vide comme homme et un froid comme poète.

Cet épanchement dans le coeur d’un ami soulagea Ursus.

Il resta muré vis-à-vis de Gwynplaine qui, de son côté, ne fit aucune allusion à Tom-Jim-Jack.

Au fait, Tom-Jim-Jack de plus ou de moins importait peu Gwynplaine, absorbé en Dea.

L’oubli s’était fait de plus en plus dans Gwynplaine. Dea, elle, ne se doutait même pas qu’un vague ébranlement eût eu lieu. En même temps, on n’entendait plus parler de cabales et de plaintes contre l’Homme qui Rit. Les haines semblaient avoir lâché prise.

Tout s’était apaisé dans la Green-Box et autour de la Green-Box.

Plus de cabotinage, ni des cabotins, ni des prêtres. Plus de grondement extérieur. On avait le succès sans la menace. La destinée a de ces sérénités subites. La splendide félicité de Gwynplaine et de Dea était, pour l’instant, absolument sans ombre. Elle était peu à peu montée jusqu’à ce point où rien ne peut plus croître. Il y a un mot qui exprime ces situations-là, l’apogée. Le bonheur, comme la mer, arrive à faire son plein.

Ce qui est inquiétant pour les parfaitement heureux, c’est que la mer redescend.

Il y a deux façons d’être inaccessible, c’est d’être très haut et d’être très bas. Au moins autant peut-être que la première, la deuxième est souhaitable. Plus sûrement que l’aigle n’échappe la flèche, l’infusoire échappe à l’écrasement. Cette sécurité de la petitesse, nous l’avons dit déjà, si quelqu’un l’avait sur la terre, c’étaient ces deux êtres, Gwynplaine et Dea; mais jamais elle n’avait été si complète. Ils vivaient de plus en plus l’un par l’autre, l’un en l’autre, extatiquement. Le coeur se sature d’amour comme d’un sel divin qui le conserve; de l l’incorruptible adhérence de ceux qui se sont aimés dès l’aube de la vie, et la fraîcheur des vieilles amours prolongées. Il existe un embaumement d’amour. C’est de Daphnis et Chloé que sont faits Philémon et Baucis. Cette vieillesse-là, ressemblance du soir avec l’aurore, était évidemment réservée à Gwynplaine et à Dea. En attendant, ils étaient jeunes.

Ursus regardait cet amour comme un médecin fait sa clinique. Du reste il avait ce qu’on appelait en ce temps-là «le regard hippocratique». Il attachait sur Dea, frêle et pâle, sa prunelle sagace, et il gromme-lait: — C’est bien heureux qu’elle soit heureuse! — D’autres fois il disait: — Elle est heureuse pour sa santé.

Il hochait la tête, et parfois lisait attentivement Avicenne, traduit par Vopiscus Fortunatus, Louvain, 1650, un bouquin qu’il avait, à l’endroit des «troubles cardiaques».

Dea, aisément fatiguée, avait des sueurs et des assoupissements, et faisait, on s’en souvient, sa sieste dans le jour. Une fois qu’elle était ainsi endormie, étendue sur la peau d’ours, et que Gwynplaine n’était pas là, Ursus se pencha doucement et appliqua son oreille contre la poitrine de Dea, du côté du coeur. Il sembla écouter quelques instants, et en se redressant il murmura: — Il ne lui faudrait pas une secousse. La fêlure grandirait bien vite.

La foule continuait d’affluer aux représentations de Chaos vaincu. Le succès de l’Homme qui Rit paraissait inépuisable.

Tout accourait; ce n’était plus seulement Southwark, c’était déj un peu

Londres. Le public commençait même à se mélanger; ce n'étaient plus de purs matelots et cochers; dans l'opinion de maître Nicless, connaisseur en canaille, il y avait maintenant dans cette populace des gentilshommes et des baronnets, déguisés en gens du peuple. Le déguisement est un des bonheurs de l'orgueil, et c'était la grande mode d'alors. Cette aristocratie mêlée à la mob était bon signe et indiquait une extension de succès gagnant Londres. La gloire de Gwynplaine avait décidément fait son entrée dans le grand public. Et le fait était réel. Il n'était plus question dans Londres que de l'Homme qui Rit. On en parlait jusque chez le Mohock-Club, hanté des lords.

Dans la Green-Box on ne s'en doutait pas; on se contentait d'être heureux. L'enivrement de Dea, c'était de toucher tous les soirs le front crépu et fauve de Gwynplaine. En amour, rien n'est tel qu'une habitude. Toute la vie s'y concentre. La réapparition de l'astre est une habitude de l'univers. La création n'est pas autre chose qu'une amoureuse, et le soleil est un amant.

La lumière est une cariatide éblouissante qui porte le monde.
Tous les jours, pendant une minute sublime, la terre couverte de nuit s'appuie sur le soleil levant. Dea, aveugle, sentait la même rentrée de chaleur et d'espérance en elle dans le moment o elle posait sa main sur la tête de Gwynplaine.

Être deux ténébreux qui s'adorent, s'aimer dans la plénitude du silence, on s'accommoderait de l'éternité passée ainsi.

Un soir, Gwynplaine, ayant en lui cette surcharge de félicit qui, pareille à l'ivresse des parfums, cause une sorte de divin malaise, rôdait, comme il faisait d'ordinaire après le spectacle terminé, dans le pré, à quelque cent pas de la Green-Box. On a de ces heures de dilatation où l'on dégorge le trop-plein de son coeur. La nuit était noire et transparente; il faisait clair d'étoiles. Tout le champ de foire était désert, et il n'y avait que du sommeil et de l'oubli dans les baraques éparses autour du Tarrinzeau-field.

Une seule lumière n'était pas éteinte; c'était la lanterne de l'inn Tadcaster, entr'ouvert et attendant la rentrée de Gwynplaine.

Minuit venait de sonner aux cinq paroisses de Southwark avec les intermittences et les différences de voix d'un clocher à l'autre.

Gwynplaine songeait à Dea. A quoi eût-il songé? Mais ce soir-là, singulièrement confus, plein d'un charme où il y avait de l'angoisse, il songeait à Dea comme un homme songe à une femme. Il se le reprochait.

C’était une diminution. La sourde attaque de l’époux commençait en lui. Douce et impérieuse impatience. Il franchissait la frontière invisible; en deçà il y a la vierge, au delà il y a la femme. Il se questionnait avec anxiété; il avait ce qu’on pourrait nommer la rougeur intérieure.

Le Gwynplaine des premières années s’était peu à peu transform dans l’inconscience d’une croissance mystérieuse. L’ancien adolescent pudique se sentait devenir trouble et inquiétant.

Nous avons l’oreille de lumière où parle l’esprit, et l’oreille d’obscurité où parle l’instinct. Dans cette oreille amplifiante des voix inconnues lui faisaient des offres. Si pur que soit le jeune homme qui rêve d’amour, un certain épaississement de chair finit toujours par s’interposer entre son rêve et lui. Les intentions perdent leur transparence. L’inavouable voulu par la nature fait son entrée dans la conscience. Gwynplaine éprouvait on ne sait quel appétit de cette matière où sont toutes les tentations, et qui manquait presque à Dea. Dans sa fièvre, qui lui semblait malsaine, il transfigurait Dea, du côté périlleux peut-être, et il tâchait d’exagérer cette forme séraphique jusqu’à la forme féminine. C’est de toi, femme, que nous avons besoin.

Trop de paradis, l’amour en arrive à ne pas vouloir cela. Il lui faut la peau fiévreuse, la vie émue, le baiser électrique et irréparable, les cheveux dénoués, l’étreinte ayant un but. Le sidéral gêne. L’éthéré pèse. L’excès de ciel dans l’amour, c’est l’excès de combustible dans le feu; la flamme en souffre.

Dea saisissable et saisie, la vertigineuse approche qui mêle en deux êtres l’inconnu de la création, Gwynplaine, éperdu, avait ce cauchemar exquis. Une femme! Il entendait en lui ce profond cri de la nature. Comme un Pygmalion du rêve modelant une Galatée de l’azur, il faisait témérairement, au fond de son âme, des retouches à ce contour chaste de Dea; contour trop céleste et pas assez édénique; car l’éden, c’est Ève; et Ève était une femelle, une mère charnelle, une nourrice terrestre, le ventre sacré des générations, la mamelle du lait inépuisable, la berceuse du monde nouveau-né; et le sein exclut les ailes. La virginité n’est que l’espérance de la maternité. Pourtant, dans les mirages de Gwynplaine, Dea jusqu’alors avait été au-dessus de la chair. En ce moment, égaré, il essayait dans sa pensée de l’y faire redescendre, et il tirait ce fil, le sexe, qui tient toute jeune fille liée à la terre. Pas un seul de ces oiseaux n’est lâché.

Dea, pas plus qu’une autre, n’était hors la loi, et Gwynplaine, tout en ne l’avouant qu’à demi, avait une vague volonté qu’elle s’y soumît. Il avait cette volonté malgré lui, et dans une rechute continuelle. Il se figurait Dea humaine. Il en était concevoir une idée inouïe: Dea, créature, non plus seulement d’extase, mais de volupté; Dea la tête sur l’oreiller. Il avait honte de cet empiétement visionnaire; c’était comme un effort de profanation; il résistait à cette obsession; il s’en détournait, puis il y revenait; il lui semblait commettre un attentat à la pudeur. Dea était pour lui un nuage. Frémissant, il écartait ce nuage comme il eût soulevé une chemise. On était en avril.

La colonne vertébrale a ses rêveries.

Il faisait des pas au hasard avec cette oscillation distraite qu’on a dans la solitude. N’avoir personne autour de soi, cela aide à divaguer. Où allait sa pensée? il n’eût osé se le dire lui-même. Dans le ciel? Non. Dans un lit. Vous le regardiez, astres.

Pourquoi dit-on un amoureux? On devrait dire un possédé. Être possédé du diable, c’est l’exception; être possédé de la femme, c’est la règle. Tout homme subit cette aliénation de soi-même.

Quelle sorcière qu’une jolie femme! Le vrai nom de l’amour, c’est captivité.

On est fait prisonnier par l’âme d’une femme. Par sa chair aussi. Quelquefois plus encore par la chair que par l’âme.

L’âme est l’amante; la chair est la maîtresse.

On calomnie le démon. Ce n’est pas lui qui a tenté Eve. C’est Ève qui l’a tenté. La femme a commencé.

Lucifer passait tranquille. Il a aperçu la femme. Il est devenu Satan.

La chair, c’est le dessus de l’inconnu. Elle provoque, chose étrange, par la pudeur. Rien de plus troublant. Elle a honte, cette effrontée.

En cet instant-là, ce qui agitait Gwynplaine et ce qui le tenait, c’était cet effrayant amour de surface. Moment redoutable que celui où l’on veut la nudité. Un glissement dans la faute est possible. Que de ténèbres dans cette blancheur de Vénus!

Quelque chose en Gwynplaine appelait à grands cris Dea, Dea fille, Dea moitié d’un homme, Dea chair et flamme, Dea gorge nue.

Il chassait presque l’ange. Crise mystérieuse que tout amour traverse, et où l’idéal est en danger. Ceci est la préméditation de la création.

Moment de corruption céleste.

L’amour de Gwynplaine pour Dea devenait nuptial. L’amour virginal n’est qu’une transition. Le moment était arrivé. Il fallait à Gwynplaine cette femme.

Il lui fallait une femme.

Pente dont on ne voit que le premier plan.

L’appel indistinct de la nature est inexorable.

Toute la femme, quel gouffre!

Heureusement, pour Gwynplaine, il n’y avait d’autre femme que Dea. La seule dont il voulût. La seule qui pût vouloir de lui.

Gwynplaine avait ce grand frisson vague qui est la réclamation vitale de l’infini.

Ajoutez l’aggravation du printemps. Il aspirait les effluves sans nom de l’obscurité sidérale. Il allait devant lui, délicieusement hagard. Les parfums errants de la sève en travail, les irradiations capiteuses qui flottent dans l’ombre, l’ouverture lointaine des fleurs nocturnes, la complicité des petits nids cachés, les bruissements d’eaux et de feuilles, les soupirs sortant des choses, la fraîcheur, la tiédeur, tout ce mystérieux éveil d’avril et de mai, c’est l’immense sexe épars proposant à voix basse la volupté, provocation vertigineuse qui fait bégayer l’âme. L’idéal ne sait plus ce qu’il dit.

Qui eût vu marcher Gwynplaine eût pensé: Tiens! un ivrogne!

Il chancelait presque en effet sous le poids de son coeur, du printemps et de la nuit.

La solitude dans le bowling-green était si paisible que, par instants, il parlait haut.

Se sentir pas écouté fait qu’on parle.

Il se promenait à pas lents, la tête baissée, les mains derrière le dos, la gauche dans la droite, les doigts ouverts.

Tout à coup il sentit comme le glissement de quelque chose dans l’entre-bâillement inerte de ses doigts.

Il se retourna vivement.

Il avait dans la main un papier et devant lui un homme.

C’était cet homme venu jusqu’à lui par derrière avec la précaution d’un chat, qui lui avait mis ce papier entre les doigts.

Le papier était une lettre.

L’homme, suffisamment éclairé par la pénombre stellaire, était petit, joufflu, jeune, grave, et vêtu d’une livrée couleur feu, visible du haut en bas par la fente verticale d’un long surtout gris qu’on appelait alors capenoche, mot espagnol contracté qui veut dire cape de nuit. Il était coiffé d’une gorra cramoisie, pareille à une calotte de cardinal où la domesticité serait accentuée par un galon. Sur cette calotte on apercevait un bouquet de plumes de tisserin.

Il était immobile devant Gwynplaine. On eût dit une silhouette de rêve.

Gwynplaine reconnut le mousse de la duchesse.

Avant que Gwynplaine eût pu jeter un cri de surprise, il entendit la voix grêle, à la fois enfantine et féminine, du mousse qui lui disait:

— Trouvez-vous demain à pareille heure à l’entrée du pont de Londres. J’y serai. Je vous conduirai.

— Où? demanda Gwynplaine.

— Où vous êtes attendu.

Gwynplaine abaissa ses yeux sur la lettre qu’il tenait machinalement dans sa main.

Quand il les releva, le mousse n’était plus là.

On distinguait dans la profondeur du champ de foire une vague forme obscure qui décroissait rapidement. C’était le petit laquais qui s’en allait. Il tourna un coin de rue, et il n’y eut plus personne.

Gwynplaine regarda le mousse disparaître, puis il regarda la lettre. Il est des moments dans la vie où ce qui vous arrive ne vous arrive pas; la stupeur vous maintient quelque temps à une certaine distance du fait. Gwynplaine approcha la lettre de ses yeux comme quelqu’un qui veut lire; alors, il s’aperçut qu’il ne pouvait la lire pour deux raisons: premièrement, parce qu’il ne l’avait pas décachetée; deuxièmement, parce qu’il faisait nuit.
Il fut plusieurs minutes avant de se rendre compte qu’il y avait une lanterne dans l’inn. Il fit quelques pas, mais de côté, et comme s’il ne savait où aller. Un somnambule à qui un fantôme a remis une lettre marche de la sorte.

Enfin il se décida, courut plutôt qu’il n’avança vers l’inn, se plaça dans le rayon de la porte entr’ouverte, et considéra encore une fois, à cette clarté, la lettre fermée. On ne voyait aucune empreinte sur le cachet, et sur l’enveloppe il y avait: A Gwynplaine. Il brisa le cachet, déchira l’enveloppe, déplia la lettre, la mit en plein sous la lumière, et voici ce qu’il lut:

«Tu es horrible, et je suis belle. Tu es histrion, et je suis duchesse. Je suis la première, et tu es le dernier. Je veux de toi. Je t’aime. Viens.

LIVRE QUATRIÈME

LA CAVE PÉNALE

I

LA TENTATION DE SAINT GWYNPLAINE

Tel jet de flamme fait à peine une piqûre aux ténèbres; tel autre met le feu à un volcan.

Il y a des étincelles énormes.

Gwynplaine lut la lettre, puis la relut. Il y avait bien ce mot: Je t'aime!

Les épouvantes se succédèrent dans son esprit.

La première, ce fut de se croire fou.

Il était fou. C'était certain. Ce qu'il venait de voir n'existait pas. Les simulacres crépusculaires jouaient de lui, misérable. Le petit homme écarlate était une lueur de vision.

Quelquefois, la nuit, rien condensé en une flamme vient rire de vous. Après s'être moqué, l'être illusoire avait disparu, laissant derrière lui Gwynplaine fou. L'ombre fait de ces choses-là.

La seconde épouvante, ce fut de constater qu'il avait toute sa raison.

Une vision? mais non. Eh bien! et cette lettre? Est-ce qu'il n'avait pas une lettre entre les mains? Est-ce que ne voilà pas une enveloppe, un cachet, du papier, une écriture? Est-ce qu'il ne sait pas de qui cela vient? Rien d'obscur dans cette aventure. On a pris une plume et de l'encre, et l'on a écrit.

On a allumé une bougie, et l'on a cacheté avec de la cire.

Est-ce que son nom n'est pas écrit sur la lettre? A Gwynplaine. Le papier sent bon. Tout est clair. Le petit homme, Gwynplaine le connaît. Ce nain est un groom. Cette lueur est une livrée. Ce groom a donné rendez-vous à Gwynplaine pour le lendemain à la même heure, à l'entrée du pont de Londres.

Est-ce que le pont de Londres est une illusion? Non, non, tout cela se tient. Il n'y a là dedans aucun délire. Tout est réalité. Gwynplaine est parfaitement lucide. Ce n'est pas une fantasmagorie tout de suite décomposée au-dessus de sa tête, et dissipée en évanouissement; c'est une chose qui lui arrive. Non, Gwynplaine n'est pas fou. Gwynplaine ne rêve pas. Et il relisait la lettre.

Eh bien, oui. Mais alors?

Alors c’est formidable.

Il y a une femme qui veut de lui.

Une femme veut de lui! En ce cas que personne ne prononce plus jamais ce mot: incroyable. Une femme veut de lui! une femme qui a vu son visage! une femme qui n’est pas aveugle! Et qui est cette femme? Une laide? non. Une belle. Une bohémienne? non.
Une duchesse.

Qu’y avait-il là dedans, et qu’est-ce que cela voulait dire?
Quel péril qu’un tel triomphe! mais comment ne pas s’y jeter tête perdue?

Quoi! cette femme! la sirène, l’apparition, la lady, la spectatrice de la loge visionnaire, la ténébreuse éclatante! Car c’était elle. C’était bien elle.

Le pétillement de l’incendie commençant éclatait en lui de toutes parts. C’était cette étrange inconnue! la même qui l’avait tant troublé! Et ses premières pensées tumultueuses sur cette femme reparaissaient, comme chauffées à tout ce feu sombre. L’oubli n’est autre chose qu’un palimpseste. Qu’un accident survienne, et tous les effacements revivent dans les interlignes de la mémoire étonnée. Gwynplaine croyait avoir retiré cette figure de son esprit, et il l’y retrouvait, et elle y était empreinte, et elle avait fait son creux dans ce cerveau inconscient, coupable d’un songe. A son insu, la profonde gravure de la rêverie avait mordu très avant. Maintenant un certain mal était fait. Et toute cette rêverie, désormais peut-être irréparable, il la reprenait avec emportement.

Quoi! on voulait de lui! Quoi! la princesse descendait de son trône, l’idole de son autel, la statue de son piédestal, le fantôme de sa nuée! Quoi! du fond de l’impossible, la chimère arrivait! Quoi! cette déité du plafond, quoi! cette irradiation, quoi! cette néréide toute mouillée de pierreries, quoi! cette beauté inabordable et suprême, du haut de son escarpement de rayons, elle se penchait vers Gwynplaine! Quoi!
son char d’aurore, attelé à la fois de tourterelles et de dragons, elle l’arrêtait au-dessus de Gwynplaine, et elle disait à Gwynplaine: Viens! Quoi! lui, Gwynplaine, il avait cette gloire terrifiante d’être l’objet d’un tel abaissement de l’empyrée! Cette femme, si l’on peut donner ce nom à une forme sidérale et souveraine, cette femme se proposait, se donnait, se livrait! Vertige! L’olympe se prostituait! à qui? à lui, Gwynplaine! Des bras de courtisane s’ouvraient dans un nimbe pour le serrer contre un sein de déesse! Et cela sans souillure.
Ces majestés-là ne noircissent pas. La lumière lave les dieux.

Et cette déesse qui venait à lui savait ce qu'elle faisait. Elle n'était pas ignorante de l'horreur incarnée en Gwynplaine. Elle avait vu ce masque qui était le visage de Gwynplaine! et ce masque ne la faisait pas reculer. Gwynplaine était aimé quoique!

Chose qui dépassait tous les songes, il était aimé parce que!

Loin de faire reculer la déesse, ce masque l'attirait!

Gwynplaine était plus qu'aimé, il était désiré. Il était mieux qu'accepté, il était choisi. Lui, choisi!

Quoi! là où était cette femme, dans ce royal milieu du resplendissement irresponsable et de la puissance en plein libre arbitre, il y avait des princes, elle pouvait prendre un prince; il y avait des lords, elle pouvait prendre un lord; il y avait des hommes beaux, charmants, superbes, elle pouvait prendre Adonis. Et qui prenait-elle? Gnafron! Elle pouvait choisir au milieu des météores et des foudres l'immense séraphin à six ailes, et elle choisissait la larve rampant dans la vase. D'un côté, les altesses et les seigneuries, toute la grandeur, toute l'opulence, toute la gloire; de l'autre, un saltimbanque. Le saltimbanque l'emportait! Quelle balance y avait-il donc dans le coeur de cette femme? à quel poids pesait-elle son amour? Cette femme ôtait de son front le chapeau ducal et le jetait sur le tréteau du clown! Cette femme ôtait de sa tête l'auréole olympienne et la posait sur le crâne hérissé du gnome! On ne sait quel renversement du monde, le fourmillement d'insectes en haut, les constellations en bas, engloutissait Gwynplaine éperdu sous un écroulement de lumière, et lui faisait un nimbe dans le cloaque. Une toute-puissante, en révolte contre la beauté et la splendeur, se donnait au damné de la nuit, préférait Gwynplaine Antinous, entrait en accès de curiosité devant les ténèbres, et y descendait, et, de cette abdication de la déesse, sortait, couronnée et prodigieuse, la royauté du misérable. «Tu es horrible. Je t'aime.» Ces mots atteignaient Gwynplaine l'endroit hideux de l'orgueil. L'orgueil, c'est là le talon o tous les héros sont vulnérables. Gwynplaine était flatté dans sa vanité de monstre. C'était comme être difforme qu'il était aimé.

Lui aussi, autant et plus peut-être que les Jupiters et les Apollons, il était l'exception. Il se sentait surhumain, et tellement monstre qu'il était dieu. Éblouissement épouvantable.

Maintenant, qu'était-ce que cette femme? que savait-il d'elle?

Tout et rien. C'était une duchesse, il le savait; il savait qu'elle était belle, qu'elle était riche, qu'elle avait des livrées, des laquais, des pages, et des coureurs à flambeaux autour de son carrosse à couronne. Il savait qu'elle était amoureuse de lui, ou du moins qu'elle le lui disait. Le reste, il l'ignorait. Il savait son titre, et ne savait pas son nom.

Il savait sa pensée, et ne savait pas sa vie. Était-elle mariée, veuve, fille? était-elle libre? était-elle sujette à des devoirs quelconques? A quelle famille appartenait-elle? Y avait-il autour d'elle des pièges, des embûches, des écueils? Ce qu'est la galanterie dans les hautes régions oisives, qu'il y ait sur ces sommets des antres où rêvent des charmeuses féroces ayant pêle-mêle autour d'elles des ossements d'amour déjà dévorés, quels essais tragiquement cyniques peut aboutir l'ennui d'une femme qui se croit au-dessus de l'homme, Gwynplaine ne soupçonnait rien de cela; il n'avait pas même dans l'esprit de quoi échafauder une conjecture, on est mal renseigné dans le sous-sol social où il vivait; pourtant il voyait de l'ombre. Il se rendait compte que toute cette clarté était obscure.

Comprenait-il? Non. Devinait-il? Encore moins. Qu'y avait-il derrière cette lettre? Une ouverture à deux battants, et en même temps une fermeture inquiétante. D'un côté l'aveu. De l'autre l'énigme.

L'aveu et l'énigme, ces deux bouches, l'une provocante, l'autre menaçante, prononcent la même parole: Ose!

Jamais la perfidie du hasard n'avait mieux pris ses mesures, et n'avait fait arriver plus à point une tentation. Gwynplaine, remué par le printemps et par la montée de la sève universelle, était en train de faire le rêve de la chair. Le vieil homme insubmersible dont aucun de nous ne triomphe, s'éveillait en cet éphèbe attardé, resté adolescent à vingt-quatre ans. C'est à ce moment-là, c'est à la minute la plus trouble de cette crise, que l'offre lui était faite, et que se dressait devant lui, éblouissante, la gorge nue du sphinx. La jeunesse est un plan incliné. Gwynplaine penchait, on le poussait. Qui? la saison.

Qui? la nuit. Qui? cette femme. S'il n'y avait pas le mois d'avril, on serait bien plus vertueux. Les buissons en fleur, tas de complices! l'amour est le voleur, le printemps est le recéleur.

Gwynplaine était bouleversé.

Il y a une certaine fumée du mal qui précède la faute, et qui n'est pas respirable à la conscience. L'honnêteté tentée a la nausée obscure de l'enfer. Ce qui s'entr'ouvre dégage une exhalaison qui avertit les forts et étourdit les faibles.

Gwynplaine avait ce mystérieux malaise.

Des dilemmes, à la fois fugaces et opiniâtres, flottaient devant lui. La faute, obstinée à s'offrir, prenait forme. Le lendemain, minuit, le pont de Londres, le page! irait-il? Oui!
criait la chair. Non! criait l'âme.

Pourtant, disons-le, si singulier que cela semble au premier abord, cette question: — Irait-il? — il ne se l'adressa pas une seule fois distinctement. Les actions reprochables ont des endroits réservés. Comme les eaux-de-vie trop fortes, on ne les boit pas tout d'un trait. On pose le verre, on verra plus tard, la première goutte est déjà bien étrange.

Ce qui est sûr, c'est qu'il se sentait poussé par derrière vers l'inconnu.

Et il frémissait. Et il entrevoyait un bord d'écroulement. Et il se rejetait en arrière, ressaisi de tous côtés par l'effroi.
Il fermait les yeux. Il faisait effort pour se nier à lui-même cette aventure, et pour se remettre à douter de sa raison.
Évidemment c'était le mieux. Ce qu'il avait de plus sage faire, c'était de se croire fou.

Fièvre fatale. Tout homme surpris par l'imprévu a eu dans sa vie de ces pulsations tragiques. L'observateur écoute toujours avec anxiété le retentissement des sombres coups de bélier du destin contre une conscience.

Hélas! Gwynplaine s'interrogeait. Là où le devoir est net, se poser des questions, c'est déjà la défaite.

Du reste, détail à noter, l'effronterie de l'aventure qui peut-être eût choqué un homme corrompu, ne lui apparaissait point. Ce que c'est que le cynisme, il l'ignorait. L'idée de prostitution, indiquée plus haut, ne l'approchait pas. Il n'était pas de force à la concevoir. Il était trop pur pour admettre les hypothèses compliquées. De cette femme, il ne voyait que la grandeur. Hélas! il était flatté. Sa vanité ne constatait que sa victoire. Qu'il fût l'objet d'une impudeur plutôt que d'un amour, il lui eût fallu, pour conjecturer cela, beaucoup plus d'esprit que n'en a l'innocence. Près de: Je t'aime, il n'apercevait pas ce correctif effrayant: Je veux de toi.

Le côté bestial de la déesse lui échappait.

L'esprit peut subir des invasions. L'âme a ses vandales, les mauvaises pensées, qui viennent dévaster notre vertu. Mille idées en sens inverse se précipitaient sur Gwynplaine l'une après l'autre, quelquefois toutes ensemble. Puis il se faisait en lui des silences. Alors il prenait sa tête entre ses mains, dans une sorte d'attention lugubre, pareille à la contemplation d'un paysage de la nuit.

Tout à coup il s’aperçut d’une chose, c’est qu’il ne pensait plus. Sa rêverie était arrivée à ce moment noir où tout disparaît.

Il remarqua aussi qu’il n’était pas rentré. Il pouvait être deux heures du matin.

Il mit la lettre apportée par le page dans sa poche de côté, mais s’apercevant qu’elle était sur son coeur, il l’ôta de là, et la fourra toute froissée dans le premier gousset venu de son haut-de-chausses, puis il se dirigea vers l’hôtellerie, y pénétra silencieusement, ne réveilla pas le petit Govicum qui l’attendait tombé de sommeil sur une table avec ses deux bras pour oreiller, referma la porte, alluma une chandelle à la lanterne de l’auberge, tira les verrous, donna un tour de clef à la serrure, prit machinalement les précautions d’un homme qui rentre tard, remonta l’escalier de la Green-Box, se glissa dans l’ancienne cahute qui lui servait de chambre, regarda Ursus qui dormait, souffla sa chandelle, et ne se coucha pas.

Une heure passa ainsi. Enfin, las, se figurant que le lit c’est le sommeil, il posa sa tête sur son oreiller, sans se déshabiller, et il fit à l’obscurité la concession de fermer les yeux; mais l’orage d’émotions qui l’assaillait n’avait pas discontinué un instant. L’insomnie est un sévice de la nuit sur l’homme. Gwynplaine souffrait beaucoup. Pour la première fois de sa vie, il n’était pas content de lui. Intime douleur mêlée sa vanité satisfaite. Que faire? Le jour vint. Il entendit Ursus se lever, et n’ouvrit pas les paupières. Aucune trêve cependant. Il songeait à cette lettre. Tous les mots lui revenaient dans une sorte de chaos. Sous de certains souffles violents du dedans de l’âme, la pensée est un liquide. Elle entre en convulsions, elle se soulève, et il en sort quelque chose de semblable au rugissement sourd de la vague. Flux, reflux, secousses, tournoiements, hésitations du flot devant l’écueil, grêles et pluies, nuages avec des trouées où sont des lueurs, arrachements misérables d’une écume inutile, folles ascensions tout de suite écroulées, immenses efforts perdus, apparition du naufrage de toutes parts, ombre et dispersion, tout cela, qui est dans l’abîme, est dans l’homme. Gwynplaine était en proie à cette tourmente.

Au plus fort de cette angoisse, les paupières toujours fermées, il entendit une voix exquise qui disait: — Est-ce que tu dors, Gwynplaine? — Il ouvrit les yeux en sursaut et se leva sur son séant, la porte de la cahute vestiaire était entr’ouverte, Dea apparaissait dans l’entre-bâillement. Elle avait dans les yeux et sur les lèvres son ineffable sourire. Elle se dressait charmante, dans la sérénité inconsciente de son rayonnement. Il y eut une sorte de minute sacrée. Gwynplaine la contempla, tressaillant, ébloui, réveillé; réveillé de quoi? du sommeil?

non, de l’insomnie. C’était elle, c’était Dea; et tout à coup il sentit au plus profond de son être l’indéfinissable évanouissement de la tempête et la sublime descente du bien sur le mal; le prodige du regard d’en haut s’opéra, la douce aveugle lumineuse, sans autre effort que sa présence, dissipa toute l’ombre en lui, le rideau de nuage s’écarta de cet esprit comme tiré par une main invisible, et Gwynplaine, enchantement céleste, eut dans la conscience une rentrée d’azur. Il redevint subitement, par la vertu de cet ange, le grand et bon Gwynplaine innocent. L’âme, comme la création, a de ces confrontations mystérieuses; tous deux se taisaient, elle la clarté, lui le gouffre, elle divine, lui apaisé; et audessus du coeur orageux de Gwynplaine, Dea resplendissait avec on ne sait quel inexprimable effet d’étoile de la mer.

II

DU PLAISANT AU SÉVÈRE

Comme c'est simple un miracle! C'était dans la Green-Box l'heure du déjeuner, et Dea venait tout bonnement savoir pourquoi Gwynplaine n'arrivait pas à leur petite table du matin.

— Toi! cria Gwynplaine, et tout fut dit. Il n'eut plus d'autre horizon et d'autre vision que ce ciel où était Dea.

Qui n'a pas vu, après l'ouragan, le sourire immédiat de la mer, ne peut se rendre compte de ces apaisements-là. Rien ne se calme plus vite que les gouffres. Cela tient à leur facilit d'engloutissement. Ainsi est le coeur humain. Pas toujours, pourtant.

Dea n'avait qu'à se montrer, toute la lumière qui était en Gwynplaine sortait et allait à elle, et il n'y avait plus derrière Gwynplaine ébloui qu'une fuite de fantômes. Quelle pacificatrice que l'adoration!

Quelques instants après, tous deux étaient assis l'un devant l'autre, Ursus entre eux, Homo à leurs pieds. La théière, sous laquelle flambait une petite lampe, était sur la table. Fibi et Vinos étaient dehors et vaquaient au service.

Le déjeuner, comme le souper, se faisait dans le compartiment du centre. De la façon dont la table très étroite était placée, Dea tournait le dos à la baie de la cloison qui répondait à la porte d'entrée de la Green-Box.

Leurs genoux se touchaient. Gwynplaine versait le thé à Dea.

Dea soufflait gracieusement sur sa tasse. Tout à coup, elle éternua. Il y avait en ce moment-là, audessus de la flamme de la lampe, une fumée qui se dissipait, et quelque chose comme du papier qui tombait en cendre. Cette fumée avait fait éternuer Dea.

— Qu'est cela? demanda-t-elle.

— Rien, répondit Gwynplaine.

Et il se mit à sourire.

Il venait de brûler la lettre de la duchesse.

L'ange gardien de la femme aimée, c'est la conscience de l'homme qui aime.

Cette lettre de moins sur lui le soulagea étrangement, et Gwynplaine sentit son honnêteté comme l'aigle sent ses ailes.

Il lui sembla qu'avec cette fumée la tentation s'en allait, et qu'en même temps que ce papier, la duchesse tombait en cendre.

Tout en mêlant leurs tasses, buvant l'un après l'autre dans la même, ils parlaient. Babil d'amoureux, caquetage de moineaux.

Enfantillages dignes de la Mère l'Oie et d'Homère. Deux coeurs qui s'aiment, n'allez pas chercher plus loin la poésie; et deux baisers qui dialoguent, n'allez pas chercher plus loin la musique.

— Sais-tu une chose?

— Non.

— Gwynplaine, j'ai rêvé que nous étions des bêtes, et que nous avions des ailes.

— Ailes, cela veut dire oiseaux, murmura Gwynplaine.

— Bêtes, cela veut dire anges, grommela Ursus.

La causerie continuait.

— Si tu n'existais pas, Gwynplaine...

— Eh bien?

— C'est qu'il n'y aurait pas de bon Dieu.

— Le thé est trop chaud. Tu vas te brûler, Dea.

— Souffle sur ma tasse.

— Que tu es belle ce matin!

— Dis.

— Je t'aime!

— Je t'adore!

Et Ursus faisait cet aparté:

— Par le ciel, voilà d'honnêtes gens.

Quand on s'aime, ce qui est exquis, ce sont les silences. Il se fait comme des amas d'amour, qui éclatent ensuite doucement.

Il y eut une pause après laquelle Dea s'écria:

— Si tu savais! le soir, quand nous jouons la pièce, à l'instant où ma main touche ton front... — Oh! tu as une noble tête, Gwynplaine! — ... à l'instant où je sens tes cheveux sous mes doigts, c'est un frisson, j'ai une joie du ciel, je me dis: Dans tout ce monde de noirceur qui m'enveloppe, dans cet univers de solitude, dans cet immense écroulement obscur où je suis, dans cet effrayant tremblement de moi et de tout, j'ai un point d'appui, le voilà. C'est lui. — C'est toi.

— Oh! tu m'aimes, dit Gwynplaine. Moi aussi je n'ai que toi sur la terre. Tu es tout pour moi. Dea, que veux-tu que je fasse? Désires-tu quelque chose? que te faut-il?

Dea répondit:

— Je ne sais pas. Je suis heureuse.

— Oh! reprit Gwynplaine, nous sommes heureux!

Ursus éleva la voix sévèrement:

— Ah! vous êtes heureux. C'est une contravention. Je vous ai déjà avertis. Ah! vous êtes heureux! Alors, tâchez qu'on ne vous voie pas. Tenez le moins de place possible. Ça doit se fourrer dans des trous, le bonheur. Faites-vous encore plus petits que vous n'êtes, si vous pouvez. Dieu mesure la grandeur du bonheur à la petitesse des heureux. Les gens contents doivent se cacher comme des malfaiteurs. Ah! vous rayonnez, méchants vers luisants que vous êtes, morbleu, on vous marchera dessus, et l'on fera bien. Qu'est-ce que c'est que toutes ces mamours-là? Je ne suis pas une duègne, moi, dont l'état est de regarder les amoureux se becqueter. Vous me fatiguez, à la fin! Allez au diable!

Et sentant que son accent revêche mollissait jusqu' l'attendrissement, il noya cette émotion dans un fort souffle de bougonnement.

— Père, dit Dea, comme vous faites votre grosse voix!

— C'est que je n'aime pas qu'on soit trop heureux, répondit Ursus.

Ici Homo fit écho à Ursus. On entendit un grondement sous les pieds des amoureux.

Ursus se pencha et mit la main sur le crâne d'Homo.

— C'est cela, toi aussi, tu es de mauvaise humeur. Tu grognes. Tu hérisses ta mèche sur ta caboche de loup. Tu n'aimes pas les amourettes. C'est que tu es sage. C'est égal, tais-toi. Tu as parlé, tu as dit ton avis, soit; maintenant silence.

Le loup gronda de nouveau.

Ursus le regarda sous la table.

— Paix donc, Homo! Allons, n'insiste pas, philosophe!

Mais le loup se dressa et montra les dents du côté de la porte.

— Qu'est-ce que tu as donc? dit Ursus.

Et il empoigna Homo par la peau du cou.

Dea, inattentive aux grincements du loup, toute à sa pensée, et savourant en elle-même le son de voix de Gwynplaine, se taisait, dans cette sorte d'extase propre aux aveugles, qui semble parfois leur donner intérieurement un chant à écouter et leur remplacer par on ne sait quelle musique idéale la lumière qui leur manque.

La cécité est un souterrain d'où l'on entend la profonde harmonie éternelle.

Pendant qu'Ursus, apostrophant Homo, baissait le front, Gwynplaine avait levé les yeux.

Il allait boire une tasse de thé, et ne la but pas; il la posa sur la table avec la lenteur d'un ressort qui se détend, ses doigts restèrent ouverts, et il demeura immobile, l'oeil fixe, ne respirant plus.

Un homme était debout derrière Dea, dans l'encadrement de la porte.

Cet homme était vêtu de noir avec une cape de justice. Il avait une perruque jusqu'aux sourcils, et il tenait à la main un bâton de fer sculpté en couronne aux deux bouts.

Ce bâton était court et massif.

Qu'on se figure Méduse passant sa tête entre deux branches du paradis.

Ursus, qui avait senti la commotion d'un nouveau venu et qui avait dressé la tête sans lâcher Homo, reconnut ce personnage redoutable.

Il eut un tremblement de la tête aux pieds.

Il dit bas à l'oreille de Gwynplaine:

— C'est le wapentake.

Gwynplaine se souvint.

Une parole de surprise allait lui échapper. Il la retint.

Le bâton de fer terminé en couronne aux deux extrémités était l'iron-weapon.

C'était de l'iron-weapon, sur lequel les officiers de justice urbaine prêtaient serment en entrant en charge, que les anciens wapentakes de la police anglaise tiraient leur qualification.

Au delà de l'homme à la perruque, dans la pénombre, on entrevoyait l'hôtelier consterné.

L'homme, sans dire une parole, et personnifiant cette muta Themis des vieilles chartes, abaissa son bras droit par-dessus Dea rayonnante, et toucha du bâton de fer l'épaule de Gwynplaine, pendant que, du pouce de sa main gauche, il montrait derrière lui la porte de la Green-Box. Ce double geste, d'autant plus impérieux qu'il était silencieux, voulait dire: Suivez-moi.

Pro signo exeundi, sursum trahe, dit le cartulaire normand.

L'individu sur lequel venait se poser l'iron-weapon n'avait d'autre droit que le droit d'obéir. Nulle réplique à cet ordre muet. Les rudes pénalités anglaises menaçaient le réfractaire.

Sous ce rigide attouchement de la loi, Gwynplaine eut une secousse, puis fut comme pétrifié.

Au lieu d'être simplement effleuré du bâton de fer sur l'épaule, il en eût été violemment frappé sur la tête, qu'il n'eût pas ét plus étourdi. Il se voyait sommé de suivre l'officier de police.

Mais pourquoi? Il ne comprenait pas.

Ursus, jeté lui aussi de son côté dans un trouble poignant, entrevoyait quelque chose d'assez distinct. Il songeait aux bateleurs et aux prédicateurs, ses concurrents, à la Green-Box dénoncée, au loup, ce délinquant, à son propre démêlé avec les trois inquisitions de Bishops'gate; et qui sait? peut-être, mais ceci était effrayant, aux bavardages malséants et factieux de Gwynplaine touchant l'autorité royale. Il tremblait profondément.

Dea souriait.

Ni Gwynplaine, ni Ursus ne prononcèrent une parole. Tous deux eurent la même pensée: ne pas inquiéter Dea. Le loup l'eut peut-être aussi, car il cessa de gronder. Il est vrai qu'Ursus ne le lâchait point.

D'ailleurs Homo, dans l'occasion, avait ses prudences. Qui n'a remarqué certaines anxiétés intelligentes des animaux?

Peut-être, dans la mesure de ce qu'un loup peut comprendre des hommes, se sentait-il proscrit.

Gwynplaine se leva.

Aucune résistance n'était possible, Gwynplaine le savait, il se rappelait les paroles d'Ursus, et aucune question n'était faisable.

Il demeura debout devant le wapentake.

Le wapentake lui retira le weapon de dessus l'épaule, et ramena lui le bâton de fer qu'il tint droit dans la posture du commandement, attitude de police comprise alors de tout le peuple, et qui intimait l'ordre que voici:

— Que cet homme me suive, et personne autre. Restez tous où vous êtes. Silence.

Pas de curieux. La police a, de tout temps, eu le goût de ces clôtures-là.

Ce genre de saisie était qualifié «séquestre de la personne».

Le wapentake, d'un seul mouvement, et comme une pièce mécanique qui pivote sur elle-même, tourna le dos et se dirigea d'un pas magistral et grave vers l'issue de la Green-Box.

Gwynplaine regarda Ursus.

Ursus eut cette pantomime composée d'un haussement d'épaules, des deux coudes aux hanches avec les mains écartées, et des sourcils froncés en chevrons, laquelle signifie: soumission à l’inconnu.

Gwynplaine regarda Dea. Elle songeait. Elle continuait de sourire.

Il posa l’extrémité de ses doigts sur ses lèvres, et lui envoya un inexprimable baiser.

Ursus, soulagé d’une certaine quantité de terreur par le dos tourné du wapentake, saisit ce moment pour glisser dans l’oreille de Gwynplaine ce murmure:

— Sur ta vie, ne parle pas avant qu’on t’interroge!

Gwynplaine, avec ce soin de ne pas faire de bruit qu’on a dans la chambre d’un malade, décrocha de la cloison son chapeau et son manteau, s’enveloppa du manteau jusqu’aux yeux, et se rabattit le chapeau sur le front; ne s’étant pas couché, il avait encore ses vêtements de travail et au cou son esclavine de cuir; il regarda encore une fois Dea; le wapentake, arrivé à la porte extérieure de la Green-Box, éleva son bâton et commença à descendre le petit escalier de sortie; alors Gwynplaine se mit en marche comme si cet homme le tirait avec une chaîne invisible; Ursus regarda Gwynplaine sortir de la Green-Box; le loup, à ce moment-là, ébaucha un grondement plaintif, mais Ursus le tint en respect, et lui dit tout bas: Il va revenir.

Dans la cour, maître Nicless, d’un geste servile et impérieux, refoulait les cris d’effarement dans les bouches de Vinos et de Fibi qui considéraient avec détresse Gwynplaine emmené, et les vêtements couleur deuil et le bâton de fer du wapentake.

Deux pétrifications, c’étaient ces deux filles. Elles avaient des attitudes de stalactites.

Govicum, abasourdi, écarquillait sa face dans une fenêtre entre baillée.

Le wapentake précédait Gwynplaine de quelques pas sans se retourner et sans le regarder, avec cette tranquillité glaciale que donne la certitude d’être la loi.

Tous deux, dans un silence de sépulcre, franchirent la cour, traversèrent la salle obscure du cabaret et débouchèrent sur la place. Il y avait là quelques passants groupés devant la porte de l’auberge, et le justicier-quorum à la tête d’une escouade de police. Ces curieux, stupéfaits, et sans souffler mot, s’écartèrent et se rangèrent avec la discipline anglaise devant le bâton du constable; le wapentake prit la direction des petites rues, dites alors Little Strand, qui longeaient la Tamise; et Gwynplaine, ayant à sa droite et à sa gauche les gens du justicier-quorum alignés en double haie, pâle, sans un geste, sans autre mouvement que les pas qu’il faisait, couvert de son manteau ainsi que d’un suaire, s’éloigna lentement de l’inn, marchant muet derrière l’homme taciturne, comme une statue qui suit un spectre.

LEX, REX, FEX

L’arrestation sans explication, qui étonnerait fort un anglais d’aujourd’hui, était un procédé de police fort usité alors dans la Grande-Bretagne. On y eut recours, particulièrement pour les choses délicates auxquelles pourvoyaient en France les lettres de cachet, et en dépit de l’habeas corpus, jusque sous Georges II, et une des accusations dont Walpole eut à se défendre, ce fut d’avoir fait ou laissé arrêter Neuhoff de cette façon.

L’accusation était probablement peu fondée, car Neuhoff, roi de Corse, fut incarcéré par ses créanciers.

Les prises de corps silencieuses, dont la Sainte-Voehme en Allemagne avait fort usé, étaient admises par la coutume germanique qui régit une moitié des vieilles lois anglaises, et recommandées, en certain cas, par la coutume normande qui régit l’autre moitié. Le maître de police du palais de Justinien s’appelait «le silentiaire impérial», silentiarius imperialis.

Les magistrats anglais qui pratiquaient cette sorte de prise de corps, s’appuyaient sur de nombreux textes normands: — Canes latrant, sergentes silent. — Sergenter agere, ici est tacere. — Ils citaient Lundulphus Sagax, paragraphe 16: — Facit imperator silentium. — Ils citaient la charte du roi Philippe, de 1307: — Multos tenebimus bastonerios qui, obmutescentes, sergentare valeant. — Ils citaient les statuts de Henri Ier d’Angleterre, chapitre LIII: — Surge signa jussus. Taciturnior esto. Hoc est esse in captione regis. — Ils se prévalaient spécialement de cette prescription considérée comme faisant partie des antiques franchises féodales de l’Angleterre: — «Sous les viscomtes sont les serjans de l’espée, lesquels doivent justicier vertueusement à l’espée tous ceux qui suient malveses compagnies, gens diffamez d’aucuns crimes, et gens fuitis et forbannis..... et les doivent si vigoureusement et si discrètement appréhender, que la bonne gent qui sont paisibles soient gardez paisiblement, et que les malfeteurs soient espoantés.» Être arrêté de la sorte, c’était être saisi «ô le glaive de l’espée» (Vetus Consuetudo Normanniae, MS. I. part.

Sect. I, cap. II). Les jurisconsultes invoquaient en outre, in Charta Ludovici Hutini pro normannis, le chapitre servientes spathae. Les servientes spathae, dans l’approche graduelle de la basse latinité jusqu’à nos idiomes, sont devenus sergentes spadae

Les arrestations silencieuses étaient le contraire de la clameur de haro, et indiquaient qu’il convenait de se taire jusqu’à ce que de certaines obscurités fussent éclaircies.

Elles signifiaient: Questions réservées.

Elles indiquaient, dans l’opération de police, une certaine quantité de raison d’état.

Le terme de droit private, qui veut dire à huis clos, s’appliquait à ce genre d’arrestations.

C’est de cette manière qu’Edouard III avait, selon quelques annalistes, fait saisir Mortimer dans le lit de sa mère Isabelle de France. Ici encore on peut douter, car Mortimer soutint un siège dans sa ville avant d’être pris.

Warwick, le Faiseur de rois, pratiquait volontiers ce mode «d’attraire les gens».

Cromwell l’employait, surtout dans le Connaugh; et ce fut avec cette précaution du silence que Trailie-Arcklo, parent du comte d’Ormond, fut arrêté dans Kilmacaugh.

Ces prises de corps par le simple geste de justice représentaient plutôt le mandat de comparution que le mandat d’arrêt.

Elles n’étaient parfois qu’un procédé d’information, et impliquaient même, par le silence imposé à tous, un certain ménagement pour la personne saisie.

Pour le peuple, peu au fait de ces nuances, elles étaient particulièrement terrifiantes.

L’Angleterre, qu’on ne l’oublie pas, n’était pas en 1705, ni même beaucoup plus tard, ce qu’elle est de nos jours. L’ensemble était très confus et parfois très oppressif; Daniel de Foë, qui avait tâté du pilori, caractérise quelque part l’ordre social anglais par ces mots: «les mains de fer de la loi». Il n’y avait pas seulement la loi, il y avait l’arbitraire. Qu’on se rappelle Steele chassé du parlement, Locke chassé de sa chaire; Hobbes et Gibbon, forcés de fuir; Charles Curchill, Hume, Priestley persécutés; John Wilkes mis à la Tour. Qu’on énumère, le compte sera long, les victimes du statut seditious libel.

L’inquisition avait un peu fusé par toute l’Europe; ses pratiques de police faisaient école. Un attentat monstrueux à tous les droits était possible en

Angleterre; qu’on se souvienne du Gazetier cuirassé. En plein dix-huitième siècle, Louis XV faisait enlever dans Piccadilly les écrivains qui lui déplaisaient. Il est vrai que Georges III empoignait en France le prétendant au beau milieu de la salle de l’Opéra. C’étaient deux bras très longs; celui du roi de France allait jusque dans Londres, et celui du roi d’Angleterre jusque dans Paris. Telles étaient les libertés.

Ajoutons qu’on exécutait volontiers les gens dans l’intérieur des prisons; escamotage mêlé au supplice; expédient hideux, auquel l’Angleterre revient en ce moment; donnant ainsi au monde le singulier spectacle d’un grand peuple qui, voulant améliorer, choisit le pire, et qui, ayant devant lui, d’un côté le passé, de l’autre le progrès, se trompe de visage, et prend la nuit pour le jour.

URSUS ESPIONNE LA POLICE

Ainsi que nous l’avons dit, selon les très rigides lois de la police d’alors, la sommation de suivre le wapentake, adressée un individu, impliquait pour toute autre personne présente le commandement de ne point bouger.

Quelques curieux pourtant s’obstinèrent, et accompagnèrent de loin le cortège qui emmenait Gwynplaine.

Ursus fut du nombre.

Ursus avait été pétrifié autant qu’on a le droit de l’être. Mais Ursus, tant de fois assailli par les surprises de la vie errante et par les méchancetés de l’inattendu, avait, comme un navire de guerre, son branle-bas de combat qui appelle au poste de bataille tout l’équipage, c’est-à-dire toute l’intelligence.

Il se dépêcha de n’être plus pétrifié, et se mit à réfléchir. Il ne s’agit pas d’être ému, il s’agit de faire face.

Faire face à l’incident, c’est le devoir de quiconque n’est pas imbécile.

Ne pas chercher à comprendre, mais agir. Tout de suite. Ursus s’interrogea.

Qu’y avait-il à faire?

Gwynplaine parti, Ursus se trouvait placé entre deux craintes: la crainte pour Gwynplaine, qui lui disait de suivre; la crainte pour lui-même, qui lui disait de rester.

Ursus avait l’intrépidité d’une mouche et l’impassibilité d’une sensitive. Son tremblement fut indescriptible. Pourtant il prit héroiquement son parti, et se décida à braver la loi et à suivre le wapentake, tant il était inquiet de ce qui pouvait arriver a Gwynplaine.

Il fallait qu’il eût bien peur pour avoir tant de courage.

A quels actes de vaillance l’épouvante peut pousser un lièvre!

Le chamois éperdu saute les précipices. Être effrayé jusqu’ l’imprudence, c’est une des formes de l’effroi.

Gwynplaine avait été enlevé plutôt qu’arrêté. L’opération de police s’était exécutée si rapidement que le champ de foire, d’ailleurs peu fréquenté à cette heure matinale, avait ét peine ému. Presque personne ne se doutait dans les baraques du Tarrinzeau-field que le wapentake était venu chercher l’Homme qui Rit. De là le peu de foule.

Gwynplaine, grâce à son manteau et à son feutre, qui se rejoignaient presque sur son visage, ne pouvait être reconnu des passants.

Avant de sortir à la suite de Gwynplaine, Ursus eut une précaution. Il prit à part maître Nicless, le boy Govicum, Fibi et Vinos, et leur prescrivit le plus absolu silence vis-à-vis de Dea, ignorante de tout; qu’on eût soin de ne pas souffler un mot qui pût lui faire soupçonner ce qui s’était passé; qu’on lui expliquât par les soins de ménage de la Green-Box l’absence de Gwynplaine et d’Ursus; que d’ailleurs c’était bientôt l’heure de son sommeil au milieu du jour, et qu’avant que Dea fût éveillée, il serait de retour, lui Ursus, avec Gwynplaine, tout cela n’étant qu’un malentendu, un mistake, comme on dit en Angleterre; qu’il leur serait bien facile à Gwynplaine et à lui d’éclairer les magistrats et la police; qu’ils feraient toucher du doigt la méprise, et que tout à l’heure ils allaient revenir tous deux.

Surtout que personne ne dît rien à Dea. Ces recommandations faites, il partit.

Ursus put, sans être remarqué, suivre Gwynplaine. Quoiqu’il se tînt à la plus grande distance possible, il s’arrangea de façon ne pas le perdre de vue. La hardiesse dans le guet, c’est la bravoure des timides.

Après tout, et si solennel que fût l’appareil, Gwynplaine n’était peut-être que cité à comparaître devant le magistrat de simple police pour quelque infraction sans gravité.

Ursus se disait que cette question allait être tout de suite résolue.

L’éclaircissement se ferait, sous ses yeux mêmes, par la direction que prendrait l’escouade emmenant Gwynplaine au moment où, parvenue aux limites du Tarrinzeau-field, elle atteindrait l’entrée des ruelles du Little Strand.

Si elle tournait à gauche, c’était qu’elle conduisait Gwynplaine à la maison de ville de Southwark. Peu de chose à craindre alors; quelque méchant délit municipal, une admonition du magistrat, deux ou trois shellings d’amende, puis Gwynplaine serait lâché, et la représentation de Chaos vaincu aurait lieu le soir même comme à l’ordinaire. Personne ne se serait aperçu de rien.

Si l’escouade tournait à droite, c’était sérieux.

Il y avait de ce côté là des lieux sévères.

A l’instant où le wapentake, menant les deux files d’argousins entre lesquelles marchait Gwynplaine, arriva aux petites rues, Ursus, haletant, regarda. Il existe des moments où tout l’homme passe dans les yeux.

De quel côté allait-on tourner?

On tourna à droite.

Ursus, chancelant d’effroi, s’appuya contre un mur pour ne point tomber.

Rien d’hypocrite comme ce mot qu’on se dit à soi-même: Je veux savoir à quoi m’en tenir. Au fond, on ne le veut pas du tout.

On a une peur profonde. L’angoisse se complique d’un effort obscur pour ne point conclure. On ne se l’avoue pas, mais on reculerait volontiers, et quand on a avancé, on se le reproche.

C’est ce que fit Ursus. Il pensa avec frisson: — Voilà qui tourne mal. J’aurais toujours su cela assez tôt. Qu’est-ce que je fais là à suivre Gwynplaine?

Cette réflexion faite, comme l’homme n’est que contradiction, il doubla le pas, et maîtrisant son anxiété, il se hâta, afin de se rapprocher de l’escouade et de ne pas laisser se rompre dans le dédale des rues de Southwark le fil entre Gwynplaine et lui Ursus.

Le cortège de police ne pouvait aller vite, à cause de sa solennité.

Le wapentake l’ouvrait.

Le justicier-quorum le fermait.

Cet ordre impliquait une certaine lenteur.

Toute la majesté possible au recors éclatait dans le justicier-quorum. Son costume tenait le milieu entre le splendide accoutrement du docteur en musique d’Oxford et l’ajustement sobre et noir du docteur en divinité de Cambridge.

Il avait des habits de gentilhomme sous un long godebert qui est une mante fourrée de dos de lièvre de Norvège. Il était mi-parti gothique et moderne, ayant une perruque comme Lamoignon et des manches mahoîtres comme Tristan l’Hermite. Son gros oeil rond couvait Gwynplaine avec une fixité de hibou. Il marchait en cadence. Impossible de voir un bonhomme plus farouche.

Ursus, un moment dérouté dans l’écheveau brouillé des ruelles, parvint à rejoindre près de Sainte-Marie Over-Ry le cortège qui, heureusement, avait été retardé dans le préau de l’église par une batterie d’enfants et de chiens, incident habituel des rues de Londres, dogs and boys, disent les vieux registres de police, lesquels font passer les chiens avant les enfants.

Un homme conduit au magistrat par les gens de police étant, après tout, un événement fort vulgaire, et chacun ayant ses affaires, les curieux s'étaient dispersés. Il n'était resté, sur la piste de Gwynplaine, qu'Ursus.

On passa devant les deux chapelles, qui se faisaient face, des Recreative Religionists et de la Ligue Halleluiah, deux sectes d'alors qui subsistent encore aujourd'hui.

Puis le cortège serpenta de ruelle en ruelle, choisissant de préférence les roads non encore bâtis, les rows où poussait l'herbe et les lànes déserts, et fit force zigzags.

Enfin il s'arrêta.

On était dans une ruette exiguë. Pas de maisons, si ce n'est l'entrée deux ou trois masures. Cette ruette était composée de deux murs, l'un à gauche, bas; l'autre à droite, haut. La muraille haute était noire et maçonnée à la saxonne, avec des créneaux, des scorpions et des carrés de grosses grilles sur des soupiraux étroits. Aucune fenêtre; ça et là seulement des fentes, qui étaient d'anciennes embrasures de pierriers et d'archegayes. On voyait, au pied de ce grand mur, comme le trou au bas de la ratière, un tout petit guichet, très surbaissé.

Ce guichet, emboîté dans un lourd plein cintre de pierre, avait un judas grillé, un marteau massif, une large serrure, des gonds noueux et robustes, un enchevêtrement de clous, une cuirasse de plaques et de peintures, et était fait de fer plus que de bois.

Personne dans la ruette. Pas de boutiques, pas de passants.

Mais on entendait tout près un bruit continu comme si la ruette eût été parallèle à un torrent. C'était un vacarme de voix et de voitures. Il était probable qu'il y avait de l'autre côté de l'édifice noir une grande rue, sans doute la rue principale de Southwark, laquelle se reliait d'un bout à la route de Cantorbéry et de l'autre bout au pont de Londres.

Dans toute la longueur de la ruette un guetteur, en dehors du cortége enveloppant Gwynplaine, n'eût vu d'autre face humaine que le blême profil d'Ursus, risqué et à demi avancé dans la pénombre d'un coin de mur, regardant et ayant peur de voir. Il s'était posté dans le repli que faisait un zigzag de la rue.

L'escouade se groupa devant le guichet.

Gwynplaine était au centre, mais avait maintenant derrière lui le wapentake et son bâton de fer.

Le justicier-quorum leva le marteau et frappa trois coups.

Le judas s’ouvrit.

Le justicier-quorum dit:

— De par sa majesté.

La pesante porte de chêne et de fer tourna sur ses gonds, et une ouverture livide et froide s’offrit, pareille à une bouche d’antre. Une voûte hideuse se prolongeait dans l’ombre.

Ursus vit Gwynplaine disparaître là-dessous.

V

MAUVAIS LIEU

Le wapentake entra après Gwynplaine.

Puis le justicier-quorum.

Puis toute l’escouade.

Le guichet se referma.

La pesante porte revint s’appliquer hermétiquement sur ses chambranles de pierre sans qu’on vît qui l’avait ouverte ni qui la refermait. Il semblait que les verrous rentrassent d’eux-mêmes dans leurs alvéoles. Quelques-uns de ces mécanismes inventés par l’antique intimidation existent encore dans les très vieilles maisons de force. Porte dont on ne voyait pas le portier. Cela faisait ressembler le seuil de la prison au seuil de la tombe.

Ce guichet était la porte basse de la geôle de Southwark.

Rien dans cet édifice vermoulu et revêche ne démentait la mine discourtoise propre à une prison.

Un temple paien, construit par les vieux cattieuchlans pour les Mogons qui sont d’anciens dieux anglais, devenu palais pour Ethelulfe et forteresse pour saint Edouard, puis élevé à la dignité de prison en 1199 par Jean sans Terre, c’était là la geôle de Southwark. Cette geôle, d’abord traversée par une rue, comme Chenonceaux l’est par une rivière, avait été pendant un siècle ou deux une gate, c’est-à-dire une porte de faubourg; puis on avait muré le passage. Il reste en Angleterre quelques prisons de ce genre; ainsi, à Londres, Newgate; à Cantorbéry, Westgate; à Edimbourg, Canongate. En France la Bastille a d’abord été une porte.

Presque toutes les geôles d’Angleterre offraient le même aspect, grand mur au dehors, au dedans une ruche de cachots. Rien de funèbre comme ces gothiques prisons où l’araignée et la justice tendaient leurs toiles, et où John Howard, ce rayon, n’avait pas encore pénétré. Toutes, comme l’antique géhenne de Bruxelles, eussent pu être appelées Treurenberg, maison des pleurs.

On éprouvait, en présence de ces constructions inclémentes et sauvages, la même angoisse que ressentaient les navigateurs antiques devant les enfers d’esclaves dont parle Plaute, îles ferricrépitantes, ferricrepiditae insulae, lorsqu’ils passaient assez près pour entendre le bruit des chaînes.

La geôle de Southwark, ancien lieu d’exorcismes et de tourments, avait d abord eu pour spécialité les sorciers, ainsi que l’indiquaient ces deux vers gravés sur une pierre fruste au-dessus du guichet:

Sunt arreptitii vexati doemone multo.
Est energumenus quem doemon possidet unus.

Dans le démoniaque un enfer se démène. Avec un simple diable, on n’est qu’énergumène.

Vers qui fixent la nuance délicate entre le démoniaque et l’énergumène.

Au-dessus de cette inscription était clouée à plat contre le mur, signe de haute justice, une échelle de pierre, laquelle avait ét de bois jadis, mais changée en pierre par l’enfouissement dans la terre pétrifiante du lieu nommé Aspley-Gowis, près l’abbaye de Woburn.

La prison de Southwark, aujourd’hui démolie, donnait sur deux rues, auxquelles, comme gate, elle avait autrefois servi de communication, et avait deux portes; sur la grande rue, la porte d’apparat, destinée aux autorités, et, sur la ruette, la porte de souffrance, destinée au reste des vivants. Et aux trépassés aussi; car lorsqu’il mourait un prisonnier dans la geôle, c’était par là que le cadavre sortait. Une libération comme une autre.

La mort, c’est l’élargissement dans l’infini.

C’est par l’entrée de souffrance que Gwynplaine venait d’être introduit dans la prison.

La ruette, nous l’avons dit, n’était autre chose qu’un petit chemin caillouté, serré entre deux murs se faisant face. Il y a en ce genre à Bruxelles le passage dit: Rue d’une personne.

Les deux murs étaient inégaux; le haut mur était la prison, le mur bas était le cimetière. Ce mur bas, clôture du pourrissoir mortuaire de la geôle, ne dépassait guère la stature d’un homme.

Il était percé d’une porte, vis-à-vis le guichet de la geôle.

Les morts n’avaient que la peine de traverser la rue. Il suffisait de longer le mur une vingtaine de pas pour entrer au cimetière. Sur la muraille haute était appliquée une échelle patibulaire, en face sur la muraille basse était sculptée une tête de mort. L’un de ces murs n’égayait pas l’autre.

VI

QUELLES MAGISTRATURES IL Y AVAIT SOUS LES PERRUQUES D’AUTREFOIS

Quelqu’un qui, en ce moment-là, eût regardé de l’autre côté de la prison, du côté de la façade, eût aperçu la grande rue de Southwark, et eût pu remarquer, en station devant la porte monumentale et officielle de la geôle, une voiture de voyage, reconnaissable à sa «loge de carrosse» qu’on appellerait aujourd’hui cabriolet. Un cercle de curieux entourait cette voiture. Elle était armoriée, et l’on en avait vu descendre un personnage qui était entré dans la prison; probablement un magistrat, conjecturait la foule; les magistrats en Angleterre étant souvent nobles et ayant presque toujours «droit d’écuage».

En France, blason et robe s’excluaient presque; le duc de Saint-Simon dit en parlant des magistrats: «Les gens de cet état.» En Angleterre un gentilhomme n’était point déshonoré parce qu’il était juge.

Le magistrat ambulant existe en Angleterre; il s’appelle juge de circuit, et rien n’était plus simple que de voir dans ce carrosse le véhicule d’un magistrat en tournée. Ce qui était moins simple, c’est que le personnage supposé magistrat était descendu, non de la voiture même, mais de la loge de devant, place qui n’est pas habituellement celle du maître. Autre particularité: on voyageait à cette époque, en Angleterre, de deux façons, par «le carrosse de diligence» à raison d’un shelling tous les cinq milles, et en poste à franc étrier moyennant trois sous par mille et quatre sous au postillon après chaque poste; une voiture de maître, qui se passait la fantaisie de voyager par relais, payait par cheval et par mille autant de shellings que le cavalier courant la poste payait de sous; or la voiture arrêtée devant la geôle de Southwark était attelée de quatre chevaux et avait deux postillons, luxe de prince. Enfin, ce qui achevait d’exciter et de déconcerter les conjectures, cette voiture était minutieusement fermée. Les panneaux pleins étaient levés. Les vitres étaient bouchées avec des volets; toutes les ouvertures par où l’oeil eût pu pénétrer étaient masquées; du dehors on ne pouvait rien voir dedans, et il est probable que du dedans on ne pouvait rien voir dehors. Du reste, il ne semblait pas qu’il y eût quelqu’un dans cette voiture.

Southwark étant dans le Surrey, c’est au shériff du comté de Surrey que ressortissait la prison de Southwark. Ces juridictions distinctes étaient très fréquentes en Angleterre.

Ainsi, par exemple, la Tour de Londres n’était supposée située dans aucun comté; c’est-à-dire que, légalement, elle était en quelque sorte en l’air. La Tour ne reconnaissait d’autre autorité juridique que son constable, qualifié custos turris.

La Tour avait sa juridiction, son église, sa cour de justice et son gouvernement à part. L’autorité du custos, ou constable, s’étendait hors de Londres sur vingt et un hamlets, traduisez: hameaux. Comme en Grande-Bretagne les singularités légales se greffent les unes sur les autres, l’office de maître canonnier d’Angleterre relevait de la Tour de Londres.

D’autres habitudes légales semblent plus bizarres encore. Ainsi la cour de l’amirauté anglaise consulte et applique les lois de Rhodes et d’Oleron (île française qui a été anglaise).

Le shériff d’une province était très considérable. Il était toujours écuyer, et quelquefois chevalier. Il était qualifi spectabilis dans les vieilles chartes; «homme à regarder».

Titre intermédiaire entre illustris et clarissimus, moins que le premier, plus que le second. Les shériffs des comtés étaient jadis choisis par le peuple; mais Edouard II, et après lui Henri VI, ayant repris cette nomination pour la couronne, les shériffs étaient devenus une émanation royale. Tous recevaient leur commission de sa majesté, excepté le shériff du Westmoreland qui était héréditaire, et les shériffs de Londres et de Midlesex qui étaient élus par la livery dans le Commonhall. Les shériffs de Galles et de Chester possédaient de certaines prérogatives fiscales. Toutes ces charges subsistent encore en Angleterre, mais, usées peu à peu au frottement des moeurs et des idées, elles n’ont plus la même physionomie qu’autrefois. Le shériff du comté avait la fonction d’escorter et de protéger les «juges itinérants». Comme on a deux bras, il avait deux officiers, son bras droit, le sous-shériff, et son bras gauche, le justicier-quorum. Le justicier-quorum, assisté du bailli de la centaine, qualifié wapentake, appréhendait, interrogeait, et, sous la responsabilité du shériff, emprisonnait, pour être jugés par les juges de circuit, les voleurs, meurtriers, séditieux, vagabonds, et tous gens de félonie. La nuance entre le sous-shériff et le justicier-quorum, dans leur service hiérarchique vis-à-vis du shériff, c’est que le sous-shériff accompagnait, et que le justicier-quorum assistait. Le shériff tenait deux cours, une cour sédentaire et centrale, la County-court, et une cour voyageante, la Shériff-turn. Il représentait ainsi l’unité et l’ubiquité. Il pouvait comme juge se faire aider et renseigner, dans les questions litigieuses, par un sergent de la coiffe, dit sergens coifae, qui est un sergent en droit et qui porte, sous la calotte noire, une coiffe de toile blanche de Cambrai. Le shériff désencombrait les maisons de justice; quand il arrivait dans une ville de sa province, il avait le droit d’expédier sommairement les prisonniers, ce qui aboutissait soit à leur renvoi, soit à leur pendaison, et ce qui s’appelait «délivrer la geôle», goal delivery. Le shériff présentait le bill de mise en cause aux vingt-quatre jurés d’accusation; s’ils l’approuvaient, ils écrivaient dessus: billa vera; s’ils le désapprouvaient, ils écrivaient: ignoramus; alors l’accusation était annulée et le shériff avait le privilège de déchirer le bill. Si, pendant la délibération, un jur mourait, ce qui, de droit, acquittait l’accusé et le faisait innocent, le shériff, qui avait eu le privilège d’arrêter l’accusé, avait le privilège de le mettre en liberté. Ce qui faisait singulièrement estimer et craindre le shériff, c’est qu’il avait pour charge d’exécuter tous les ordres de sa majesté; latitude redoutable. L’arbitraire se loge dans ces rédactions-là. Les officiers qualifiés verdeors, et les coroners faisaient cortège au shériff, et les clercs du marché lui prêtaient main-forte, et il avait une très belle suite de gens cheval et de livrées. Le shériff, dit Chamberlayne, est «la vie de la Justice, de la Loi et de la Comté».

En Angleterre, une démolition insensible pulvérise et désagrège perpétuellement les lois et les coutumes. De nos jours, insistons-y, ni le shériff, ni le wapentake, ni le justicier-quorum, ne pratiqueraient leurs charges comme ils les pratiquaient en ce temps-là. Il y avait dans l’ancienne Angleterre une certaine confusion de pouvoirs, et les attributions mal définies se résolvaient en empiétements, qui seraient impossibles aujourd’hui. La promiscuité de la police et de la justice a cessé. Les noms sont restés, les fonctions se sont modifiées. Nous croyons même que le mot wapentake a changé de sens. Il signifiait une magistrature, maintenant il signifie une division territoriale; il spécifiait le centenier, il spécifie le canton (centum).

Du reste, à cette époque, le shériff de comté combinait, avec quelque chose de plus et quelque chose de moins, et condensait dans son autorité, à la fois royale et municipale, les deux magistrats qu’on appelait jadis en

France Lieutenant civil de Paris et Lieutenant de police. Le lieutenant civil de Paris est assez bien qualifié par cette vieille note de police: «M. le lieutenant civil ne hait pas les querelles domestiques, parce que le pillage est toujours pour lui.» (22 juillet 1704.) Quant au lieutenant de police, personnage inquiétant, multiple et vague, il se résume en l'un de ses meilleurs types, René d'Argenson, qui, au dire de Saint-Simon, avait sur son visage les trois juges d'enfer mêlés.

Ces trois juges d'enfer étaient, on l'a vu, à la Bishopsgate de Londres.

FRÉMISSEMENT

Quand Gwynplaine entendit le guichet, grinçant de tous ses verrous, se refermer, il tressaillit. Il lui sembla que cette porte, qui venait de se clore, était la porte de communication de la lumière avec les ténèbres, donnant d'un côté sur le fourmillement terrestre, et de l'autre sur le monde mort, et que maintenant toutes les choses qu'éclaire le soleil étaient derrière lui, qu'il avait franchi la frontière de ce qui est la vie, et qu'il était dehors. Ce fut un profond serrement de coeur. Qu'allait-on faire de lui? Qu'est-ce que tout cela voulait dire?

Où était-il?

Il ne voyait rien autour de lui; il se trouvait dans du noir. La porte en se fermant l'avait fait momentanément aveugle. Le vasistas était fermé comme la porte. Pas de soupirail, pas de lanterne. C'était une précaution des vieux temps. Il était défendu d'éclairer l'abord intérieur des geôles, afin que les nouveaux venus ne pussent faire aucune remarque.

Gwynplaine étendit les mains et toucha le mur à sa droite et à sa gauche; il était dans un couloir. Peu à peu, ce jour de cave qui suinte on ne sait d'où et qui flotte dans les lieux obscurs, et auquel s'ajuste la dilatation des pupilles, lui fit distinguer çà et là un linéament, et le couloir s'ébaucha vaguement devant lui.

Gwynplaine, qui n'avait jamais entrevu les sévérités pénales qu' travers les grossissements d'Ursus, se sentait saisi par une sorte de main énorme et obscure. Être manié par l'inconnu de la loi, c'est effrayant. On est brave en présence de tout, et l'on se déconcerte en présence de la justice. Pourquoi? c'est que la justice de l'homme n'est que crépusculaire, et que le juge s'y meut à tâtons. Gwynplaine se rappelait ce qu'Ursus lui avait dit de la nécessité du silence; il voulait revoir Dea; il y avait dans sa situation on ne sait quoi de discrétionnaire qu'il ne voulait pas irriter. Parfois vouloir éclaircir, c'est empirer.

Pourtant, d'un autre côté, la pesée de cette aventure était si forte qu'il finit par y céder, et qu'il ne put retenir une question.

— Messieurs, demanda-t-il, où me conduisez-vous?

On ne lui répondit pas.

C’était la loi des prises de corps silencieuses, et le texte normand est formel: A silentiariis ostio proepositis introducti sunt.

Ce silence glaça Gwynplaine. Jusque-là il s’était cru fort; il se suffisait; se suffire, c’est être puissant. Il avait vécu isolé, s’imaginant qu’être isolé, c’est être inexpugnable. Et voilà que tout à coup il se sentait sous la pression de la hideuse force collective. De quelle façon se débattre avec cet anonyme horrible, la loi? Il défaillait sous l’énigme. Une peur d’une espèce inconnue avait trouvé le défaut de son armure. Et puis il n’avait pas dormi, il n’avait pas mangé; à peine avait-il trempé ses lèvres dans une tasse de thé. Il avait eu toute la nuit une sorte de délire, et il lui restait de la fièvre. Il avait soif, il avait faim peut-être. L’estomac mécontent dérange tout. Depuis la veille, il était assailli d’incidents. Les émotions qui le tourmentaient le soutenaient; sans l’ouragan, la voile serait chiffon. Mais cette faiblesse profonde du haillon que le vent gonfle jusqu’à ce qu’il le déchire, il la sentait en lui. Il sentait venir l’affaissement. Allait-il tomber sans connaissance sur le pavé? Se trouver mal, c’est la ressource de la femme et l’humiliation de l’homme. Il se roidissait, mais il tremblait.

Il avait la sensation de quelqu’un qui perd pied.

VIII

GÉMISSEMENT

On se mit en marche.

On avança dans le couloir.

Aucun greffe préalable. Aucun bureau avec registres. Les prisons de ce temps-là n’étaient point paperassières. Elles se contentaient de se fermer sur vous, souvent sans savoir pourquoi.

Être une prison, et avoir des prisonniers, cela leur suffisait.

Le cortège avait dû s’allonger et prendre la forme du corridor.

On marchait presque un à un; d’abord le wapentake, ensuite Gwynplaine, ensuite le justicier-quorum; puis les gens de police, avançant en bloc et bouchant le corridor derrière Gwynplaine comme un tampon. Le couloir se resserrait; maintenant Gwynplaine touchait le mur de ses deux coudes; la voûte en caillou noyé de ciment avait d’intervalle en intervalle des voussures de granit en saillie faisant étranglement; il fallait baisser le front pour passer; pas de course possible dans ce corridor; la fuite eût ét forcée de marcher lentement; ce boyau faisait des détours; toutes les entrailles sont tortueuses, celles d’une prison comme celles d’un homme; çà et là, tantôt à droite, tantôt à gauche, des coupures dans le mur, carrées et closes de grosses grilles, laissaient apercevoir des escaliers, ceux-ci montant, ceux-l plongeant. On arriva à une porte fermée, elle s’ouvrit, on passa, elle se referma. Puis on rencontra une deuxième porte, qui livra passage, puis une troisième, qui tourna de même sur ses gonds. Ces portes s’ouvraient et se refermaient comme toutes seules. On ne voyait personne. En même temps que le couloir se rétrécissait, la voûte s’abaissait, et l’on en était à ne plus pouvoir marcher que la tête courbée. Le mur suintait; il tombait de la voûte des gouttes d’eau; le dallage qui pavait le corridor avait la viscosité d’un intestin. L’espèce de pâleur diffuse qui tenait lieu de clarté devenait de plus en plus opaque; l’air manquait. Ce qu’il y avait de singulièrement lugubre, c’est que cela descendait.

Il fallait y faire attention pour s’apercevoir qu’on descendait.

Dans les ténèbres, une pente douce, c’est sinistre. Rien n’est redoutable comme les choses obscures auxquelles on arrive par des pentes insensibles.

Descendre, c’est l’entrée dans l’ignoré terrible.

Combien de temps marcha-t-on ainsi? Gwynplaine n’eût pu le dire.

Passées à ce laminoir, l’angoisse, les minutes s’allongent démesurément.

Subitement on fit halte.

L’obscurité était épaisse.

Il y avait un certain élargissement du corridor.

Gwynplaine entendit tout près de lui un bruit dont le gong chinois pourrait seul donner une idée; quelque chose comme un coup frappé sur le diaphragme de l’abîme.

C’était le wapentake qui venait de heurter de son bâton une lame de fer.

Cette lame était une porte.

Non une porte qui tourne, mais une porte qui se lève et s’abat.
A peu près comme une herse.

Il y eut un froissement strident dans une rainure, et Gwynplaine eut subitement devant les yeux un morceau de jour carré.

C’était la lame qui venait de se hisser dans une fente de la voûte de la façon dont se lève le panneau d’une souricière.

Une ouverture s’était faite.

Ce jour n’était pas du jour; c’était de la lueur. Mais, pour la prunelle très dilatée de Gwynplaine, cette clarté pâle et brusque fut d’abord comme le choc d’un éclair.

Il fut quelque temps avant de rien voir. Discerner dans l’éblouissement est aussi difficile que dans la nuit.

Puis, par degrés, sa pupille se proportionna à la lumière comme elle s’était proportionnée à l’obscurité; il finit par distinguer; la clarté, qui lui avait d’abord paru trop vive, s’apaisa dans sa prunelle et se refit livide; il hasarda son regard dans l’ouverture béante devant lui, et ce qu’il aperçut était effroyable.

A ses pieds, une vingtaine de marches, hautes, étroites, frustes, presque à pic, sans rampe à droite ni à gauche, sorte de crête de pierre pareille à un pan de mur biseauté en escalier, entraient et s’enfonçaient dans une cave très creuse. Elles allaient jusqu’en bas.

Cette cave était ronde, à voûte ogive en arc rampant, à cause du défaut de niveau des impostes, dislocation propre à tous les souterrains sur lesquels se sont tassés de très lourds édifices.

L’espèce de coupure tenant lieu de porte que la lame de fer venait de démasquer et à laquelle aboutissait l’escalier était entaillée dans la voûte, de sorte que de cette hauteur l’oeil plongeait dans la cave comme dans un puits.

La cave était vaste, et, si c’était le fond d’un puits, c’était le fond d’un puits cyclopéen. L’idée qu’éveillé l’ancien mot «cul de basse-fosse» ne pouvait s’appliquer à cette cave qu’à la condition de se figurer une fosse à lions ou à tigres.

La cave n’était pas dallée ni pavée. Elle avait pour sol la terre mouillée et froide des lieux profonds.

Au milieu de la cave, quatre colonnes basses et difformes soutenaient un porche lourdement ogival dont les quatre nervures en se rejoignant à l’intérieur du porche dessinaient à peu près le dedans d’une mitre. Ce porche, pareil aux pinacles sous lesquels jadis on mettait des sarcophages, montait jusqu’à la voûte et faisait dans la cave une sorte de chambre centrale, si l’on peut appeler du nom de chambre un compartiment ouvert de tous les côtés, ayant, au lieu de quatre murs, quatre piliers.

A la clef de voûte du porche pendait une lanterne de cuivre, ronde et grillée comme une fenêtre de prison. Cette lanterne jetait autour d’elle, sur les piliers, sur les voûtes et sur le mur circulaire entrevu vaguement en arrière des piliers, une clarté blafarde, coupée de barres d’ombre.

C’était cette clarté qui avait d’abord ébloui Gwynplaine.
Maintenant ce n’était plus pour lui qu’une rougeur presque confuse.

Pas d’autre jour dans cette cave. Ni fenêtre, ni porte, ni soupirail.

Entre les quatre piliers, précisément au-dessous de la lanterne, à l’endroit où il y avait le plus de lumière, était appliquée plat sur le sol une silhouette blanche et terrible.

C’était couché sur le clos. On voyait une tête dont les yeux étaient fermés, un corps dont le torse disparaissait sous on ne sait quel monceau informe, quatre membres se rattachant au torse en croix de saint André et tirés vers les quatre piliers par quatre chaînes liées aux pieds et aux mains. Ces chaînes aboutissaient à un anneau de fer au bas de chaque colonne. Cette forme, immobilisée dans l’atroce posture de l’écartèlememt, avait la lividité glacée du cadavre. C’était nu; c’était un homme.

Gwynplaine, pétrifié, debout au haut de l’escalier, regardait.

Tout à coup il entendit un râle.

Ce cadavre était vivant.

Tout près de ce spectre, dans une des ogives du porche, des deux côtés d’un grand fauteuil à bras exhaussé par une large pierre plate, se tenaient droits deux hommes vêtus de longs suaires noirs, et dans le fauteuil un vieillard enveloppé d'une robe rouge était assis, blême, immobile, sinistre, un bouquet de roses à la main.

Ce bouquet de roses eût renseigné un moins ignorant que Gwynplaine. Le droit de juger en tenant une touffe de fleurs caractérisait le magistrat à la fois royal et municipal. Le lord-maire de Londres juge encore ainsi. Aider les juges juger, c'était la fonction des premières roses de la saison.

Le vieillard assis dans le fauteuil était le shériff du comté de Surrey.

Il avait la rigidité majestueuse d'un romain revêtu de l'augustat.

Le fauteuil était le seul siège qu'il y eût das la cave.

A côté du fauteuil, on voyait une table couverte de papiers et de livres et sur laquelle était posée la longue baguette blanche du shériff.

Les hommes debout à gauche et à droite du shériff étaient deux docteurs, l'un en médecine, l'autre en lois; celui-ci reconnaissable à sa coiffe de sergent en droit sur sa perruque.

Tous deux avaient la robe noire, l'un de juge, l'autre de médecin. Ces deux sortes d'hommes portent le deuil des morts qu'ils font.

Derrière le shériff, au rebord de la marche que faisait la pierre plate, se tenait accroupi avec une écritoire près de lui sur la dalle, un dossier de carton sur ses genoux, et une feuille de parchemin sur le dossier, un greffier en perruque ronde, la plume à la main, dans l'attitude d'un homme prêt à écrire.

Ce greffier était de l'espèce dite greffier garde-sacs; ce qu'indiquait une sacoche qui était devant lui à ses pieds. Ces sacoches, jadis employées dans les procès, étaient qualifiées «sacs de justice».

A l'un des piliers était adossé, croisant les bras, un homme tout vêtu de cuir. C'était un valet de bourreau.

Ces hommes semblaient enchantés dans leur posture funèbre autour de l'homme enchaîné. Pas un ne remuait ni ne parlait.

Il y avait sur tout cela un calme monstrueux.

Ce que Gwynplaine voyait là, c'était une cave pénale. Ces caves abondaient en Angleterre. La crypte de la Beauchamp Tower a longtemps servi à cet usage, de même que le souterrain de la Lollard's Prison. Il y avait, et l'on peut voir encore Londres, en ce genre, le lieu bas dit «les vault de Lady Place».

Dans cette dernière chambre, il y a une cheminée en-cas pour la chauffe des fers.

Toutes les prisons du temps du King-John, et la geôle de Southwark en était une, avaient leur cave pénale.

Ce qui va suivre se pratiquait alors fréquemment en Angleterre, et pourrait, à la rigueur, en procédure criminelle, s’y exécuter même aujourd’hui; car toutes ces lois-là existent toujours.
L’Angleterre offre ce curieux spectacle d’un code barbare vivant en bonne intelligence avec la liberté. Le ménage, disons-le, est excellent.

Quelque défiance pourtant ne serait pas hors de propos. Si une crise survenait, un réveil pénal n’est pas impossible. La législation anglaise est un tigre apprivoisé. Elle fait patte de velours, mais elle a toujours ses griffes.

Couper les ongles aux lois, cela est sage.

La loi ignore presque le droit. Il y a d’un côté la pénalité, de l’autre l’humanité. Les philosophes protestent; mais il se passera du temps encore avant que la justice des hommes ait fait sa jonction avec la justice.

Respect de la loi; c’est le mot anglais. En Angleterre on vénère tant les lois qu’on ne les abroge jamais. On se tire de cette vénération en ne les exécutant point. Une vieille loi tombe en désuétude comme une vieille femme; mais on ne tue pas plus l’une de ces vieilles que l’autre. On cesse de les pratiquer, voil tout. Libre à elles de se croire toujours belles et jeunes. On les laisse rêver qu’elles existent. Cette politesse s’appelle respect.

La coutume normande est bien ridée; cela n’empêche pas plus d’un juge anglais de lui faire encore les yeux doux. On conserve amoureusement une antiquaille atroce, si elle est normande. Quoi de plus féroce que la potence? En 1867 on a condamné un homme à être coupé en quatre quartiers qui seraient offerts à une femme, la reine.

Le fénian Burke, mai 1867.

Du reste, la torture n’a jamais existé en Angleterre. C’est l’histoire qui le dit. L’aplomb de l’histoire est beau.

Mathieu de Westminster prend acte de ce que «la loi saxonne, fort clémente et débonnaire», ne punissait pas de mort les criminels, et il ajoute: «On se bornait à leur couper le nez, à leur crever les yeux, et à leur arracher les parties qui distinguent le sexe.» Seulement!

Gwynplaine, hagard au haut de l’escalier, commençait à trembler de tous ses membres. Il avait toutes sortes de frissons. Il cherchait à se rappeler quel crime il pouvait avoir commis. Au silence du wapentake venait de succéder la vision d’un supplice.

C’était un pas de fait, mais un pas tragique. Il voyait s’obscurcir de plus en plus la sombre énigme légale sous laquelle il se sentait pris.

La forme humaine couchée à terre râla une deuxième fois.

Gwynplaine eut l’impression qu’on lui poussait doucement l’épaule.

Cela venait du wapentake.

Gwynplaine comprit qu’il fallait descendre.

Il obéit.

Il s’enfonça de marche en marche dans l’escalier. Les degrés avaient un plat-bord très mince, et huit ou neuf pouces de haut.

Avec cela pas de rampe. On ne pouvait descendre qu’avec précaution.

Derrière Gwynplaine descendait, le suivant à la distance de deux degrés, le wapentake, tenant droit l’iron-weapon, et derrière le wapentake descendait, à la même distance, le justicier-quorum.

Gwynplaine en descendant ces marches sentait on ne sait quel engloutissement de l’espérance. C’était une sorte de mort pas pas. Chaque degré franchi éteignait en lui de la lumière. Il arriva, de plus en plus pâlissant, au bas de l’escalier.

L’espèce de larve terrassée et enchaînée aux quatre piliers continuait de râler.

Une voix dans la pénombre dit:

— Approchez.

C’était le shériff qui s’adressait à Gwynplaine.

Gwynplaine fit un pas.

— Plus près, dit la voix.

Gwynplaine fit encore un pas.

— Tout près, reprit le shériff.

Le justicier-quorum murmura à l’oreille de Gwynplaine, si gravement que ce chuchotement était solennel:

— Vous êtes devant le shériff du comté de Surrey.

Gwynplaine avança jusqu’au supplicié qu’il voyait étendu au centre de la cave. Le wapentake et le justicier-quorum restèrent où ils étaient et laissèrent Gwynplaine avancer seul.

Quand Gwynplaine, parvenu jusque sous le porche, vit de près cette chose misérable qu’il n’avait encore aperçue qu’à distance, et qui était un homme vivant, son effroi devint épouvante.

L’homme lié sur le sol était absolument nu, à cela près de ce haillon hideusement pudique qu’on pourrait nommer la feuille de vigne du supplice, et qui était le succingulum des romains et le christipannus des gothiques, duquel notre vieux jargon gaulois a fait le cripagne. Jésus, nu sur la croix, n’avait que ce lambeau.

L’effrayant patient que considérait Gwynplaine semblait un homme de cinquante à soixante ans. Il était chauve. Des poils blancs de barbe lui hérissaient le menton. Il fermait les yeux et ouvrait la bouche. On voyait toutes ses dents. Sa face maigre et osseuse était voisine de la tête de mort. Ses bras et ses jambes, assujettis par les chaînes aux quatre poteaux de pierre, faisaient un X. Il avait sur la poitrine et le ventre une plaque de fer, et sur cette plaque étaient posées en tas cinq ou six grosses pierres. Son râle était tantôt un souffle, tantôt un rugissement.

Le shériff, sans quitter son bouquet de roses, prit sur la table, de la main qu’il avait libre, sa verge blanche et la dressa en disant:

— Obédience à sa majesté.

Puis il reposa la verge sur la table.

Ensuite, avec la lenteur d’un glas, sans un geste, aussi immobile que le patient, le shériff éleva la voix.

Il dit:

— Homme qui êtes ici lié de chaînes, écoutez pour la dernière fois la voix de justice. Vous avez été extrait de votre cachot et amené dans cette geôle. Dûment interpellé et dans les formes voulues, formaliis verbis pressus, sans égard aux lectures et communications qui vous ont été faites et qui vous vont être renouvelées, inspiré par un esprit de ténacité mauvaise et perverse, vous vous êtes enfermé dans le silence, et vous avez refusé de répondre au juge. Ce qui est un libertinage détestable, et ce qui constitue, parmi les faits punissables du cashlit, le crime et délit d’oversenesse.

Le sergent de la coiffe debout à droite du shériff interrompit et dit avec une indifférence qui avait on ne sait quoi de funèbre:

— Overhernessa, Lois d’Alfred et de Godrun. Chapitre six.

Le shériff reprit:

— La loi est vénérée de tous, excepté des larrons qui infestent les bois où les biches font leurs petits.

Comme une cloche après une cloche, le sergent dit:

— Qui faciunt vastum in foresta ubi damae solent founinare.

— Celui qui refuse de répondre au magistrat, dit le shériff, est suspect de tous les vices. Il est réputé capable de tout le mal.

Le sergent intervint:

— Prodigus, devorator, profusus, salax, ruffianus, ebriosus, luxuriosus, simulator, consumptor patrimonii, elluo, ambro, et gluto.

— Tous les vices, dit le shériff, supposent tous les crimes. Qui n’avoue rien confesse tout. Celui qui se tait devant les questions du juge est de fait menteur et parricide.

— Mendax et parricida, fit le sergent.

Le shériff dit:

— Homme, il n’est point permis de se faire absent par le silence.

Le faux contumace fait une plaie à la loi. Il ressemble Diomède blessant une déesse. La taciturnité devant la justice est une forme de la rébellion. Lèse-justice, c’est lèse-majesté.

Rien de plus haïssable et de plus téméraire. Qui se soustrait l’interrogatoire vole la vérité. La loi y a pourvu. Pour des cas semblables, les anglais ont de tout temps joui du droit de fosse, de fourche et de chaînes.

— Anglica charta, année 1088, dit le sergent.

Et, toujours avec la même gravité mécanique, le sergent ajouta:

— Ferrum, et fossam, et furcas, cum aliis libertalibus.

Le shériff continua:

— C’est pourquoi, homme, puisque vous n’avez pas voulu vous départir du silence, bien que sain d’esprit et parfaitement informé de ce que vous demande la justice, puisque vous êtes diaboliquement réfractaire, vous avez dû être géhenné, et vous avez été, aux termes des statuts criminels, mis à l’épreuve du tourment dit «la peine forte et dure». Voici ce qui vous a ét fait. La loi exige que je vous en informe authentiquement. Vous avez été amené dans cette basse-fosse, vous avez été dépouillé de vos vêtements, vous avez été couché tout nu à terre sur le dos, vos quatre membres ont été tendus et liés aux quatre colonnes de la loi, une planche de fer vous a été appliquée au ventre, et l’on vous a mis sur le corps autant de pierres que vous en pouvez porter. «Et davantage», dit la loi.

— Plusque, affirma le sergent.

Le shériff poursuivit:

— En cette situation, et avant de prolonger l’épreuve, il vous a été fait, par moi shériff du comté de Surrey, sommation itérative de répondre et de parler, et vous avez sataniquement persévér dans le silence, bien qu’étant au pouvoir des gênes, chaînes, ceps, entraves et ferrements.

— Attachiamenta legalia, dit le sergent.

— Sur votre refus et endurcissement, dit le shériff, étant équitable que l’obstination de la loi soit égale à l’obstination du criminel, l’épreuve a continué, telle que la commandent les édits et textes. Le premier jour on ne vous a donné ni à boire ni à manger.

— Hoc est superjejunare, dit le sergent.

Il y eut un silence. On entendait l’affreuse respiration sifflante de l’homme sous le tas de pierres.

Le sergent en droit compléta son interruption:

— Adde augmentum abstinentiae ciborum diminutione. Consuetudo brttannica, article cinq cent quatre.

Ces deux hommes, le shériff et le sergent, alternaient; rien de plus sombre que cette monotonie imperturbable; la voix lugubre répondait à la voix sinistre; on eût dit le prêtre et le diacre du supplice, célébrant la messe féroce de la loi.

Le shériff recommença:

— Le premier jour on ne vous a donné ni à boire ni à manger. Le deuxième jour on vous a donné à manger et pas à boire; on vous a mis entre les dents trois bouchées de pain d’orge. Le troisième jour on vous a donné à boire et pas à manger. On vous a vers dans la bouche, en trois fois et en trois verres, une pinte d’eau prise au ruisseau d’égout de la prison. Le quatrième jour est venu. C’est aujourd’hui. Maintenant, si vous continuez à ne pas répondre, vous serez laissé là jusqu’à ce que vous mouriez.
Ainsi le veut justice.

Le sergent, toujours à sa réplique, approuva:

— Mors rei homagium est bonae legi.

— Et tandis que vous vous sentirez trépasser lamentablement, repartit le shériff, nul ne vous assistera, quand même le sang vous sortirait de la gorge, de la barbe et des aisselles, et de toutes les ouvertures du corps depuis la bouche jusqu’aux reins.

— A throtebolla, dit le sergent, et pabus et subhircis, et a grugno usque ad crupponum.

Le shériff continua:

— Homme, faites attention. Car les suites vous regardent. Si vous renoncez à votre silence exécrable, et si vous avouez, vous ne serez que pendu, et vous aurez droit au meldefeoh qui est une somme d’argent.

— Damnum confitens, dit le sergent, habeat le meldefeoh.
Leges Inae, chapitre vingt.

— Laquelle somme, insista le shériff, vous sera payée en doitkins, suskins et galihalpens, seul cas où cette monnaie puisse être employée, aux termes du statut d'abolition, au troisième de Henri cinquième, et aurez le droit et jouissance de scortum ante mortem, et serez ensuite étranglé au gibet. Tels sont les avantages de l'aveu. Vous plaît-il répondre à justice?

Le shériff se tut et attendit. Le patient demeura sans mouvement.

Le shériff reprit:

— Homme, le silence est un refuge où il y a plus de risque que de salut. L'opiniâtreté est damnable et scélérate. Qui se tait devant justice est félon à la couronne. Ne persistez point dans cette désobéissance non filiale. Songez à sa majesté. Ne résistez point à notre gracieuse reine. Quand je vous parle, répondez-lui. Soyez loyal sujet.

Le patient râla.

Le shériff repartit:

— Donc, après les soixante-douze premières heures de l'épreuve, nous voici au quatrième jour. Homme, c'est le jour décisif.

C'est au quatrième jour que la loi fixe la confrontation.

— Quarta die, frontem ad frontem adduce, grommela le sergent.

— La sagesse de la loi, reprit le shériff, a choisi cette heure extrême, afin d'avoir ce que nos ancêtres appelaient «le jugement par le froid mortel», attendu que c'est le moment où les hommes sont crus sur leur oui et sur leur non.

Le sergent en droit reprit:

— Judicium pro frodmortell, quod homines credensi sint per suum ya et per suum na. Charte du roi Adelstan. Tome premier, page cent soixante-treize.

Il y eut un instant d'attente, puis le shériff inclina vers le patient sa face sévère.

— Homme qui êtes là couché à terre...

Et il fit une pause.

— Homme, cria-t-il, m'entendez-vous?

L'homme ne bougea pas.

— Au nom de la loi, dit le shériff, ouvrez les yeux.

Les paupières de l'homme restèrent closes.

Le shériff se tourna vers le médecin debout à sa gauche.

— Docteur, donnez votre diagnostic.

— Probe, da diagnosticum, dit le sergent.

Le médecin descendit de la dalle avec la raideur magistrale, s’approcha de l’homme, se pencha, mit son oreille près de la bouche du patient, lui tâta le pouls au poignet, à l’aisselle et à la cuisse, et se redressa.

— Eh bien? dit le shériff.

— Il entend encore, dit le médecin.

— Voit-il? demanda le shériff.

Le médecin répondit:

— Il peut voir.

Sur un signe du shériff, le justicier-quorum et le wapentake s’avancèrent. Le wapentake se plaça près de la tête du patient; le justicier-quorum s’arrêta derrière Gwynplaine.

Le médecin recula d’un pas entre les piliers.

Alors le shériff, élevant le bouquet de roses comme un prêtre son goupillon, interpella le patient d’une voix haute, et devint formidable:

— O misérable, parle! la loi te supplie avant de t’exterminer. Tu veux sembler muet, songe à la tombe qui est muette; tu veux paraître sourd, songe à la damnation qui est sourde. Pense à la mort qui est pire que toi. Réfléchis, tu vas être abandonné dans ce cachot. Écoute, mon semblable, car je suis un homme! Écoute, mon frère, car je suis un chrétien! Écoute, mon fils, car je suis un vieillard! Prends garde à moi, car je suis le maître de ta souffrance, et je vais tout à l’heure être horrible. L’horreur de la loi fait la majesté du juge. Songe que moi-même je tremble devant moi. Mon propre pouvoir me consterne. Ne me pousse pas à bout. Je me sens plein de la sainte méchanceté du châtiment. Aie donc, ô infortuné, la salutaire et honnête crainte de la justice, et obéis-moi. L’heure de la confrontation est venue et tu dois répondre. Ne t’obstine point dans la résistance. N’entre pas dans l’irrévocable. Pense que l’achèvement est mon droit. Cadavre commencé, écoute! A moins qu’il ne te plaise expirer ici pendant des heures, des jours et des semaines, et agoniser longtemps d’une épouvantable agonie affamée et fécale, sous le poids de ces pierres, seul dans ce souterrain, délaissé, oublié, aboli, donné à manger aux rats et aux belettes, mordu par les bêtes des ténèbres, tandis qu’on ira et viendra, et qu’on achètera et qu’on vendra, et que les voitures rouleront dans la rue au-dessus de ta tête; à moins qu’il ne te convienne de râler sans rémission au fond de ce désespoir, grinçant, pleurant, blasphémant, sans un médecin pour apaiser tes plaies, sans un prêtre pour offrir le verre d’eau divin à ton âme; oh! à moins que tu ne veuilles sentir lentement éclore à tes lèvres l’écume affreuse du sépulcre, oh! je t'adjure et te conjure, entends-moi! je t'appelle à ton propre secours, aie pitié de toi-même, fais ce qui t'est demandé, cède la justice, obéis, tourne la tête, ouvre les yeux, et dis si tu reconnais cet homme!

Le patient ne tourna pas la tête et n'ouvrit pas les yeux.

Le shériff jeta un coup d'oeil tour à tour au justicier-quorum et au wapentake.

Le justicier-quorum ôta à Gwynplaine son chapeau et son manteau, le prit par les épaules et lui fit faire face à la lumière du côté de l'homme enchaîné. Le visage de Gwynplaine se détacha dans toute cette ombre, avec son relief étrange, pleinement éclairé.

En même temps le wapentake se courba, saisit par les tempes entre ses deux mains la tête du patient, tourna cette tête inerte vers Gwynplaine, et de ses deux pouces et de ses deux index écarta les paupières fermées. Les yeux farouches de l'homme apparurent.

Le patient vit Gwynplaine.

Alors, soulevant lui-même sa tête et ouvrant ses paupières toutes grandes, il le regarda.

Il tressaillit autant qu'on peut tressaillir quand on a une montagne sur la poitrine, et il cria:

— C'est lui! oui! c'est lui!

Et, terrible, il éclata de rire.

— C'est lui! répéta-t-il.

Puis il laissa retomber sa tête sur le sol, et il referma les yeux.

— Greffier, écrivez, dit le shériff.

Gwynplaine, quoique terrifié, avait fait jusqu'à ce moment-l peu près bonne contenance. Le cri du patient: C'est lui! le bouleversa. Ce: Greffier, écrivez, la glaça. Il lui sembla comprendre qu'un scélérat l'entraînait dans sa destinée, sans que lui, Gwynplaine, pût deviner pourquoi, et que l'inintelligible aveu de cet homme se fermait sur lui comme la charnière d'un carcan. Il se figura cet homme et lui attachés au même pilori deux poteaux jumeaux. Gwynplaine perdit pied dans cette épouvante, et se débattit. Il se mit à balbutier des bégaiements incohérents, avec le trouble profond de l'innocence, et, frémissant, effaré, éperdu, il jeta au hasard les premiers cris qui lui vinrent et toutes ces paroles de l'angoisse qui ont l'air de projectiles insensés.

— Ce n’est pas vrai. Ce n’est pas moi. Je ne connais pas cet homme. Il ne peut pas me connaître, puisque je ne le connais pas. J’ai ma représentation de ce soir qui m’attend. Qu’est-ce qu’on me veut? Je demande ma liberté. Ce n’est pas tout ça.

Pourquoi m’a-t-on amené dans cette cave? Alors il n’y a plus de lois. Dites tout de suite qu’il n’y a plus de lois. Monsieur le juge, je répète que ce n’est pas moi. Je suis innocent de tout ce qu’on peut dire. Je le sais bien, moi. Je veux m’en aller.

Cela n’est pas juste. Il n’y a rien entre cet homme et moi. On peut s’informer. Ma vie n’est pas une chose cachée. On est venu me prendre comme un voleur. Pourquoi est-on venu comme cela?

Cet homme-là, est-ce que je sais ce que c’est? Je suis un garçon ambulant qui joue des farces dans les foires et les marchés. Je suis l’Homme qui Rit. Il y a assez de monde qui sont venus me voir. Nous sommes dans le Tarrinzeau-field. Voilà quinze ans que je fais mon état honnêtement. J’ai vingt-cinq ans. Je loge à l’inn Tadcaster. Je m’appelle Gwynplaine. Faites-moi la grâce de me faire mettre hors d’ici, monsieur le juge. Il ne faut pas abuser de la petitesse des malheureux. Ayez compassion d’un homme qui n’a rien fait, et qui est sans protection et sans défense. Vous avez devant vous un pauvre saltimbanque.

— J’ai devant moi, dit le shériff, lord Fermain Clancharlie, baron Clancharlie et Hunkerville, marquis de Corleone en Sicile, pair d’Angleterre.

Et se levant, et montrant son fauteuil à Gwynplaine, le shériff ajouta:

— Milord, que votre seigneurie daigne s’asseoir.

LIVRE CINQUIÈME

LA MER ET LE SORT REMUENT SOUS LE MÊME SOUFFLE

I

SOLIDITÉ DES CHOSES FRAGILES

La destinée nous tend parfois un verre de folie à boire. Une main sort du nuage et nous offre brusquement la coupe sombre o est l’ivresse inconnue.

Gwynplaine ne comprit pas.

Il regarda derrière lui pour voir à qui l’on parlait,

Le son trop aigu n’est plus perceptible à l’oreille; l’émotion trop aiguë n’est plus perceptible à l’intelligence. Il y a une limite pour comprendre comme pour entendre.

Le wapentake et le justicier-quorum s’approchèrent de Gwynplaine et le prirent sous le bras, et il sentit qu’on l’asseyait dans le fauteuil d’où le shériff s’était levé.

Il se laissa faire, sans s’expliquer comment cela se pouvait.

Quand Gwynplaine fut assis, le justicier-quorum et le wapentake reculèrent de quelques pas et se tinrent droits et immobiles en arrière du fauteuil.

Alors le shériff posa son bouquet de roses sur la dalle, mit des lunettes que lui présenta le greffier, tira de dessous les dossiers qui encombraient la table une feuille de parchemin tachée, jaunie, verdie, rongée et cassée par places, qui semblait avoir été pliée à plis très étroits, et dont un côté était couvert d’écriture, et, debout sous la lumière de la lanterne, rapprochant de ses yeux cette feuille, de sa voix la plus solennelle, il lut ceci:

«Au nom du Père, du Fils et du Saint-Esprit,

«Ce jourd’hui vingt-neuvième de janvier mil six cent quatrevingt-dix de Notre Seigneur,

«A été méchamment abandonné, sur la côte déserte de Portland, dans l’intention de l’y laisser périr de faim, de froid et de solitude, un enfant âgé de dix ans.

«Cet enfant a été vendu à l’âge de deux ans par ordre de sa très gracieuse majesté le roi Jacques deuxième.

«Cet enfant est lord Fermain Clancharlie, fils légitime unique de lord Linnaeus Clancharlie, baron Clancharlie et Hunkerville, marquis de

Corleone en Italie, pair du royaume d’Angleterre, défunt, et d’Ann Bradshaw, son épouse, défunte.

«Cet enfant est héritier des biens et titres de son père. C’est pourquoi il a été vendu, mutilé, défiguré et disparu par la volonté de sa très gracieuse majesté.

«Cet enfant a été élevé et dressé pour être bateleur dans les marchés et foires.

«Il a été vendu à l’âge de deux ans après la mort du seigneur son père, et dix livres sterling ont été données au roi pour l’achat de cet enfant, ainsi que pour diverses concessions, tolérances et immunités.

«Lord Fermain Clancharlie, âgé de deux ans, a été acheté par moi soussigné qui écris ces lignes, et mutilé et défiguré par un flamand de Flandre nommé Hardquanonne, lequel est seul en possession des secrets et procédés du docteur Conquest.

«L’enfant était destiné par nous à être un masque de rire.

Masca ridens.

«A cette intention, Hardquanonne lui a pratiqué l’opération Bucca fissa usque ad aures, qui met sur la face un rire éternel.

«L’enfant, par un moyen connu de Hardquanonne seul, ayant ét endormi et fait insensible pendant ce travail, ignore l’opération qu’il a subie.

«Il ignore qu’il est lord Clancharlie.

«Il répond au nom de Gwynplaine.

«Cela tient à la bassesse de l’âge et à la petitesse de mémoire qu’il avait quand il a été vendu et acheté, étant à peine âgé de deux ans.

«Hardquanonne est le seul qui sache faire l’opération Bucca fissa, et cet enfant est le seul vivant à qui elle ait ét faite.

«Cette opération est unique et singulière à ce point que, même après de longues années, cet enfant, fût-il un vieillard au lieu d’être un enfant, et ses cheveux noirs fussent-ils devenus des cheveux blancs, serait immédiatement reconnu par Hardquanonne.

«C’est en Suisse, près du lac de Genève, entre Lausanne et Vevey, dans la maison même où son père et sa mère étaient morts, que l’enfant nous a été, conformément aux commandements du roi, vendu et livré par le dernier domestique du feu lord Linnaeus, lequel domestique a trépassé peu après comme ses maîtres, de sorte que cette affaire délicate et secrète n’est plus connue à cette heure de personne ici-bas, si ce n’est de Hardquanonne, qui est au cachot dans Chatham, et de nous, qui allons mourir.

«Nous soussignés, avons élevé et gardé huit ans, pour en tirer parti dans notre industrie, le petit seigneur acheté par nous au roi.

«Ce jour d’huy, fuyant l’Angleterre pour ne point partager le mauvais sort de Hardquanonne, nous avons, par timidité et crainte, à cause des inhibitions et fulminations pénales édictées en parlement, abandonné, à la nuit tombante, sur la côte de Portland, ledit enfant Gwynplaine, qui est lord Fermain Clancharlie.

«Or, avons juré le secret au roi, mais pas à Dieu.

«Cette nuit, en mer, assaillis d’une sévère tempête par la volonté de la providence, en plein désespoir et détresse, agenouillés devant celui qui peut sauver nos vies et qui voudra peut-être sauver nos âmes, n’ayant plus rien à attendre des hommes et tout à craindre de Dieu, ayant pour ancre et ressource le repentir de nos actions mauvaises, résignés à mourir, et contents si la justice d’en haut se satisfait, humbles et pénitents et nous frappant la poitrine, faisons cette déclaration et la confions et remettons à la mer furieuse pour qu’elle en use selon le bien à l’obéissance de Dieu. Et que la Très Sainte Vierge nous soit en aide. Ainsi soit-il. Et avons signé.

Le shériff, s’interrompant, dit:

— Voici les signatures. Toutes d’écritures diverses.

Et il se remit à lire:

— «Doctor Gernardus Geestemunde. — Asuncion. — Une croix, et côté: Barbara Fermoy, de l’île Tyrryf, dans les Ebudes. — Gaïzdorra, captal. — Giangirate. — Jacques Quatourze, dit le Narbonnais. — Luc-Pierre Capgaroupe, du bagne de Mahon.

Le shériff, s’arrêtant encore, dit:

— Note écrite de la même main que le texte et que la première signature.

Et il lut:

— «De trois hommes d’équipage, le patron ayant été enlevé par un coup de mer, il ne reste que deux. Et ont signé. — Galdeazun. — Ave-Maria, voleur.

Le shériff, mêlant la lecture et les interruptions, continua:

— Au bas de la feuille est écrit: «En mer, à bord de la Matutina, ourque de Biscaye, du golfe de Pasages.

— Cette feuille, ajouta le shériff, est un parchemin de chancellerie qui porte le filigrane du roi Jacques deuxième. En marge de la déclaration, et de la même écriture, il y a cette note:

— «La présente déclaration est écrite par nous au verso de l’ordre royal qui nous a été remis pour notre décharge d’avoir acheté l’enfant. Qu’on retourne la feuille, on verra l’ordre.

Le shériff retourna le parchemin, et l’éleva dans sa main droite en l’exposant à la lumière. On vit une page blanche, si le mot page blanche peut s’appliquer à une telle moisissure, et au milieu de la page trois mots écrits: deux mots latins, jussu regis, et une signature, Jeffreys.

— Jussu regis. Jeffreys, dit le shériff, passant de la voix grave à la voix haute.

Un homme à qui il vient de tomber sur la tête une tuile du palais des rêves, c’était là Gwynplaine.

Il se mit à parler comme on parle dans l’inconscience:

— Gernardus, oui, le docteur. Un homme vieux et triste. J’en avais peur. Gaizdorra, captal, cela veut dire le chef. Il y avait des femmes, Asuncion, et l’autre. Et puis le provençal.
C’était Capgaroupe. Il buvait dans une bouteille plate sur laquelle il y avait un nom écrit en rouge.

— La voici, dit le shériff.

Et il posa sur la table une chose que le greffier venait de tirer du sac de justice.

C’était une gourde à oreillons, revêtue d’osier. Cette bouteille avait visiblement eu des aventures. Elle avait dû séjourner dans l’eau. Des coquillages et des conferves y adhéraient. Elle était incrustée et damasquinée de toutes les rouilles de l’océan.
Le goulot avait un collet de goudron indiquant qu’elle avait ét hermétiquement bouchée. Elle était décachetée et ouverte. On avait toutefois replacé dans le goulot une sorte de tampon de funin goudronné qui avait été le bouchon.

— C’est dans cette bouteille, dit le shériff, qu’avait été enfermée, par les gens qui allaient mourir, la déclaration dont il vient d’être donné lecture. Ce message adressé à la justice lui a été fidèlement remis par la mer.

Le shériff augmenta la majesté de son intonation, et continua:

— De même que la montagne Harrow est excellente au blé et fournit la fine fleur de farine dont on cuit le pain pour la table royale, de même la mer rend à l’Angleterre tous les services qu’elle peut, et, quand un lord se perd, elle le retrouve et le rapporte.

Puis il reprit:

— Sur cette gourde il y a en effet un nom écrit en rouge.

Et haussant la voix, il se tourna vers le patient immobile:

— Votre nom à vous, malfaiteur qui êtes ici. Car telles sont les voies obscures par où la vérité, engloutie dans le gouffre des actions humaines, arrive du fond à la surface.

Le shériff prit la gourde et présenta à la lumière un des côtés de l’épave qui avait été nettoyé, probablement pour les besoins de la justice. On y voyait serpenter dans les entrelacements de l’osier un mince ruban de jonc rouge, devenu noir par endroits, travail de l’eau et du temps. Ce jonc, malgré quelques cassures, traçait distinctement dans l’osier ces douze lettres: Hardquanonne.

Alors le shériff, reprenant ce son de voix particulier qui ne ressemble à rien et qu’on pourrait qualifier l’accent de justice, se tourna vers le patient:

— Hardquanonne! quand, par nous, shériff, cette gourde, sur laquelle est votre nom, vous a été, pour la première fois, montrée, exhibée et présentée, vous l’avez tout d’abord et de bonne grâce reconnue comme vous ayant appartenu; puis, lecture vous ayant été faite, en sa teneur, du parchemin qui y était ployé et enfermé, vous n’avez pas voulu en dire davantage, et, dans l’espoir sans doute que l’enfant perdu ne serait pas retrouvé et que vous échapperiez au châtiment, vous avez refus de répondre. A la suite duquel refus, vous avez été appliqu la peine forte et dure, et deuxième lecture dudit parchemin, o est consignée la déclaration et confession de vos complices, vous a été donnée. Inutilement. Aujourd’hui, qui est le jour quatrième et le jour légalement voulu de la confrontation, ayant été mis en présence de celui qui a été abandonné à Portland le vingt-neuf janvier mil six cent quatrevingt-dix, l’espérance diabolique s’est évanouie en vous, et vous avez rompu le silence et reconnu votre victime...

Le patient ouvrit les yeux, dressa la tète, et d’une voix où il y avait la sonorité étrange de l’agonie, avec on ne sait quel calme mêlé à son râle, prononçant tragiquement sous cet amas de pierres des mots pour chacun desquels il lui fallait soulever l'espèce de couvercle de tombe posé sur lui, il se mit à parler:

— J'ai juré le secret, et je l'ai gardé le plus que j'ai pu. Les hommes sombres sont les hommes fidèles, et il existe une honnêteté dans l'enfer. Aujourd'hui le silence est devenu inutile. Soit. C'est pourquoi je parle. Eh bien, oui. C'est lui. Nous l'avons fait à nous deux le roi; le roi par sa volonté, moi par mon art.

Et, regardant Gwynplaine, il ajouta:

— Maintenant ris à jamais.

Et lui-même il se mit à rire.

Ce second rire, plus farouche encore que le premier, aurait pu être pris pour un sanglot.

Le rire cessa, et l'homme se recoucha. Ses paupières se refermèrent.

Le shériff, qui avait laissé la parole au supplicié, poursuivit:

— De tout quoi il est pris acte.

Il donna au greffier le temps d'écrire, puis il dit:

— Hardquanonne, aux termes de la loi, après confrontation suivie d'effet, après troisième lecture de la déclaration de vos complices, désormais confirmée par votre reconnaissance et confession, après votre aveu itératif, vous allez être dégagé de ces entraves, et remis au bon plaisir de sa majesté pour être pendu comme plagiaire.

— Plagiaire, fit le sergent de la coiffe. C'est-à-dire acheteur et vendeur d'enfants. Loi visigothe, livre sept, titre trois, paragraphe Usurpaverit; et Loi salique, titre quarante et un, paragraphe deux; et Loi des Frisons, titre vingt et un, De Plagio. Et Alexandre Nequam dit:

Qui pueros vendis, plagiarius est tibi nomen.

Toi qui vends des enfants, ton nom est plagiaire.

Le shériff posa le parchemin sur la table, ôta ses lunettes, ressaisit le bouquet, et dit:

— Fin de la peine forte et dure. Hardquanonne, remerciez sa majesté.

D'un signe, le justicier-quorum mit en mouvement l'homme habill de cuir.

Cet homme, qui était un valet de bourreau, «groom du gibet», disent les vieilles chartes, alla au patient, lui ôta l'une après l'autre les pierres qu'il avait sur le ventre, enleva la plaque de fer qui laissa voir les côtes déformées du misérable, puis lui défît des poignets et des chevilles les quatre carcans qui le liaient aux piliers.

Le patient, déchargé des pierres et délivré des chaînes, resta plat sur la terre, les yeux fermés, les bras et les jambes écartés, comme un crucifié décloué.

— Hardquanonne, dit le shériff, levez-vous.

Le patient ne remua point.

Le groom du gibet lui prit une main et la lâcha; la main retomba. L'autre main, soulevée, retomba de même. Le valet de bourreau saisit un pied, puis l'autre, les talons revinrent frapper le sol. Les doigts restèrent inertes et les orteils immobiles. Les pieds nus d'un corps gisant ont on ne sait quoi de hérissé.

Le médecin s'approcha, tira d'une poche de sa robe un petit miroir d'acier et le mit devant la bouche béante de Hardquanonne; puis du doigt il lui ouvrit les paupières. Elle ne s'abaissèrent point. Les prunelles vitreuses demeurèrent fixes.

Le médecin se redressa et dit:

— Il est mort.

Et il ajouta:

— Il a ri, cela l'a tué.

— Peu importe, dit le shériff. Après l'aveu, vivre ou mourir n'est plus qu'une formalité.

Puis, désignant Hardquanonne d'un geste de son bouquet de roses, le shériff jeta cet ordre au wapentake:

— Carcasse à emporter d'ici cette nuit.

Le wapentake adhéra d'un hochement de tête.

Et le shériff ajouta:

— Le cimetière de la prison est en face.

Le wapentake fit un nouveau signe d'adhésion.

Le greffier écrivait.

Le shériff, ayant dans sa main gauche le bouquet, prit dans l'autre main sa baguette blanche, se plaça droit devant Gwynplaine toujours assis, lui fit une révérence profonde, puis, autre attitude de solennité, renversa sa tête en arrière, et, regardant Gwynplaine en face, lui dit:

— A vous qui êtes ici présent, nous Philippe Deuzill Parsons, chevalier, shériff du comté de Surrey, assisté d'Aubrie Docminique, écuyer, notre clerc et greffier, et de nos officiers ordinaires, dûment pourvu de commandements directs et spéciaux de sa majesté, en vertu de notre commission, et des droits et devoirs de notre charge, et avec le congé du lord chancelier d’Angleterre, procès-verbaux dressés et actes pris, vu les pièces communiquées par l’amirauté, après vérification des attestations et signatures, après déclarations lues et ouïes, après confrontation faite, toutes les constatations et informations légales étant complétées, épuisées, et menées à bonne et juste fin, nous vous signifions et déclarons, afin qu’il en advienne ce que de droit, que vous êtes Fermain Clancharlie, baron Clancharlie et Hunkerville, marquis de Corleone en Sicile, pair d’Angleterre, et que Dieu garde votre seigneurie.

Et il salua.

Le sergent en droit, le docteur, le justicier-quorum, le wapentake, le greffier, tous les assistants, excepté le bourreau, répétèrent ce salut plus profondément encore, et s’inclinèrent jusqu’à terre devant Gwynplaine.

— Ah çà, cria Gwynplaine, réveillez-moi!

Et il se dressa debout, tout pâle.

— Je viens vous réveiller en effet, dit une voix qu’on n’avait pas encore entendue.

Un homme sortit de derrière un des piliers. Comme personne n’avait pénétré dans la cave depuis que la lame de fer avait livré passage à l’arrivée du cortège de police, il était visible que cet homme était dans cette ombre avant l’entrée de Gwynplaine, qu’il avait un rôle régulier d’observation, et qu’il avait mission et fonction de se tenir là. Cet homme était gros et replet, en perruque de cour et en manteau de voyage, plutôt vieux que jeune, et très correct.

Il salua Gwynplaine avec respect et aisance, avec l’élégance d’un gentleman domestique, et sans gaucherie de magistrat.

— Oui, dit-il, je viens vous réveiller. Depuis vingt-cinq ans, vous dormez. Vous faites un songe, et il faut en sortir. Vous vous croyez Gwynplaine, vous êtes Clancharlie. Vous vous croyez du peuple, vous êtes de la seigneurie. Vous vous croyez au dernier rang, vous êtes au premier. Vous vous croyez histrion, vous êtes sénateur. Vous vous croyez pauvre, vous êtes opulent.
Vous vous croyez petit, vous êtes grand. Réveillez-vous, milord!

Gwynplaine, d’une voix très basse, et où il y avait une certaine terreur, murmura:

— Qu’est-ce que tout cela veut dire?

— Cela veut dire, milord, répondit le gros homme, que je m’appelle Barkilphedro, que’ je suis officier de l’amirauté, que cette épave, la gourde de Hardquanonne, a été trouvée au bord de la mer, qu'elle m'a été apportée pour être décachetée par moi, comme c'est la sujétion et la prérogative de ma charge, que je l'ai ouverte en présence des deux jurés assermentés de l'office Jetson, lesquels sont tous deux membres du parlement, William Blathwaith, pour la ville de Bath, et Thomas Jervoise pour Southampton, que les deux jurés ont décrit et certifié le contenu de la gourde, et signé le procès-verbal d'ouverture, conjointement avec moi, que j'ai fait mon rapport à sa majesté, que, par l'ordre de la reine, toutes les formalités légales nécessaires ont été remplies avec la discrétion que commande une si délicate matière, et que la dernière, la confrontation, vient d'avoir lieu; cela veut dire que vous avez un million de rentes; cela veut dire que vous êtes lord du Royaume-Uni de la Grande-Bretagne, législateur et juge, juge suprême, législateur souverain, vêtu de la pourpre et de l'hermine, égal aux princes, semblable aux empereurs, que vous avez sur la tête la couronne de pair, et que vous allez épouser une duchesse, fille d'un roi.

Sous cette transfiguration croulant sur lui à coups de tonnerre, Gwynplaine s'évanouit.

II

CE QUI ERRE NE SE TROMPE PAS

Toute cette aventure était venue d'un soldat qui avait trouvé une bouteille au bord de la mer.

Racontons le fait.

A tout fait se rattache un engrenage.

Un jour un des quatre canonniers composant la garnison du château de Calshor avait ramassé dans le sable à marée basse une gourde d'osier jetée là par le flux. Cette gourde, toute moisie, était bouchée d'un bouchon goudronné. Le soldat avait porté l'épave au colonel du château, et le colonel l'avait transmise à l'amiral d'Angleterre. L'amiral, c'était l'amirauté; pour les épaves, l'amirauté, c'était Barkilphedro. Barkilphedro avait ouvert et débouché la gourde, et l'avait portée à la reine. La reine avait immédiatement avisé. Deux conseillers considérables avaient ét informés et consultés, le lord-chancelier, qui est, de par la loi, «gardien de la conscience du roi d'Angleterre», et le lord-maréchal, qui est «juge des armes et de la descente de la noblesse». Thomas Howard, duc de Norfolk, pair catholique, qui était héréditairement haut-maréchal d'Angleterre, avait fait dire par son député-comte-maréchal Henri Howard, comte de Bindon, qu'il serait de l'avis du lord-chancelier. Quant au lord-chancelier, c'était William Cowper. Il ne faut point confondre ce chancelier avec son homonyme et son contemporain William Cowper, l'anatomiste commentateur de Bidloo, qui publia en Angleterre le Traité des muscles presque au moment o Étienne Abeille publiait en France l'Histoire des os; un chirurgien est distinct d'un lord. Lord William Cowper était célèbre pour avoir, à propos de l'affaire de Talbot Yelverton, vicomte Longueville, émis cette sentence: «qu'au respect de la constitution d'Angleterre, la restauration d'un pair importait plus que la restauration d'un roi». La gourde trouvée à Calshor avait éveillé au plus haut point son attention. L'auteur d'une maxime aime les occasions de l'appliquer. C'était un cas de restauration d'un pair. Des recherches avaient été faites.

Gwynplaine, ayant écriteau sur rue, était facile à trouver.

Hardquanonne aussi. Il n'était pas mort. La prison pourrit l'homme, mais le conserve, si garder c'est conserver. Les gens confiés aux bastilles y étaient rarement dérangés. On ne changeait guère plus de cachot qu’on ne change de cercueil.

Hardquanonne était encore dans le donjon de Chatham. On n’eut qu’à mettre la main dessus. On le transféra de Chatham Londres. En même temps on s’informait en Suisse. Les faits furent reconnus exacts. On leva, dans les greffes locaux, Vevey, à Lausanne, l’acte de mariage de lord Linnaeus en exil, l’acte de naissance de l’enfant, les actes de décès du père et de la mère, et l’on en eut «pour servir ce que de besoin» de doubles expéditions, dûment certifiées. Tout cela s’exécuta dans le plus sévère secret, avec ce qu’on appelait alors la promptitude royale, et avec le «silence de taupe» recommandé et pratiqué par Bacon, et plus tard érigé en loi par Blackstone, pour les affaires de chancellerie et d’état, et pour les choses qualifiées sénatoriales.

Le jussu regis et la signature Jeffreys furent vérifiés.

Pour qui a étudié pathologiquement les cas de caprice dits «bon plaisir», ce jussu regis est tout simple. Pourquoi Jacques II, qui, ce semble, eût dû cacher de tels actes, en laissait-il, au risque même de compromettre la réussite, des traces écrites?

Cynisme. Indifférence hautaine. Ah! vous croyez qu’il n’y a que les filles d’impudiques! la raison d’état l’est aussi. Et se cupit ante videri. Commettre un crime et s’en blasonner, c’est là toute l’histoire. Le roi se tatoue, comme le forçat.

On a intérêt à échapper au gendarme et à l’histoire, on en serait bien fâché, on tient à être connu et reconnu. Voyez mon bras, remarquez ce dessin, un temple de l’amour et un coeur enflamm percé d’une flèche, c’est moi qui suis Lacenaire. Jussu regis. C’est moi qui suis Jacques II. On accomplit une mauvaise action, on met sa marque dessus. Se compléter par l’effronterie, se dénoncer soi-même, faire imperdable son méfait, c’est la bravade insolente du malfaiteur. Christine saisit Monaldeschi, le fait confesser et assassiner, et dit: Je suis reine de Suède chez le roi de France. Il y a le tyran qui se cache, comme Tibère, et le tyran qui se vante, comme Philippe II. L’un est plus scorpion, l’autre est plus léopard. Jacques II était de cette dernière variété. Il avait, on le sait, le visage ouvert et gai, différent en cela de Philippe II. Philippe était lugubre, Jacques était jovial. On est tout de même féroce. Jacques II était le tigre bonasse. Il avait, comme Philippe II, la tranquillité de ses forfaits. Il était monstre par la grâce de Dieu. Donc il n’avait rien à dissimuler et à atténuer, et ses assassinats étaient de droit divin. Il eût volontiers, lui aussi, laissé derrière lui ses archives de Simancas avec tous ses attentats numérotés, datés, classés, étiquetés et mis en ordre, chacun dans son compartiment, comme les poisons dans l’officine d’un pharmacien. Signer ses crimes, c’est royal.

Toute action commise est une traite tirée sur le grand payeur ignoré. Celle-ci venait d’arriver à échéance avec l’endos sinistre Jussu regis.

La reine Anne, point femme d’un côté, en ce qu’elle excellait garder un secret, avait demandé, sur cette grave affaire, au lord-chancelier un rapport confidentiel du genre qualifi «rapport à l’oreille royale». Les rapports de cette sorte ont toujours été usités dans les monarchies. A Vienne, il y avait le conseiller de l’oreille, personnage aulique. C’était une ancienne dignité carlovingienne, l’auricularius des vieilles chartes palatines. Celui qui parle bas à l’empereur.

William, baron Cowper, chancelier d’Angleterre, que la reine croyait, parce qu’il était myope comme elle et plus qu’elle, avait rédigé un mémoire commençant ainsi: «Deux oiseaux étaient aux ordres de Salomon, une huppe, la hudbud, qui parlait toutes les langues, et un aigle, le simourganka, qui couvrait d’ombre avec ses ailes une caravane de vingt mille hommes. De même, sous une autre forme, la providence», etc. Le lord-chancelier constatait le fait d’un héritier de pairie enlevé et mutilé, puis retrouvé. Il ne blâmait point Jacques II, père de la reine après tout. Il donnait même des raisons. Premièrement, il y a les anciennes maximes monarchiques. E senioratu eripimus. In roturagio cadat. Deuxièmement, le droit royal de mutilation existe. Chamberlayne l’a constaté. Corpora et bona nostrorum subjectorum nostra sunt, a dit Jacques Ier, de glorieuse et docte mémoire. Il a été crevé les yeux à des ducs de sang royal pour le bien du royaume. Certains princes, trop voisins du trône, ont été utilement étouffés entre deux matelas, ce qui a passé pour apoplexie. Or, étouffer, c’est plus que mutiler. Le roi de Tunis a arraché les yeux à son père, Muley-Assem, et ses ambassadeurs n’en ont pas moins été reçus par l’empereur. Donc le roi peut ordonner une suppression de membre comme une suppression d’état, etc., c’est légal, etc. Mais une légalité ne détruit pas l’autre. «Si le noyé revient sur l’eau et n’est pas mort, c’est Dieu qui retouche l’action du roi. Si l’héritier se retrouve, que la couronne lui soit rendue. Ainsi il fut fait pour lord Alla, roi de Northumbre, qui lui aussi avait ét bateleur. Ainsi il doit être fait pour Gwynplaine, qui lui aussi est roi, c’est-à-dire lord. La bassesse du métier, traversée et subie par force majeure, ne ternit point le blason; témoin Abdolonyme; qui était roi et qui fut jardinier; témoin Joseph, qui était saint et qui fut menuisier; témoin Apollon, qui était dieu et qui fut berger.» Bref, le savant chancelier concluait la réintégration en tous ses biens et dignités de Fermain, lord Clancharlie, faussement appelé Gwynplaine, «à la seule condition qu'il fût confronté avec le malfaiteur Hardquanonne, et reconnu par ledit». Et sur ce, le chancelier, garde constitutionnel de la conscience royale, rassurait cette conscience.

(Chamberlayne, 2e partie, chap. iv, p. 76.)

Le lord-chancelier rappelait, en post-scriptum, que, au cas o Hardquanonne refuserait de répondre, il devait être appliqu «la peine forte et dure», auquel cas, pour atteindre la période dite de frodmortell voulue par la charte du roi Adelstan, la confrontation devait avoir lieu le quatrième jour; ce qui a bien un peu l'inconvénient que, si le patient murte le second ou le troisième jour, la confrontation devient difficile; mais la loi doit être exécutée. L'inconvénient de la loi fait partie de la loi.

Du reste, dans l'esprit du lord-chancelier, la reconnaissance de Gwynplaine par Hardquanonne ne faisait aucun doute.

Anne, suffisamment informée de la difformité de Gwynplaine, ne voulant point faire tort à sa soeur, à laquelle avaient ét substitués les biens des Clancharlie, décida avec bonheur que la duchesse Josiane serait épousée par le nouveau lord, c'est-à-dire par Gwynplaine.

La réintégration de lord Fermain Clancharlie était du reste un cas très simple, l'héritier étant légitime et direct. Pour les filiations douteuses ou pour les pairies «in abeyance revendiquées par des collatéraux, la chambre des lords doit être consultée. Ainsi, sans remonter plus haut, elle le fut en 1782 pour la baronnie de Sidney, réclamée par Élisabeth Perry; en 1798, pour la baronnie de Beaumont, réclamée par Thomas Stapleton; en 1803, pour la baronnie de Chandos, réclamée par le révérend Tymewell Brydges; en 1813, pour la pairie-comté de Banbury, réclamée par le lieutenant général Knollys, etc.; mais ici rien de pareil. Aucun litige; une légitimité évidente; un droit clair et certain; il n'y avait point lieu à saisir la chambre, et la reine, assistée du lord-chancelier, suffisait pour reconnaître et admettre le nouveau lord.

Barkilphedro mena tout.

L’affaire, grâce à lui, resta tellement souterraine, le secret fut si hermétiquement gardé, que ni Josiane, ni lord David n’eurent vent du prodigieux fait qui se creusait sous eux.

Josiane, très altière, avait un escarpement qui la rendait aisée à bloquer. Elle s’isolait d’elle-même. Quant à lord David, on l’envoya en mer, sur les côtes de Flandre. Il allait perdre la lordship et ne s’en doutait pas. Notons ici un détail. Il advint qu’à dix lieues du mouillage de la station navale commandée par lord David, un capitaine nommé Halyburton força la flotte française. Le comte de Pembroke, président du conseil, porta sur une proposition de promotion de contre-amiraux ce capitaine Halyburton. Anne raya Halyburton et mit lord David Dirry-Moir à sa place, afin que lord David eût au moins, lorsqu’il apprendrait qu’il n’était plus pair, la consolation d’être contre-amiral.

Anne se sentit contente. Un mari horrible à sa soeur, un beau grade à lord David. Malice et bonté.

Sa majesté allait se donner la comédie. En outre, elle se disait qu’elle réparait un abus de pouvoir de son auguste père, qu’elle restituait un membre à la pairie, qu’elle agissait en grande reine, qu’elle protégeait l’innocence selon la volonté de Dieu, que la providence dans ses saintes et impénétrables voies, etc.

C’est bien doux de faire une action juste, qui est désagréable quelqu’un qu’on n’aime pas.

Du reste, savoir que le futur mari de sa soeur était difforme avait suffi à la reine. De quelle façon ce Gwynplaine était-il difforme, quel genre de laideur était-ce? Barkilphedro n’avait pas tenu à en informer la reine, et Anne n’avait pas daigné s’en enquérir. Profond dédain royal. Qu’importait d’ailleurs? La chambre des lords ne pouvait qu’être reconnaissante. Le lord-chancelier, l’oracle, avait parlé. Restaurer un pair, c’est restaurer toute la pairie. La royauté, en cette occasion, se montrait bonne et respectueuse gardienne du privilège de la pairie. Quel que fût le visage du nouveau lord, un visage n’est pas une objection contre un droit. Anne se dit plus ou moins tout cela, et alla simplement à son but, à ce grand but féminin et royal, se satisfaire.

La reine était alors à Windsor, ce qui mettait une certaine distance entre les intrigues de cour et le public.

Les personnes seules d’absolue nécessité furent dans le secret de ce qui allait se passer.

Quant à Barkilphedro, il fut joyeux, ce qui ajouta à son visage une expression lugubre.

La chose en ce monde qui peut le plus être hideuse, c'est la joie.

Il eut cette volupté de déguster le premier la gourde de Hardquanonne. Il eut l'air peu surpris, l'étonnement étant d'un petit esprit. D'ailleurs, n'est-ce pas? cela lui était bien dû, à lui qui depuis si longtemps faisait faction à la porte du hasard. Puisqu'il attendait, il fallait bien que quelque chose arrivât.

Ce nil mirari faisait partie de sa contenance. Au fond, disons-le, il avait été émerveillé. Quelqu'un qui eût pu lui ôter le masque qu'il mettait sur sa conscience devant Dieu même, eût trouvé ceci: Précisément, en cet instant-là, Barkilphedro commençait à être convaincu qu'il lui serait décidément impossible, à lui ennemi intime et infime, de faire une fracture à cette haute existence de la duchesse Josiane. De là un accès frénétique d'animosité latente. Il était parvenu à ce paroxysme qu'on appelle le découragement. D'autant plus furieux qu'il désespérait. Ronger son frein, expression tragique et vraie! un méchant rongeant l'impuissance. Barkilphedro était peut-être au moment de renoncer, non à vouloir du mal à Josiane, mais à lui en faire; non à la rage, mais à la morsure. Pourtant, quelle chute, lâcher prise! garder désormais sa haine dans le fourreau, comme un poignard de musée! Rude humiliation.

Tout à coup, à point nommé, — l'immense aventure universelle se plaît à ces coïncidences, — la gourde de Hardquanonne vient, de vague en vague, se placer entre ses mains. Il y a dans l'inconnu on ne sait quoi d'apprivoisé qui semble être aux ordres du mal.

Barkilphedro, assisté des deux témoins quelconques, jurés indifférents de l'amirauté, débouche la gourde, trouve le parchemin, le déploie, lit... — Qu'on se représente cet épanouissement monstrueux!

Il est étrange de penser que la mer, le vent, les espaces, les flux et les reflux, les orages, les calmes, les souffles, peuvent se donner beaucoup de peine pour arriver à faire le bonheur d'un méchant. Cette complicité avait duré quinze ans. Oeuvre mystérieuse. Pendant ces quinze années, l'océan n'avait pas ét une minute sans y travailler. Les flots s'étaient transmis de l'un à l'autre la bouteille surnageante, les écueils avaient esquivé le choc du verre, aucune fêlure n'avait lézardé la gourde, aucun frottement n'avait usé le bouchon, les algues n'avaient point pourri l'osier, les coquillages n'avaient point rongé le mot Hardquanonne, l'eau n'avait pas pénétré dans l'épave, la moisissure n'avait pas dissous le parchemin, l'humidité n'avait pas effacé l’écriture, que de soins l’abîme avait dû se donner! Et de cette façon, ce que Gernardus avait jeté à l’ombre, l’ombre l’avait remis à Barkilphedro, et le message envoyé à Dieu était parvenu au démon. Il y avait eu abus de confiance dans l’immensité, et l’ironie obscure mêlée aux choses s’était arrangée de telle sorte qu’elle avait compliqué ce triomphe loyal, l’enfant perdu Gwynplaine redevenant lord Clancharlie, d’une victoire venimeuse, qu’elle avait fait méchamment une bonne action, et qu’elle avait mis la justice au service de l’iniquité. Retirer sa victime à Jacques II, c’était donner une proie à Barkilphedro. Relever Gwynplaine, c’était livrer Josiane. Barkilphedro réussissait; et c’était pour cela que pendant tant d’années les vagues, les lames, les rafales, avaient ballotté, secoué, poussé, jeté, tourmenté et respect cette bulle de verre où il y avait tant d’existences mêlées!

c’était pour cela qu’il y avait eu entente cordiale entre les vents, les marées et les tempêtes! La vaste agitation du prodige complaisante pour un misérable! l’infini collaborateur d’un ver de terre! la destinée a de ces volontés sombres.

Barkilphedro eut un éclair d’orgueil titanique. Il se dit que tout cela avait été exécuté à son intention. Il se sentit centre et but.

Il se trompait. Réhabilitons le hasard. Ce n’était point là le vrai sens du fait remarquable dont profitait la haine de Barkilphedro. L’océan se faisant père et mère d’un orphelin, envoyant la tourmente à ses bourreaux, brisant la barque qui a repoussé l’enfant, engloutissant les mains jointes des naufragés, refusant toutes leurs supplications et n’acceptant d’eux que leur repentir, la tempête recevant un dépôt des mains de la mort, le robuste navire où était le forfait remplacé par la fiole fragile où est la réparation, la mer changeant de rôle, comme une panthère qui se ferait nourrice, et se mettant à bercer, non l’enfant, mais sa destinée, pendant qu’il grandit ignorant de tout ce que le gouffre fait pour lui, les vagues, à qui a ét jetée la gourde, veillant sur ce passé dans lequel il y a un avenir, l’ouragan soufflant dessus avec bonté, les courants dirigeant la frêle épave à travers l’insondable itinéraire de l’eau, les ménagements des algues, des houles, des rochers, toute la vaste écume de l’abîme prenant sous sa protection un innocent, l’onde imperturbable comme une conscience, le chaos rétablissant l’ordre, le monde des ténèbres aboutissant à une clarté, toute l’ombre employée à cette sortie d’astre, la vérité; le proscrit consolé dans sa tombe, l’héritier rendu à l’héritage, le crime du roi cassé, la préméditation divine obéie, le petit, le faible, l’abandonné, ayant l’infini pour tuteur; voilà ce que Barkilphedro eût pu voir dans l’événement dont il triomphait; voilà ce qu’il ne vit pas. Il ne se dit point que tout avait ét fait pour Gwynplaine; il se dit que tout avait été fait pour Barkilphedro; et qu’il en valait la peine. Tels sont les satans.

Du reste, pour s’étonner qu’une épave fragile ait pu nager quinze ans sans être avariée, il faudrait peu connaître la profonde douceur de l’océan. Quinze ans, ce n’est rien. Le 4 octobre 1867, dans le Morbihan, entre l’île de Groix, la pointe de la presqu’île de Gavres et le rocher des Errants, des pêcheurs de Port-Louis ont trouvé une amphore romaine du quatrième siècle, couverte d’arabesques par les incrustations de la mer. Cette amphore avait flotté quinze cents ans.

Quelque apparence flegmatique que voulût garder Barkilphedro, sa stupéfaction avait égalé sa joie.

Tout s’offrait; tout était comme préparé. Les tronçons de l’aventure qui allait satisfaire sa haine étaient d’avance épars à sa portée. Il n’y avait qu’à les rapprocher et à faire les soudures. Ajustage amusant à exécuter. Ciselure.

Gwynplaine! il connaissait ce nom. Masca ridens! Comme tout le monde, il avait été voir l’Homme qui Rit. Il avait lu l’enseigne-écriteau accrochée à l’inn Tadcaster ainsi qu’on lit une affiche de spectacle qui attire la foule; il l’avait remarquée; il se la rappela sur-le-champ dans les moindres détails, quitte d’ailleurs à vérifier ensuite; cette affiche, dans l’évocation électrique qui se fit en lui, reparut devant son oeil profond et vint se placer à côté du parchemin des naufragés, comme la réponse à côté de la question, comme le mot à côté de l’énigme, et ces lignes: «Ici l’on voit Gwynplaine abandonn l’âge de dix ans, la nuit du 29 janvier 1690, au bord de la mer, à Portland», prirent brusquement sous son regard un resplendissement d’apocalyse. Il eut cette vision, le flamboiement de Mane Thecel Pharès sur un boniment de la foire.

C’en était fait de tout cet échafaudage qui était l’existence de Josiane. Écroulement subit. L’enfant perdu était retrouvé. Il y avait un lord Clancharlie. David Dirry-Moir était vidé. La pairie, la richesse, la puissance, le rang, tout cela sortait de lord David et entrait dans Gwynplaine. Tout, châteaux, chasses, forêts, hôtels, palais, domaines, y compris Josiane, était Gwynplaine. Et Josiane, quelle solution! Qui maintenant avait-elle devant elle? Illustre et hautaine, un histrion; belle et précieuse, un monstre. Eût-on jamais espéré cela? La vérit est que Barkilphedro était dans l'enthousiasme. Toutes les combinaisons les plus haineuses peuvent être dépassées par la munificence infernale de l'imprévu. Quand la réalité veut, elle fait des chefs-d'oeuvre. Barkilphedro trouvait bêtes tous ses rêves. Il avait mieux.

Le changement qui allait se faire par lui se fût-il fait contre lui, il ne l'eût pas moins voulu. Il existe de féroces insectes désintéressés qui piquent sachant qu'ils mourront de la piqûre.

Barkilphedro était cette vermine-là.

Mais cette fois, il n'avait pas le mérite du désintéressement.

Lord David Dirry-Moir ne lui devait rien, et lord Fermain Clancharlie allait lui devoir tout. De protégé, Barkilphedro allait devenir protecteur. Et protecteur de qui? d'un pair d'Angleterre. Il aurait un lord à lui! un lord qui serait sa créature! Le premier pli, Barkilphedro comptait bien le lui donner. Et ce lord serait le beau-frère morganatique de la reine! Étant si laid, il plairait à la reine de toute la quantité dont il déplairait à Josiane. Poussé par cette faveur, et en mettant des habits graves et modestes, Barkilphedro pouvait devenir un personnage. Il s'était toujours destiné à l'église.

Il avait une vague envie d'être évêque.

En attendant, il était heureux.

Quel beau succès! et comme toute cette quantité de besogne du hasard était bien faite! Sa vengeance, car il appelait cela sa vengeance, lui était mollement apportée par le flot. Il n'avait pas été vainement embusqué.

L'écueil, c'était lui. L'épave, c'était Josiane. Josiane venait s'échouer sur Barkilphedro! Profonde extase scélérate.

Il était habile à cet art qu'on appelle la suggestion, et qui consiste à faire dans l'esprit des autres une petite incision o l'on met une idée à soi; tout en se tenant à l'écart, et sans avoir l'air de s'en mêler, il s'arrangea de façon à ce que Josiane allât à la baraque Green-Box et vît Gwynplaine. Cela ne pouvait pas nuire. Le saltimbanque vu en sa bassesse, bon ingrédient dans la combinaison. Plus tard, cela assaisonnerait.

Il avait silencieusement tout apprêté d'avance. Ce qu'il voulait, c'était on ne sait quoi de soudain. Le travail qu'il avait exécuté ne pourrait être exprimé que par ces mots étranges: construire un coup de foudre.

Les préliminaires achevés, il avait veillé à ce que toutes les formalités voulues fussent accomplies dans les formes légales.

Le secret n'en avait point souffert, le silence faisant partie de la loi.

La confrontation de Hardquanonne avec Gwynplaine avait eu lieu; Barkilphedro y avait assisté. On vient d’en voir le résultat.

Le même jour, un carrosse de poste de la reine vint brusquement, de la part de sa majesté, chercher lady Josiane à Londres pour la conduire à Windsor où Anne en ce moment passait la saison.

Josiane, pour quelque chose qu’elle avait dans l’esprit, eût bien souhaité désobéir, ou du moins retarder d’un jour son obéissance et remettre ce départ au lendemain, mais la vie de cour ne comporte point ces résistances-là. Elle dut se mettre immédiatement en route, et abandonner sa résidence de Londres, Hunkerville-house, pour sa résidence de Windsor, Corleone-lodge.

La duchesse Josiane avait quitté Londres au moment même où le wapentake se présentait à l’inn Tadcaster pour enlever Gwynplaine et le mener à la cave pénale de Southwark.

Quand elle arriva à Windsor, l’huissier de la verge noire, qui garde la porte de la chambre de présence, l’informa que sa majesté était enfermée avec le lord chancelier, et ne pourrait la recevoir que le lendemain; qu’elle eût en conséquence à se tenir, à Corleone-lodge, à la disposition de sa majesté, et que sa majesté lui enverrait directement ses ordres le lendemain matin son réveil. Josiane rentra chez elle fort dépitée, soupa de mauvaise humeur, eut la migraine, congédia tout le monde, son mousse excepté, puis le congédia lui-même, et se coucha qu’il faisait encore jour.

En arrivant elle avait appris que, ce même lendemain, lord David Dirry-Moir, ayant reçu en mer l’ordre de venir immédiatement prendre les ordres de la reine, était attendu à Windsor.

AUCUN HOMME NE PASSERAIT BRUSQUEMENT DE LA SIBÉRIE AU SÉNÉGAL SANS PERDRE CONNAISSANCE. (Humboldt.)

L'évanouissement d'un homme, même le plus ferme et le plus énergique, sous un brusque coup de massue de la fortune, n'a rien qui doive surprendre. Un homme s'assomme par l'imprévu comme un boeuf par le merlin. François d'Albescola, le même qui arrachait aux ports turcs leur chaîne de fer, demeura, quand on le fit pape, un jour entier sans connaissance. Or, du cardinal au pape l'enjambée est moindre que du saltimbanque au pair d'Angleterre.

Rien de violent comme les ruptures d'équilibre.

Quand Gwynplaine revint à lui et rouvrit les yeux, il était nuit.

Gwynplaine était dans un fauteuil au milieu d'une vaste chambre toute tendue de velours pourpre, murs, plafond et plancher. On marchait sur du velours. Près de lui se tenait debout, tête nue, l'homme au gros ventre et au manteau de voyage qui était sorti de derrière un pilier dans la cave de Southwark. Gwynplaine était seul dans cette chambre avec cet homme. De son fauteuil, en étendant le bras, il pouvait toucher deux tables, portant chacune une girandole de six chandelles de cire allumées. Sur l'une de ces tables, il y avait des papiers et une cassette; sur l'autre un en-cas, volaille froide, vin, brandy, servi sur un plateau de vermeil.

Par le vitrage d'une longue fenêtre allant du plancher au plafond, un clair ciel nocturne d'avril faisait entrevoir au dehors un demi-cercle de colonnes autour d'une cour d'honneur fermée d'un portail à trois portes, une fort large et deux basses; la porte cochère, très grande, au milieu; à droite, la porte chevalière, moindre; à gauche, la porte piétonne, petite.

Ces portes étaient fermées de grilles dont les pointes brillaient; une haute sculpture couronnait la porte centrale.

Les colonnes étaient probablement en marbre blanc, ainsi que le pavage de la cour, qui faisait un effet de neige et qui encadrait de sa nappe de lames plates une mosaïque confusément distincte dans l'ombre; cette mosaïque, sans doute, vue le jour, eût offert au regard, avec tous ses émaux et toutes ses couleurs, un gigantesque blason, selon la mode florentine. Des zigzags de balustres montaient et descendaient, indiquant des escaliers de terrasses. Au-dessus de la cour se dressait une immense architecture brumeuse et vague à cause de la nuit. Des intervalles de ciel, pleins d'étoiles, découpaient une silhouette de palais.

On apercevait un toit démesuré, des pignons à volutes, des mansardes à visières comme des casques, des cheminées pareilles des tours, et des entablements couverts de dieux et de déesses immobiles. A travers la colonnade jaillissait dans la pénombre une de ces fontaines de féerie, doucement bruyantes, qui se versent de vasque en vasque, mêlent la pluie à la cascade, ressemblent à une dispersion d'écrin, et font au vent une folle distribution de leurs diamants et de leurs perles comme pour désennuyer les statues qui les entourent. De longues rangées de fenêtres se profilaient, séparées par des panoplies en ronde bosse, et par des bustes sur des piédouches. Sur les acrotères, des trophées et des morions à panaches de pierre alternaient avec les dieux.

Dans la chambre où était Gwynplaine, au fond, en face de la fenêtre, on voyait d'un côté une cheminée aussi haute que la muraille, et de l'autre, sous un dais, un de ces spacieux lits féodaux où l'on monte avec une échelle et où l'on peut se coucher en travers. L'escabeau du lit était à côté. Un rang de fauteuils au bas des murs et un rang de chaises en avant des fauteuils complétaient l'ameublement. Le plafond était de forme tumbon; un grand feu de bois à la française flambait dans la cheminée; à la richesse des flammes et à leurs stries roses et vertes, un connaisseur eût constaté que ce feu était de bois de frêne, très grand luxe; la chambre était si grande que les deux girandoles la laissaient obscure. Çà et là, des portières, baissées et flottantes, indiquaient des communications avec d'autres chambres. Cet ensemble avait l'aspect carré et massif du temps de Jacques Ier, mode vieillie et superbe. Comme le tapis et la tenture de la chambre, le dais, le baldaquin, le lit, l'escabeau, les rideaux, la cheminée, les housses des tables, les fauteuils, les chaises, tout était velours cramoisi. Pas d'or, si ce n'est au plafond. Là, à égale distance des quatre angles, luisait, appliqué à plat, un énorme bouclier rond de métal repoussé, où étincelait un éblouissant relief d'armoiries; dans ces armoiries, sur deux blasons accostés, on distinguait un tortil de baron et une couronne de marquis; était-ce du cuivre doré? était-ce du vermeil? on ne savait. Cela semblait de l'or. Et au centre de ce plafond seigneurial, magnifique ciel obscur, ce flamboyant écusson avait le sombre resplendissement d'un soleil dans de la nuit.

Un homme sauvage dans lequel est amalgamé un homme libre est peu près aussi inquiet dans un palais que dans une prison. Ce lieu superbe était troublant. Toute magnificence dégage de l'effroi. Quel pouvait être l'habitant de cette demeure auguste?
A quel colosse toute cette grandeur appartenait-elle? De quel lion ce palais était-il l'antre? Gwynplaine, encore mal éveillé, avait le coeur serré.

— Où est-ce que je suis? dit-il.

L'homme qui était debout devant lui, répondit:

— Vous êtes dans votre maison, milord.

FASCINATION

II faut du temps pour revenir à la surface.

Gwynplaine avait été jeté au fond de la stupéfaction.

On ne prend pas tout de suite pied dans l’inconnu.

Il y a des déroutes d’idées comme il y a des déroutes d’armées; le ralliement ne se fait point immédiatement.

On se sent en quelque sorte épars. On assiste à une bizarre dissipation de soi-même.

Dieu est le bras, le hasard est la fronde, l’homme est le caillou. Résistez donc, une fois lancé.

Gwynplaine, qu’on nous passe le mot, ricochait d’un étonnement sur l’autre. Après la lettre d’amour de la duchesse, la révélation de la cave de Southwark.

Dans une destinée, quand l’inattendu commence, préparez-vous ceci: coup sur coup. Cette farouche porte une fois ouverte, les surprises s’y précipitent. La brèche faite à votre mur, le pêle-mêle des événement s’y engouffre. L’extraordinaire ne vient pas pour une fois.

L’extraordinaire, c’est une obscurité. Cette obscurité était sur Gwynplaine. Ce qui lui arrivait lui semblait inintelligible. Il percevait tout à travers ce brouillard qu’une commotion profonde laisse dans l’intelligence comme la poussière d’un écroulement.

La secousse avait été de fond en comble. Rien de net ne s’offrait à lui. Pourtant la transparence se rétablit toujours peu à peu. La poussière tombe. D’instant en instant, la densit de l’étonnement décroît. Gwynplaine était comme quelqu’un qui aurait l’oeil ouvert et fixe dans un songe, et qui tâcherait de voir ce qu’il y a dedans. Il décomposait ce nuage, puis le recomposait. Il avait des intermittences d’égarement. Il subissait cette oscillation de l’esprit dans l’imprévu, laquelle, tour à tour, vous pousse du côté où l’on comprend, puis vous ramène du côté où l’on ne comprend plus. A qui n’est-il pas arrivé d’avoir ce balancier dans le cerveau?

Par degré la dilatation se faisait en sa pensée dans les ténèbres de l’incident comme elle s’était faite en sa pupille dans les ténèbres du souterrain de Southwark. Le difficile, c'était de parvenir à mettre un certain espacement entre tant de sensations accumulées. Pour que cette combustion des idées troubles, dite compréhension, puisse s'opérer, il faut de l'air entre les émotions. Ici l'air manquait. L'événement, pour ainsi dire, n'était pas respirable. En entrant dans la terrifiante cave de Southwark, Gwynplaine s'était attendu au carcan du forçat; on lui avait mis sur la tête la couronne de pair. Comment était-ce possible? Il n'y avait point assez de place entre ce que Gwynplaine avait redouté et ce qui lui arrivait, cela s'était succédé trop vite, son effroi se changeait en autre chose trop brusquement pour que ce fût clair. Les deux contrastes étaient trop serrés l'un contre l'autre. Gwynplaine faisait effort pour retirer son esprit de cet étau.

Il se taisait. C'est l'instinct des grandes stupeurs qui sont sur la défensive plus qu'on ne croit. Qui ne dit rien fait face à tout. Un mot qui vous échappe, saisi par l'engrenage inconnu, peut vous tirer tout entier sous on ne sait quelles roues.

L'écrasement, c'est la peur des petits. La foule craint toujours qu'on ne lui mette le pied dessus. Or Gwynplaine avait été de la foule bien longtemps.

Un état singulier de l'inquiétude humaine se traduit par ce mot: voir venir. Gwynplaine était dans cet état. On ne se sent pas encore en équilibre avec une situation qui surgit. On surveille quelque chose qui doit avoir une suite. On est vaguement attentif. On voit venir. Quoi? on ne sait. Qui? on regarde.

L'homme au gros ventre répéta:

— Vous êtes dans votre maison, milord.

Gwynplaine se tâta. Dans les surprises, on regarde, pour s'assurer que les choses existent, puis on se tâte, pour s'assurer qu'on existe soi-même.

C'était bien à lui qu'on parlait; mais lui-même était autre. Il n'avait plus son capingot et son esclavine de cuir. Il avait un gilet de drap d'argent, et un habit de satin qu'en le touchant il sentait brodé; il sentait une grosse bourse pleine dans la poche du gilet. Un large haut-de-chausses de velours recouvrait son étroite culotte collante de clown; il avait des souliers à hauts talons rouges.

De même qu'on l'avait transporté dans ce palais, on lui avait changé ses vêtements.

L'homme reprit:

— Que votre seigneurie daigne se souvenir de ceci: C’est moi qui me nomme Barkilphedro. Je suis clerc de l’amirauté. C’est moi qui ai ouvert la gourde de Hardquanonne et qui en ai fait sortir votre destinée. Ainsi, dans les contes arabes, un pêcheur fait sortir d’une bouteille un géant.

Gwynplaine fixa ses yeux sur le visage souriant qui lui parlait.

Barkilphedro continua:

— Outre ce palais, milord. vous avez Hunkerville-house, qui est plus grand. Vous avez Clancharlie-castle, où est assise votre pairie, et qui est une forteresse du temps d’Édouard le Vieux.

Vous avez dix-neuf baillis à vous, avec leurs villages et leurs paysans. Ce qui met sous votre bannière de lord et de nobleman environ quatrevingt mille vassaux et fiscalins. A Clancharlie, vous êtes juge, juge de tout, des biens et des personnes, et vous tenez votre cour de baron. Le roi n’a de plus que vous que le droit de frapper monnaie. Le roi, que la loi normande qualifie chief-signor, a justice, cour et coin. Coin, c’est monnaie. A cela près, vous êtes roi dans votre seigneurie comme lui dans son royaume. Vous avez droit, comme baron, à un gibet de quatre piliers en Angleterre, et, comme marquis, à une potence de sept poteaux en Sicile; la justice du simple seigneur ayant deux piliers, celle du châtelain trois, et celle du duc huit. Vous êtes qualifié prince dans les anciennes chartres de Northumbre. Vous êtes allié aux vicomtes Valentia en Irlande, qui sont Power, et aux comtes d’Umfraville en Écosse, qui sont Angus. Vous êtes chef de clan comme Campbell, Ardmannach, et Mac-Callummore. Vous avez huit châtellenies, Reculver, Buxton, Hell-Kerters, Homble, Moricambe, Gumdraith, Trenwardraith et d’autres. Vous avez un droit sur les tourbières de Pillinmore et sur les carrières d’albâtre de Trent; de plus vous avez tout le pays de Penneth-chase, et vous avez une montagne avec une ancienne ville qui est dessus. La ville s’appelle Vinecaunton; la montagne s’appelle Moil-enlli. Tout cela vous fait un revenu de quarante mille livres sterling, c’est-à-dire quarante fois les vingt-cinq mille francs de rente dont se contente un français.

Pendant que Barkilphedro parlait, Gwynplaine, dans un crescendo de stupeur, se souvenait. Le souvenir est un engloutissement qu’un mot peut remuer jusqu’au fond. Tous ces noms prononcés par Barkilphedro, Gwynplaine les connaissait. Ils étaient inscrits aux dernières lignes de ces deux placards qui tapissaient la cahute où s’était écoulée son enfance, et, à force d’y avoir laissé machinalement errer ses yeux, il les savait par coeur.

En arrivant, orphelin abandonné, dans la baraque roulante de Weymouth, il y avait trouvé son héritage inventorié qui l'attendait, et le matin, quand le pauvre petit s'éveillait, la première chose qu'épelait son regard insouciant et distrait, c'était sa seigneurie et sa pairie. Détail étrange qui s'ajoutait à toutes ses surprises, pendant quinze ans, rôdant de carrefour en carrefour, clown d'un tréteau nomade, gagnant son pain au jour le jour, ramassant des liards et vivant de miettes, il avait voyagé avec sa fortune affichée sur sa misère.

Barkilphedro toucha de l'index la cassette qui était sur la table:

— Milord, cette cassette contient deux mille guinées que sa gracieuse majesté la reine vous envoie pour vos premiers besoins.

Gwynplaine fit un mouvement.

— Ce sera pour mon père Ursus, dit-il.

— Soit, milord, fit Barkilphedro. Ursus, à l'inn Tadcaster. Le sergent de la coiffe, qui nous a accompagnés jusqu'ici et qui va repartir tout à l'heure, les lui portera. Peut-être irai-je Londres. En ce cas, ce serait moi. Je m'en charge.

— Je les lui porterai moi-même, repartit Gwynplaine.

Barkilphedro cessa de sourire, et dit:

— Impossible.

Il y a une inflexion de voix qui souligne. Barkilphedro eut cet accent. Il s'arrêta comme pour mettre un point après le mot qu'il venait de dire. Puis il continua, avec ce ton respectueux et particulier du valet qui se sent le maître:

— Milord, vous êtes ici à vingt-trois milles de Londres, Corleone-lodge, dans votre résidence de cour, contiguë au château royal de Windsor. Vous y êtes sans que personne le sache. Vous y avez été transporté dans une voiture fermée qui vous attendait à la porte de la geôle de Southwark. Les gens qui vous ont introduit dans ce palais ignorent qui vous êtes, mais me connaissent, et cela suffit. Vous avez pu être amené jusqu'à cet appartement, au moyen d'une clef secrète que j'ai. Il y a dans la maison des personnes endormies, et ce n'est pas l'heure de réveiller les gens. C'est pourquoi nous avons le temps d'une explication, qui sera courte d'ailleurs. Je vais vous la faire.

J'ai commission de sa majesté.

Barkilphedro se mit à feuilleter tout en parlant une liasse de dossiers qui était près de la cassette.

— Milord, voici votre patente de pair. Voici le brevet de votre marquisat sicilien. Voici les parchemins et diplômes de vos huit baronnies avec les sceaux de onze rois, depuis Baldret, roi de Kent, jusqu’à Jacques VI et Ier, roi d’Angleterre et d’Écosse.

Voici vos lettres de préséance. Voici vos baux à rentes, et les titres et descriptions de vos fiefs, alleux, mouvances, pays et domaines. Ce que vous avez au-dessus de votre tête dans ce blason qui est au plafond, ce sont vos deux couronnes, le tortil à perles de baron et le cercle à fleurons de marquis. Ici, côté, dans votre vestiaire, est votre robe de pair de velours rouge à bandes d’hermine. Aujourd’hui même, il y a quelques heures, le lord-chancelier, et le député-comte-maréchal d’Angleterre, informés du résultat de votre confrontation avec le comprachicos Hardquanonne, ont pris les ordres de sa majesté. Sa majesté a signé selon son bon plaisir qui est la même chose que la loi. Toutes les formalités sont remplies. Demain, pas plus tard que demain, vous serez admis à la chambre des lords; on y délibère depuis quelques jours sur un bill présenté par la couronne ayant pour objet d’augmenter de cent mille livres sterling, qui sont deux millions cinq cent mille livres de France, la dotation annuelle du duc de Cumberland, mari de la reine; vous pourrez prendre part à la discussion.

Barkilphedro s’interrompit, respira lentement, et reprit:

— Pourtant rien n’est fait encore. On n’est pas pair d’Angleterre malgré soi. Tout peut s’annuler et disparaître, moins que vous ne compreniez. Un événement qui se dissipe avant d’éclore, cela se voit dans la politique. Milord, le silence cette heure est encore sur vous. La chambre des lords ne sera mise au fait que demain. Le secret de toute votre affaire a ét gardé, par raison d’état, laquelle est d’une conséquence tellement considérable que les personnes graves, seules informées en ce moment de votre existence et de vos droits, les oublieront immédiatement, si la raison d’état leur commande de les oublier.

Ce qui est dans la nuit peut rester dans la nuit. Il est aisé de vous effacer. Cela est d’autant plus facile que vous avez un frère, fils naturel de votre père et d’une femme qui depuis, pendant l’exil de votre père, a été la maîtresse du roi Charles II, ce qui fait que votre frère est bien en cour; or c’est à ce frère, tout bâtard qu’il est, que reviendrait votre pairie.

Voulez-vous cela? je ne le suppose pas. Eh bien, tout dépend de vous. Il faut obéir à la reine. Vous ne quitterez cette résidence que demain, dans une voiture de sa majesté, et pour aller à la chambre des lords. Milord, voulez-vous être pair d'Angleterre, oui ou non? La reine a des vues sur vous. Elle vous destine à une alliance quasi royale. Lord Fermain Clancharlie, ceci est l'instant décisif. Le destin n'ouvre point une porte sans en fermer une autre. Après de certains pas en avant, un pas en arrière n'est plus possible. Qui entre dans la transfiguration a derrière lui un évanouissement. Milord, Gwynplaine est mort. Comprenez-vous?

Gwynplaine eut un tremblement de la tête aux pieds, puis il se remit.

— Oui, dit-il.

Barkilphedro sourit, salua, prit la cassette sous son manteau, et sortit.

V

ON CROIT SE SOUVENIR, ON OUBLIE

Qu’est-ce que ces étranges changements à vue qui se font dans l’âme humaine?

Gwynplaine avait été en même temps enlevé sur un sommet et précipité dans un abîme.

Il avait le vertige.

Le vertige double.

Le vertige de l’ascension et le vertige de la chute.

Mélange fatal.

Il s’était senti monter et ne s’était pas senti tomber.

Voir un nouvel horizon, c’est redoutable.

Une perspective, cela donne des conseils. Pas toujours bons.

Il avait eu devant lui la trouée féerique, piège peut-être, d’un nuage qui se déchire et qui montre le bleu profond.

Si profond qu’il est obscur.

Il était sur la montagne d’où l’on voit les royaumes de la terre.

Montagne d’autant plus terrible qu’elle n’existe pas. Ceux qui sont sur cette cime sont dans un rêve.

La tentation y est gouffre, et si puissante, que l’enfer sur ce sommet espère corrompre le paradis, et que le diable y apporte Dieu.

Fasciner l’éternité, quelle étrange espérance!

Là où Satan tente Jésus, comment un homme lutterait-il?

Des palais, des châteaux, la puissance, l’opulence, toutes les félicités humaines à perte de vue autour de soi, une mappemonde des jouissances étalées à l’horizon, une sorte de géographie radieuse dont on est le centre; mirage périlleux.

Et qu’on se figure le trouble d’une telle vision pas amenée, sans échelons préalables franchis, sans précaution, sans transition.

Un homme qui s’est endormi dans un trou de taupe et qui se réveille sur la pointe du clocher de Strasbourg; c’était l Gwynplaine.

Le vertige est une espèce de lucidité formidable. Surtout celui qui, vous emportant à la fois vers le jour et vers la nuit, se compose de deux tournoiements en sens inverse.

On voit trop, et pas assez.

On voit tout, et rien.

On est ce que l'auteur de ce livre a appelé quelque part «l'aveugle ébloui».

Gwynplaine, resté seul, se mit à marcher à grands pas. Un bouillonnement précède l'explosion.

A travers cette agitation, dans cette impossibilité de se tenir en place, il méditait. Ce bouillonnement était une liquidation.

Il faisait l'appel de ses souvenirs. Chose surprenante qu'on ait toujours si bien écouté ce qu'on croit à peine avoir entendu! la déclaration des naufragés lue par le shériff dans la cave de Southwark lui revenait parfaitement nette et intelligible; il s'en rappelait chaque mot; il revoyait dessous toute son enfance.

Brusquement il s'arrêta, les mains derrière le dos, regardant le plafond, le ciel, n'importe, ce qui est en haut.

— Revanche! dit-il.

Il fut comme celui qui met sa tête hors de l'eau. Il lui sembla qu'il voyait tout, le passé, l'avenir, le présent, dans le saisissement d'une clarté subite.

Ah! cria-t-il, — car il y a des cris au fond de la pensée, — ah!
c'était donc cela! j'étais lord. Tout se découvre. Ah! l'on m'a volé, trahi, perdu, déshérité, abandonné, assassiné! le cadavre de ma destinée a flotté quinze ans sur la mer, et tout coup il a touché la terre, et il s'est dressé debout et vivant!

Je renais. Je nais! Je sentais bien sous mes haillons palpiter autre chose qu'un misérable, et, quand je me tournais du côté des hommes, je sentais bien qu'ils étaient le troupeau, et que je n'étais pas le chien, mais le berger! Pasteurs des peuples, conducteurs d'hommes, guides et maîtres, c'est là ce qu'étaient mes pères; et ce qu'ils étaient, je le suis! Je suis gentilhomme, et j'ai une épée; je suis baron, et j'ai un casque; je suis marquis, et j'ai un panache; je suis pair, et j'ai une couronne. Ah! l'on m'avait pris tout cela! J'étais l'habitant de la lumière, et l'on m'avait fait l'habitant des ténèbres. Ceux qui avaient proscrit le père ont vendu l'enfant. Quand mon père a été mort, ils lui ont retiré de dessous la tête la pierre de l'exil qu'il avait pour oreiller, et ils me l'ont mise au cou, et ils m'ont jeté dans l'égout. Oh! ces bandits qui ont tortur mon enfance, oui, ils remuent et se dressent au plus profond de ma mémoire, oui, je les revois. J'ai été le morceau de chair becqueté sur une tombe par une troupe de corbeaux. J'ai saign et crié sous toutes ces silhouettes horribles. Ah! c'est donc là qu'on m'avait précipité, sous l'écrasement de ceux qui vont et viennent, sous le trépignement de tous, au-dessous du dernier dessous du genre humain, plus bas que le serf, plus bas que le valet, plus bas que le goujat, plus bas que l'esclave, l'endroit où le chaos devient le cloaque, au fond de la disparition! Et c'est de là que je sors! c'est de là que je remonte! c'est de là que je ressuscite! Et me voilà. Revanche!

Il s'assit, se releva, prit sa tête dans ses mains, se remit marcher, et ce monologue d'une tempête continua en lui:

— Où suis-je? sur le sommet! Où est-ce que je viens m'abattre? sur la cime! Ce faîte, la grandeur, ce dôme du monde, la toute-puissance, c'est ma maison. Ce temple en l'air, j'en suis un des dieux! l'inaccessible, j'y loge. Cette hauteur que je regardais d'en bas, et d'où il tombait tant de rayons que j'en fermais les yeux, cette seigneurie inexpugnable, cette forteresse imprenable des heureux, j'y entre. J'y suis. J'en suis. Ah! tour de roue définitif! j'étais en bas, je suis en haut. En haut, à jamais! me voilà lord, j'aurai un manteau d'écarlate, j'aurai des fleurons sur la tête, j'assisterai au couronnement des rois, ils prêteront serment entre mes mains, je jugerai les ministres et les princes, j'existerai. Des profondeurs où l'on m'avait jeté, je rejaillis jusqu'au zénith. J'ai des palais de ville et de campagne, des hôtels, des jardins, des chasses, des forêts, des carrosses, des millions, je donnerai des fêtes, je ferai des lois, j'aurai le choix des bonheurs et des joies, et le vagabond Gwynplaine, qui n'avait pas le droit de prendre une fleur dans l'herbe, pourra cueillir des astres dans le ciel!

Funèbre rentrée de l'ombre dans une âme. Ainsi s'opérait, en ce Gwynplaine qui avait été un héros, et qui, disons-le, n'avait peut-être pas cessé de l'être, le remplacement de la grandeur morale par la grandeur matérielle. Transition lugubre. Effraction d'une vertu par une troupe de démons qui passe. Surprise faite au côté faible de l'homme. Toutes les choses inférieures qu'on appelle supérieures, les ambitions, les volontés louches de l'instinct, les passions, les convoitises, chassées loin de Gwynplaine par l'assainissement du malheur, reprenaient tumultueusement possession de ce généreux coeur. Et à quoi cela avait-il tenu? à la trouvaille d'un parchemin dans une épave charriée par la mer. Le viol d'une conscience par un hasard, cela se voit.

Gwynplaine buvait à pleine gorgée l’orgueil, ce qui lui faisait l’âme obscure. Tel est ce vin tragique.

Cet étourdissement l’envahissait; il faisait plus qu’y consentir, il le savourait. Effet d’une longue soif. Est-on complice de la coupe où l’on perd sa raison? Il avait toujours vaguement désir cela. Il regardait sans cesse du côté des grands; regarder, c’est souhaiter. L’aiglon ne naît pas impunément dans l’aire.

Être lord. Maintenant, à de certains moments, il trouvait cela tout simple.

Peu d’heures s’étaient écoulées, comme le passé d’hier était déj loin!

Gwynplaine avait rencontré l’embuscade du mieux, ennemi du bien.

Malheur à celui dont on dit: A-t-il du bonheur!

On résiste à l’adversité mieux qu’à la prospérité. On se tire de la mauvaise fortune plus entier que de la bonne. Charybde est la misère, mais Scylla est la richesse. Ceux qui se dressaient sous la foudre sont terrassés par l’éblouissement. Toi qui ne t’étonnais pas du précipice, crains d’être emporté sur les légions d’ailes de la nuée et du songe. L’ascension t’élèvera et t’amoindrira. L’apothéose a une sinistre puissance d’abattre.

Se connaître en bonheur, ce n’est pas facile. Le hasard n’est autre chose qu’un déguisement. Rien ne trompe comme ce visage-là. Est-il la Providence? Est-il la Fatalité?

Une clarté peut ne pas être une clarté. Car la lumière est vérité, et une lueur peut être une perfidie. Vous croyez qu’elle éclaire, non, elle incendie.

Il fait nuit; une main pose une chandelle, vil suif devenu étoile, au bord d’une ouverture dans les ténèbres. Le phalène y va.

Dans quelle mesure est-il responsable?

Le regard du feu fascine le phalène de même que le regard du serpent fascine l’oiseau.

Que le phalène et l’oiseau n’aillent point là, cela leur est-il possible? Est-il possible à la feuille de refuser obéissance au vent? Est-il possible à la pierre de refuser obéissance à la gravitation?

Questions matérielles, qui sont aussi des questions morales.

Après la lettre de la duchesse, Gwynplaine s’était redressé. Il y avait en lui de profondes attaches qui avaient résisté. Mais les bourrasques, après avoir épuisé le vent d’un côté de l’horizon, recommencent de l’autre, et la destinée, comme la nature, a ses acharnements. Le premier coup ébranle, le second déracine.

Hélas! comment tombent les chênes?

Ainsi, celui qui, enfant de dix ans, seul sur la falaise de Portland, prêt à livrer bataille, regardait fixement les combattants à qui il allait avoir affaire, la rafale qui emportait le navire où il comptait s'embarquer, le gouffre qui lui dérobait cette planche de salut, le vide béant dont la menace est de reculer, la terre qui lui refusait un abri, le zénith qui lui refusait une étoile, la solitude sans pitié, l'obscurité sans regard, l'océan, le ciel, toutes les violences dans un infini et toutes les énigmes dans l'autre; celui qui n'avait pas tremblé ni défailli devant l'énormité hostile de l'inconnu; celui qui, tout petit, avait tenu tête à la nuit comme l'ancien Hercule avait tenu tête à la mort, celui qui, dans ce conflit démesuré, avait fait ce défi de mettre toutes les chances contre lui en adoptant un enfant, lui enfant, et en s'embarrassant d'un fardeau, lui fatigué et fragile, rendant ainsi plus faciles les morsures à sa faiblesse, et ôtant lui-même les muselières aux monstres de l'ombre embusqués autour de lui; celui qui, belluaire avant l'âge, avait, tout de suite, dès ses premiers pas hors du berceau, pris corps à corps la destinée; celui que sa disproportion avec la lutte n'avait pas empêché de lutter; celui qui, voyant tout à coup se faire autour de lui une occultation effrayante du genre humain, avait accepté cette éclipse et continué superbement sa marche; celui qui avait su avoir froid, avoir soif, avoir faim, vaillamment; celui qui, pygmée par la stature, avait été colosse par l'âme; ce Gwynplaine qui avait vaincu l'immense vent de l'abîme sous sa double forme, tempête et misère, chancelait sous ce souffle, une vanité!

Ainsi, quand elle a épuisé les détresses, les dénûments, les orages, les rugissements, les catastrophes, les agonies, sur un homme resté debout, la Fatalité se met à sourire, et l'homme, brusquement devenu ivre, trébuche.

Le sourire de la Fatalité. S'imagine-t-on rien de plus terrible? C'est la dernière ressource de l'impitoyable essayeur d'âmes qui éprouve les hommes. Le tigre qui est dans le destin fait parfois patte de velours. Préparation redoutable. Douceur hideuse du monstre.

La coïncidence d'un affaiblissement avec un agrandissement, tout homme a pu l'observer en soi. Une croissance soudaine disloque et donne la fièvre.

Gwynplaine avait dans le cerveau le tourbillonnement vertigineux d'une foule de nouveautés, tout le clair-obscur de la métamorphose, on ne sait quelles confrontations étranges, le choc du passé contre l'avenir, deux Gwynplaines, lui-même double; en arrière, un enfant en guenilles, sorti de la nuit, rôdant, grelottant, affamé, faisant rire, en avant, un seigneur éclatant, fastueux, superbe, éblouissant Londres. Il se dépouillait de l'un et s'amalgamait à l'autre. Il sortait du saltimbanque et entrait dans le lord. Changements de peau qui sont parfois des changements d'âme. Par instants cela ressemblait trop au songe.

C'était complexe, mauvais et bon. Il pensait à son père. Chose poignante, un père qui est un inconnu. Il essayait de se le figurer. Il pensait à ce frère dont on venait de lui parler.

Ainsi, une famille! Quoi! une famille, à lui Gwynplaine! Il se perdait dans des échafaudages fantastiques. Il avait des apparitions de magnificences; des solennités inconnues s'en allaient en nuage devant lui; il entendait des fanfares.

— Et puis, disait-il, je serai éloquent.

Et il se représentait une entrée splendide à la chambre des lords. Il arrivait gonflé de choses nouvelles. Que n'avait-il pas à dire? Quelle provision il avait faite! Quel avantage d'être, au milieu d'eux, l'homme qui a vu, touché, subi, souffert, et de pouvoir leur crier: J'ai été près de tout ce dont vous êtes loin! A ces patriciens repus d'illusions, il leur jettera la réalité à la face, et ils trembleront, car il sera vrai, et ils applaudiront, car il sera grand. Il surgira parmi ces tout-puissants, plus puissant qu'eux; il leur apparaîtra comme le porte-flambeau, car il leur montrera la vérité, et comme le porte-glaive, car il leur montrera la justice. Quel triomphe!

Et tout en faisant ces constructions dans son esprit, lucide et trouble à la fois, il avait des mouvements de délire, des accablements dans le premier fauteuil venu, des sortes d'assoupissements, des sursauts. Il allait, venait, regardait le plafond, examinait les couronnes, étudiait vaguement les hiéroglyphes du blason, palpait le velours du mur, remuait les chaises, retournait les parchemins, lisait les noms, épelait les titres, Buxton, Homble, Gumdraith, Hunkerville, Clancharlie, comparait les cires et les cachets, tâtait les tresses de soie des sceaux royaux, s'approchait de la fenêtre, écoutait le jaillissement de la fontaine, constatait les statues, comptait avec une patience de somnambule les colonnes de marbre, et disait: Cela est.

Et il touchait son habit de satin, et il s'interrogeait:

— Est-ce que c'est moi? Oui.

Il était en pleine tempête intérieure.

Dans cette tourmente, sentit-il sa défaillance et sa fatigue?

But-il, mangea-t-il, dormit-il? S'il le fit, ce fut sans le savoir. Dans de certaines situations violentes, les instincts se satisfont comme bon leur semble sans que la pensée s’en mêle.

D’ailleurs sa pensée était moins une pensée qu’une fumée. Au moment où le flamboiement noir de l’éruption se dégorge à travers son puits plein de tourbillons, le cratère a-t-il conscience des troupeaux qui paissent l’herbe au pied de sa montagne?

Les heures passèrent.

L’aube parut et fit le jour. Un rayon blanc pénétra dans la chambre et en même temps entra dans l’esprit de Gwynplaine.

— Et Dea! lui dit la clarté.

LIVRE SIXIÈME

ASPECTS VARIÉS D’URSUS

I

CE QUE DIT LE MISANTHROPE

Après qu’Ursus eut vu Gwynplaine s’enfoncer sous la porte de la geôle de Southwark, il demeura, hagard, dans le recoin où il s’était mis en observation. Il eut longtemps dans l’oreille ce grincement de serrures et de verrous qui semble le hurlement de joie de la prison dévorant un misérable. Il attendit. Quoi? Il épia. Quoi? Ces inexorables portes, une fois fermées, ne se rouvrent pas tout de suite; elles sont ankylosées par leur stagnation dans les ténèbres et elles ont les mouvements difficiles, surtout lorsqu’il s’agit de délivrer; entrer, soit; sortir, c’est différent. Ursus le savait. Mais attendre est une chose qu’on n’est pas libre de cesser à volonté; on attend malgr soi; les actions que nous faisons dégagent une force acquise qui persiste même lorsqu’il n’y a plus d’objet, qui nous possède et nous tient, et qui nous oblige pendant quelque temps à continuer ce qui est désormais sans but. Le guet inutile, posture inepte que nous avons tous eue dans l’occasion, perte de temps que fait machinalement tout homme attentif à une chose disparue. Personne n’échappe à ces fixités-là. On s’obstine avec une sorte d’acharnement distrait. On ne sait pourquoi l’on reste à cet endroit où l’on est, mais on y reste. Ce qu’on a commenc activement, on le continue passivement. Ténacité épuisante d’o l’on sort accablé. Ursus, différent des autres hommes, fut pourtant, comme le premier venu, cloué sur place par cette rêverie mêlée de surveillance où nous plonge un événement qui peut tout sur nous et sur lequel nous ne pouvons rien. Il considérait tour à tour les deux murailles noires, tantôt la basse, tantôt la haute, tantôt la porte où il y avait une échelle de potence, tantôt la porte où il y avait une tête de mort; il était comme pris dans cet étau composé d’une prison et d’un cimetière. Cette rue évitée et impopulaire avait si peu de passants qu’on ne remarquait point Ursus.

Enfin il sortit de l’encoignure quelconque qui l’abritait, espèce de guérite de hasard où il était en vedette, et il s’en alla pas lents. Le jour baissait, tant sa faction avait été longue.

De temps en temps il tournait le cou et regardait l’affreux guichet bas où était entré Gwynplaine. Il avait l’oeil vitreux et stupide. Il arriva au bout de la ruelle, prit une autre rue, puis une autre, retrouvant vaguement l’itinéraire par où il avait passé quelques heures auparavant. Par intervalles il se retournait, comme s’il pouvait encore voir la porte de la prison, quoiqu’il ne fût plus dans la rue où était la geôle. Peu à peu il se rapprochait du Tarrinzeau-field. Les lanes qui avoisinaient le champ de foire étaient des sentiers déserts entre des clôtures de jardins. Il marchait courbé le long des haies et des fossés. Tout à coup il fit halte, et se redressa, et il cria: — Tant mieux!

En même temps il se donna deux coups de poing sur la tête, puis deux coups de poing sur les cuisses, ce qui indique l’homme qui juge les choses comme il faut les juger.

Et il se mit à grommeler entre cuir et chair, par moments avec des éclats de voix:

— C’est bien fait! Ah! le gueux! le brigand! le chenapan! le vaurien! le séditieux! Ce sont ses propos sur le gouvernement qui l’ont mené là. C’est un rebelle. J’avais chez moi un rebelle. J’en suis délivré. J’ai de la chance. Il nous compromettait. Fourré au bagne! Ah! tant mieux! Excellence des lois. Ah! l’ingrat! moi qui l’avais élevé! Donnez-vous donc de la peine! Quel besoin avait-il de parler et de raisonner? Il s’est mêlé des questions d’état! Je vous demande un peu! En maniant des sous, il a déblatéré sur l’impôt, sur les pauvres, sur le peuple, sur ce qui ne le regardait pas! il s’est permis des réflexions sur les pence! il a commenté méchamment et malicieusement le cuivre de la monnaie du royaume! il a insult les liards de sa majesté! un farthing, c’est la même chose que la reine! l’effigie sacrée, morbleu, l’effigie sacrée. A-t-on une reine, oui ou non? respect à son vert-de-gris. Tout se tient dans le gouvernement. Il faut connaître cela. J’ai vécu, moi. Je sais les choses. On me dira: Mais vous renoncez donc la politique? La politique, mes amis, je m’en soucie autant que du poil bourru d’un âne. J’ai reçu un jour un coup de canne d’un baronnet. Je me suis dit: Cela suffit, je comprends la politique. Le peuple n’a qu’un liard, il le donne, la reine le prend, le peuple remercie. Rien de plus simple. Le reste regarde les lords. Leurs seigneuries les lords spirituels et temporels. Ah! Gwynplaine est sous clef! Ah! il est aux galères! c’est juste. C’est équitable, excellent, mérité et légitime. C’est sa faute. Bavarder est défendu. Es-tu un lord, imbécile? Le wapentake l’a saisi, le justicier-quorum l’a emmené, le shériff le tient. Il doit être en ce moment-ci épluché par quelque sergent de la coiffe. Comme ça vous plume les crimes, ces habiles gens-là! Coffré, mon drôle! Tant pis pour lui, tant mieux pour moi! Je suis, ma foi, bien content.

J’avoue ingénument que j’ai de la chance. Quelle extravagance j’avais faite de ramasser ce petit et cette petite! Nous étions si tranquilles auparavant, Homo et moi! Qu’est-ce qu’ils venaient faire dans ma baraque, ces gredins-là? Les ai-je assez couvés quand ils étaient mioches! les ai-je assez traînés avec ma bricole! joli sauvetage! lui sinistrement laid, elle borgne des deux yeux! Privez-vous donc de tout! Ai-je assez tété pour eux les mamelles de la famine! Ça grandit, ça fait l’amour! Des flirtations d’infirmes, c’est là que nous en étions. Le crapaud et la taupe, idylle. J’avais ça dans mon intimité. Tout cela devait finir par la justice. Le crapaud a parlé politique, c’est bon. M’en voilà délivré. Quand le wapentake est venu, j’ai d’abord été bête, on doute toujours du bonheur, j’ai cru que je ne voyais pas ce que je voyais, que c’était impossible, que c’était uu cauchemar, que c’était une farce que me faisait le rêve. Mais non, il n’y a rien de plus réel. C’est plastique.

Gwynplaine est bellement en prison. C’est un coup de la providence. Merci, bonne madame. C’est ce monstre qui, avec le tapage qu’il faisait, a attiré l’attention sur mon établissement, et a dénoncé mon pauvre loup! Parti, le Gwynplaine! Et me voil débarrassé des deux. D’un caillou deux bosses. Car Dea en mourra. Quand elle ne verra plus Gwynplaine — elle le voit, l’idiote! — elle n’aura plus de raison d’être, elle se dira: Qu’est-ce que je fais en ce monde? Et elle partira, elle aussi.

Bon voyage. Au diable tous les deux. Je les ai toujours détestés, ces êtres! Crève, Dea. Ah! que je suis content!

II

CE QU'IL FAIT

Il rejoignit l'inn Tadcaster.

Six heures et demie sonnaient, la demie passé six, comme disent les anglais. C'était un peu avant le crépuscule.

Maître Nicless était sur le pas de sa porte. Sa face consternée n'avait point réussi depuis le matin à se détendre, et l'effarement y était resté figé.

Du plus loin qu'il aperçut Ursus:

— Eh bien? cria-t-il.

— Eh bien quoi?

— Gwynplaine va-t-il revenir? Il serait grand temps. Le public ne tardera pas à arriver. Aurons-nous ce soir la représentation de l'Homme qui Rit?

— L'Homme qui Rit, c'est moi, dit Ursus.

Et il regarda le tavernier avec un ricanement éclatant.

Puis il monta droit au premier, ouvrit la fenêtre voisine de l'enseigne de l'inn, se pencha, allongea le poing, fit une pesée sur l'écriteau de Gwynplaine — l'Homme qui Rit, et sur le panneau affiche de Chaos vaincu, décloua l'un, arracha l'autre, mit ces deux planches sous son bras, et redescendit. Maître Nicless le suivait des yeux.

— Pourquoi décrochez-vous ça?

Ursus partit d'un second éclat de rire.

— Pourquoi riez-vous? reprit l'hôtelier.

— Je rentre dans la vie privée.

Maître Nicless comprit, et donna ordre à son lieutenant, le boy Govicum, d'annoncer à quiconque se présenterait qu'il n'y aurait pas de représentation le soir. Il ôta de la porte la futaille-niche où se faisait la recette, et la rencogna dans un angle de la salle basse.

Un moment après, Ursus montait dans la Green-Box.

Il posa dans un coin les deux écriteaux, et pénétra dans ce qu'il appelait «le pavillon des femmes».

Dea dormait.

Elle était sur son lit, tout habillée et son corps de jupe défait, comme dans les siestes.

Près d'elle, Vinos et Fibi, assises, l'une sur un escabeau, l'autre à terre, songeaient.

Malgré l'heure avancée, elles n'avaient point revêtu leur tricot de déesses, signe de profond découragement. Elles étaient restées empaquetées dans leur guimpe de bure et dans leur robe de grosse toile.

Ursus considéra Dea.

— Elle s'essaie à un plus long sommeil, murmura-t-il.

Il apostropha Fibi et Vinos.

— Vous savez, vous autres. C'est fini la musique. Vous pouvez mettre vos trompettes dans votre tiroir. Vous avez bien fait de ne pas vous harnacher en déités. Vous êtes bien laides comme ceci, mais vous avez bien fait. Gardez vos cotillons de torchon.
Pas de représentation ce soir. Ni demain, ni après-demain, ni après après-demain. Plus de Gwynplaine. Pas plus de Gwynplaine que sur ma patte.

Et il se remit à regarder Dea.

— Quel coup ça va lui donner! Ce sera comme une chandelle qu'on souffle.

Il enfla ses joues.

— Fouhh! — Plus rien.

Il eut un petit rire sec.

— Gwynplaine de moins, c'est tout de moins. Ce sera comme si je perdais Homo. Ce sera pire. Elle sera plus seule qu'une autre.
Les aveugles, ça patauge dans plus de tristesse que nous.

Il alla a la lucarne du fond.

— Comme les jours allongent! on y voit encore à sept heures.
Pourtant allumons le suif.

Il battit le briquet et alluma la lanterne du plafond de la Green-Box.

Il se pencha sur Dea.

— Elle va s'enrhumer. Les femmes, vous lui avez trop délacé son capingot. Il y a le proverbe français:

On est en avril, N'ôte pas un fil.

Il vit briller à terre une épingle, la ramassa et la piqua sur sa manche.
Puis il arpenta la Green-Box en gesticulant.

— Je suis en pleine possession de mes facultés. Je suis lucide, archilucide. Je trouve cet événement très correct, et j'approuve ce qui se passe. Quand elle va se réveiller, je lui dirai tout net l'incident. La catastrophe ne se fera pas attendre. Plus de Gwynplaine. Bonsoir, Dea. Comme tout ça est bien arrangé!

Gwynplaine dans la prison. Dea au cimetière. Ils vont se faire vis-à-vis. Danse macabre. Deux destinées qui rentrent dans la coulisse. Serrons les costumes. Bouclons la valise. Valise, lisez cercueil. C'était manqué, ces deux créatures-là. Dea sans yeux, Gwynplaine sans visage. Là-haut le bon Dieu rendra la clarté à Dea et la beauté à Gwynplaine. La mort est une mise en ordre. Tout est bien. Fibi, Vinos, accrochez vos tambourins au clou. Vos talents pour le vacarme vont se rouiller, mes belles.
On ne jouera plus, on ne trompettera plus. Chaos vaincu est vaincu. L'Homme qui Rit est flambé. Taratantara est mort.
Cette Dea dort toujours. Elle fait aussi bien. A sa place, je ne me réveillerais pas. Bah! elle sera vite rendormie. C'est tout de suite mort, une mauviette comme ça. Voilà ce que c'est que de s'occuper de politique. Quelle leçon! Et comme les gouvernements ont raison! Gwynplaine au shériff. Dea au fossoyeur. C'est parallèle. Symétrie instructive. J'espère bien que le tavernier a barricadé la porte. Nous allons mourir ce soir entre nous, en famille. Pas moi, ni Homo. Mais Dea.
Moi, je continuerai de faire rouler le berlingot. J'appartiens aux méandres de la vie vagabonde. Je congédierai les deux filles. Je n'en garderai pas même une. J'ai de la tendance être un vieux débauché. Une servante chez un libertin, c'est du pain sur la planche. Je ne veux pas de tentation. Ce n'est plus de mon âge. Turpe senilis amor. Je poursuivrai ma route tout seul avec Homo. C'est Homo qui va être étonné! Où est Gwynplaine? où est Dea? Mon vieux camarade, nous revoil ensemble. Par la peste, je suis ravi. Ça m'encombrait, leurs bucoliques. Ah! ce garnement de Gwynplaine qui ne revient même pas! Il nous plante là. C'est bon. Maintenant c'est le tour de Dea. Ce ne sera pas long. J'aime les choses finies. Je ne donnerais pas une chiquenaude sur le bout du nez du diable pour l'empêcher de crever. Crève, entends-tu! Ah! elle se réveille!

Dea ouvrit les paupières; car beaucoup d'aveugles ferment les yeux pour dormir. Son doux visage ignorant avait tout son rayonnement.

— Elle sourit, murmura Ursus, et moi je ris. Ça va bien.

Dea appela.

— Fibi! Vinos! Il doit être l'heure de la représentation. Je crois avoir dormi longtemps. Venez m'habiller.

Ni Fibi, ni Vinos ne bougèrent.

Cependant cet ineffable regard d’aveugle qu’avait Dea venait de rencontrer la prunelle d’Ursus. Il tressaillit.

— Eh bien! cria-t-il, qu’est-ce que vous faites donc? Vinos, Fibi, vous n’entendez pas votre maîtresse? Est-ce que vous êtes sourdes? Vite! la représentation va commencer.

Les deux femmes regardèrent Ursus, stupéfaites.

Ursus vociféra.

— Vous ne voyez pas le public qui entre. Fibi, habille Dea.
Vinos, tambourine.

Obéissance, c’était Fibi. Passive, c’était Vinos. A elles deux elles personnifiaient la soumission. Leur maître Ursus avait toujours été pour elle une énigme. N’être jamais compris est une raison pour être toujours obéi. Elles pensèrent simplement qu’il devenait fou, et exécutèrent l’ordre. Fibi décrocha le costume et Vinos le tambour.

Fibi commença à habiller Dea. Ursus baissa la portière du gynécée et, de derrière le rideau, continua:

— Regarde donc, Gwynplaine! la cour est déjà plus qu’à moiti remplie de multitude. On se bouscule dans les vomitoires.
Quelle foule! que dis-tu de Fibi et de Vinos qui n’avaient pas l’air de s’en apercevoir? que ces femmes bréhaignes sont stupides! qu’on est bête en Egypte! Ne soulève pas la portière.
Sois pudique, Dea s’habille.

Il fit une pause, et tout à coup on entendit cette exclamation:

— Que Dea est belle!

C’était la voix de Gwynplaine. Fibi et Vinos eurent une secousse et se retournèrent. C’était la voix de Gwynplaine, mais dans la bouche d’Ursus.

Ursus, d’un signe, par l’entre-bâillement de la portière, leur fit défense de s’étonner.

Il reprit avec la voix de Gwynplaine:

— Ange!

Puis il répliqua avec la voix d’Ursus:

— Dea, un ange! tu es fou, Gwynplaine. Il n’y a de mammifère volant que la chauve-souris.

Et il ajouta:

— Tiens, Gwynplaine, va détacher Homo. Ce sera plus raisonnable.

Et il descendit l’escalier d’arrière de la Green-Box, très vite, à la façon leste de Gwynplaine. Tapage imitatif que Dea put entendre.

Il avisa dans la cour le boy que toute cette aventure faisait oisif et curieux.

— Tends tes deux mains, lui dit-il tout bas. Et il lui vida dedans une poignée de sous. Govicum fut attendri de cette munificence. Ursus lui chuchota à l’oreille:

— Boy, installe-toi dans la cour, saute, danse, cogne, gueule, braille, siffle, roucoule, hennis, applaudis, trépigne, éclate de rire, casse quelque chose.

Maître Nicless, humilié et dépité de voir les gens venus pour l’Homme qui Rit rebrousser chemin et refluer vers les autres baraques du champ de foire, avait fermé la porte de l’inn; il avait même renoncé à donner à boire ce soir-là, afin d’éviter l’ennui des questions; et, dans le désoeuvrement de la représentation manquée, chandelle au poing, il regardait dans la cour du haut du balcon. Ursus, avec la précaution de mettre sa voix entre parenthèses dans les paumes de ses deux mains ajustées à sa bouche, lui cria:

— Gentleman, faites comme votre boy, glapissez, jappez, hurlez.

Il remonta dans la Green-Box et dit au loup:

— Parle le plus que tu pourras.

Et, haussant la voix:

— Il y a trop de foule. Je crois que nous allons avoir une représentation cahotée.

Cependant Vinos tapait du tambour.

Ursus poursuivit:

— Dea est habillée. On va pouvoir commencer. Je regrette qu’on ait laissé entrer tant de public. Comme ils sont tassés! Mais vois donc, Gwynplaine! y en a-t-il de la tourbe effrénée! je gage que nous ferons notre plus grosse recette aujourd’hui.

Allons, drôlesses, toutes deux à la musique! Arrive ici, Fibi, saisis ton clairon. Bon, Vinos, rosse ton tambour. Flanque-lui une raclée. Fibi, prends une pose de Renommée. Mesdemoiselles, je ne vous trouve pas assez nues comme cela. Otez-moi ces jaquettes. Remplacez la toile par la gaze. Le public aime les formes de la femme. Laissons tonner les moralistes. Un peu d’indécence, morbleu. Soyons voluptueuses. Et ruez-vous dans des mélodies éperdues. Ronflez, cornez, crépitez, fanfarez, tambourinez! Que de monde, mon pauvre Gwynplaine!

Il s'interrompit:

— Gwynplaine, aide-moi. Baissons le panneau.

Cependant il déploya son mouchoir.

— Mais d'abord laisse-moi mugir dans mon haillon.

Et il se moucha énergiquement, ce que doit toujours faire un engastrimythe.

Son mouchoir remis dans sa poche, il retira les clavettes du jeu de poulies qui fit son grincement ordinaire. Le panneau s'abaissa.

— Gwynplaine, il est inutile d'écarter la triveline. Gardons le rideau jusqu'à ce que la représentation commence. Nous ne serions pas chez nous. Vous, venez sur l'avant-scène toutes deux. Musique, mesdemoiselles! Poum! Poum! Poum! La chambrée est bien composée. C'est la lie du peuple. Que de populace, mon Dieu!

Les deux brehaignes, abruties d'obéissance, s'installèrent avec leurs instruments à leur place habituelle aux deux angles du panneau abaisse.

Alors Ursus devint extraordinaire. Ce ne fut plus un homme, ce fut une foule. Force de faire la plénitude avec le vide, il appela à son secours une ventriloquie prodigieuse. Tout l'orchestre de voix humaines et bestiales qu'il avait en lui entra en branle à la fois. Il se fit légion. Quelqu'un qui eût fermé les yeux eût cru être dans une place publique un jour de fête ou un jour d'émeute. Le tourbillon de bégaiements et de clameurs qui sortait d'Ursus chantait, clabaudait, causait, toussait, crachait, éternuait, prenait du tabac, dialoguait, faisait les demandes et les réponses, tout cela à la fois. Les syllabes ébauchées rentraient les unes dans les autres. Dans cette cour où il n'y avait rien, on entendait des hommes, des femmes, des enfants. C'était la confusion claire du brouhaha. A travers ce fracas, serpentaient, comme dans une fumée, des cacophonies étranges, des gloussements d'oiseaux, des jurements de chats, des vagissements d'enfants qui tettent. On distinguait l'enrouement des ivrognes. Le mécontentement des dogues sous les pieds des gens bougonnait. Les voix venaient de loin et de près, d'en haut et d'en bas, du premier plan et du dernier. L'ensemble était une rumeur, le détail était un cri. Ursus cognait du poing, frappait du pied, jetait sa voix tout au fond de la cour, puis la faisait venir de dessous terre. C'était orageux et familier. Il passait du murmure au bruit, du bruit au tumulte, du tumulte à l'ouragan. Il était lui et tous. Soliloque et polyglotte. De même qu'il y a le trompe-l'oeil, il y a le trompe-l'oreille. Ce que Protée faisait pour le regard, Ursus le faisait pour l'ouïe. Rien de merveilleux comme ce fac-similé de la multitude. De temps en temps il écartait la portière du gynécée et regardait Dea. Dea écoutait.

De son côté dans la cour le boy faisait rage.

Vinos et Fibi s'essoufflaient consciencieusement dans les trompettes et se démenaient sur les tambourins. Maître Nicless, spectateur unique, se donnait, comme elles, l'explication tranquille qu'Ursus était fou, ce qui du reste n'était qu'un détail grisâtre ajouté à sa mélancolie. Le brave hôtelier grommelait: Quel désordres! Il était sérieux comme quelqu'un qui se souvient qu'il y a des lois.

Govicum, ravi d'être utile à du désordre, se démenait presque autant qu'Ursus. Cela l'amusait. De plus, il gagnait ses sous.

Homo était pensif.

A son vacarme, Ursus mêlait des paroles.

— C'est comme à l'ordinaire, Gwynplaine, il y a de la cabale.
Nos concurrents sapent nos succès. La huée, assaisonnement du triomphe. Et puis les gens sont trop nombreux. Ils sont mal leur aise. L'angle des coudes du voisin ne dispose pas à la bienveillance. Pourvu qu'ils ne cassent pas les banquettes!
Nous allons être en proie à une population insensée. Ah! si notre ami Tom-Jim-Jack était là! mais il ne vient plus. Vois donc toutes ces têtes les unes sur les autres. Ceux qui sont debout n'ont pas l'air content, quoique se tenir debout soit, selon Galien, un mouvement, que ce grand homme appelle «le mouvement tonique». Nous abrégerons le spectacle. Comme il n'y a que Chaos vaincu d'affiché, nous ne jouerons pas Ursus rursus. C'est toujours ça de gagné. Quel hourvari! O turbulence aveugle des masses! Ils nous feront quelque dégât!
Ça ne peut pourtant pas continuer comme ça. Nous ne pourrions pas jouer. On ne saisirait pas un mot de la pièce. Je vais les haranguer. Gwynplaine, écarte un peu la triveline. Citoyens...

Ici Ursus se cria à lui-même d'une voix fébrile et pointue:

— A bas le vieux!

Et il reprit, de sa voix à lui:

— Je crois que le peuple m'insulte. Cicéron a raison: plebs, fex urbis. N'importe, admonestons la mob. J'aurai beaucoup de peine à me faire entendre. Je parlerai pourtant. Homme, fais ton devoir. Gwynplaine, vois donc cette mégère qui grince là-bas.

Ursus fit une pause où il plaça un grincement. Homo, provoqué, en ajouta un second, et Govicum un troisième.

Ursus poursuivit.

— Les femmes sont pires que les hommes. Moment peu propice.
C’est égal, essayons le pouvoir d’un discours. Il est toujours l’heure d’être disert. — Écoute ça, Gwynplaine, exorde insinuant. — Citoyennes et citoyens, c’est moi qui suis l’ours.
J’ôte ma tête pour vous parler. Je réclame humblement le silence.

Ursus prêta à la foule ce cri:

— Grumphll!

Et continua:

— Je vénère mon auditoire. Grumphll est un épiphonème comme un autre. Salut, population grouillante. Que vous soyez tous de la canaille, je n’en fais nul doute. Cela n’ôte rien à mon estime.
Estime réfléchie. J’ai le plus profond respect pour messieurs les sacripants qui m’honorent de leur pratique. Il y a parmi vous des êtres difformes, je ne m’en offense point. Messieurs les boiteux et messieurs les bossus sont dans la nature. Le chameau est gibbeux; le bison est enflé du dos; le blaireau a les jambes plus courtes à gauche qu’à droite; le fait est détermin par Aristote dans son traité du marcher des animaux. Ceux d’entre vous qui ont deux chemises en ont une sur le torse et l’autre chez l’usurier. Je sais que cela se fait. Albuquerque mettait en gage sa moustache et saint Denis son auréole. Les juifs prêtaient, même sur l’auréole. Grands exemples. Avoir des dettes, c’est avoir quelque chose. Je révère en vous des gueux.

Ursus se coupa par cette interruption en basse profonde:

— Triple baudet!

Et il répondit de son accent le plus poli:

— D’accord. Je suis un savant. Je m’en excuse comme je peux.
Je méprise scientifiquement la science. L’ignorance est une réalité dont on se nourrit; la science est une réalité dont on jeûne. En général on est forcé d’opter: être un savant, et maigrir; brouter, et être un âne. O citoyens, broutez! La science ne vaut pas une bouchée de quelque chose de bon.
J’aime mieux manger de l’aloyau que de savoir qu’il s’appelle le muscle psoas. Je n’ai, moi, qu’un mérite. C’est l’oeil sec. Tel que vous me voyez, je n’ai jamais pleuré. Il faut dire que je n’ai jamais été content. Jamais content.

Pas même de moi. Je me dédaigne. Mais, je soumets ceci aux membres de l'opposition ici présents, si Ursus n'est qu'un savant, Gwynplaine est un artiste.

Il renifla de nouveau:

— Grumphll!

Et il reprit:

— Encore Grumphll! c'est une objection. Néanmoins je passe outre. Et Gwynplaine, ô messieurs, mesdames! a près de lui un autre artiste, c'est ce personnage distingué et velu qui nous accompagne, le seigneur Homo, ancien chien sauvage, aujourd'hui loup civilisé, et fidèle sujet de sa majesté. Homo est un mime d'un talent fondu et supérieur. Soyez attentifs et recueillis.

Vous allez tout à l'heure voir jouer Homo, ainsi que Gwynplaine, et il faut honorer l'art. Cela sied aux grandes nations.

Êtes-vous des hommes des bois? J'y souscris. En ce cas, sylvae sint consule dignae. Deux artistes valent bien un consul. Bon.

Ils viennent de me jeter un trognon de chou. Mais je n'ai pas été touché. Cela ne m'empêchera pas de parler. Au contraire.

Le danger esquivé est bavard. Garrula pericula, dit Juvénal.

Peuple, il y a parmi vous des ivrognes, il y a aussi des ivrognesses. C'est très bien. Les hommes sont infects, les femmes sont hideuses. Vous avez toutes sortes d'excellentes raisons pour vous entasser ici sur ces bancs de cabaret, le désoeuvrement, la paresse, l'intervalle entre deux vols, le porter, l'ale, le stout, le malt, le brandy, le gin, et l'attrait d'un sexe pour l'autre sexe. A merveille. Un esprit tourné au badinage aurait ici un beau champ. Mais je m'abstiens. Luxure, soit. Pourtant il faut que l'orgie ait de la tenue. Vous êtes gais, mais bruyants. Vous imitez avec distinction les cris des bêtes; mais que diriez-vous si, quand vous parlez d'amour avec une lady dans un bouge, je passais mon temps à aboyer après vous?

Cela vous gênerait. Eh bien, cela nous gêne. Je vous autorise vous taire. L'art est aussi respectable que la débauche. Je vous parle un langage honnête.

Il s'apostropha:

— Que la fièvre t'étrangle avec tes sourcils en épis de seigle!

Et il répliqua:

— Honorables messieurs, laissons les épis de seigle tranquilles.

C'est une impiété de faire violence aux végétables pour leur trouver une ressemblance humaine ou animale. En outre, la fièvre n'étrangle pas. Fausse métaphore. De grâce, faites silence!

souffrez qu'on vous le dise, vous manquez un peu de cette majest qui caractérise le vrai gentilhomme anglais! Je constate que, parmi vous, ceux qui ont des souliers à travers lesquels passent leurs orteils en profitent pour poser leurs pieds sur les épaules des spectateurs qui sont devant eux, ce qui expose les dames faire la remarque que les semelles se crèvent toujours au point où est la tête des os métatarsiens. Montrez un peu moins vos pieds, et montrez un peu plus vos mains. J'aperçois d'ici des fripons qui plongent leurs griffes ingénieuses dans les goussets de leurs voisins imbéciles. Chers pick-pockets, de la pudeur!

Boxez le prochain, si vous voulez, ne le dévalisez pas. Vous fâcherez moins les gens en leur pochant un oeil qu'en leur chipant un sou. Endommagez les nez, soit. Le bourgeois tient son argent plus qu'à sa beauté. Du reste, agréez mes sympathies.

Je n'ai point le pédantisme de blâmer les filous. Le mal existe.

Chacun l'endure, et chacun le fait. Nul n'est exempt de la vermine de ses péchés. Je ne parle que de celle-là.

N'avons-nous pas tous nos démangeaisons? Dieu se gratte l'endroit du diable. Moi-même j'ai fait des fautes. Plaudite, cives.

Ursus exécuta un long groan qu'il domina par ces paroles finales:

— Milords et messieurs, je vois que mon discours a eu le bonheur de vous déplaire. Je prends congé de vos huées pour un moment.

Maintenant je vais remettre ma tête, et la représentation va commencer.

Il quitta l'accent oratoire pour le ton intime.

— Referme la triveline. Respirons. J'ai été mielleux. J'ai bien parlé. Je les ai appelés milords et messieurs. Langage velouté, mais inutile. Que dis-tu de toute cette crapule, Gwynplaine? Comme on se rend bien compte des maux que l'Angleterre a soufferts depuis quarante ans par l'emportement de ces esprits aigres et malicieux! Les anciens anglais étaient belliqueux, ceux-ci sont mélancoliques et illuminés, et ils se font gloire de mépriser les lois et de méconnaître l'autorit royale. J'ai fait tout ce que peut faire l'éloquence humaine.

Je leur ai prodigué des métonymies gracieuses comme la joue en fleur d'un adolescent. Sont-ils adoucis? J'en doute.

Qu'attendre d'un peuple qui mange si extraordinairement, et qui se bourre de tabac, au point qu'en ce pays les gens de lettres eux-mêmes composent souvent leurs ouvrages avec une pipe à la bouche! C'est égal, jouons la pièce.

On entendit glisser sur leur tringle les anneaux de la triveline.

Le tambourinage des bréhaignes cessa. Ursus décrocha sa chiffonie, exécuta son prélude, dit à demi-voix: Hein!

Gwynplaine, comme c'est mystérieux! puis se bouscula avec le loup.

Cependant, en même temps que la chiffonie, il avait ôté du clou une perruque très bourrue qu'il avait, et il l'avait jetée sur le plancher dans un coin à sa portée.

La représentation de Chaos vaincu eut lieu presque comme l'ordinaire, moins les effets de lumière bleue et les féeries d'éclairage. Le loup jouait de bonne foi. Au moment voulu, Dea fit son apparition et de sa voix tremblante et divine évoqua Gwynplaine. Elle étendit le bras, cherchant cette tête...

Ursus se rua sur la perruque, l'ébouriffa, s'en coiffa, et avança doucement, en retenant son souffle, sa tête ainsi hérissée sous la main de Dea.

Puis, appelant à lui tout son art et copiant la voix de Gwynplaine, il chanta avec un ineffable amour la réponse du monstre à l'appel de l'esprit.

L'imitation fut si parfaite que, cette fois encore, les deux bréhaignes cherchèrent des yeux Gwynplaine, effrayées de l'entendre sans le voir.

Govicum, émerveillé, trépigna, applaudit, battit des mains, produisit un vacarme olympien, et rit à lui tout seul comme une troupe de dieux. Ce boy, disonsle, déploya un rare talent de spectateur.

Fibi et Vinos, automates dont Ursus poussait les ressorts, firent le tohu-bohu habituel d'instruments, cuivre et peau d'âne mêlés, qui marquait la fin de la représentation et accompagnait le départ du public.

Ursus se releva en sueur.

Il dit tout bas à Homo: — Tu comprends qu'il s'agissait de gagner du temps. Je crois que nous avons réussi. Je ne m'en suis point mal tiré, moi qui avais pourtant le droit d'être assez éperdu.

Gwynplaine peut encore revenir d'ici à demain. Il était inutile de tuer tout de suite Dea. Je t'explique la chose, à toi.

Il ôta la perruque et s'essuya le front.

— Je suis un ventriloque de génie, murmura-t-il. Quel talent j'ai eu! J'ai égalé Brabant, l'engastrimythe du roi de France François Ier. Dea est convaincue que Gwynplaine est ici.

— Ursus, dit Dea, où est Gwynplaine?

Ursus se retourna, en sursaut.

Dea était restée au fond du théâtre, debout sous la lanterne du plafond. Elle était pâle, d’une pâleur d’ombre.

Elle reprit avec un ineffable sourire désespéré:

— Je sais. Il nous a quittés. Il est parti. Je savais bien qu’il avait des ailes.

Et, levant vers l’infini ses yeux blancs, elle ajouta:

— A quand moi?

COMPLICATIONS

Ursus demeura interdit.

Il n’avait pas fait illusion.

Était-ce la faute de sa ventriloquie? Non certes. Il avait réussi à tromper Fibi et Vinos, qui avaient des yeux, et non tromper Dea, qui était aveugle. C’est que les prunelles seules de Fibi et de Vinos étaient lucides, tandis que, chez Dea, c’était le coeur qui voyait.

Il ne put répondre un mot. Et il pensa à part lui: Bos in lingua. L’homme interdit a un boeuf sur la langue.

Dans les émotions complexes, l’humiliation est le premier sentiment qui se fasse jour. Ursus songea:

— J’ai gaspillé mes onomatopées.

Et, comme tout rêveur acculé au pied du mur de l’expédient, il s’injuria:

— Chute à plat. J’ai épuisé en pure perte l’harmonie imitative. Mais qu’allons-nous devenir maintenant?

Il regarda Dea. Elle se taisait, de plus en plus pâlissante, sans faire un mouvement. Son oeil perdu restait fixé dans les profondeurs.

Un incident vint à propos.

Ursus aperçut dans la cour maître Nicless, sa chandelle en main, qui lui faisait signe.

Maître Nicless n’avait point assisté à la fin de l’espèce de comédie fantôme jouée par Ursus. Cela tenait à ce qu’on avait frappé à la porte de l’inn. Maître Nicless était allé ouvrir. Deux fois on avait frappé, ce qui avait fait deux éclipses de maître Nicless. Ursus, absorbé par son monologue à cent voix, ne s’en était point aperçu.

Sur l’appel muet de maître Nicless, Ursus descendit.

Il s’approcha de l’hôtelier.

Ursus mit un doigt sur sa bouche.

Maître Nicless mit un doigt sur sa bouche.

Tous deux se regardèrent ainsi.

Chacun d’eux semblait dire à l’autre: Causons, mais taisons-nous.

Le tavernier, silencieusement, ouvrit la porte de la salle basse de l’inn. Maître Nicless entra, Ursus entra. Il n’y avait personne qu’eux deux. La devanture sur la rue, porte et volets, était close.

Le tavernier poussa derrière lui la porte de la cour, qui se ferma au nez de Govicum curieux.

Maître Nicless posa la chandelle sur une table.

Le dialogue s’engagea. A demi-voix, comme un chuchotement.

— Maître Ursus...

— Maître Nicless?

— J’ai fini par comprendre.

— Bah!

— Vous avez voulu faire croire à la pauvre aveugle que tout était ici comme à l’ordinaire.

— Aucune loi ne défend d’être ventriloque.

— Vous avez du talent.

— Non.

— C’est prodigieux à quel point vous faites ce que vous voulez faire.

— Je vous dis que non.

— Maintenant j’ai à vous parler.

— Est-ce de la politique?

— Je n’en sais rien.

— C’est que je n’écouterais pas.

— Voici. Pendant que vous faisiez la pièce et le public à vous tout seul, on a frappé à la porte de la taverne.

— On a frappé à la porte?

— Oui.

— Je n’aime pas ça.

— Moi non plus.

— Et puis?

— Et puis j’ai ouvert.

— Qui est-ce qui frappait?

— Quelqu’un qui m’a parlé.

— Qu’est-ce qu’il a dit?

— Je l’ai écouté.

— Qu’est-ce que vous avez répondu?

— Rien. Je suis revenu vous voir jouer.

— Et?...

— Et l’on a frappé une seconde fois.

— Qui? le même?

— Non. Un autre.

— Quelqu’un encore qui vous a parlé?

— Quelqu’un qui ne m’a rien dit.

— Je le préfère.

— Moi pas.

— Expliquez-vous, maître Nicless.

— Devinez qui avait parlé la première fois.

— Je n’ai pas le temps d’être Oedipe.

— C’était le maître du circus.

— D’à côté?

— D’à côté.

— Où il y a toute cette musique enragée?

— Enragée.

— Eh bien?

— Eh bien, maître Ursus, il vous fait des offres.

— Des offres?

— Des offres.

— Pourquoi?

— Parce que.

— Vous avez sur moi un avantage, maître Nicless, c’est que vous, tout à l’heure, vous avez compris mon énigme, et que moi, maintenant, je ne comprends pas la vôtre.

— Le maître du circus m’a chargé de vous dire qu’il avait vu ce matin passer le cortège de police, et que lui, le maître du circus, voulant vous prouver qu’il est votre ami, il vous offrait de vous acheter, moyennant cinquante livres sterling payées comptant, votre berlingot, la Green-Box, vos deux chevaux, vos trompettes avec les femmes qui y soufflent, votre pièce avec l’aveugle qui chante dedans, votre loup, et vous avec.

Ursus eut un hautain sourire.

— Maître de l’inn Tadcaster, vous direz au maître du circus que Gwynplaine va revenir.

Le tavernier prit sur une chaise quelque chose qui était dans l’obscurité, et se retourna vers Ursus, les deux bras levés, laissant pendre de l’une de ses mains un manteau et de l’autre une esclavine de cuir, un chapeau de feutre et un capingot.

Et maître Nicless dit:

— L’homme qui a frappé la seconde fois, et qui était un homme de police, et qui est entré et sorti sans prononcer une parole, a apporté ceci.

Ursus reconnut l’esclavine, le capingot, le chapeau et le manteau de Gwynplaine.

MOENIBUS SURDIS CAMPANA MUTA

Ursus palpa le feutre du chapeau, le drap du manteau, la serge du capingot, le cuir de l’esclavine, ne put douter de cette défroque, et d’un geste bref et impératif, sans dire un mot, désigna à maître Nicless la porte de l’inn.

Maître Nicless ouvrit.

Ursus se précipita hors de la taverne.

Maître Nicless le suivit des yeux, et vit Ursus courir, autant que le lui permettaient ses vieilles jambes, dans la direction prise le matin par le wapentake emmenant Gwynplaine. Un quart d’heure après, Ursus essoufflé arrivait dans la petite rue o était l’arrière-guichet de la geôle de Southwark et où il avait passé déjà tant d’heures d’observation.

Cette ruelle n’avait pas besoin de minuit pour être déserte.

Mais, triste le jour, elle était inquiétante la nuit. Personne ne s’y hasardait passé une certaine heure. Il semblait qu’on craignît que les deux murs ne se rapprochassent, et qu’on eût peur, s’il prenait fantaisie à la prison et au cimetière de s’embrasser, d’être écrasé par l’embrassement. Effets nocturnes.

Les saules tronqués de la ruelle Vauvert à Paris étaient de la sorte mal famés. On prétendait que la nuit ces moignons d’arbres se changeaient en grosses mains et empoignaient les passants.

D’instinct le peuple de Southwark évitait, nous l’avons dit, cette rue entre prison et cimetière. Jadis elle avait été barrée la nuit d’une chaîne de fer. Très inutile; car la meilleure chaîne pour fermer cette rue, c’était la peur qu’elle faisait.

Ursus y entra résolument.

Quelle idée avait-il? Aucune.

Il venait dans cette rue aux informations. Allait-il frapper la porte de la geôle? Non certes. Cet expédient effroyable et vain ne germait pas dans son cerveau. Tenter de s’introduire l pour demander un renseignement? Quelle folie! Les prisons n’ouvrent pas plus à qui veut entrer qu’à qui veut sortir. Leurs gonds ne tournent que sur la loi. Ursus le savait. Que venait-il donc faire dans cette rue? Voir. Voir quoi? Rien.

On ne sait pas. Le possible. Se retrouver en face de la porte où Gwynplaine avait disparu, c’était déjà quelque chose.

Quelquefois le mur le plus noir et le plus bourru parle, et d’entre les pierres une lueur sort. Une vague transsudation de clarté se dégage parfois d’un entassement fermé et sombre.

Examiner l’enveloppe d’un fait, c’est être utilement aux écoutes.

Nous avons tous cet instinct de ne laisser, entre le fait qui nous intéresse et nous, que le moins d’épaisseur possible. C’est pourquoi Ursus était retourné dans la ruelle où était l’entrée basse de la maison de force.

Au moment où il s’engagea dans la ruelle, il entendit un coup de cloche, puis un second.

— Tiens, pensa-t-il, serait-ce déjà minuit?

Machinalement, il se mit à compter:

— Trois, quatre, cinq.

Il songea:

— Comme les coups de cette cloche sont espacés! quelle lenteur! — Six. Sept.

Et il fit cette remarque:

— Quel son lamentable! — Huit, neuf. — Ah! rien de plus simple. Être dans une prison, cela attriste une horloge. — Dix. — Et puis, le cimetière est là. Cette cloche sonne l’heure aux vivants et l’éternité aux morts. — Onze. — Hélas! sonner une heure à qui n’est pas libre, c’est aussi sonner une éternité! — Douze.

Il s’arrêta.

— Oui, c’est minuit.

La cloche sonna un treizième coup.

Ursus tressaillit.

— Treize!

Il y eut un quatorzième coup. Puis un quinzième.

— Qu’est-ce que cela veut dire?

Les coups continuèrent à longs intervalles. Ursus écoutait.

— Ce n’est pas une cloche d’horloge. C’est la cloche Muta. Aussi je disais: Comme minuit sonne longtemps! cette cloche ne sonne pas, elle tinte. Que se passe-t-il de sinistre?

Toute prison autrefois, comme tout monastère, avait sa cloche dite muta, réservée aux occasions mélancoliques. La muta, «la muette», était une cloche tintant très bas, qui avait l’air de faire son possible pour n’être pas entendue.

Ursus avait regagné l’encoignure commode au guet, d’où il avait pu, pendant une grande partie de la journée, épier la prison.

Les tintements se suivaient, à une lugubre distance l’un de l’autre.

Un glas fait dans l’espace une vilaine ponctuation. Il marque dans les préoccupations de tout le monde des alinéas funèbres.

Un glas de cloche ressemble à un râle d’homme. Annonce d’agonie.

Si, dans les maisons, ça et là, aux environs de cette cloche en branle, il y a des rêveries éparses et en attente, ce glas les coupe en tronçons rigides. La rêverie indécise est une sorte de refuge; on ne sait quoi de diffus dans l’angoisse permet quelque espérance de percer; le glas, désolant, précise. Cette diffusion, il la supprime, et, dans ce trouble, où l’inquiétude tâche de rester en suspens, il détermine des précipités. Un glas parle à chacun dans le sens de son chagrin ou de son effroi. Une cloche tragique, cela vous regarde. Avertissement. Rien de sombre comme un monologue sur lequel tombe cette cadence. Les retours égaux indiquent une intention. Qu’est-ce que ce marteau, la cloche, forge sur cette enclume, la pensée?

Ursus, confusément, comptait, bien que cela n’eût aucun but, les tintements du glas. Se sentant sur un glissement, il faisait effort pour ne point ébaucher de conjectures. Les conjectures sont un plan incliné où l’on va inutilement trop loin.

Néanmoins, que signifiait cette cloche?

Il regardait l’obscurité à l’endroit où il savait qu’était la porte de la prison.

Tout à coup, à cet endroit même qui faisait une sorte de trou noir, il y eut une rougeur. Cette rougeur grandit et devint une clarté.

Cette rougeur n’avait rien de vague. Elle eut tout de suite une forme et des angles. La porte de la geôle venait de tourner sur ses gonds. Cette rougeur en dessinait le cintre et les chambranles.

C’était plutôt un entre-bâillement qu’une ouverture. Une prison, cela ne s’ouvre pas, cela bâille. D’ennui peut-être.

La porte du guichet donna passage à un homme qui avait une torche à la main.

La cloche ne discontinuait pas. Ursus se sentit saisi par deux attentes; il se mit en arrêt, l’oreille au glas, l’oeil à la torche.

Après cet homme, la porte, qui n’était qu’entrebâillée, s’élargit tout à fait, et donna issue à deux autres hommes, puis à un quatrième. Ce quatrième était le wapentake, visible à la lumière de la torche. Il avait au poing son bâton de fer.

A la suite du wapentake, défilèrent, débouchant de dessous le guichet, en ordre, deux par deux, avec la rigidité d’une série de poteaux qui marcheraient, des hommes silencieux.

Ce cortége nocturne franchissait la porte basse couple par couple, comme les bini d’une procession de pénitents, sans solution de continuité, avec un soin lugubre de ne faire aucun bruit, gravement, presque doucement. Un serpent qui sort d’un trou a cette précaution.

La torche faisait saillir les profils et les attitudes. Profils farouches, attitudes mornes.

Ursus reconnut tous les visages de police qui, le matin, avaient emmené Gwynplaine.

Nul doute. C’étaient les mêmes. Ils reparaissaient.

Évidemment Gwynplaine aussi allait reparaître.

Ils l’avaient amené là; ils le ramenaient.

C’était clair.

La prunelle d’Ursus redoubla de fixité. Mettrait-on Gwynplaine en liberté?

La double file des gens de police s’écoulait de la voûte basse très lentement, et comme goutte à goutte. La cloche, qui ne s’interrompait point, semblait leur marquer le pas. En sortant de la prison, le cortège, montrant le dos à Ursus, tournait droite dans le tronçon de la rue opposé à celui où il était posté.

Une deuxième torche brilla sous le guichet.

Ceci annonçait la fin du cortège.

Ursus allait voir ce qu’ils emmenaient. Le prisonnier. L’homme.

Ursus allait voir Gwynplaine.

Ce qu’ils emmenaient apparut.

C’était une bière.

Quatre hommes portaient une bière couverte d’un drap noir.

Derrière eux venait un homme ayant une pelle sur l’épaule.

Une troisième torche allumée, tenue par un personnage lisant dans un livre, qui devait être un chapelain, fermait le cortège.

La bière prit la file à la suite des gens de police qui avaient tourné à droite.

En même temps la tête du cortège s’arrêta.

Ursus entendit le grincement d’une clef.

Vis-à-vis la prison, dans le mur bas qui longeait l’autre côté de la rue, une deuxième ouverture de porte s’éclaira par une torche qui passa dessous.

Cette porte, sur laquelle on distinguait une tête de mort, était la porte du cimetière.

Le wapentake s’engagea dans cette ouverture, puis les hommes, puis la deuxième torche après la première; le cortège y décrut comme le reptile rentrant; la file entière des gens de police pénétra dans cette autre obscurité qui était au delà de cette porte, puis la bière, puis l’homme à la pelle, puis le chapelain avec sa torche et son livre, et la porte se referma.

Il n’y eut plus rien qu’une lueur au-dessus d’un mur.

On entendit un chuchotement, puis des coups sourds.

C’étaient sans doute le chapelain et le fossoyeur qui jetaient sur le cercueil, l’un, des versets de prière, l’autre, des pelletées de terre.

Le chuchotement cessa, les coups sourds cessèrent.

Un mouvement se fit, les torches brillèrent, le wapentake repassa, tenant haut le weapon, sous la porte rouverte du cimetière, le chapelain revint avec son livre, le fossoyeur avec sa pelle, le cortège reparut, sans le cercueil, la double file d’hommes refit le même trajet entre les deux portes avec la même taciturnité et en sens inverse, la porte du cimetière se referma, la porte de la prison se rouvrit, la voûte sépulcrale du guichet se découpa en lueur, l’obscurité du corridor devint vaguement visible, l’épaisse et profonde nuit de la geôle s’offrit au regard, et toute cette vision rentra dans toute cette ombre.

Le glas s’éteignit. Le silence vint tout clore, sinistre serrure des ténèbres.

De l’apparition évanouie, ce ne fut plus que cela.

Un passage de spectres qui se dissipe.

Des rapprochements qui coïncident logiquement finissent par construire quelque chose qui ressemble à l’évidence. A Gwynplaine arrêté, au mode silencieux de son arrestation, à ses vêtements rapportés par l’homme de police, à ce glas de la prison où il avait été conduit, venait s’ajouter, disons mieux, s’ajuster cette chose tragique, un cercueil porté en terre.

— Il est mort! cria Ursus.

Il tomba assis sur une borne.

— Mort! Ils l’ont tué! Gwynplaine! mon enfant! mon fils!

Et il éclata en sanglots.

V

LA RAISON D'ÉTAT TRAVAILLE EN PETIT COMME EN GRAND

Ursus, il s'en vantait, hélas! n'avait jamais pleuré. Le réservoir des pleurs était plein. Une telle plénitude, où s'est accumulée goutte à goutte, douleur à douleur, toute une longue existence, ne se vide pas en un instant. Ursus sanglota longtemps.

La première larme est une ponction. Il pleura sur Gwynplaine, sur Dea, sur lui Ursus, sur Homo. Il pleura comme un enfant. Il pleura comme un vieillard. Il pleura de tout ce dont il avait ri. Il acquitta l'arriéré. Le droit de l'homme aux larmes ne se périme pas.

Du reste, le mort qu'on venait de mettre en terre, c'était Hardquanonne; mais Ursus n'était pas forcé de le savoir.

Plusieurs heures s'écoulèrent.

Le jour commença à poindre; la pâle nappe du matin s'étala, vaguement plissée d'ombre, sur le bowling-green. L'aube vint blanchir la façade de l'inn Tadcaster. Maître Nicless ne s'était pas couché; car parfois le même fait produit plusieurs insomnies.

Les catastrophes rayonnent en tout sens. Jetez une pierre dans l'eau, et comptez les éclaboussures

Maître Nicless se sentait atteint. C'est fort désagréable, des aventures chez vous. Maître Nicless, peu rassuré et entrevoyant des complications, méditait. Il regrettait d'avoir reçu chez lui «ces gens-là». — S'il avait su! — Ils finiront par lui attirer quelque mauvaise affaire. Comment les mettre dehors maintenant? — Il avait bail avec Ursus. — Quel bonheur s'il en était débarrassé! — Comment s'y prendre pour les chasser?

Brusquement il y eut à la porte de l'inn un de ces frappements tumultueux qui, en Angleterre, annoncent «quelqu'un». La gamme du frappement correspond à l'échelle de la hiérarchie.

Ce n'était point tout à fait le frappement d'un lord, mais c'était le frappement d'un magistrat.

Le tavernier, fort tremblant, entre-bâilla son vasistas.

Il y avait magistrat en effet. Maître Nicless aperçut à sa porte, dans le petit jour, un groupe de police, en tête duquel se détachaient deux hommes, dont l’un était le justicier-quorum.

Maître Nicless avait vu le matin le justicier-quorum, et il le connaissait.

Il ne connaissait pas l’autre homme.

C’était un gentleman gras, au visage couleur cire, en perruque mondaine et en cape de voyage.

Maître Nicless avait grand’peur du premier de ces personnages, le justicier-quorum. Si maître Nicless eût été de la cour, il eût eu plus peur encore du second, car c’était Barkilphedro.

Un des hommes du groupe cogna une seconde fois la porte, violemment.

Le tavernier, avec une grosse sueur d’anxiété au front, ouvrit.

Le justicier-quorum, du ton d’un homme qui a charge de police et qui est très au fait du personnel des vagabonds, éleva la voix et demanda sévèrement:

— Maître Ursus?

L’hôtelier, bonnet bas, répondit:

— Votre honneur, c’est ici.

— Je le sais, dit le justicier.

— Sans doute, votre honneur,

— Qu’il vienne.

— Votre honneur, il n’est pas là,

— Où est-il?

— Je l’ignore.

— Comment?

— Il n’est pas rentré.

— Il est donc sorti de bien bonne heure?

— Non. Mais il est sorti bien tard.

— Ces vagabonds! reprit le justicier.

— Votre honneur, dit doucement maître Nicless. le voilà.

Ursus, en effet, venait de paraître à un détour de mur. Il arrivait à l’inn. Il avait passé presque toute la nuit entre la geôle où, à midi, il avait vu entrer Gwynplaine, et le cimetière où, à minuit, il avait entendu combler une fosse. Il était pâle de deux pâleurs, de sa tristesse et du crépuscule.

Le petit jour, qui est de la lueur à l’état de larve, laisse les formes, même celles qui se meuvent, mêlées à la diffusion de la nuit. Ursus, blême et vague, marchant lentement, ressemblait une figure de songe.

Dans cette distraction farouche que donne l’angoisse, il s’en était allé de l’inn tête nue. Il ne s’était pas même aperçu qu’il n’avait point de chapeau.

Ses quelques cheveux gris remuaient au vent. Ses yeux ouverts ne paraissaient pas regarder. Souvent, éveillé on est endormi, de même qu’il arrive qu’endormi on est éveillé. Ursus avait un air fou.

— Maître Ursus, cria le tavernier, venez. Leurs honneurs désirent vous parler.

Maître Nicless, occupé uniquement d’amadouer l’incident, lâcha, et en même temps eût voulu retenir ce pluriel, «leurs honneurs», respectueux pour le groupe, mais blessant peut-être pour le chef, confondu de la sorte avec ses subordonnés.

Ursus eut le sursaut d’un homme précipité à bas d’un lit où il dormirait profondément.

— Qu’est-ce? dit-il.

Et il aperçut la police, et en tête de la police le magistrat.

Nouvelle et rude secousse.

Tout à l’heure le wapentake, maintenant le justicier-quorum.

L’un semblait le jeter à l’autre. Il y a de vieilles histoires d’écueils comme cela.

Le justicier-quorum lui fit signe d’entrer dans la taverne.

Ursus obéit.

Govicum, qui venait de se lever et qui balayait la salle, s’arrêta, se rencogna derrière les tables, mit son balai au repos, et retint son souffle. Il plongea son poing dans ses cheveux et se gratta vaguement, ce qui indique l’attention aux événements.

Le justicier-quorum s’assit sur un banc, devant une table; Barkilphedro prit une chaise. Ursus et maître Nicless demeurèrent debout. Les gens de police, laissés dehors, se massèrent devant la porte refermée.

Le justicier-quorum fixa sa prunelle légale sur Ursus, et dit:

— Vous avez un loup.

Ursus répondit:

— Pas tout à fait.

— Vous avez un loup, reprit le justicier, en soulignant «loup d’un accent décisif.

Ursus répondit:

— C’est que...

Et il se tut.

— Délit, repartit le justicier.

Ursus hasarda cette plaidoirie:

— C’est mon domestique.

Le justicier posa sa main à plat sur la table les cinq doigts écartés, ce qui est un très beau geste d’autorité.

— Baladin, demain, à pareille heure, vous et votre loup; vous aurez quitté l’Angleterre. Sinon, le loup sera saisi, mené au greffe, et tué.

Ursus pensa: — Continuation des assassinats. — Mais il ne souffla mot et se contenta de trembler de tous ses membres.

— Vous entendez? reprit le justicier.

Ursus adhéra d’un hochement de tête.

Le justicier insista.

— Tué.

Il y eut un silence.

— Étranglé, ou noyé.

Le justicier-quorum regarda Ursus.

— Et vous en prison.

Ursus murmura:

— Mon juge...

— Soyez parti avant demain matin. Sinon, tel est l’ordre.

— Mon juge...

— Quoi?

— Il faut que nous quittions l’Angleterre, lui et moi?

— Oui.

— Aujourd’hui?

— Aujourd’hui.

— Comment faire?

Maître Nicless était heureux. Ce magistrat, qu’il avait redouté, venait à son aide. La police se faisait l’auxiliaire de lui, Nicless. Elle le délivrait de ces «gens-là». Le moyen qu’il cherchait, elle le lui apportait. Cet Ursus qu’il voulait congédier, la police le chassait. Force majeure. Rien objecter. Il était ravi. Il intervint:

— Votre honneur, cet homme...

Il désignait Ursus du doigt.

— ... Cet homme demande comment faire pour quitter l’Angleterre aujourd’hui? Rien de plus simple. Il y a, tous les jours et toutes les nuits, aux amarrages de la Tamise, de ce côté-ci du pont de Londres comme de l’autre côté, des bateaux qui partent pour les pays. On va d’Angleterre en Danemark, en Hollande, en Espagne, pas en France, à cause de la guerre, mais partout.

Cette nuit, plusieurs navires partiront, vers une heure du matin, qui est l’heure de la marée. Entre autres, la panse Vograat de Rotterdam.

Le justicier-quorum fit un mouvement d’épaule du côté d’Ursus:

— Soit. Partez par le premier bateau venu. Par la Vograat.

— Mon juge... fit Ursus.

— Eh bien?

— Mon juge, si je n’avais, comme autrefois, que ma petite baraque à roues, cela se pourrait. Elle tiendrait sur un bateau.

Mais...

— Mais quoi?

— Mais c’est que j’ai la Green-Box, qui est une grande machine avec deux chevaux, et, si large que soit un navire, jamais cela n’entrera.

— Qu’est-ce que cela me fait? dit le justicier. On tuera le loup.

Ursus, frémissant, se sentait manié comme par une main de glace. — Les monstres! pensa-t-il. Tuer les gens! c’est leur expédient.

Le tavernier sourit, et s’adressa à Ursus.

— Maître Ursus, vous pouvez vendre la Green-Box.

Ursus regarda Nicless.

— Maître Ursus, vous avez offre.

— De qui?

— Offre pour la voiture. Offre pour les deux chevaux. Offre pour les deux femmes bréhaignes. Offre...

— De qui? répéta Ursus.

— Du maître du circus voisin.

— C’est juste.

Ursus se souvint.

Maître Nicless se tourna vers le justicier-quorum.

— Votre honneur, le marché peut être conclu aujourd’hui même. Le maître du circus d’à côté désire acheter la grande voiture et les deux chevaux.

— Le maître de ce circus a raison, dit le justicier, car il va en avoir besoin. Une voiture et des chevaux, cela lui sera utile.

Lui aussi partira aujourd’hui. Les révérends des paroisses de Southwark se sont plaints des vacarmes obscènes du Tarrinzeau-field. Le shériff a pris des mesures. Ce soir, il n’y aura plus une seule baraque de bateleur sur cette place. Fin des scandales. L’honorable gentleman qui daigne être ici présent...

Le justicier-quorum s’interrompit par un salut à Barkilphedro, que Barkilphedro lui rendit.

— ... L’honorable gentleman qui daigne être ici présent est arrivé cette nuit de Windsor. Il apporte des ordres. Sa majest a dit: II faut nettoyer cela.

Ursus, dans sa longue méditation de toute la nuit, n’avait pas été sans se poser quelques questions. Après tout, il n’avait vu qu’une bière. Était-il bien sûr que Gwynplaine fut dedans? Il pouvait y avoir sur la terre d’autres morts que Gwynplaine. Un cercueil qui passe n’est pas un trépassé qui se nomme. A la suite de l’arrestation de Gwynplaine, il y avait eu un enterrement. Cela ne prouvait rien. Post hoc, nonpropter hoc, — etc. — Ursus en était revenu à douter. L’espérance brûle et luit sur l’angoisse comme le naphte sur l’eau. Cette flamme surnageante flotte éternellement sur la douleur humaine. Ursus avait fini par se dire: Il est probable que c’est Gwynplaine qu’on a enterré, mais ce n’est pas certain. Qui sait? Gwynplaine est peut-être encore vivant.

Ursus s’inclina devant le justicier.

— Honorable juge, je partirai. Nous partirons. On partira. Par la Vograat. Pour Rotterdam. J’obéis. Je vendrai la Green-Box, les chevaux, les trompettes, les femmes d’Egypte.

Mais il y a quelqu’un qui est avec moi, un camarade, et que je ne puis laisser derrière moi. Gwynplaine...

— Gwynplaine est mort, dit une voix.

Ursus eut l’impression du froid d’un reptile sur sa peau.

C’était Barkilphedro qui venait de parler.

La dernière lueur s’évanouissait. Plus de doute. Gwynplaine était mort.

Ce personnage devait le savoir. Il était assez sinistre pour cela.

Ursus salua.

Maître Nicless était très bon homme en dehors de la lâcheté.

Mais, effrayé, il était atroce. La suprême férocité, c’est la peur.

Il grommela:

— Simplification.

Et il eut, derrière Ursus, ce frottement de mains, particulier aux égoïstes, qui signifie: M’en voila quitte! et qui semble fait au-dessus de la cuvette de Ponce-Pilate.

Ursus accablé baissait la tête. La sentence de Gwynplaine était exécutée, la mort; et, quant à lui, son arrêt lui était signifié, l’exil. Il n’y avait plus qu’à obéir. Il songeait.

Il sentit qu’on lui touchait le coude. C’était l’autre personnage, l’acolyte du justicier-quorum. Ursus tressaillit.

La voix qui avait dit: Gwynplaine est mort, lui chuchota l’oreille:

— Voici dix livres sterling que vous envoie quelqu’un qui vous veut du bien.

Et Barkilphedro posa une petite bourse sur une table devant Ursus.

On se rappelle la cassette que Barkilphedro avait emportée.

Dix guinées sur deux mille, c’était tout ce que pouvait faire Barkilphedro. En conscience, c’était assez. S’il eût donn davantage, il y eût perdu. Il avait pris la peine de faire la trouvaille d’un lord, il en commençait l’exploitation, il était juste que le premier rendement de la mine lui appartînt. Ceux qui verraient là une petitesse seraient dans leur droit, mais auraient tort de s’étonner. Barkilphedro aimait l’argent, surtout volé. Un envieux contient un avare. Barkilphedro n’était pas sans défauts. Commettre des crimes, cela n’empêche pas d’avoir des vices. Les tigres ont des poux.

D’ailleurs, c’était l’école de Bacon.

Barkilphedro se tourna vers le justicier-quorum, et lui dit:

— Monsieur, veuillez terminer. Je suis très pressé. Une chaise attelée des propres relais de sa majesté m’attend. Il faut que je reparte ventre à terre pour Windsor, et que j’y sois avant deux heures d’ici. J’ai des comptes à rendre et des ordres prendre.

Le justicier-quorum se leva.

Il alla à la porte qui n’était fermée qu’au pêne, l’ouvrit, regarda, sans dire un mot, les gens de police, et il lui jaillit de l’index un éclair d’autorité. Tout le groupe entra avec ce silence où l’on entrevoit l’approche de quelque chose de sévère.

Maître Nicless, satisfait du dénoûment rapide qui coupait court aux complications, charmé d’être hors de cet écheveau brouillé, craignit, en voyant ce déploiement d’exempts, qu’on n’appréhendât Ursus chez lui. Deux arrestations coup sur coup dans sa maison, celle de Gwynplaine, puis celle d’Ursus, cela pouvait nuire à la taverne, les buveurs n’aimant point les dérangements de police.

C’était le cas d’une intervention convenablement suppliante et généreuse.

Maître Nicless tourna vers le justicier-quorum sa face souriante où la confiance était tempérée par le respect:

— Votre honneur, je fais observer à votre honneur que ces honorables messieurs les sergents ne sont point indispensables du moment que le loup coupable va être emmené hors d'Angleterre, et que ce nommé Ursus ne fait point de résistance, et que les ordres de votre honneur sont ponctuellement suivis. Votre honneur considérera que les actions respectables de la police, si nécessaires au bien du royaume, font du tort à un établissement, et que ma maison est innocente. Les saltimbanques de la Green-Box étant nettoyés, comme dit sa majesté la reine, je ne vois plus personne ici de criminel, car je ne suppose pas que la fille aveugle et les deux bréhaignes soient délinquantes, et j'implorerais votre honneur de daigner abréger son auguste visite et de congédier ces dignes messieurs qui viennent d'entrer, car ils n'ont rien à faire en ma maison, et si votre honneur me permettait de prouver la justesse de mon dire sous la forme d'une humble question, je rendrais évidente l'inutilité de la présence de ces vénérables messieurs en demandant à votre honneur: Puisque le nommé Ursus s'exécute et part, qui peuvent-ils avoir à arrêter ici?

— Vous, dit le justicier.

On ne discute pas avec un coup d'épée qui vous perce de part en part. Maître Nicless s'affaissa sur n'importe quoi, sur une table, sur un banc, sur ce qui se trouva là, altéré.

Le justicier haussa la voix tellement que, s'il y avait des gens sur la place, ils pouvaient l'entendre.

— Maître Nicless Plumptre, tavernier de cette taverne, ceci est le dernier point à régler. Ce baladin et ce loup sont des vagabonds. Ils sont chassés. Mais le plus coupable, c'est vous.

C'est chez vous, et de votre consentement, que la loi a ét violée, et vous, homme patenté, investi d'une responsabilit publique, vous avez installé le scandale dans votre maison.

Maître Nicless, votre licence vous est retirée, vous payerez l'amende, et vous irez en prison.

Les gens de police entourèrent le tavernier.

Le justicier continua, désignant Govicum:

— Ce garçon, votre complice, est saisi.

Le poignet d'un exempt s'abattit sur le collet de Govicum, qui considéra l'exempt avec curiosité. Le boy, pas très effrayé, comprenait peu, avait déjà vu plus d’une chose singulière, et se demandait si c’était la suite de la comédie.

Le justicier-quorum enfonça son chapeau sur son chef, croisa ses deux mains sur son ventre, ce qui est le comble de la majesté, et ajouta:

— C’est dit, maître Nicless, vous serez attrait en prison, et mis en geôle. Vous et ce boy. Et cette maison, l’inn Tadcaster, demeurera fermée, condamnée et close. Pour l’exemple. Sur ce, vous allez nous suivre.

LIVRE SEPTIEME

LA TITANE

I

RÉVEIL

— Et Dea!

Il sembla à Gwynplaine, regardant poindre le jour Corleone-lodge pendant ces aventures de l'inn Tadcaster, que ce cri venait du dehors; ce cri était en lui.

Qui n'a entendu les profondes clameurs de l'âme?

D'ailleurs le jour se levait.

L'aurore est une voix.

A quoi servirait le soleil si ce n'est à réveiller la sombre endormie, la conscience?

La lumière et la vertu sont de même espèce.

Que le dieu s'appelle Christ ou qu'il s'appelle Amour, il y a toujours une heure où il est oublié, même par le meilleur; nous avons tous, même les saints, besoin d'une voix qui nous fasse souvenir, et l'aube fait parler en nous l'avertisseur sublime.

La conscience crie devant le devoir comme le coq chante devant le jour.

Le coeur humain, ce chaos, entend le Fiat lux.

Gwynplaine — nous continuerons à le nommer ainsi; Clancharlie est un lord, Gwynplaine est un homme; — Gwynplaine fut comme ressuscité.

Il était temps que l'artère fût liée.

Il y avait en lui une fuite d'honnêteté.

— Et Dea! dit-il.

Et il sentit dans ses veines comme une transfusion généreuse.

Quelque chose de salubre et de tumultueux se précipitait en lui.

L'irruption violente des bonnes pensées, c'est un retour au logis de quelqu'un qui n'a pas sa clef, et qui force honnêtement son propre mur. Il y a escalade, mais du bien. Il y a effraction, mais du mal.

— Dea! Dea! Dea! répéta-t-il.

Il s'affirmait à lui-même son propre coeur.

Et il fit cette question à haute voix:

— Où es-tu?

Presque étonné qu'on ne lui répondit pas. Il reprit, regardant le plafond et les murs, avec un égarement où la raison revenait:

— Où es-tu? où suis-je?

Et dans cette chambre, dans cette cage, il recommença sa marche de bête farouche enfermée.

— Où suis-je? à Windsor. Et toi? à Southwark. Ah! mon Dieu! voilà la première fois qu'il y a une distance entre nous. Qui donc a creusé cela? moi ici, toi là! Oh! cela n'est pas. Cela ne sera pas. Qu'est-ce donc qu'on m'a fait?

Il s'arrêta.

— Qui donc m'a parlé de la reine? est-ce que je connais cela? Changé! moi changé! pourquoi? parce que je suis lord. Sais-tu ce qui se passe, Dea? tu es lady. C'est étonnant les choses qui arrivent. Ah ça! il s'agit de retrouver mon chemin. Est-ce qu'on m'aurait perdu? Il y a un homme qui m'a parlé avec un air obscur. Je me rappelle les paroles qu'il m'a adressées: — Milord, une porte qui s'ouvre ferme une autre porte. Ce qui est derrière vous n'est plus. — Autrement dit: Vous êtes un lâche! Cet homme-là, le misérable! il me disait cela pendant que je n'étais pas encore réveillé. Il abusait de mon premier moment étonné.
J'étais comme une proie qu'il avait. Où est-il, que je l'insulte! Il me parlait avec le sombre sourire du rêve. Ah!
voici que je redeviens moi! C'est bon. On se trompe si l'on croit qu'on fera de lord Clancharlie ce qu'on voudra! Pair d'Angleterre, oui, avec une pairesse, qui est Dea. Des conditions! est-ce que j'en accepte? La reine? que m'importe la reine! je ne l'ai jamais vue. Je ne suis pas lord pour être esclave. J'entre libre dans la puissance. Est-ce qu'on se figure m'avoir déchaîné pour rien? On m'a démuselé, voilà tout.
Dea! Ursus! nous sommes ensemble. Ce que vous étiez, je l'étais. Ce que je suis, vous l'êtes. Venez! Non. J'y vais!
Tout de suite. Tout de suite! J'ai déjà trop attendu. Que doivent-ils penser de ne pas me voir revenir? Cet argent! quand je pense que je leur ai envoyé de l'argent! C'était moi qu'il fallait. Je me rappelle, cet homme, il m'a dit que je ne pouvais pas sortir d'ici. Nous allons voir. Allons, une voiture! une voiture! qu'on attelle. Je veux aller les chercher. Où sont les valets? Il doit y avoir des valets, puisqu'il y a un seigneur. Je suis le maître ici. C'est ma maison. Et j'en tordrai les verrous, et j'en briserai les serrures, et j'en enfoncerai les portes à coups de pied. Quelqu'un qui me barre le passage, je lui passe mon épée au travers du corps, car j'ai une épée maintenant. Je voudrais bien voir qu'on me résistât. J'ai une femme, qui est Dea. J'ai un père, qui est Ursus. Ma maison est un palais et je le donne à Ursus. Mon nom est un diadème et je le donne à Dea. Vite! Tout de suite! Dea, me voici! Ah!

j'aurai vite enjambé l'intervalle, va!

Et, levant la première portière venue, il sortit de la chambre impétueusement.

Il se trouva dans un corridor.

Il alla devant lui.

Un deuxième corridor se présenta.

Toutes les portes étaient ouvertes.

Il se mit à marcher au hasard, de chambre en chambre, de couloir en couloir, cherchant la sortie.

II

RESSEMBLANCE D’UN PALAIS AVEC UN BOIS

Dans les palais à l’italienne, Corleone-lodge était de cette sorte, il y avait très peu de portes. Tout était rideau, portière, tapisserie.

Pas de palais à cette époque qui n’eût, à l’intérieur, un singulier fouillis de chambres et de corridors où abondait le faste; dorures, marbres, boiseries ciselées, soies d’orient; avec des recoins pleins de précaution et d’obscurité, d’autres pleins de lumière. C’étaient des galetas riches et gais, des réduits vernis, luisants, revêtus de faïences de Hollande ou d’azulejos de Portugal, des embrasures de hautes fenêtres coupées en soupentes, et des cabinets tout en vitres, jolies lanternes logeables. Les épaisseurs de mur, évidées, étaient habitables.

Ça et là, des bonbonnières, qui étaient des garde-robes. Cela s’appelait «les petits appartements». C’est là qu’on commettait les crimes.

Si l’on avait à tuer le duc de Guise ou à fourvoyer la jolie présidente de Sylvecane, ou, plus tard, à étouffer les cris des petites qu’amenait Lebel, c’était commode. Logis compliqué, inintelligible à un nouveau venu. Lieu des rapts; fond ignoré o aboutissaient les disparitions. Dans ces élégantes cavernes les princes et les seigneurs déposaient leur butin; le comte de Charolais y cachait madame Courchamp, la femme du maître des requêtes; M. de Monthulé y cachait la fille de Haudry, le fermier de la Croix Saint-Lenfroy; le prince de Conti y cachait les deux belles boulangères de l’Ile-Adam; le duc de Buckingham y cachait la pauvre Pennywell, etc. Les choses qui s’accomplissaient là étaient de celles qui se font, comme dit la loi romaine, vi, clam et precario, par force, en secret, et pour peu de temps. Qui était là y restait selon le bon plaisir du maître. C’étaient des oubliettes, dorées. Cela tenait du cloître et du sérail. Des escaliers tournaient, montaient, descendaient. Une spirale de chambres s’emboîtant vous ramenait à votre point de départ. Une galerie s’achevait en oratoire. Un confessionnal se greffait sur une alcôve. Les ramifications des coraux et les percées des éponges avaient probablement servi de modèles aux architectes des «petits appartements» royaux et seigneuriaux. Les embranchements étaient inextricables. Des portraits pivotant sur des ouvertures offraient des entrées et des sorties. C'était machiné. Il le fallait bien; il s'y jouait des drames. Les étages de cette ruche allaient des caves aux mansardes. Madrépore bizarre incrusté dans tous les palais, commencer par Versailles, et qui était comme l'habitation des pygmées dans la demeure des titans. Couloirs, reposoirs, nids, alvéoles, cachettes. Toutes sortes de trous où se fourraient les petitesses des grands.

Ces lieux, serpentants et murés, éveillaient des idées de jeux, d'yeux bandés, de mains à tâtons, de rires contenus, colin-maillard, cache-cache; et en même temps faisaient songer aux Atrides, aux Plantagenets, aux Médicis, aux sauvages chevaliers d'Elz, à Rizzio, à Monaldeschi, aux épées poursuivant un fuyard de chambre en chambre.

L'antiquité avait, elle aussi, de mystérieux logis de ce genre, où le luxe était approprié aux horreurs. L'échantillon en a ét conservé sous terre dans certains sépulcres d'Egypte, par exemple dans la crypte du roi Psamméticus, découverte par Passalacqua.

On trouve dans les vieux poètes l'effroi de ces constructions suspectes.

Error circumflexus, locus implicitus gyris.

Gwynplaine était dans les petits appartements de Corleone-lodge.

Il avait la fièvre de partir, d'être dehors, de revoir Dea. Cet enchevêtrement de corridors et de cellules, de portes dérobées, de portes imprévues, l'arrêtait et le ralentissait. Il eût voulu y courir, il était forcé d'y errer. Il croyait n'avoir qu'une porte à pousser, il avait un écheveau à débrouiller.

Après une chambre, une autre. Puis des carrefours de salons.

Il ne rencontrait rien de vivant. Il écoutait. Aucun mouvement.

Il lui semblait parfois revenir sur ses pas.

Par moments il croyait voir quelqu'un venir à lui. Ce n'était personne. C'était lui, dans une glace, en habit de seigneur.

C'était lui, invraisemblable. Il se reconnaissait, mais pas tout de suite.

Il allait, prenant tous les passages qui s'offraient.

Il s'engageait dans des méandres d'architecture intime; là un cabinet coquettement peint et sculpté, un peu obscène et très discret; là une chapelle équivoque tout écaillée de nacres et d'émaux, avec des ivoires faits pour être vus à la loupe, comme des dessus de tabatières; là un de ces précieux retraits florentins accommodés pour les hypocondries féminines, et qu'on appelait dès lors boudoirs. Partout, sur les plafonds, sur les murs, sur les planchers même, il y avait des figurations veloutées ou métalliques d’oiseaux et d’arbres, des végétations extravagantes enroulées de perles, des bossages de passementerie, des nappes de jais, des guerriers, des reines, des tritonnes cuirassées d’un ventre d’hydre. Les biseaux des cristaux taillés ajoutaient des effets de prismes à des effets de reflets. Les verroteries jouaient les pierreries. On voyait étinceler des encoignures sombres. On ne savait si toutes ces facettes lumineuses, où des verres d’émeraudes s’amalgamaient à des ors de soleil levant et où flottaient des nuées gorge de pigeon, étaient des miroirs microscopiques ou des aigues-marines démesurées.

Magnificence à la fois délicate et énorme. C’était le plus mignon des palais, à moins que ce ne fût le plus colossal des écrins. Une maison pour Mab ou un bijou pour Géo. Gwynplaine cherchait l’issue.

Il ne la trouvait pas. Impossible de s’orienter. Rien de capiteux comme l’opulence quand on la voit pour la première fois.

Mais en outre c’était un labyrinthe. A chaque pas, une magnificence lui faisait obstacle. Cela semblait résister à ce qu’il s’en allât. Cela avait l’air de ne pas vouloir le lâcher.

Il était comme dans une glu de merveilles. Il se sentait saisi et retenu.

— Quel horrible palais! pensait-il.

Il rôdait dans ce dédale, inquiet, se demandant ce que cela voulait dire, s’il était en prison, s’irritant, aspirant à l’air libre. Il répétait: Dea! Dea! comme on tient le fil qu’il ne faut pas laisser rompre et qui vous fera sortir.

Par moments il appelait.

— Hé! quelqu’un!

Rien ne répondait.

Ces chambres n’en finissaient pas. C’était désert, silencieux, splendide, sinistre.

On se figure ainsi les châteaux enchantés.

Des bouches de chaleur cachées entretenaient dans ces corridors et dans ces cabinets une température d’été. Le mois de juin semblait avoir été pris par quelque magicien et enfermé dans ce labyrinthe. Par moments cela sentait bon. On traversait des bouffées de parfums comme s’il y avait là des fleurs invisibles.

On avait chaud. Partout des tapis. On eût pu se promener nu.

Gwynplaine regardait par les fenêtres. L’aspect changeait. Il voyait tantôt des jardins, remplis des fraîcheurs du printemps et du matin, tantôt de nouvelles façades avec d’autres statues, tantôt des patios à l’espagnole, qui sont de petites cours quadrangulaires entre de grands bâtiments, dallées, moisies et froides; parfois une rivière qui était la Tamise, parfois une grosse tour qui était Windsor.

Dehors, de si grand matin, il n’y avait point de passants.

Il s’arrêtait. Il écoutait.

— Oh! je m’en irai, disait-il. Je rejoindrai Dea. On ne me gardera pas de force. Malheur à qui voudrait m’empêcher de sortir! Qu’est-ce que c’est que cette grande tour-là? S’il y a un géant, un dogue d’enfer, une tarasque, pour barrer la porte dans ce palais ensorcelé, je l’exterminerai. Une armée, je la dévorerais. Dea! Dea!

Tout à coup il entendit un petit bruit, très faible. Cela ressemblait à de l’eau qui coule.

Il était dans une galerie étroite, obscure, fermée à quelques pas devant lui par un rideau fendu.

Il alla à ce rideau, l’écarta, entra.

Il pénétra dans de l’inattendu.

EVE

Une salle octogone, voûtée en anse de panier, sans fenêtres, éclairée d'un jour d'en haut, toute revêtue, mur, pavage et voûte, de marbre fleur de pêcher; au milieu de la salle un baldaquin pinacle en marbre drap mortuaire, à colonnes torses, dans le style pesant et charmant d'Elisabeth, couvrant d'ombre une vasque-baignoire du même marbre noir; au milieu de la vasque un fin jaillissement d'eau odorante et tiède remplissant doucement et lentement la cuve; c'est là ce qu'il avait devant les yeux.

Bain noir fait pour changer la blancheur en resplendissement.

C'était cette eau qu'il avait entendue. Une fuite ménagée dans la baignoire à un certain niveau ne la laissait pas déborder. La vasque fumait, mais si peu qu'il y avait à peine quelque buée sur le marbre. Le grêle jet d'eau était pareil à une souple verge d'acier fléchissante au moindre souffle.

Aucun meuble. Si ce n'est, près de la baignoire, une de ces chaises-lits à coussins assez longues pour qu'une femme, qui y est étendue, puisse avoir à ses pieds son chien, ou son amant; d'où can-al-pie, dont nous avons fait canapé.

C'était une chaise longue d'Espagne, vu que le bas était en argent. Les coussins et le capiton étaient de soie glacée blanc.

De l'autre côté de la baignoire, se dressait, adossée au mur, une haute étagère de toilette en argent massif avec tous ses ustensiles, ayant à son milieu huit petites glaces de Venise ajustées daans un châssis d'argent et figurant une fenêtre.

Dans le pan coupé de muraille le plus voisin du canapé, était entaillée une baie carrée qui ressemblait à une lucarne et qui était bouchée d'un panneau fait d'une lame d'argent rouge. Ce panneau avait des gonds comme un volet. Sur l'argent rouge brillait, niellée et dorée, une couronne royale. Au-dessus du panneau était suspendu et scellé au mur un timbre qui était en vermeil, à moins qu'il ne fût en or.

Vis-à-vis l'entrée de cette salle, en-face de Gwynplaine qui s'était arrêté court, le pan coupé de marbre manquait. Il était remplacé par une ouverture de même dimension, allant jusqu'à la voûte et fermée d'une large et haute toile d'argent.

Cette toile, d'une ténuité féerique, était transparente. On voyait au travers.

Au centre de la toile, à l'endroit où est d'ordinaire l'araignée, Gwynplaine aperçut une chose formidable, une femme nue.

Nue à la lettre, non. Cette femme était vêtue. Et vêtue de la tête aux pieds. Le vêtement était une chemise, très longue, comme les robes d'anges dans les tableaux de sainteté, mais si fine qu'elle semblait mouillée. De là un à peu près de femme nue, plus traître et plus périlleux que la nudité franche.

L'histoire a enregistré des processions de princesses et de grandes dames entre deux files de moines, où, sous prétexte de pieds nus et d'humilité, la duchesse de Montpensier se montrait ainsi à tout Paris dans une chemise de dentelle. Correctif: un cierge à la main.

La toile d'argent, diaphane comme une vitre, était un rideau.

Elle n'était fixée que du haut, et pouvait se soulever. Elle séparait la salle de marbre, qui était une salle de bain, d'une chambre, qui était une chambre à coucher. Cette chambre, très petite, était une espèce de grotte de miroirs. Partout des glaces de Venise, contiguës, ajustées polyédriquement, reliées par des baguettes dorées, réfléchissaient le lit qui était au centre. Sur ce lit, d'argent comme la toilette et le canapé, était couchée la femme. Elle dormait.

Elle dormait la tête renversée, un de ses pieds refoulant ses couvertures, comme la succube au-dessus de laquelle le rêve bat des ailes.

Son oreiller de guipure était tombé à terre sur le tapis.

Entre sa nudité et le regard il y avait deux obstacles, sa chemise et le rideau de gaze d'argent, deux transparences. La chambre, plutôt alcôve que chambre, était éclairée avec une sorte de retenue par le reflet de la salle de bain. La femme peut-être n'avait pas de pudeur, mais la lumière en avait.

Le lit n'avait ni colonnes, ni dais, ni ciel, de sorte que la femme, quand elle ouvrait les yeux, pouvait se voir mille fois nue dans les miroirs au-dessus de sa tête.

Les draps avaient le désordre d'un sommeil agité. La beauté des plis indiquait la finesse de la toile. C'était l'époque où une reine, songeant qu'elle serait damnée, se figurait l'enfer ainsi: un lit avec de gros draps.

Du reste, cette mode du sommeil nu venait d’Italie, et remontait aux romains. Sub clara nuda lucerna, dit Horace.

Une robe de chambre en soie singulière, de Chine sans doute, car dans les plis on entrevoyait un grand lézard d’or, était jetée sur le pied du lit.

Au delà du lit, au fond de l’alcôve, il y avait probablement une porte, masquée et marquée par une assez grande glace sur laquelle étaient peints des paons et des cygnes. Dans cette chambre faite d’ombre tout reluisait. Les espacements entre les cristaux et les dorures étaient enduits de cette matière étincelante qu’on appelait à Venise «fiel de verre».

Au chevet du lit était fixé un pupitre en argent à tasseaux tournants et à flambeaux fixes sur lequel on pouvait voir un livre ouvert portant au haut des pages ce titre en grosses lettres rouges: Alcoramus Mahumedis.

Gwynplaine ne percevait aucun de ces détails. La femme, voilà ce qu’il voyait.

Il était à la fois pétrifié et bouleversé; ce qui s’exclut, mais ce qui existe.

Cette femme, il la reconnaissait.

Elle avait les yeux fermés et le visage tourné vers lui.

C’était la duchesse.

Elle, cet être mystérieux en qui se mélangeaient tous les resplendissements de l’inconnu, celle qui lui avait fait faire tant de songes inavouables, celle qui lui avait écrit une si étrange lettre! La seule femme au monde dont il pût dire: Elle m’a vu, et elle veut de moi! Il avait chassé les songes, il avait brûlé la lettre. Il l’avait reléguée, elle; le plus loin qu’il avait pu hors de sa rêverie et de sa mémoire; il n’y pensait plus; il l’avait oubliée...

Il la revoyait!

Il la revoyait terrible.

La femme nue, c’est la femme armée.

Il ne respirait plus. Il se sentait soulevé comme dans un nimbe, et poussé. Il regardait. Cette femme devant lui! Était-ce possible?

Au théâtre, duchesse. Ici, néréide, naïade, fée. Toujours apparition.

Il essaya de fuir et sentit que cela ne se pouvait pas. Ses regards étaient devenus deux chaînes, et l’attachaient à cette vision.

Était-ce une fille? Était-ce une vierge? Les deux. Messaline, présente peut-être dans l’invisible, devait sourire, et Diane devait veiller. Il y avait sur cette beauté la clarté de l’inaccessible. Pas de pureté comparable à cette forme chaste et altière. Certaines neiges qui n’ont jamais été touchées sont reconnaissables. Les blancheurs sacrées de la Yungfrau, cette femme les avait. Ce qui se dégageait de ce front inconscient, de cette vermeille chevelure éparse, de ces cils abaissés, de ces veines bleues vaguement visibles, de ces rondeurs sculpturales des seins, des hanches et des genoux modelant les affleurements roses de la chemise, c'était la divinité d'un sommeil auguste.

Cette impudeur se dissolvait en rayonnement. Cette créature était nue avec autant de calme que si elle avait droit au cynisme divin, elle avait la sécurité d'une olympienne qui se fait fille du gouffre, et qui peut dire à l'océan: Père! et elle s'offrait, inabordable et superbe, à tout ce qui passe, aux regards, aux désirs, aux démences, aux songes, aussi fièrement assoupie sur ce lit de boudoir que Vénus dans l'immensité de l'écume.

Elle s'était endormie la nuit et prolongeait son sommeil au grand jour; confiance commencée dans les ténèbres et continuée dans la lumière.

Gwynplaine frémissait. Il admirait.

Admiration malsaine, et qui intéresse trop.

Il avait peur.

La boîte à surprises du sort ne s'épuise point. Gwynplaine avait cru être au bout. Il recommençait. Qu'était-ce que tous ces éclairs, s'abattant sur sa tête sans relâche, et enfin, foudroiement suprême, lui jetant, à lui, homme frissonnant, une déesse endormie? Qu'était-ce que toutes ces ouvertures de ciel successives d'où finissait par sortir, désirable et redoutable, son rêve? Qu'était-ce que ces complaisances du tentateur inconnu lui apportant, l'une après l'autre, ses aspirations vagues, ses velléités confuses, jusqu'à ses mauvaises pensées devenues chair vivante, et l'accablant sous une enivrante série de réalités tirées de l'impossible? Y avait-il conspiration de toute l'ombre contre lui, misérable, et qu'allait-il devenir avec tous ces sourires de la fortune sinistre autour de lui? Qu'était-ce que ce vertige arrangé exprès? Cette femme! là! pourquoi? comment? Nulle explication. Pourquoi lui? Pourquoi elle?
Était-il fait pair d'Angleterre exprès pour cette duchesse? Qui les amenait ainsi l'un à l'autre? qui était dupe? qui était victime? De qui abusait-on la bonne foi? était-ce Dieu qu'on trompait? Toutes ces choses, il ne les précisait pas, il les entrevoyait à travers une suite de nuages noirs dans son cerveau.

Ce logis magique et malveillant, cet étrange palais, tenace comme une prison, était-il du complot? Gwynplaine subissait une sorte de résorption.

Des forces obscures le garrottaient mystérieusement. Une gravitation l’enchaînait. Sa volonté, soutirée, s’en allait de lui. A quoi se retenir? Il était hagard et charmé. Cette fois, il se sentait irrémédiablement insensé. La sombre chute à pic dans le précipice d’éblouissement continuait.

La femme dormait.

Pour lui, l’état de trouble s’aggravant, ce n’était même plus la lady, la duchesse, la dame; c’était la femme.

Les déviations sont dans l’homme à l’état latent. Les vices ont dans notre organisme un tracé invisible tout préparé. Même innocents, et en apparence purs, nous avons cela en nous. Être sans tache, ce n’est pas être sans défaut. L’amour est une loi.

La volupté est un piège. Il y a l’ivresse, et il y a l’ivrognerie. L’ivresse, c’est de vouloir une femme; l’ivrognerie, c’est de vouloir la femme.

Gwynplaine, hors de lui, tremblait.

Que faire contre cette rencontre? Pas de flots d’étoffes, pas d’ampleurs soyeuses, pas de toilette prolixe et coquette, pas d’exagération galante cachant et montrant, pas de nuage. La nudité dans sa concision redoutable. Sorte de sommation mystérieuse, effrontément édénique. Tout le côté ténébreux de l’homme mis en demeure. Ève pire que Satan. L’humain et le surhumain amalgamés. Extase inquiétante, aboutissant au triomphe brutal de l’instinct sur le devoir. Le contour souverain de la beauté est impérieux. Quand il sort de l’idéal et quand il daigne être réel, c’est pour l’homme une proximité funeste.

Par instants la duchesse se déplaçait mollement sur le lit, et avait les vagues mouvements d’une vapeur dans l’azur, changeant d’attitude comme la nuée change de forme. Elle ondulait, composant et décomposant des courbes charmantes. Toutes les souplesses de l’eau, la femme les a. Comme l’eau, la duchesse avait on ne sait quoi d’insaisissable. Chose bizarre à dire, elle était là, chair visible, et elle restait chimérique.

Palpable, elle semblait lointaine. Gwynplaine, effaré et pâle, contemplait. Il écoutait ce sein palpiter et croyait entendre une respiration de fantôme. Il était attiré, il se débattait.

Que faire contre elle? que faire contre lui?

Il s’était attendu à tout, excepté à cela. Un gardien féroce en travers de la porte, quelque furieux monstre geôlier à combattre, voilà sur quoi il avait compté. Il avait prévu Cerbère; il trouvait Hébé.

Une femme nue. Une femme endormie.

Quel sombre combat!

Il fermait les paupières. Trop d’aurore dans l’oeil est une souffrance. Mais, à travers ses paupières fermées, tout de suite il la revoyait. Plus ténébreuse, aussi belle.

Prendre la fuite, ce n’est pas facile. Il avait essayé, et n’avait pu. Il était enraciné comme on est dans le rêve. Quand nous voulons rétrograder, la tentation cloue nos pieds au pavé.

Avancer reste possible, reculer non. Les invisibles bras de la faute sortent de terre et nous tirent dans le glissement.

Une banalité acceptée de tout le monde, c’est que l’émotion s’émousse. Rien n’est plus faux. C’est comme si l’on disait que, sous de l’acide nitrique tombant goutte à goutte, une plaie s’apaise et s’endort, et que l’écartèlement blase Damiens.

La vérité est qu’à chaque redoublement, la sensation est plus aiguë.

D’étonnement en étonnement, Gwynplaine était arrivé au paroxysme.

Ce vase, sa raison, sous cette stupeur nouvelle, débordait. Il sentait en lui un éveil effrayant.

De boussole, il n’en avait plus. Une seule certitude était devant lui, cette femme. On ne sait quel irrémédiable bonheur s’entr’ouvrait, ressemblant à un naufrage. Plus de direction possible. Un courant irrésistible, et l’écueil. L’écueil, ce n’est pas le rocher, c’est la sirène. Un aimant est au fond de l’abîme. S’arracher à cette attraction, Gwynplaine le voulait, mais comment faire? Il ne sentait plus de point d’attache. La fluctuation humaine est infinie. Un homme peut être désempar comme un navire. L’ancre, c’est la conscience. Chose lugubre, la conscience peut casser.

Il n’avait même pas cette ressource: — Je suis défiguré et terrible. Elle me repoussera. — Cette femme lui avait écrit qu’elle l’aimait.

Il y a dans les crises un instant de porte-à-faux. Quand nous débordons sur le mal plus que nous ne nous appuyons sur le bien, cette quantité de nous-même qui est en suspens sur la faute finit par l’emporter et nous précipite. Ce moment triste était-il venu pour Gwynplaine?

Comment échapper?

Ainsi c’était elle! la duchesse! cette femme! Il l’avait devant lui, dans cette chambre, dans ce lieu désert, endormie, livrée, seule. Elle était à sa discrétion, et il était en son pouvoir!

La duchesse!

On a aperçu une étoile au fond des espaces. On l’a admirée.

Elle est si loin! que craindre d’une étoile fixe? Un jour, — une nuit, — on la voit se déplacer. On distingue un frisson de lueur autour d’elle. Cet astre, qu’on croyait impassible, remue. Ce n’est pas l’étoile, c’est la comète. C’est l’immense incendiaire du ciel. L’astre marche, grandit, secoue une chevelure de pourpre, devient énorme. C’est de votre côté qu’il se dirige. O terreur, il vient à vous! La comète vous connaît, la comète vous désire, la comète vous veut. Épouvantable approche céleste. Ce qui arrive sur vous, c’est le trop de lumière, qui est l’aveuglement; c’est l’excès de vie, qui est la mort. Cette avance que vous fait le zénith, vous la refusez. Cette offre d’amour du gouffre, vous la rejetez. Vous mettez votre main sur vos paupières, vous vous cachez, vous vous dérobez, vous vous croyez sauvé. Vous rouvrez les yeux... — L’étoile redoutable est là. Elle n’est plus étoile, elle est monde. Monde ignoré.

Monde de lave et de braise. Dévorant prodige des profondeurs.

Elle emplit le ciel. Il n’y a plus qu’elle. L’escarboucle du fond de l’infini, diamant de loin, de près est fournaise. Vous êtes dans sa flamme.

Et vous sentez commencer votre combustion par une chaleur de paradis.

SATAN

Tout à coup la dormeuse se réveilla. Elle se dressa sur son séant avec une majesté brusque et harmonieuse; ses cheveux de blonde soie floche se répandirent avec un doux tumulte sur ses reins; sa chemise tombante laissa voir son épaule très bas; elle toucha de sa main délicate son orteil rose, et regarda quelques instants son pied nu, digne d'être adoré par Périclés et copi par Phidias; puis elle s'étira et bâilla comme une tigresse au soleil levant.

Il est probable que Gwynplaine respirait, comme lorsqu'on retient son souffle, avec effort.

— Est-ce qu'il y a là quelqu'un? dit-elle.

Elle dit cela tout en bâillant, et c'était plein de grâce.

Gwynplaine entendit cette voix qu'il ne connaissait pas. Voix de charmeuse; accent délicieusement hautain; l'intonation de la caresse tempérant l'habitude du commandement.

En même temps, se dressant sur ses genoux, il y a une statue antique ainsi agenouillée dans mille plis transparents, elle tira à elle la robe de chambre et se jeta à bas du lit, nue et debout, le temps de voir passer une flèche, et tout de suite enveloppée.

En un clin d'oeil la robe de soie la couvrit. Les manches, très longues, lui cachaient les mains. On ne voyait plus que le bout des doigts de ses pieds, blancs avec de petits ongles, comme des pieds d'enfant.

Elle s'ôta du dos un flot de cheveux qu'elle rejeta sur sa robe, puis elle courut derrière le lit, au fond de l'alcôve, et appliqua son oreille au miroir peint qui vraisemblablement recouvrait une porte.

Elle frappa contre la glace avec le petit coude que fait l'index replié.

— Y a-t-il quelqu'un? Lord David! est-ce que ce serait déj vous? Quelle heure est-il donc? Est-ce toi, Barkilphedro?

Elle se retourna.

— Mais non. Ce n'est pas de ce côté-ci. Est-ce qu'il y a quelqu'un dans la chambre de bain? Mais répondez donc! Au fait, non, personne ne peut venir par là.

Elle alla au rideau de toile d’argent, l’ouvrit du bout de son pied, l’écarta d’un mouvement d’épaule, et entra dans la chambre de marbre.

Gwynplaine sentit comme un froid d’agonie. Nul abri. Il était trop tard pour fuir. D’ailleurs il n’en avait pas la force. Il eût voulu que le pavé se fendît, et tomber sous terre. Aucun moyen de ne pas être vu.

Elle le vit.

Elle le regarda, prodigieusement étonnée, mais sans aucun tressaillement, avec une nuance de bonheur et de mépris:

— Tiens, dit-elle, Gwynplaine!

Puis, subitement, d’un bond violent, car cette chatte était une panthère, elle se jeta à son cou.

Elle lui pressa la tête entre ses bras nus dont les manches, dans cet emportement, s’étaient relevées.

Et tout à coup le repoussant, abattant sur les deux épaules de Gwynplaine ses petites mains comme des serres, elle debout devant lui, lui debout devant elle, elle se mit à le regarder étrangement.

Elle regarda, fatale, avec ses yeux d’Aldébaran, rayon visuel mixte, ayant on ne sait quoi de louche et de sidéral. Gwynplaine contemplait cette prunelle bleue et cette prunelle noire, éperdu sous la double fixité de ce regard de ciel et de ce regard d’enfer. Cette femme et cet homme se renvoyaient l’éblouissement sinistre. Ils se fascinaient l’un l’autre, lui par la difformité, elle par la beauté, tous deux par l’horreur.

Il se taisait, comme sous un poids impossible à soulever. Elle s’écria:

— Tu as de l’esprit. Tu es venu. Tu as su que j’avais ét forcée de partir de Londres. Tu m’as suivie. Tu as bien fait.
Tu es extraordinaire d’être ici.

Une prise de possession réciproque, cela jette une sorte d’éclair. Gwynplaine, confusément averti par une vague crainte sauvage et honnête, recula, mais les ongles roses crispés sur son épaule le tenaient. Quelque chose d’inexorable s’ébauchait. Il était dans l’antre de la femme fauve, homme fauve lui-même.

Elle reprit:

— Anne, cette sotte, — tu sais? la reine, — elle m’a fait venir Windsor sans savoir pourquoi. Quand je suis arrivée, elle était enfermée avec son idiot de chancelier. Mais comment as-tu fait pour pénétrer jusqu’à moi?
Voilà ce que j’appelle être un homme.
Des obstacles. Il n’y en a pas. On est appelé, on accourt. Tu t’es renseigné?

Mon nom, la duchesse Josiane, je pense que tu le savais. Qui est-ce qui t'a introduit? C'est le mousse sans doute. Il est intelligent. Je lui donnerai cent guinées.

Comment t'y es-tu pris? dis-moi cela. Non, ne me le dis pas.

Je ne veux pas le savoir. Expliquer rapetisse. Je t'aime mieux surprenant. Tu es assez monstrueux pour être merveilleux. Tu tombes de l'empyrée, voilà, ou tu montes du troisième dessous, travers la trappe de l'Érèbe. Rien de plus simple, le plafond s'est écarté ou le plancher s'est ouvert. Une descente par les nuées ou une ascension dans un flamboiement de soufre, c'est ainsi que tu arrives. Tu mérites d'entrer comme les dieux.

C'est dit, tu es mon amant.

Gwynplaine, égaré, écoutait, sentant de plus en plus sa pensée osciller. C'était fini. Et impossible de douter. La lettre de la nuit, cette femme la confirmait. Lui, Gwynplaine, amant d'une duchesse, amant aimé! l'immense orgueil aux mille têtes sombres remua dans ce coeur infortuné.

La vanité, force énorme en nous, contre nous.

La duchesse continua:

— Puisque tu es là, c'est que c'est voulu. Je n'en demande pas davantage. Il y a quelqu'un en haut, ou en bas, qui nous jette l'un à l'autre. Fiançailles du Styx et de l'Aurore. Fiançailles effrénées hors de toutes les lois! Le jour où je t'ai vu, j'ai dit: — C'est lui. Je le reconnais. C'est le monstre de mes rêves.

Il sera à moi. — Il faut aider le destin. C'est pourquoi je t'ai écrit. Une question, Gwynplaine? crois-tu à la prédestination?

J'y crois, moi, depuis que j'ai lu le Songe de Scipion dans Cicéron. Tiens, je ne remarquais pas. Un habit de gentilhomme.

Tu t'es habillé en seigneur. Pourquoi pas? Tu es saltimbanque.

Raison de plus. Un bateleur vaut un lord. D'ailleurs, qu'est-ce que les lords? des clowns. Tu as une noble taille, tu es très bien fait. C'est inouï que tu sois ici! Quand es-tu arrivé?

Depuis combien de temps es-tu là? Est-ce que tu m'as vue nue?

je suis belle, n'est-ce pas? J'allais prendre mon bain. Oh! je t'aime. Tu as lu ma lettre! L'as-tu lue toi-même? Te l'a-t-on lue? Sais-tu lire? Tu dois être ignorant. Je te fais des questions, mais n'y réponds pas. Je n'aime pas ton son de voix.

Il est doux. Un être incomparable comme toi ne devrait pas parler, mais grincer. Tu chantes, c'est harmonieux. Je hais cela. C'est la seule chose en toi qui me déplaise. Tout le reste est formidable, tout le reste est superbe. Dans l'Inde, tu serais dieu. Est-ce que tu es né avec ce rire épouvantable sur la face? Non, n'est-ce pas? C'est sans doute une mutilation pénale. J'espère bien que tu as commis quelque crime. Viens dans mes bras.

Elle se laissa tomber sur le canapé et le fit tomber près d'elle.

Ils se trouvèrent l'un près de l'autre sans savoir comment. Ce qu'elle disait passait sur Gwynplaine comme un grand vent. Il percevait à peine le sens de ce tourbillon de mots forcenés.

Elle avait l'admiration dans les yeux. Elle parlait en tumulte, frénétiquement, d'une voix éperdue et tendre. Sa parole était une musique, mais Gwynplaine entendait cette musique comme une tempête.

Elle appuya de nouveau sur lui son regard fixe.

— Je me sens dégradée près de toi, quel bonheur! Être altesse, comme c'est fade! Je suis auguste, rien de plus fatigant.

Déchoir repose. Je suis si saturée de respect que j'ai besoin de mépris. Nous sommes toutes un peu des extravagantes, à commencer par Vénus, Cléopâtre, mesdames de Chevreuse et de Longueville, et à finir par moi. Je t'afficherai, je le déclare. Voilà une amourette qui fera une contusion à la royale famille Stuart dont je suis. Ah! je respire! J'ai trouvé l'issue. Je suis hors de là majesté. Être déclassée, c'est être délivrée. Tout rompre, tout braver, tout faire, tout défaire, c'est vivre. Écoute, je t'aime.

Elle s'interrompit, et eut un effrayant sourire.

— Je t'aime non seulement parce que tu es difforme, mais parce que tu es vil. J'aime le monstre, et j'aime l'histrion. Un amant humilié, bafoué, grotesque, hideux, exposé aux rires sur ce pilori qu'on appelle un théâtre, cela a une saveur extraordinaire. C'est mordre au fruit de l'abîme. Un amant infamant, c'est exquis. Avoir sous la dent la pomme, non du paradis, mais de l'enfer, voilà ce qui me tente, j'ai cette faim et cette soif, et je suis cette Ève-là. L'Ève du gouffre. Tu es probablement, sans le savoir, un démon. Je me suis gardée à un masque du songe. Tu es un pantin dont un spectre tient les fils.

Tu es la vision du grand rire infernal. Tu es le maître que j'attendais. Il me fallait un amour comme en ont les Médées et les Canidies. J'étais sûre qu'il m'arriverait une de ces immenses aventures de la nuit. Tu es ce que je voulais. Je te dis là un tas de choses que tu ne dois pas comprendre. Gwynplaine, personne ne m'a possédée, je me donne à toi pure comme la braise ardente. Tu ne me crois évidemment pas, mais si tu savais comme cela m’est égal!

Ses paroles avaient le pêle-mêle de l’éruption. Une piqûre au flanc de l’Etna donnerait l’idée de ce jet de flamme.

Gwynplaine balbutia:

— Madame...

Elle lui mit la main sur la bouche.

— Silence! je te contemple. Gwynplaine, je suis l’immaculée effrénée. Je suis la vestale bacchante. Aucun homme ne m’a connue, et je pourrais être Pythie à Delphes, et avoir sous mon talon nu le trépied de bronze où les prêtres, accoudés sur la peau de Python, chuchotent des questions au dieu invisible. Mon coeur est de pierre, mais il ressemble à ces cailloux mystérieux que la mer roule au pied du rocher Huntly Nabb, à l’embouchure de la Thees, et dans lesquels, si on les casse, on trouve un serpent. Ce serpent, c’est mon amour. Amour tout-puissant, car il t’a fait venir. La distance impossible était entre nous.
J’étais dans Sirius et tu étais dans Allioth. Tu as fait la traversée démesurée, et te voilà. C’est bien. Tais-toi.
Prends-moi.

Elle s’arrêta. Il frissonnait. Elle se remit à sourire.

— Vois-tu, Gwynplaine, rêver, c’est créer. Un souhait est un appel. Construire une chimère, c’est provoquer la réalité.
L’ombre toute-puissante et terrible ne se laisse pas défier.
Elle nous satisfait. Te voilà. Oserai-je me perdre? oui.
Oserai-je être ta maîtresse, ta concubine, ton esclave, ta chose?
avec joie. Gwynplaine, je suis la femme. La femme, c’est de l’argile qui désire être fange. J’ai besoin de me mépriser.
Cela assaisonne l’orgueil. L’alliage de la grandeur, c’est la bassesse. Rien ne se combine mieux. Méprise-moi, toi qu’o méprise. L’avilissement sous l’avilissement, quelle volupté! la fleur double de l’ignominie! je la cueille. Foule-moi aux pieds. Tu ne m’en aimeras que mieux. Je le sais, moi. Sais-tu pourquoi je t’idolâtre? parce que je te dédaigne. Tu es si au-dessous de moi que je te mets sur un autel. Mêler le haut et le bas, c’est le chaos, et le chaos me plaît. Tout commence et finit par le chaos. Qu’est-ce que le chaos? une immense souillure. Et avec cette souillure, Dieu a fait la lumière, et avec cet égout, Dieu a fait le monde. Tu ne sais pas à quel point je suis perverse. Pétris un astre dans de la boue, ce sera moi.

Ainsi parlait cette femme formidable, montrant nu, par sa robe défaite, son torse de vierge.

Elle poursuivit:

— Louve pour tous, chienne pour toi. Comme on va s'étonner!
l'étonnement des imbéciles est doux. Moi, je me comprends.
Suis-je une déesse? Amphitrite s'est donnée au Cyclope.
Fluctivoma Amphitrite. Suis-je une fée? Urgèle s'est livrée Bugryx, l'androptère aux huit mains palmées. Suis-je une princesse? Marie Stuart a eu Rizzio. Trois belles, trois monstres. Je suis plus grande qu'elles, car tu es pire qu'eux.
Gwynplaine, nous sommes faits l'un pour l'autre. Le monstre que tu es dehors, je le suis dedans. De là mon amour. Caprice, soit. Qu'est-ce que l'ouragan? un caprice. Il y a entre nous une affinité sidérale; l'un et l'autre nous sommes de la nuit, toi par la face, moi par l'intelligence. A ton tour tu me crées.
Tu arrives, voilà mon âme dehors. Je ne la connaissais pas.
Elle est surprenante. Ton approche fait sortir l'hydre de moi, déesse. Tu me révèles ma vraie nature. Tu me fais faire la découverte de moi-même. Vois comme je te ressemble. Regarde dans moi comme dans un miroir. Ton visage, c'est mon âme. Je ne savais pas être à ce point terrible. Moi aussi je suis donc un monstre! O Gwynplaine, tu me désennuies.

Elle eut un étrange rire d'enfant, s'approcha de son oreille et lui dit tout bas:

— Veux-tu voir une femme folle? c'est moi.

Son regard entrait dans Gwynplaine. Un regard est un philtre.
Sa robe avait des dérangements redoutables. L'extase aveugle et bestiale envahissait Gwynplaine. Extase où il y avait de l'agonie.

Pendant que cette femme parlait, il sentait comme des éclaboussures de feu. Il sentait sourdre l'irréparable. Il n'avait pas la force de dire un mot. Elle s'interrompait, elle le considérait: O monstre! murmurait-elle. Elle était farouche.

Brusquement, elle lui saisit les mains.

— Gwynplaine, je suis le trône, tu es le tréteau. Mettons-nous de plain-pied. Ah! je suis heureuse, me voilà tombée. Je voudrais que tout le monde pût savoir à quel point je suis abjecte. Ou s'en prosternerait davantage, car plus on abhorre, plus on rampe. Ainsi est fait le genre humain. Hostile, mais reptile. Dragon, mais ver. Oh! je suis dépravée comme les dieux. On ne peut toujours pas m’ôter cela d’être la bâtarde d’un roi. J’agis en reine. Qu’était-ce que Rhodope? Une reine qui aima Phtèh, l’homme à la tête de crocodile. Elle a bâti en son honneur la troisième pyramide. Penthésilée a aimé le centaure, qui s’appelle le Sagittaire, et qui est une constellation. Et que dis-tu d’Anne d’Autriche? Mazarin était-il assez laid! Tu n’es pas laid, toi, tu es difforme. Le laid est petit, le difforme est grand. Le laid, c’est la grimace du diable derrière le beau. Le difforme est l’envers du sublime.

C’est l’autre côté. L’Olympe a deux versants; l’un, dans la clarté, donne Apollon; l’autre, dans la nuit, donne Polyphème.

Toi, tu es Titan. Tu serais Béhémoth dans la forêt, Léviathan dans l’océan, Typhon dans le cloaque. Tu es suprême. Il y a de la foudre dans ta difformité. Ton visage a été dérangé par un coup de tonnerre. Ce qui est sur ta face, c’est la torsion courroucée du grand poing de flamme. Il t’a pétri et il a passé.

La vaste colère obscure a, dans un accès de rage, englué ton âme sous cette effroyable figure surhumaine. L’enfer est un réchaud pénal où chauffe ce fer rouge qu’on appelle la Fatalité; tu es marqué de ce fer-là. T’aimer, c’est comprendre le grand. J’ai ce triomphe. Être amoureuse d’Apollon, le bel effort! La gloire se mesure à l’étonnement. Je t’aime. J’ai rêvé de toi des nuits, des nuits, des nuits! C’est ici un palais à moi. Tu verras mes jardins. Il y a des sources sous les feuilles, des grottes où l’on peut s’embrasser, et de très beaux groupes de marbre qui sont du cavalier Bernin. Et des fleurs! Il y en a trop. Au printemps, c’est un incendie de roses. T’ai-je dit que la reine était ma soeur? Fais de moi ce que tu voudras. Je suis faite pour que Jupiter baise mes pieds et pour que Satan me crache au visage. As-tu une religion? Moi je suis papiste. Mon père Jacques II est mort en France avec un tas de jésuites autour de lui. Jamais je n’ai ressenti ce que j’éprouve auprès de toi. Oh! je voudrais être le soir avec toi, pendant qu’on ferait de la musique, tous deux adossés au même coussin, sous le tendelet de pourpre d’une galère d’or, au milieu des douceurs infinies de la mer. Insulte-moi. Bats-moi. Paye-moi. Traite-moi comme une créature. Je t’adore. Les caresses peuvent rugir. En doutez-vous? entrez chez les lions. L’horreur était dans cette femme et se combinait avec la grâce. Rien de plus tragique. On sentait la griffe, on sentait le velours. C’était l’attaque féline, mêlée de retraite. Il y avait du jeu et du meurtre dans ce va-et-vient. Elle idolâtrait, insolemment. Le résultat, c’était la démence communiquée. Fatal langage, inexprimablement violent et doux. Ce qui insultait n’insultait pas. Ce qui adorait outrageait. Ce qui souffletait déifiait. Son accent imprimait à ses paroles furieuses et amoureuses on ne sait quelle grandeur prométhéenne. Les fêtes de la Grande Déesse, chantées par Eschyle, donnaient aux femmes cherchant les satyres sous les étoiles cette sombre rage épique. Ces paroxysmes compliquaient les danses obscures sous les branches de Dodone. Cette femme était comme transfigurée, s'il est possible qu'on se transfigure du côté opposé au ciel. Ses cheveux avaient des frissons de crinière; sa robe se refermait, puis se rouvrait; rien de charmant comme ce sein plein de cris sauvages, les rayons de son oeil bleu se mêlaient aux flamboiements de son oeil noir, elle était surnaturelle. Gwynplaine, défaillant, se sentait vaincu par la pénétration profonde d'une telle approche.

— Je t'aime! cria-t-elle.

Et elle le mordit d'un baiser.

Homère a des nuages qui peut-être allaient devenir nécessaires sur Gwynplaine et Josiane comme sur Jupiter et Junon. Pour Gwynplaine, être aimé par une femme qui avait un regard et qui le voyait, avoir sur sa bouche informe une pression de lèvres divines, c'était exquis et fulgurant. Il sentait devant cette femme pleine d'énigmes tout s'évanouir en lui. Le souvenir de Dea se débattait dans cette ombre avec de petits cris. Il y a un bas-relief antique qui représente le sphinx mangeant un amour; les ailes du doux être céleste saignent entre ces dents féroces et souriantes.

Est-ce que Gwynplaine aimait cette femme? Est-ce que l'homme a, comme le globe, deux pôles? Sommes-nous, sur notre axe inflexible, la sphère tournante, astre de loin, boue de près, o alternent le jour et la nuit? Le coeur a-t-il deux côtés, l'un qui aime dans la lumière, l'autre qui aime dans les ténèbres?

Ici la femme rayon; là la femme cloaque. L'ange est nécessaire.

Est-ce qu'il serait possible que le démon, lui aussi, fût un besoin? Y a-t-il pour l'âme l'aile de chauve-souris? l'heure crépusculaire sonne-t-elle fatalement pour tous? la faute fait-elle partie intégrante de notre destinée non refusable? le mal, dans notre nature, est-il à prendre en bloc, avec le reste?

est-ce que la faute est une dette à payer? Frémissements profonds.

Et une voix pourtant nous dit que c'est un crime d'être faible.

Ce que Gwynplaine éprouvait était indicible, la chair, la vie, l'effroi, la volupté, une ivresse accablée, et toute la quantit de honte qu'il y a dans l'orgueil. Est-ce qu'il allait tomber?

Elle répéta: — Je t'aime!

Et, frénétique, elle l'étreignit contre sa poitrine.

Gwynplaine haletait.

Tout à coup, tout près d'eux, une petite sonnerie ferme et claire vibra. C'était le timbre scellé dans le mur qui tintait. La duchesse tourna la tête, et dit:

— Qu'est-ce qu'elle me veut?

Et brusquement, avec le bruit d'une trappe à ressort, le panneau d'argent incrusté d'une couronne royale s'ouvrit.

L'intérieur d'un tour, tapissé de velours bleu prince, apparut avec une lettre sur une assiette d'or.

Cette lettre était volumineuse et carrée et posée de façon montrer le cachet, qui était une grande empreinte sur de la cire vermeille. Le timbre continuait de sonner.

Le panneau ouvert touchait presque au canapé où tous deux étaient assis. La duchesse, penchée et se retenant d'un bras au cou de Gwynplaine, étendit l'autre bras, prit la lettre sur l'assiette, et repoussa le panneau. Le tour se referma et le timbre se tut.

La duchesse cassa la cire entre ses doigts, défit l'enveloppe, en tira deux plis qu'elle contenait, et jeta l'enveloppe à terre aux pieds de Gwynplaine.

Le sceau de cire brisé restait déchiffrable, et Gwynplaine put y distinguer une couronne royale et au-dessous la lettre A.

L'enveloppe déchirée étalait ses deux côtés, de sorte qu'on pouvait en même temps lire la suscription: A sa grâce la duchesse Josiane.

Les deux plis qu'avait contenus l'enveloppe étaient un parchemin et un vélin. Le parchemin était grand, le vélin était petit.

Sur le parchemin était empreint un large sceau de chancellerie, en cette cire verte dite cire de seigneurie. La duchesse, toute palpitante et les yeux noyés d'extase, fit une imperceptible moue d'ennui.

— Ah! dit-elle, qu'est-ce qu'elle m'envoie là? Une paperasse!

Quel trouble-fête que cette femme!

Et, laissant de côté le parchemin, elle entr'ouvrit le vélin.

— C'est de son écriture. C'est de l'écriture de ma soeur. Cela me fatigue. Gwynplaine, je t'ai demandé si tu savais lire.

Sais-tu lire?

Gwynplaine fit de la tête signe que oui.

Elle s’étendit sur le canapé, presque comme une femme couchée, cacha soigneusement ses pieds sous sa robe et ses bras sous ses manches, avec une pudeur bizarre, tout en laissant voir son sein, et, couvrant Gwynplaine d’un regard passionné, elle lui tendit le vélin.

— Eh bien, Gwynplaine, tu es à moi. Commence ton service. Mon bien-aimé, lis-moi ce que m’écrit la reine.

Gwynplaine prit le vélin, il défit le pli, et, d’une voix où il y avait toutes sortes de tremblements, il lut:

«Madame,

«Nous vous envoyons gracieusement la copie ci-jointe d’un procès-verbal, certifié et signé par notre serviteur William Cowper, lord chancelier de ce royaume d’Angleterre, et duquel il résulte cette particularité considérable que le fils légitime de lord Linnaeus Clancharlie vient d’être constaté et retrouvé, sous le nom de Gwynplaine, dans la bassesse d’une existence ambulante et vagabonde et parmi des saltimbanques et bateleurs. Cette suppression d’état remonte à son plus bas âge. En conséquence des lois du royaume, et en vertu de son droit héréditaire, lord Fermain Clancharlie, fils de lord Linnaeus, sera, ce jourd’hui même, admis et réintégré dans la chambre des lords. C’est pourquoi, voulant vous bien traiter et vous conserver la transmission des biens et domaines des lords Clancharlie Hunkerville, nous le substituons dans vos bonnes grâces à lord David Dirry-Moir. Nous avons fait amener lord Fermain dans votre résidence de Corleone-lodge; nous commandons et voulons, comme reine et soeur, que notre dit lord Fermain Clancharlie, nomm jusqu’à ce jour Gwynplaine, soit votre mari, et vous l’épouserez, et c’est notre plaisir royal.

Pendant que Gwynplaine lisait, avec des intonations qui chancelaient presque à chaque mot, la duchesse, soulevée du coussin du canapé, écoutait, l’oeil fixe. Comme Gwynplaine achevait, elle lui arracha la lettre.

— ANNE, REINE, dit-elle, lisant la signature, avec une intonation de rêverie.

Puis elle ramassa à terre le parchemin qu’elle avait jeté, et y promena son regard. C’était la déclaration des naufragés de la Matutina, copiée sur un procès-verbal signé du shériff de Southwark et du lord-chancelier.

Le procès-verbal lu, elle relut le message de la reine. Puis elle dit:

— Soit.

Et, calme, montrant du doigt à Gwynplaine la portière de la galerie par où il était entré:

— Sortez, dit-elle.

Gwynplaine, pétrifié, demeura immobile.

Elle reprit, glaciale:

— Puisque vous êtes mon mari, sortez.

Gwynplaine, sans parole, les yeux baissés comme un coupable, ne bougeait pas. Elle ajouta:

— Vous n'avez pas le droit d'être ici. C'est la place de mon amant.

Gwynplaine était comme cloué.

— Bien, dit-elle. Ce sera moi, je m'en vais. Ah! vous êtes mon mari! Rien de mieux. Je vous hais.

Et se levant, jetant à on ne sait qui dans l'espace un hautain geste d'adieu, elle sortit.

La portière de la galerie se referma sur elle.

V

ON SE RECONNAIT, MAIS ON NE SE CONNAIT PAS

Gwynplaine demeura seul.

Seul en présence de cette baignoire tiède et de ce lit défait.

La pulvérisation des idées était en lui à son comble. Ce qu'il pensait ne ressemblait pas à de la pensée. C'était une diffusion, une dispersion, l'angoisse d'être dans l'incompréhensible. Il avait en lui quelque chose comme le sauve-qui-peut d'un rêve.

L'entrée dans les mondes inconnus n'est pas une chose simple.

A partir de la lettre de la duchesse, apportée par le mousse, une série d'heures surprenantes avait commencé pour Gwynplaine, de moins en moins intelligibles. Jusqu'à cet instant il était dans le songe, mais il y voyait clair. Maintenant il y tâtonnait.

Il ne pensait pas. Il ne songeait même plus. Il subissait.

Il restait assis sur le canapé, à l'endroit où la duchesse l'avait laissé.

Tout à coup il y eut dans cette ombre un bruit de pas. C'était un pas d'homme. Ce pas venait du côté opposé à la galerie par o était sortie la duchesse. Il approchait, et on l'entendait sourdement, mais nettement. Gwynplaine, quelle que fût son absorption, prêta l'oreille.

Subitement, au delà du rideau de toile d'argent que la duchesse avait laissé entr'ouvert, derrière le lit, la porte qu'il était aisé de soupçonner sous la glace peinte s'ouvrit toute grande, et une voix mâle et joyeuse, chantant à pleine gorge, jeta dans la chambre aux miroirs ce refrain d'une vieille chanson française:

Trois petits gorets sur leur fumier Juraient comme des porteurs de chaise.

Un homme entra.

Cet homme avait l'épée au côté et à la main un chapeau à plumes avec ganse et cocarde, et était vêtu d'un magnifique habit de mer, galonné.

Gwynplaine se dressa, comme si un ressort le mettait debout.

Il reconnut cet homme et cet homme le reconnut.

De leurs deux bouches stupéfaites s'échappa en même temps ce double cri:

— Gwynplaine!

— Tom-Jim-Jack!

L’homme au chapeau à plumes marcha sur Gwynplaine, qui croisa les bras.

— Comment es-tu ici, Gwynplaine?

— Et toi, Tom-Jim-Jack, comment y viens-tu?

— Ah! je comprends. Josiane! un caprice. Un saltimbanque qui est un monstre, c’est trop beau pour qu’on y résiste. Tu t’es déguisé pour venir ici, Gwynplaine.

— Et toi aussi, Tom-Jim-Jack.

— Gwynplaine, que signifie cet habit de seigneur?

— Tom-Jim-Jack, que signifie cet habit d’officier?

— Gwynplaine, je ne réponds pas aux questions.

— Ni moi, Tom-Jim-Jack.

— Gwynplaine, je ne m’appelle pas Tom-Jim-Jack.

— Tom-Jim-Jack, je ne m’appelle pas Gwynplaine.

— Gwynplaine, je suis ici chez moi.

— Je suis ici chez moi, Tom-Jim-Jack.

— Je te défends de me faire écho. Tu as l’ironie, mais j’ai ma canne. Trêve à tes parodies, misérable drôle.

Gwynplaine devint pâle.

— Drôle toi-même! et tu me rendras raison de cette insulte.

— Dans ta baraque, tant que tu voudras. A coups de poing.

— Ici, et à coups d’épée.

— L’ami Gwynplaine, l’épée est affaire de gentilshommes. Je ne me bats qu’avec mes pareils. Nous sommes égaux devant le poing, inégaux devant l’épée. A l’inn Tadcaster, Tom-Jim-Jack peut boxer Gwynplaine. A Windsor, c’est différent. Apprends ceci: je suis contre-amiral.

— Et moi, je suis pair d’Angleterre.

L’homme en qui Gwynplaine voyait Tom-Jim-Jack éclata de rire.

— Pourquoi pas roi? Au fait, tu as raison. Un histrion est tous ses rôles. Dis-moi que tu es Theseus, duc d’Athènes.

— Je suis pair d’Angleterre, et nous nous battrons.

— Gwynplaine, ceci devient long. Ne joue pas avec quelqu’un qui peut te faire fouetter. Je m’appelle lord David Dirry-Moir.

— Et moi, je m’appelle lord Clancharlie.

Lord David eut un second éclat de rire.

— Bien trouvé. Gwynplaine est lord Clancharlie. C’est en effet le nom qu’il faut avoir pour posséder Josiane. Écoute, je te pardonne. Et sais-tu pourquoi? C’est que nous sommes les deux amants.

La portière de la galerie s’écarta, et une voix dit:

— Vous êtes les deux maris, messeigneurs.

Tous deux se retournèrent.

— Barkilphedro! s’écria lord David.

C’était Barkilphedro, en effet.

Il saluait profondément les deux lords avec un sourire.

Derrière lui, à quelques pas, on apercevait un gentilhomme au visage respectueux et sévère qui avait une baguette noire à la main.

Ce gentilhomme s’avança, fit trois révérences à Gwynplaine, et lui dit:

— Milord, je suis l’huissier de la verge noire. Je viens chercher votre seigneurie, conformément aux ordres de sa majesté.

LIVRE HUITIEME

LE CAPITOLE ET SON VOISINAGE

I

DISSECTION DES CHOSES MAJESTUEUSES

La redoutable ascension qui, depuis tant d’heures déjà, variait ses éblouissements sur Gwynplaine, et qui l’avait emport Windsor, le remporta à Londres.

Les réalités visionnaires se succédèrent devant lui, sans solution de continuité.

Nul moyen de s’y soustraire. Quand une le quittait, l’autre le reprenait.

Il n’avait pas le temps de respirer.

Qui a vu un jongleur a vu le sort. Ces projectiles tombant, montant et retombant, ce sont les hommes dans la main du destin.

Projectiles et jouets.

Le soir de ce même jour, Gwynplaine était dans un lieu extraordinaire.

Il était assis sur un banc fleurdelysé. Il avait par-dessus ses habits de soie une robe de velours écarlate doublée de taffetas blanc avec rochet d’hermine, et aux épaules deux bandes d’hermine bordées d’or.

Il avait autour de lui des hommes de tout âge, jeunes et vieux, assis comme lui sur les fleurs de lys et comme lui vêtus d’hermine et de pourpre.

Devant lui, il apercevait d’autres hommes, à genoux. Ces hommes avaient des robes de soie noire. Quelques-uns de ces hommes agenouillés écrivaient.

En face de lui, à quelque distance, il apercevait des marches, une estrade, un dais, un large écusspn étincelant entre un lion et une licorne, et, sous ce dais, sur cette estrade, au haut de ces marches, adossé à cet écusson, un fauteuil doré et couronné.

C’était un trône.

Le trône de la Grande Bretagne.

Gwynplaine était, pair lui-même, dans la chambre des pairs d’Angleterre.

De quelle façon avait eu lieu cette introduction de Gwynplaine la chambre des lords? Disons-le.

Toute la journée, depuis le matin jusqu’au soir, depuis Windsor jusqu’à Londres, depuis Corleone-lodge jusqu’à Westminster-hall, avait été une montée d'échelon en échelon. A chaque échelon nouvel étourdissement.

Il avait été emmené de Windsor dans les voitures de la reine, avec l'escorte due à un pair. La garde qui honore ressemble beaucoup à la garde qui garde.

Ce jour-là, les riverains de la route de Windsor à Londres virent galoper une cavalcade de gentilshommes pensionnaires de sa majesté accompagnant deux chaises menées grand train en poste royale. Dans la première était assis l'huissier de la verge noire, sa baguette à la main. Dans la seconde on distinguait un large chapeau à plumes blanches couvrant d'ombre un visage qu'on ne voyait pas. Qui est-ce qui passait là? était-ce un prince? était-ce un prisonnier?

C'était Gwynplaine.

Cela avait l'air de quelqu'un qu'on mène à la tour de Londres, moins que ce ne fût quelqu'un qu'on menât à la chambre des pairs.

La reine avait bien fait les choses. Comme il s'agissait du futur mari de sa soeur, elle avait donné une escorte de son propre service.

L'officier de l'huissier de la verge noire était à cheval en tête du cortège.

L'huissier de la verge noire avait dans sa chaise, sur un strapontin, un coussin de drap d'argent. Sur ce coussin était posé un portefeuille noir timbré d'une couronne royale.

A Brentford, dernier relais avant Londres, les deux chaises et l'escorte firent halte.

Un carrosse d'écaillé attelé de quatre chevaux attendait, avec quatre laquais derrière, deux postillons devant, et un cocher en perruque. Roues, marchepieds, soupentes, timon, tout le train de ce carrosse était doré. Les chevaux étaient harnachés d'argent.

Ce coche de gala était d'un dessin allier et surprenant, et eût magnifiquement figuré parmi les cinquante et un carrosses célèbres, dont Roubo nous a laissé les portraits.

L'huissier de la verge noire mit pied à terre, ainsi que son officier.

L'officier de l'huissier retira du strapontin de la chaise de poste le coussin de drap d'argent sur lequel était le portefeuille à couronne, le prit sur ses deux mains, et se tint debout derrière l'huissier.

L'huissier de la verge noire ouvrit la portière du carrosse, qui était vide, puis la portière de la chaise où était Gwynplaine, et, baissant les yeux, invita respectueusement Gwynplaine prendre place dans le carrosse.

Gwynplaine descendit de la chaise et monta dans le carrosse.

L’huissier portant la verge et l’officier portant le coussin y entrèrent après lui, et y occupèrent la banquette basse destinée aux pages dans les anciens coches de cérémonie.

Le carrosse était tendu à l’intérieur de satin blanc garni d’entoilage de Binche avec crêtes et glands d’argent. Le plafond était armorié.

Les postillons des deux chaises qu’on venait de quitter étaient vêtus du hoqueton royal. Le cocher, les postillons et les laquais du carrosse où l’on entrait avaient une autre livrée, très magnifique.

Gwynplaine, à travers le somnambulisme où il était comme anéanti, remarqua cette fastueuse valetaille et demanda à l’huissier de la verge noire:

— Quelle est cette livrée?

L’huissier de la verge noire répondit:

— La vôtre, milord.

Ce jour-là, la chambre des lords devait siéger le soir. Curia erat serena, disent les vieux procès-verbaux. En Angleterre, la vie parlementaire est volontiers une vie nocturne. On sait qu’il arriva une fois à Sheridan de commencer à minuit un discours et de le terminer au lever du soleil.

Les deux chaises de poste retournèrent à vide à Windsor; le carrosse où était Gwynplaine se dirigea vers Londres.

Le carrosse d’écaillé à quatre chevaux alla au pas de Brentford Londres. La dignité de la perruque du cocher l’exigeait.

Sous la figure de ce cocher solennel, le cérémonial prenait possession de Gwynplaine.

Ces retards, du reste, étaient, selon toute apparence, calculés.

On en verra plus loin le motif probable.

Il n’était pas encore nuit, mais il s’en fallait de peu, quand le carrosse d’écaillé s’arrêta devant la King’s Gate, lourde porte surbaissée entre deux tourelles qui communiquait de White-Hall Westminster.

La cavalcade des gentilshommes pensionnaires fit groupe autour du carrosse.

Un des valets de pied de l’arrière sauta sur le pavé, et ouvrit la portière.

L’huissier de la verge noire, suivi de son officier portant le coussin, sortit du carrosse, et dit à Gwynplaine:

— Milord, daignez descendre. Que votre seigneurie garde son chapeau sur sa tête.

Gwynplaine était vêtu, sous son manteau de voyage, de l’habit de soie qu’il n’avait pas quitté depuis la veille. Il n’avait pas d’épée.

Il laissa son manteau dans le carrosse.

Sous la voûte carrossière de la King’s Gate, il y avait une porte latérale petite et exhaussée de quelques degrés.

Dans les choses d’apparat, le respect est de précéder.

L’huissier de la verge noire, ayant derrière lui son officier, marchait devant.

Gwynplaine suivait.

Ils montèrent le degré, et entrèrent sous la porte latérale.

Quelques instants après, ils étaient dans une chambre ronde et large avec pilier au centre, un bas de tourelle, salle de rez-de-chaussée, éclairée d’ogives étroites comme des lancettes d’abside, et qui devait être obscure même en plein midi. Peu de lumière fait parfois partie de la solennité. L’obscur est majestueux.

Dans cette chambre treize hommes se tenaient debout. Trois en avant, six au deuxième rang, quatre en arrière.

Des trois premiers un avait une cotte de velours incarnat, et les deux autres des cottes vermeilles aussi, mais de satin. Tous trois avaient les armes d’Angleterre brodées sur l’épaule.

Les six du second rang étaient vêtus de vestes dalmatiques en moire blanche, chacun avec un blason différent sur la poitrine.

Les quatre derniers, tous en moire noire, étaient distincts les uns des autres, le premier par une cape bleue, le deuxième par un saint Georges écarlate sur l’estomac, le troisième par deux croix cramoisies brodées sur sa poitrine et sur son dos, le quatrième par un collet de fourrure noire appelée peau de sabelline. Tous étaient en perruque, nu-tête, et avaient l’épée au côté.

On distinguait à peine leurs visages dans la pénombre. Eux ne pouvaient voir la figure de Gwynplaine.

L’huissier de la verge noire éleva sa baguette et dit:

— Milord Fermain Clancharlie, baron Clancharlie et Hunkerville, moi huissier de la verge noire, premier officier de la chambre de présence, je remets votre seigneurie à Jarretière, roi d’armes d’Angleterre.

Le personnage à cotte de velours, laissant les autres derrière lui, salua Gwynplaine jusqu’à terre et dit:

— Milord Fermain Clancharlie, je suis Jarretière, premier roi d’armes d’Angleterre. Je suis l’officier créé et couronné par sa grâce le duc de Norfolk, comte-maréchal héréditaire. J’ai jur obéissance au roi, aux pairs et aux chevaliers de la Jarretière.

Le jour de mon couronnement, où le comte-maréchal d’Angleterre m’a versé un gobelet de vin sur la tête, j’ai solennellement promis d’être officieux à la noblesse, d’éviter la compagnie des personnes de mauvaise réputation, d’excuser plutôt que de blâmer les gens de qualité, et d’assister les veuves et les vierges.

C’est moi qui ai charge de régler les cérémonies de l’enterrement des pairs et qui ai le soin et la garde de leurs armoiries. Je me mets aux ordres de votre seigneurie.

Le premier des deux autres en cottes de satin fit une révérence, et dit:

— Milord, je suis Clarence, deuxième roi d’armes d’Angleterre.

Je suis l’officier qui règle l’enterrement des nobles au-dessous des pairs. Je me mets aux ordres de votre seigneurie.

L’autre homme à cotte de satin salua, et dit:

— Milord, je suis Norroy, troisième roi d’armes d’Angleterre. Je me mets aux ordres de votre seigneurie.

Les six du second rang, immobiles et sans saluer, firent un pas.

Le premier à la droite de Gwynplaine, dit:

— Milord, nous sommes les six ducs d’armes d’Angleterre. Je suis York.

Puis chacun des hérauts ou ducs d’armes prit la parole à son tour, et se nomma.

— Je suis Lancastre.

— Je suis Richmond.

— Je suis Chester.

— Je suis Somerset.

— Je suis Windsor,

Les blasons qu’ils avaient sur la poitrine étaient ceux des comtés et des villes dont ils portaient les noms.

Les quatre qui étaient habillés de noir, derrière les hérauts, gardaient le silence.

Le roi d’armes Jarretière les montra du doigt à Gwynplaine et dit:

— Milord, voici les quatre poursuivants d’armes. — Manteau-Bleu.

L’homme à la cape bleue salua de la tête.

— Dragon-Rouge.

L’homme au saint Georges salua.

— Rouge-Croix.

L’homme aux croix écarlates salua.

— Porte-coulisse.

L’homme à la fourrure de sabelline salua.

Sur un signe du roi d’armes, le premier des poursuivants, Manteau-Bleu, s’avança, et prit des mains de l’officier de l’huissier le coussin de drap d’argent et le portefeuille couronne.

Et le roi d’armes dit à l’huissier de la verge noire:

— Ainsi soit. Je donne à votre honneur réception de sa seigneurie.

Ces pratiques d’étiquette et d’autres qui vont suivre étaient le vieux cérémonial antérieur à Henri VIII, qu’Anne essaya, pendant un temps, de faire revivre. Rien de tout cela ne se fait plus aujourd’hui. Pourtant la chambre des lords se croit immuable; et si l’immémorial existe quelque part, c’est là.

Elle change toutefois. E pur si muove.

Qu’est devenu, par exemple, le may pole, ce mât de mai que la ville de Londres plantait sur le passage des pairs allant au parlement? Le dernier qui ait fait figure a été arboré en 1713.

Depuis, le «may pole» a disparu. Désuétude.

L’apparence, c’est l’immobilité; la réalité, c’est le changement.

Ainsi prenez ce titre, Albemarle. Il semble éternel. Sous ce titre ont passé six familles, Odo, Mandeville, Béthune, Plantagenet, Beauchamp, Monk. Sous ce titre, Leicester, se sont succédé cinq noms différents, Beaumont, Brewose, Dudley, Sidney, Coke. Sous Lincoln, six. Sous Pembroke, sept, etc. Les familles changent sous les titres qui ne bougent pas.

L’historien superficiel croit à l’immuabilité. Au fond, nulle durée. L’homme ne peut être que flot. L’onde, c’est l’humanité.

Les aristocraties ont pour orgueil ce que les femmes ont pour humiliation, vieillir; mais femmes et aristocraties ont la même illusion, se conserver.

Il est probable que la chambre des lords ne se reconnaîtra point dans ce qu’on vient de lire et dans ce qu’on va lire, un peu comme la jolie femme d’autrefois qui ne veut pas avoir de rides.

Le miroir est un vieil accusé; il en prend son parti.

Faire ressemblant, c’est là tout le devoir de l’historien.

Le roi d’armes s’adressa à Gwynplaine.

— Veuillez me suivre, milord.

Il ajouta:

— On vous saluera. Votre seigneurie soulèvera seulement le bord de son chapeau.

Et l’on se dirigea en cortège vers une porte qui était au fond de la salle ronde.

L’huissier de la verge noire ouvrait la marche.

Puis Manteau-Bleu, portant le coussin; puis le roi d’armes; derrière le roi d’armes était Gwynplaine, le chapeau sur la tête.

Les autres rois d’armes, hérauts, poursuivants, restèrent dans la salle ronde.

Gwynplaine, précédé de l’huissier de la verge noire et sous la conduite du roi d’armes, suivit de salle en salle un itinéraire qu’il serait impossible de retrouver aujourd’hui, le vieux logis du parlement d’Angleterre ayant été démoli,

Il traversa entre autres cette gothique chambre d’état où avait eu lieu la rencontre suprême de Jacques II et de Monmouth, et qui avait vu l’agenouillement inutile du neveu lâche devant l’oncle féroce. Autour de cette chambre étaient rangés sur le mur, par ordre de dates, avec leurs noms et leurs blasons, neuf portraits en pied d’anciens pairs: lord Nansladron, 1305. Lord Baliol, 1306. Lord Benestede, 1314. Lord Cantilupe, 1356. Lord Montbegon, 1357. Lord Tibotot, 1372. Lord Zouch of Codnor, 1615. Lord Bella-Aqua, sans date. Lord Harren and Surrey, comte de Blois, sans date.

La nuit étant venue, il y avait des lampes de distance en distance dans les galeries. Des lustres de cuivre à chandelles de cire étaient allumés dans les salles, éclairées à peu près comme des bas côtés d’église.

On n’y rencontrait que les personnes nécessaires.

Dans une chambre que le cortège traversa se tenaient debout, la tête respectueusement inclinée, les quatre clercs du signet, et le clerc des papiers d’état.

Dans une autre était l’honorable Philip Sydenham, chevalier banneret, seigneur de Brympton en Somerset. Le chevalier banneret est le chevalier fait en guerre par le roi sous la bannière royale déployée.

Dans une autre était le plus ancien baronnet d’Angleterre, sir Edmund Bacon de Suffolk, héritier de sir Nicholas, et qualifi primus baronetorum Angliae. Sir Edmund avait derrière lui son arcifer portant son arquebuse et son écuyer portant les armes d’Ulster, les baronnets étant les défenseurs nés du comt d’Ulster en Irlande.

Dans une autre était le chancelier de l’échiquier, accompagné de ses quatre maîtres des comptes et des deux députés du lord-chambellan chargés de fendre les tailles. Plus le maître des monnaies, ayant dans sa main ouverte une livre sterling, faite, comme c’est l’usage pour les pounds, au moulinet. Ces huit personnages firent la révérence au nouveau lord.

A l’entrée du corridor tapissé d’une natte qui était la communication de la chambre basse à la chambre haute, Gwynplaine fut salué par sir Thomas Mansell de Margam, contrôleur de la maison de la reine et membre du parlement pour Glamorgan; et, la sortie, par une députation «d’un sur deux» des barons des Cinq-Ports, rangés à sa droite et à sa gauche, quatre par quatre, les Cinq-Ports étant huit. William Ashburnham le salua pour Hastings, Matthew Aylmor pour Douvres, Josias Burchett pour Sandwich, sir Philip Boteler pour Hyeth, John Brewer pour New Rumney, Edward Southwell pour la ville de Rye, James Hayes pour la ville de Winchelsea, et Georges Nailor pour la ville de Seaford.

Le roi d’armes, comme Gwynplaine allait rendre le salut, lui rappela à voix basse le cérémonial.

— Seulement le bord du chapeau, milord.

Gwynplaine fît comme il lui était indiqué.

Il arriva à la chambre peinte, où il n’y avait pas de peinture, si ce n’est quelques figures de saints, entre autres saint Edouard, sous les voussures des longues fenêtres ogives coupées en deux par le plancher, desquelles Westminster-Hall avait le bas, et la chambre peinte le haut.

En deçà de la barrière de bois qui traversait de part en part la chambre peinte, se tenaient les trois secrétaires d’état, hommes considérables. Le premier de ces officiers avait dans ses attributions le sud de l’Angleterre, l’Irlande et les colonies, plus la France, la Suisse, l’Italie, l’Espagne, le Portugal et la Turquie. Le deuxième dirigeait le nord de l’Angleterre, avec surveillance sur les Pays-Bas, l’Allemagne, le Danemark, la Suède, la Pologne et la Moscovie. Le troisième, écossais, avait l’Écosse. Les deux premiers étaient anglais. L’un d’eux était l’honorable Robert Harley, membre du parlement pour la ville de New-Radnor. Un député d’Ecosse, Mungo Graham, esquire, parent du duc de Montrose, était présent. Tous saluèrent Gwynplaine en silence.

Gwynplaine toucha le bord de son chapeau.

Le garde-barrière leva le bras de bois sur charnière qui donnait entrée sur l’arrière de la chambre peinte où était la longue table verte drapée, réservée aux seuls lords.

Il y avait sur la table un candélabre allumé.

Gwynplaine, précédé de l’huissier de la verge noire, de Manteau-Bleu et de Jarretière, pénétra dans ce compartiment privilégié.

Le garde-barrière referma l’entrée derrière Gwynplaine.

Le roi d’armes, sitôt la barrière franchie, s’arrêta.

La chambre peinte était spacieuse.

On apercevait au fond, debout au-dessous de l’écusson royal qui était entre les deux fenêtres, deux vieillards vêtus de robes de velours rouge avec deux bandes d’hermine ourlées de galons d’or sur l’épaule et des chapeaux à plumes blanches sur leurs perruques. Par la fente des robes on voyait leur habit de soie et la poignée de leur épée.

Derrière eux était immobile un homme habillé en moire noire, portant haute une grande masse d’or surmontée d’un lion couronné.

C’était le massier des pairs d’Angleterre.

Le lion est leur insigne: Et les lions ce sont les Barons et li Per, dit la chronique manuscrite de Bertrand Duguesclin.

Le roi d’armes montra à Gwynplaine les deux personnages en robes de velours, et lui dit à l’oreille:

— Milord, ceux-ci sont vos égaux. Vous rendrez le salut exactement comme il vous sera fait. Ces deux seigneuries ici présentes sont deux barons et vos parrains désignés par le lord-chancelier. Ils sont très vieux, et presque aveugles. Ce sont eux qui vous vont introduire dans la chambre des lords. Le premier est Charles Mildmay, lord Fitzwalter, sixième seigneur du banc des barons, le second est Augustus Arundel, lord ArundeL de Trerice, trente-huitième seigneur du banc des barons.

Le roi d’armes, faisant un pas vers les deux vieillards, éleva la voix:

— Fermain Clancharlie, baron Clancharlie, baron Hunkerville, marquis de Corleone en Sicile, salue vos seigneuries.

Les deux lords soulevèrent leurs chapeaux au-dessus de leur tête de toute la longueur du bras, puis se recoiffèrent.

Gwynplaine leur rendit le salut de la même manière.

L’huissier de la verge noire avança, puis Manteau-Bleu, puis Jarretière.

Le massier vint se placer devant Gwynplaine, et les deux lords ses côtés, lord Fitzwalter à sa droite et lord Arundel de Trerice à sa gauche. Lord Arundel était fort cassé, et le plus vieux des deux. Il mourut l’année d’après, léguant à son petit-fils John, mineur, sa pairie qui, du reste, devait s'éteindre en 1768.

Ce cortège sortit de la chambre peinte et s'engagea dans une galerie à pilastres où alternaient en sentinelle, de pilastre en pilastre, des pertuisaniers d'Angleterre et des hallebardiers d'Ecosse.

Les hallebardiers écossais étaient cette magnifique troupe aux jambes nues digne de faire face, plus tard, à Fontenoy, à la cavalerie française et à ces cuirassiers du roi auxquels leur colonel disait: Messieurs les maîtres, assurez vos chapeaux, nous allons avoir l'honneur de charger.

Le capitaine des pertuisaniers et le capitaine des hallebardiers firent à Gwynplaine et aux deux lords parrains le salut de l'épée. Les soldats saluèrent, les uns de la pertuisane, les autres de la hallebarde.

Au fond de la galerie resplendissait une grande porte, si magnifique que les deux battants semblaient deux lames d'or.

Des deux côtés de la porte deux hommes étaient immobiles. A leur livrée on pouvait reconnaître les door-keepers, «garde-portes».

Un peu avant d'arriver à cette porte, la galerie s'élargissait et il y avait un rond-point vitré.

Dans ce rond-point était assis sur un fauteuil à dossier démesur un personnage auguste par l'énormité de sa robe et de sa perruque. C'était William Cowper, lord-chancelier d'Angleterre.

C'est une qualité d'être infirme plus que le roi. William Cowper était myope, Anne l'était aussi, mais moins. Cette vue basse de William Cowper plut à la myopie de sa majesté et le fit choisir par la reine pour chancelier et garde de la conscience royale.

William Cowper avait la lèvre supérieure mince et la lèvre inférieure épaisse, signe de demi-bonté.

Le rond-point vitré était éclairé d'une lampe au plafond.

Le lord-chancelier, grave dans son haut fauteuil, avait à sa droite une table où était assis le clerc de la couronne, et à sa gauche une table où était assis le clerc du parlement.

Chacun des deux clercs avait devant soi un registre ouvert et une écritoire.

Derrière le fauteuil du lord-chancelier se tenait son massier, portant la masse à couronne. Plus le porte-queue et le porte-bourse, en grande perruque. Toutes ces charges existent encore.

Sur une crédence près du fauteuil il y avait une épée à poignée d'or, avec fourreau et ceinturon de velours feu.

Derrière le clerc de la couronne était debout un officier soutenant tout ouverte de ses deux mains une robe, qui était la robe de couronnement.

Derrière le clerc du parlement un autre officier tenait déployée une autre robe, qui était la robe de parlement.

Ces robes, toutes deux de velours cramoisi doublé de taffetas blanc avec deux bandes d'hermine galonnées d'or à l'épaule, étaient pareilles, à cela près que la robe de couronnement avait un plus large rochet d'hermine.

Un troisième officier qui était le «librarian» portait sur un carreau de cuir de Flandre le red-book, petit livre relié en maroquin rouge, contenant la liste des pairs et des communes, plus des pages blanches et un crayon qu'il était d'usage de remettre à chaque nouveau membre entrant au parlement.

La marche en procession que fermait Gwynplaine entre les deux pairs ses parrains s'arrêta devant le fauteuil du lord-chancelier.

Les deux lords parrains ôtèrent leurs chapeaux. Gwynplaine fit comme eux.

Le roi d'armes reçut des mains de Manteau-Bleu le coussin de drap d'argent, se mit à genoux, et présenta le portefeuille noir sur le coussin au lord-chancelier.

Le lord-chancelier prit le portefeuille et le tendit au clerc du parlement. Le clerc vint le recevoir avec cérémonie, puis alla se rasseoir.

Le clerc du parlement ouvrit le portefeuille, et se leva.

Le portefeuille contenait les deux messages usités, la patente royale adressée à la chambre des lords, et la sommation de siéger adressée au nouveau pair.

Writ of summons.

Le clerc, debout, lut tout haut les deux messages avec une lenteur respectueuse.

La sommation de siéger intimée à lord Fermain Clancharlie se terminait par les formules accoutumées: «...Nous vous enjoignons étroitement, sous la foi et l'allégeance que vous nous devez, de venir prendre en personne votre place parmi les prélats et les pairs siégeant en notre parlement à Westminster, afin de donner votre avis, en tout honneur et conscience, sur les affaires du royaume et de l'église.

Strictly enjoin you.

La lecture des messages terminée, le lord-chancelier éleva la voix.

— Acte est donné à la couronne. Lord Fermain Clancharlie, votre seigneurie renonce à la transsubstantiation, à l’adoration des saints et à la messe?

Gwynplaine s’inclina.

— Acte est donné, dit le lord-chancelier.

Et le clerc du parlement repartit:

— Sa seigneurie a pris le test.

Le lord-chancelier ajouta:

— Milord Fermain Clancharlie, vous pouvez siéger.

— Ainsi soit, dirent les deux parrains,

Le roi d’armes se releva, prit l’épée sur la crédence et en boucla le ceinturon autour de la taille de Gwynplaine.

«Ce faict, disent les vieilles chartes normandes, le pair prend son espée et monte aux hauts siéges et assiste à l’audience.

Gwynplaine entendit derrière lui quelqu’un qui lui disait:

— Je revêts votre seigneurie de la robe de parlement.

Et en même temps l’officier qui lui parlait et qui portait cette robe la lui passa et lui noua au cou le ruban noir du rochet d’hermine.

Gwynplaine maintenant, la robe de pourpre sur le dos et l’épée d’or au côté, était semblable aux deux lords qu’il avait à sa droite et à sa gauche.

Le librarian lui présenta le red-book et le lui mit, dans la poche de sa veste.

Le roi d’armes lui murmura à l’oreille:

— Milord, en entrant, vous saluerez la chaise royale.

La chaise royale, c’est le trône.

Cependant les deux clercs écrivaient, chacun à sa table, l’un sur le registre de la couronne, l’autre sur le registre du parlement.

Tous deux, l’un après l’autre, le clerc de la couronne le premier, apportèrent leur livre au lord-chancelier, qui signa.

Après avoir signé sur les deux registres, le lord chancelier se leva:

— Lord Fermain Clancharlie, baron Clancharlie, baron Hunkerville, marquis de Corleone en Italie, soyez le bienvenu parmi vos pairs, les lords spirituels et temporels de la Grande-Bretagne.

Les deux parrains de Gwynplaine lui touchèrent l’épaule. Il se tourna.

Et la grande porte dorée du fond de la galerie s’ouvrit à deux battants.

C’était la porte de la chambre des pairs d’Angleterre.

Il ne s’était pas écoulé trente-six heures depuis que Gwynplaine, entouré d’un autre cortège, avait vu s’ouvrir devant lui la porte de fer de la geôle de Southwark.

Rapidité terrible de tous ces nuages sur sa tête; nuages qui étaient des événements; rapidité qui était une prise d’assaut.

II

IMPARTIALIT

La création d’une égalité avec le roi, dite pairie, fut aux époques barbares une fiction utile. En France et en Angleterre, cet expédient politique rudimentaire produisit des résultats différents. En France, le pair fut un faux roi; en Angleterre, ce fut un vrai prince. Moins grand qu’en France, mais plus réel.

On pourrait dire: moindre, mais pire.

La pairie est née en France. L’époque est incertaine; sous Charlemague, selon la légende; sous Robert le Sage, selon l’histoire. L’histoire n’est pas plus sûre de ce qu’elle dit que la légende. Favin écrit: «le Roy de France voulut attirer à lui les grands de son état par ce titre magnifique de Pairs, comme s’ils lui étaient égaux.

La pairie se bifurqua très vite et de France passa en Angleterre.

La pairie anglaise a été un grand fait, et presque une grande chose. Elle a eu pour précédent le wittenagemot saxon. Le thane danois et le vavasseur normand se fondirent dans le baron. Baron est le même mot que vir; qui se traduit en espagnol par varon, et qui signifie, par excellence, homme. Dès 1075 les barons se font sentir au roi. Et à quel roi! à Guillaume le Conquérant. En 1086 ils donnent une base à la féodalité, cette base est le Doomsday-book. «Livre du Jugement dernier.» Sous Jean sans Terre, conflit; la seigneurie française le prend de haut avec la Grande-Bretagne, et la pairie de France mande à sa barre le roi d’Angleterre. Indignation des barons anglais. Au sacre de Philippe-Auguste, le roi d’Angleterre portait, comme duc de Normandie, la première bannière carrée et le duc de Guyenne la seconde. Contre ce roi vassal de l’étranger, «la guerre des seigneurs» éclate. Les barons imposent au misérable roi Jean la Grande Charte d’où sort la chambre des lords. Le pape prend fait et cause pour le roi, et excommunie les lords. La date, c’est 1215, et le pape, c’est Innocent III qui écrivait le Veni sancte Spiritus et qui envoyait à Jean sans Terre les quatre vertus cardinales sous la forme de quatre anneaux d’or. Les lords persistent. Long duel, qui durera plusieurs générations.

Pembroke lutte. 1248 est l’année des «Provisions d’Oxford».

Vingt-quatre barons limitent le roi, le discutent, et appellent, pour prendre part à la querelle élargie, un chevalier par comté.

Aube des communes. Plus tard, les lords s’adjoignirent deux citoyens par chaque cité et deux bourgeois par chaque bourg.

C’est ce qui fait que, jusqu’à Elisabeth, les pairs furent juges de la validité des élections des communes. De leur juridiction naquit l’adage: «Les députés doivent être nommés sans les trois P; sine Prece, sine Pretio, sine Poculo. Ce qui n’empêcha pas les bourgs-pourris. En 1293, la cour des pairs de France avait encore le roi d’Angleterre pour justiciable, et Philippe le Bel citait devant lui Edouard Ier. Edouard Ier était ce roi qui ordonnait à son fils de le faire bouillir après sa mort et d’emporter ses os en guerre. Sous les folies royales les lords sentent le besoin de fortifier le parlement; ils le divisent en deux chambres. Chambre haute et chambre basse. Les lords gardent arrogamment la suprématie. «S’il arrive qu’un des communes soit si hardy que de parler désavantageusement de la chambre des lords, on l’appelle au barreau (à la barre) pour recevoir correction et quelquefois on l’envoie à la Tour.

Même distinction dans le vote. Dans la chambre des lords on vote un à un, en commençant par le dernier baron qu’on nomme «le puîné». Chaque pair appelé répond content ou non content.

Dans les communes on vote tous ensemble, par Oui ou Non, en troupeau. Les communes accusent, les pairs jugent. Les pairs, par dédain des chiffres, délèguent aux communes, qui en tireront parti, la surveillance de l’échiquier, ainsi nommé, selon les uns, du tapis de la table qui représentait un échiquier, et, selon les autres, des tiroirs de la vieille armoire où. était, derrière une grille de fer, le trésor des rois d’Angleterre. De la fin du treizième siècle date le Registre annuel, «Year-book».

Dans la guerre des deux roses, on sent le poids des lords, tantôt du côté de John de Gaunt, duc de Lancastre, tantôt du côt d’Edmund, duc d’York. Wat-Tyler, les Lollards, Warwick, le faiseur de rois, toute cette anarchie-mère d’où sortira l’affranchissement, a pour point d’appui, avoué ou secret, la féodalité anglaise. Les lords jalousent utilement le trône; jalouser, c’est surveiller; ils circonscrivent l’initiative royale, restreignent les cas de haute trahison, suscitent de faux Richards contre Henri IV, se font arbitres, jugent la question des trois couronnes entre le duc d’York et Marguerite d’Anjou, et, au besoin, lèvent des armées et ont leurs batailles, Shrewsbury, Tewkesbury, Saint-Alban, tantôt perdues, tantôt gagnées. Déjà, au treizième siècle, ils avaient eu la victoire de Lewes, et ils avaient chassé du royaume les quatre frères du roi, bâtards d'Isabelle et du comte de la Marche, usuriers tous quatre, et exploitant les chrétiens par les juifs; d'un côt princes, de l'autre escrocs, chose qu'on a revue plus tard, mais qui était peu estimée dans ce temps-là. Jusqu'au quinzième siècle, le duc normand reste visible dans le roi d'Angleterre, et les actes du parlement se font en français. A partir de Henri VII, par la volonté des lords, ils se font en anglais.

L'Angleterre, bretonne sous Uther Pendragon, romaine sous César, saxonne sous l'heptarchie, danoise sous Harold, normande après Guillaume, devient, grâce aux lords, anglaise. Puis elle devient anglicane. Avoir sa religion chez soi, c'est une grande force.

Un pape extérieur soutire la vie nationale. Une mecque est une pieuvre. En 1534, Londres congédie Rome, la pairie adopte la réforme et les lords acceptent Luther. Réplique l'excommunication de 1215. Ceci convenait à Henri VIII, mais d'autres égards les lords le gênaient. Un bouledogue devant un ours, c'est la chambre des lords devant Henri VIII. Quand Wolsey vole White-Hall à la nation, et quand Henri VIII vole White-Hall à Wolsey, qui gronde? quatre lords, Darcie de Chichester, Saint-John de Bletso, et (deux noms normands) Mountjoye et Mounteagle. Le roi usurpe. La pairie empiète. L'hérédit contient de l'incorruptibilité; de là l'insubordination des lords. Devant Elisabeth même, les barons remuent. Il en résulte les supplices de Durham. Cette jupe tyrannique est teinte de sang. Un vertugadin sous lequel il y a un billot, c'est l Elisabeth. Elisabeth assemble le parlement le moins qu'elle peut, et réduit la chambre des lords à soixante-cinq membres, dont un seul marquis, Westminster, et pas un duc. Du reste, les rois en France avaient la même jalousie et opéraient la même élimination. Sous Henri III, il n'y avait plus que huit duchés-pairies, et c'était au grand déplaisir du roi que le baron de Mantes, le baron de Coucy, le baron de Coulommiers, le baron de Châteauneuf en Timerais, le baron de la Fère en Tardenois, le baron de Mortagne, et quelques autres encore, se maintenaient barons pairs de France. En Angleterre, la couronne laissait volontiers les pairies s'amortir; sous Anne, pour ne citer qu'un exemple, les extinctions depuis le douzième siècle avaient fini par faire un total de cinq cent soixante-cinq pairies abolies.

La guerre des roses avait commencé l'extirpation des ducs, que Marie Tudor, à coups de hache, avait achevée. C'était décapiter la noblesse.

Couper le duc, c’est couper la tête. Bonne politique sans doute, mais corrompre vaut mieux que couper.

C’est ce que sentit Jacques Ier. Il restaura la duché. Il fit duc son favori Villiers, qui l’avait fait porc.

Transformation du duc féodal en duc courtisan. Cela pullulera.

Charles II fera duchesses deux de ses maîtresses, Barbe de Southampton et Louise de Quérouel. Sous Anne, il y aura vingt-cinq ducs, dont trois étrangers, Cumberland, Cambridge et Schonberg. Ces procédés de cour, inventés par Jacques Ier, réussissent-ils? Non. La chambre des lords se sent maniée par l’intrigue et s’irrite. Elle s’irrite contre Jacques Ier, elle s’irrite contre Charles Ier, lequel, soit dit en passant, a peut-être un peu tué son père comme Marie de Médicis a peut-être un peu tué son mari. Rupture entre Charles Ier et la pairie.

Les lords, qui, sous Jacques Ier, avaient mandé à leur barre la concussion dans la personne de Bacon, font, sous Charles Ier, le procès à la trahison dans la personne de Stafford. Ils avaient condamné Bacon, ils condamnent Stafford. L’un avait perdu l’honneur, l’autre perd la vie. Charles Ier est décapité une première fois en Stafford. Les lords prêtent main-forte aux communes. Le roi convoque le parlement à Oxford, la révolution le convoque à Londres; quarante-trois pairs vont avec le roi, vingt-deux avec la république. De cette acceptation du peuple par les lords sort le bill des droits, ébauche de nos droits de l’homme, vague ombre projetée du fond de l’avenir par la révolution de France sur la révolution d’Angleterre.

Chamberlayne, État présent de l’Angleterre. Tome II, 2me partie, ch. iv, p. 64. 1688.

Villiers appelait Jacques Ier Votre Cochonnerie.

Tels sont les services. Involontaires, soit. Et payés cher, car cette pairie est un parasite énorme. Mais considérables.

L’oeuvre despotique de Louis XI, de Richelieu et de Louis XIV, la construction d’un sultan, l’aplatissement pris pour l’égalité, la bastonnade donnée par le sceptre, les multitudes nivelées par l’abaissement, ce travail turc fait en France, les lords l’ont empêché en Angleterre. Ils ont fait de l’aristocratie un mur, endiguant le roi d’un côté, abritant le peuple de l’autre. Ils rachètent leur arrogance envers le peuple par de l’insolence envers le roi. Simon, comte de Leicester, disait à Henri III: Roi, tu as menti. Les lords imposent à la couronne des servitudes; ils froissent le roi à l’endroit sensible, à la vénerie. Tout lord, passant dans un parc royal, a le droit d’y tuer un daim. Chez le roi, le lord est chez lui. Le roi prévu la tour de Londres, avec son tarif, pas plus qu’un pair, douze livres sterling par semaine, on doit cela à la chambre des lords.

Plus encore. Le roi découronné, on le lui doit. Les lords ont destitué Jean sans Terre, dégradé Edouard II, déposé Richard II, brisé Henri VI, et ont rendu Cromwell possible. Quel Louis XIV il y avait dans Charles Ier! Grâce à Cromwell, il est rest latent. Du reste, disons-le en passant, Cromwell lui-même, aucun historien n’a pris garde à ce fait, prétendait à la pairie; c’est ce qui lui fait épouser Elisabeth Bourchier, descendante et héritière d’un Cromwell, lord Bourchier, dont la pairie s’était éteinte en 1471, et d’un Bourchier, lord Robesart, autre pairie éteinte en 1429. Partageant la croissance redoutable des événements, il trouva plus court de dominer par le roi supprim que par la pairie réclamée. Le cérémonial des lords, parfois sinistre, atteignait le roi. Les deux porte-glaives de la Tour, debout, la hache sur l’épaule, à droite et à gauche du pair accusé comparaissant à la barre, étaient aussi bien pour le roi que pour tout autre lord. Pendant cinq siècles l’antique chambre des lords a eu un plan, et l’a suivi avec fixité. On compte ses jours de distraction et de faiblesse, comme par exemple ce moment étrange où elle se laissa séduire par la galéasse chargée de fromages, de jambons et de vins grecs que lui envoya Jules II.

L’aristocratie anglaise était inquiète, hautaine, irréductible, attentive, patriotiquement défiante. C’est elle qui, à la fin du dix-septième siècle, par l’acte dixième de l’an 1694, était au bourg de Stockbridge, en Southampton, le droit de députer au parlement, et forçait les communes à casser l’élection de ce bourg, entachée de fraude papiste. Elle avait imposé le test Jacques, duc d’York, et sur son refus l’avait exclu du trône. Il régna cependant, mais les lords finirent par le ressaisir et par le chasser. Cette aristocratie a eu dans sa longue durée quelque instinct de progrès. Une certaine quantité de lumière appréciable s’en est toujours dégagée, excepté vers la fin, qui est maintenant. Sous Jacques II, elle maintenait dans la chambre basse la proportion de trois cent quarante-six bourgeois contre quatrevingt douze chevaliers; les seize barons de courtoisie des Cinq-Ports étant plus que contre-balancés par les cinquante citoyens des vingt-cinq cités. Tout en étant très corruptrice et très égoïste, cette aristocratie avait, en certains cas, une singulière impartialité. On la juge durement. Les bons traitements de l’histoire sont pour les communes; c’est débattre. Nous croyons le rôle des lords très grand.

L’oligarchie, c’est de l’indépendance à l’état barbare, mais c’est de l’indépendance. Voyez la Pologne, royaume nominal, république réelle. Les pairs d’Angleterre tenaient le trône en suspicion et en tutelle. Dans mainte occasion, mieux que les communes, les lords savaient déplaire. Ils faisaient échec au roi. Ainsi, en 1694, année remarquable, les parlements triennaux, rejetés par les communes parce que Guillaume III n’en voulait pas, avaient été votés par les pairs. Guillaume III, irrité, ôta le château de Pendennis au comte de Bath, et toutes ses charges au vicomte Mordaunt. La chambre des lords, c’était la république de Venise au coeur de la royauté d’Angleterre. Réduire le roi au doge, tel était son but, et elle a fait croître la nation de tout ce dont elle a fait décroître le roi.

La royauté le comprenait et haïssait la pairie. Des deux côtés on cherchait à s’amoindrir. Ces diminutions profitaient au peuple en augmentation. Les deux puissances aveugles, monarchie et oligarchie, ne s’apercevaient pas qu’elles travaillaient pour un tiers, la démocratie. Quelle joie ce fut pour la cour, au siècle dernier, de pouvoir pendre un pair, lord Ferrers!

Du reste, on le pendit avec une corde de soie. Politesse.

On n’eût pas pendu un pair de France. Remarque altière que fit le duc de Richelieu. D’accord. On l’eût décapité. Politesse plus grande. Montmorency-Tancarville signait: Pair de France et d’Angleterre, rejetant ainsi la pairie anglaise au second rang.

Les pairs de France étaient plus hauts et moins puissants, tenant au rang plus qu’à l’autorité, et à la préséance plus qu’à la domination. Il y avait entre eux et les lords la nuance qui sépare la vanité de l’orgueil. Pour les pairs de France, avoir le pas sur les princes étrangers, précéder les grands d’Espagne, primer les patrices de Venise, faire asseoir sur les bas sièges du parlement les maréchaux de France, le connétable et l’amiral de France, fût-il comte de Toulouse et fils de Louis XIV, distinguer entre les duchés mâles et les duchés femelles, maintenir l’intervalle entre une comté simple comme Armagnac ou Albret et une comté-pairie comme Évreux, porter de droit, dans certains cas, le cordon bleu ou la toison d’or à vingt-cinq ans, contrebalancer le duc de la Trémoille, le plus ancien pair chez le roi, par le duc d’Uzès, le plus ancien pair en parlement, prétendre à autant de pages et de chevaux au carrosse qu’un électeur, se faire dire monseigneur par le premier président, discuter si le duc du Maine a rang de pair, comme comte d’Eu, dès 1458, traverser la grande chambre diagonalement ou par les côtés; c’était la grosse affaire. La grosse affaire pour les lords, c’était l’acte de navigation, le test, l’enrôlement de l’Europe au service de l’Angleterre, la domination des mers, l’expulsion des Stuarts, la guerre à la France. Ici, avant tout l’étiquette; là, avant tout l’empire. Les pairs d’Angleterre avaient la proie, les pairs de France avaient l’ombre. En somme, la chambre des lords d’Angleterre a été un point de départ; en civilisation, c’est immense. Elle a eu l’honneur de commencer une nation.

Elle a été la première incarnation de l’unité d’un peuple. La résistance anglaise, cette obscure force toute-puissante, est née dans la chambre des lords. Les barons, par une série de voies de fait sur le prince, ont ébauché le détrônement définitif. La chambre des lords aujourd’hui est un peu étonnée et triste de ce qu’elle a fait sans le vouloir et sans le savoir. D’autant plus que c’est irrévocable. Que sont les concessions? des restitutions. Et les nations ne l’ignorent point. J’octroie, dit le roi. Je récupère, dit le peuple. La chambre des lords a cru créer le privilège des pairs, elle a produit le droit des citoyens. L’aristocratie, ce vautour, a couvé cet oeuf d’aigle, la liberté.

Aujourd’hui l’oeuf est cassé, l’aigle plane, le vautour meurt.

L’aristocratie agonise, l’Angleterre grandit.

Mais soyons justes envers l’aristocratie. Elle a fait équilibre à la royauté; elle a été contre-poids. Elle a fait obstacle au despotisme; elle a été barrière.

Remercions-la, et enterrons-la.

LA VIEILLE SALLE

Près de l’abbaye de Westminster il y avait un antique palais normand qui fut brûlé sous Henri VIII. Il en resta deux ailes.

Edouard VI mit dans l’une la chambre des lords, et dans l’autre la chambre des communes.

Ni les deux ailes, ni les deux salles n’existent maintenant; on a rebâti tout cela.

Nous l’avons dit et il faut y insister, nulle ressemblance entre la chambre des lords d’aujourd’hui et la chambre des lords de jadis. On a démoli l’ancien palais, ce qui a un peu démoli les anciens usages. Les coups de pioche dans les monuments ont leurs contre-coups dans les coutumes et les chartes. Une vieille pierre ne tombe pas sans entraîner une vieille loi. Installez dans une salle ronde le sénat d’une salle carrée, il sera autre.

Le coquillage changé déforme le mollusque.

Si vous voulez conserver une vieille chose, humaine ou divine, code ou dogme, patriciat ou sacerdoce, n’en refaites rien à neuf, pas même l’enveloppe. Mettez des pièces, tout au plus. Par exemple, le jésuitisme est une pièce mise au catholicisme.

Traitez les édifices comme vous traitez les institutions.

Les ombres doivent habiter les ruines. Les puissances décrépites sont mal à l’aise dans les logis fraîchement décorés. Aux institutions haillons il faut les palais masures.

Montrer l’intérieur de la chambre des lords d’autrefois, c’est montrer de l’inconnu. L’histoire, c’est la nuit. En histoire, il n’y a pas de second plan. La décroissance et l’obscurit s’emparent immédiatement de tout ce qui n’est plus sur le devant du théâtre. Décor enlevé, effacement, oubli. Le Passé a un synonyme, l’Ignoré.

Les pairs d’Angleterre siégeaient, comme cour de justice, dans la grande salle de Westminster, et, comme haute chambre législative, dans une salle spéciale nommée «maison des lords», house of th lords.

Outre la cour des pairs d’Angleterre, qui ne s’assemble que convoquée par la couronne, les deux grands tribunaux anglais, inférieurs à la cour des pairs, mais supérieurs à toute autre juridiction, siégeaient dans la grande salle de Westminster. Au haut bout de cette salle, ils habitaient deux compartiments qui se touchaient. Le premier tribunal était la cour du banc du roi, que le roi était censé présider; le deuxième était la cour de chancellerie, que le chancelier présidait. L'un était cour de justice, l'autre était cour de miséricorde. C'était le chancelier qui conseillait au roi les grâces; rarement. Ces deux cours, qui existent encore, interprétaient la législation et la refaisaient un peu; l'art du juge est de menuiser le code en jurisprudence. Industrie d'où l'équité se tire comme elle peut.

La législation se fabriquait et s'appliquait en ce lieu sévère, la grande salle de Westminster. Cette salle avait une voûte de châtaignier où ne pouvaient se mettre les toiles d'araignée; c'est bien assez qu'elles se mettent dans les lois.

Siéger comme cour et siéger comme chambre, c'est deux. Cette dualité constitue le pouvoir suprême. Le long parlement, qui commença le 3 novembre 1640, sentit le besoin révolutionnaire de ce double glaive. Aussi se déclara-t-il, comme une chambre des pairs, pouvoir judiciaire en même temps que pouvoir législatif.

Ce double pouvoir était immémorial dans la chambre des lords.

Nous venons de le dire, juges, les lords occupaient Westminster-Hall; législateurs, ils avaient une autre salle.

Cette autre salle, proprement dite chambre des lords, était oblongue et étroite. Elle avait pour tout éclairage quatre fenêtres profondément entaillées dans le comble et recevant le jour par le toit, plus, au-dessus du dais royal, un oeil-de-boeuf à six vitres, avec rideaux; le soir, pas d'autre lumière que douze demi-candélabres appliqués sur la muraille. La salle du sénat de Venise était moins éclairée encore. Une certaine ombre plaît à ces hiboux de la toute-puissance.

Sur la salle ou s'assemblaient les lords s'arrondissait avec des plans polyédriques une haute voûte à caissons dorés. Les communes n'avaient qu'un plafond plat; tout a un sens dans les constructions monarchiques. A une extrémité de la longue salle des lords était la porte; à l'autre, en face, le trône. A quelques pas de la porte, la barre, coupure transversale, sorte de frontière, marquant l'endroit où finit le peuple et o commence la seigneurie. A droite du trône, une cheminée, blasonnée au pinacle, offrait deux bas-reliefs de marbre, figurant, l'un la victoire de Cuthwolph sur les bretons en 572, l'autre le plan géométral du bourg de Dunstable, lequel n'a que quatre rues, parallèles aux quatre parties du monde. Trois marches exhaussaient le trône. Le trône était dit «chaise royale». Sur les deux murs se faisant vis-à-vis se déployait, en tableaux successifs, une vaste tapisserie donnée aux lords par Élisabeth et représentant toute l'aventure de l'armada depuis son départ d'Espagne jusqu'à son naufrage devant l'Angleterre. Les hauts accastillages des navires étaient tissus en fils d'or et d'argent, qui, avec le temps, avaient noirci. A cette tapisserie, coupée de distance en distance par les candélabres-appliques, étaient adossés à droite du trône trois rangs de bancs pour les évêques, à gauche trois rangs de bancs pour les ducs, les marquis et les comtes, sur gradins et séparés par desmontoirs. Sur les trois bancs de la première section s'asseyaient les ducs; sur les trois bancs de la deuxième, les marquis; sur les trois bancs de la troisième, les comtes. Le banc des vicomtes, en équerre, faisait face au trône, et derrière, entre les vicomtes et la barre, il y avait deux bancs pour les barons. Sur le haut banc, à droite du trône, étaient les deux archevêques, Canterbury et York; sur le banc intermédiaire, trois évêques, Londres, Durham et Winchester; les autres évêques sur le banc d'en bas. Il y a entre l'archevêque de Canterbury et les autres évêques cette différence considérable qu'il est, lui, évêque par la divine providence, tandis que les autres ne le sont que par la divine permission. A droite du trône, on voyait une chaise pour le prince de Galles, et à gauche des pliants pour les ducs royaux, et en arrière de ces pliants un gradin pour les jeunes pairs mineurs, n'ayant point encore séance à la chambre. Force fleurs de lys partout; et le vaste écusson d'Angleterre sur les quatre murs, au-dessus des pairs comme au-dessus du roi. Les fils de pairs et les héritiers de pairie assistaient aux délibérations, debout derrière le trône entre le dais et le mur. Le trône au fond, et, des trois côtés de la salle, les trois rangs des bancs des pairs laissaient libre un large espace carré. Dans ce carré, que recouvrait le tapis d'état, armorié d'Angleterre, il y avait quatre sacs de laine, un devant le trône où siégeait le chancelier entre la masse et le sceau, un devant les évêques où siégeaient les juges conseillers d'état, ayant séance et non voix, un devant les ducs, marquis et comtes, où siégeaient les secrétaires d'état, un devant les vicomtes et barons, où étaient assis le clerc de la couronne et le clerc du parlement, et sur lequel écrivaient les deux sous-clercs, à genoux. Au centre du carré, on voyait une large table drapée chargée de dossiers, de registres, de sommiers, avec de massifs encriers d'orfèvrerie et de hauts flambeaux aux quatre angles. Les pairs prenaient séance en ordre chronologique, chacun suivant la date de la création de sa pairie. Ils avaient rang selon le titre, et, dans le titre, selon l'ancienneté. A la barre se tenait l'huissier de la verge noire, debout, sa baguette à la main. En dedans de la porte, l'officier de l'huissier, et en dehors le crieur de la verge noire, ayant pour fonction d'ouvrir les séances de justice par le cri: Oyez! en français, poussé trois fois en appuyant solennellement sur la première syllabe. Près du crieur, le sergent porte-masse du chancelier.

Dans les cérémonies royales, les pairs temporels avaient la couronne en tête, et les pairs spirituels la mitre.

Les archevêques portaient la mitre à couronne ducale, et les évêques, qui ont rang après les vicomtes, la mitre à tortil de baron.

Remarque étrange et qui est un enseignement, ce carré formé par le trône, les évêques et les barons, et dans lequel sont des magistrats à genoux, c'était l'ancien parlement de France sous les deux premières races. Même aspect de l'autorité en France et en Angleterre, Hincmar, dans le de ordinatione sacri palatii, décrit en 853 la chambre des lords en séance à Westminster au dix-huitième siècle. Sorte de bizarre procès-verbal fait neuf cents ans d'avance.

Qu'est l'histoire? Un écho du passé dans l'avenir. Un reflet de l'avenir sur le passé.

L'assemblée du parlement n'était obligatoire que tous les sept ans.

Les lords délibéraient en secret, portes fermées. Les séances des communes étaient publiques. La popularité semblait diminution.

Le nombre des lords était illimité. Nommer des lords, c'était la menace de la royauté. Moyen de gouvernement.

Au commencement du dix-huitième siècle, la chambre des lords offrait déjà un très fort chiffre. Elle a grossi encore depuis.

Délayer l'aristocratie est une politique. Elisabeth fit peut-être une faute en condensant la pairie dans soixante-cinq lords. La seigneurie moins nombreuse est plus intense. Dans les assemblées, plus il y a de membres, moins il y a de têtes.

Jacques II l'avait senti en portant la chambre haute cent-quatrevingt-huit lords; cent-quatrevingt-six, si l'on défalque de ces pairies les deux duchesses de l'alcôve royale, Portsmouth et Cleveland. Sous Anne, le total des lords, y compris les évêques, était de deux cent sept.

Sans compter le duc de Cumberland, mari de la reine, il y avait vingt-cinq ducs dont le premier, Norfolk, ne siégeait point, étant catholique, et dont le dernier, Cambridge, prince électoral de Hanovre, siégeait, quoique étranger. Winchester, qualifi premier et seul marquis d'Angleterre, comme Astorga seul marquis d'Espagne, étant absent, vu qu'il était jacobite, il y avait cinq marquis, dont le premier était Lindsey et le dernier Lothian; soixante-dix-neuf comtes, dont le premier était Derby et le dernier Islay; neuf vicomtes, dont le premier était Hereford et le dernier Lonsdale; et soixante-deux barons, dont le premier était Abergaveny et le dernier Hervey. Lord Hervey, étant le dernier baron, était ce qu'on appelait «le puîné» de la chambre.

Derby, qui, étant primé par Oxford, Shrewsbury et Kent, n'était que le quatrième sous Jacques II, était devenu sous Anne le premier des comtes. Deux noms de chanceliers avaient disparu de la liste des barons, Verulam, sous lequel l'histoire retrouve Bacon, et Wem, sous lequel l'histoire retrouve Jeffreys. Bacon, Jeffreys, noms diversement sombres. En 1705, les vingt-six évêques n'étaient que vingt-cinq, le siège de Chester étant vacant. Parmi les évêques, quelques-uns étaient de très grands seigneurs; ainsi William Talbot évêque d'Oxford, chef de la branche protestante de sa maison. D'autres étaient des docteurs éminents, comme John Sharp, archevêque d'York, ancien doyen de Norwick, le poëte Thomas Spratt, évêque de Rochester, bonhomme apoplectique, et cet évêque de Lincoln, qui devait mourir archevêque de Canterbury, Wake, l'adversaire de Bossuet.

Dans les occasions importantes, et lorsqu'il y avait lieu de recevoir une communication de la couronne à la chambre haute, toute cette multitude auguste, en robes, en perruques, avec coiffes de prélature ou chapeaux à plumes, alignait et étageait ses rangées de têtes dans la salle de la pairie, le long des murs où l'on voyait vaguement la tempête exterminer l'armada. Sous-entendu: Tempête aux ordres de l'Angleterre.

LA VIEILLE CHAMBRE

Toute la cérémonie de l'investiture de Gwynplaine, depuis l'entrée sous le King's Gate jusqu'à la prise du test dans le rond-point vitré, s'était passée dans une sorte de pénombre.

Lord William Cowper n'avait point permis qu'on lui donnât, à lui, chancelier d'Angleterre, des détails trop circonstanciés sur la défiguration du jeune lord Fermain Clancharlie, trouvant au-dessous de sa dignité de savoir qu'un pair n'était pas beau, et se sentant amoindri par la hardiesse qu'aurait un inférieur de lui apporter des renseignements de cette nature. Il est certain qu'un homme du peuple dit avec plaisir: ce prince est bossu. Donc, être difforme, pour un lord, c'est offensant. Aux quelques mots que lui en avait dits la reine, le lord chancelier s'était borné à répondre: Un seigneur a pour visage la seigneurie.

Sommairement, et sur les procès-verbaux qu'il avait dû vérifier et certifier, il avait compris. De là des précautions.

Le visage du nouveau lord pouvait, à son entrée dans la chambre, faire une sensation quelconque. Il importait d'obvier à cela.

Le lord-chancelier avait pris ses mesures. Le moins d'événement possible, c'est l'idée fixe et la règle de conduite des personnages sérieux. La haine des incidents fait partie de la gravité. Il importait de faire en sorte que l'admission de Gwynplaine passât sans encombre, comme celle de tout autre héritier de pairie.

C'est pourquoi le lord-chancelier avait fixé la réception de lord Fermain Clancharlie à une séance du soir. Le chancelier étant portier, quodammodo ostiarius, disent les chartes normandes, januarum cancellorumque potestas, dit Tertullien, il peut officier en dehors de la chambre sur le seuil, et lord William Cowper avait usé de son droit en accomplissant dans le rond-point vitré les formalités d'investiture de lord Fermain Clancharlie.

De plus, il avait avancé l'heure pour que le nouveau pair fit son entrée dans la chambre avant même que la séance fût commencée.

Quant à l'investiture d'un pair sur le seuil, et en dehors de la chambre même, il y avait des précédents. Le premier baron héréditaire créé par patente, John de Beauchamp, de Holtcastle, fait par Richard II, en 1387, baron de Kidderminster, fut reçu de cette façon.

Du reste, en renouvelant ce précédent, le lord-chancelier se créait à lui-même un embarras dont il vit l’inconvénient moins de deux ans après, lors de l’entrée du vicomte Newhaven à la chambre des lords.

Myope, comme nous l’avons dit, lord William Cowper s’était aperçu à peine de la difformité de Gwynplaine; les deux lords parrains, pas du tout. C’étaient deux vieillards presque aveugles.

Le lord-chancelier les avait choisis exprès.

Il y a mieux, le lord-chancelier, n’ayant vu que la stature et la prestance de Gwynplaine, lui avait trouvé «fort bonne mine».

Au moment où les door-keepers avaient ouvert devant Gwynplaine la grande porte à deux battants, il y avait à peine quelques lords dans la salle. Ces lords étaient presque tous vieux. Les vieux, dans les assemblées, sont les exacts, de même que, près des femmes, ils sont les assidus. On ne voyait au banc des ducs que deux ducs, l’un tout blanc, l’autre gris, Thomas Osborne, duc de Leeds, et Schonberg, fils de ce Schonberg, allemand par la naissance, français par le bâton de maréchal, et anglais par la pairie, qui, chassé par l’édit de Nantes, après avoir fait la guerre à l’Angleterre comme français, fit la guerre à la France comme anglais. Au banc des lords spirituels, il n’y avait que l’archevêque de Canterbury, primat d’Angleterre, tout en haut, et en bas le docteur Simon Patrick, évêque d’Ély, causant avec Evelyn Pierrepont, marquis de Dorchester, qui lui expliquait la différence entre un gabion et une courtine, et entre les palissades et les fraises, les palissades étant une rangée de poteaux devant les tentes, destinée à protéger le campement, et les fraises étant une collerette de pieux pointus sous le parapet d’une forteresse empêchant l’escalade des assiégeants et la désertion des assiégés, et le marquis enseignait à l’évêque de quelle façon on fraise une redoute, en mettant les pieux moiti dans la terre et moitié dehors. Thomas Thynne, vicomte Weymouth, s’était approché d’un candélabre et examinait un plan de son architecte pour faire à son jardin de Long Leate, en Wiltshire, une pelouse dite «gazon coupé», moyennant des carreaux de sable jaune, de sable rouge, de coquilles de rivière et de fine poudre de charbon de terre. Au banc des vicomtes il y avait un pêle-mêle de vieux lords, Essex, Ossulstone, Peregrine, Osborn, William Zulestein, comte de Rochfort, parmi lesquels quelques jeunes, de la faction qui ne portait pas perruque, entourant Price Devereux, vicomte Hereford, et discutant la question de savoir si une infusion de houx des apalaches est du thé. — A peu près, disait Osborn. — Tout à fait, disait Essex. Ce qui était attentivement écouté par Pawlets de Saint-John, cousin du Bolingbroke dont Voltaire plus tard a été un peu l'élève, car Voltaire, commencé par le père Porée, a été achevé par Bolingbroke. Au banc des marquis, Thomas de Grey, marquis de Kent, lord chambellan de la reine, affirmait à Robert Bertie, marquis de Lindsey, lord chambellan d'Angleterre, que c'était par deux français réfugiés, monsieur Lecoq, autrefois conseiller au parlement de Paris, et monsieur Ravenel, gentilhomme breton, qu'avait été gagné le gros lot de la grande loterie anglaise en 1614. Le comte de Wymes lisait un livre intitulé: Pratique curieuse des oracles des sibylles. John Campbell, comte de Greenwich, fameux par son long menton, sa gaîté et ses quatrevingt-sept ans, écrivait à sa maîtresse. Lord Chandos se faisait les ongles. La séance qui allait suivre devant être une séance royale où la couronne serait représentée par commissaires, deux assistants door-keepers disposaient en avant du trône un banc de velours couleur feu. Sur le deuxième sac de laine était assis le maître des rôles, sacrorum scriniorum magister, lequel avait alors pour logis l'ancienne maison des juifs convertis. Sur le quatrième sac, les deux sous-clercs à genoux feuilletaient des registres.

Cependant le lord-chancelier prenait place sur le premier sac de laine, les officiers de la chambre s'installaient, les uns assis, les autres debout, l'archevêque de Canterbury se levait et disait la prière, et la séance commençait. Gwynplaine était déjà entr depuis quelque temps, sans qu'on eût pris garde à lui; le deuxième banc des barons, où était sa place, étant contigu à la barre, il n'avait eu que quelques pas à faire. Les deux lords ses parrains s'étaient assis à sa droite et à sa gauche, ce qui avait à peu près masqué la présence du nouveau venu. Personne n'étant averti, le clerc du parlement avait lu à demi-voix et, pour ainsi dire, chuchoté les diverses pièces concernant le nouveau lord, et le lord-chancelier avait proclamé son admission au milieu de ce qu'on appelle dans les comptes rendus «l'inattention générale». Chacun causait. Il y avait dans la chambre ce brouhaha pendant lequel les assemblées font toutes sortes de choses crépusculaires, qui quelquefois les étonnent plus tard.

Gwynplaine s'était assis, silencieusement, tête nue, entre les deux vieux pairs, lord Fitz Walter et lord Arundel.

Ajoutons que Barkilphedro, renseigné à fond comme un espion qu'il était, et déterminé à réussir dans sa machination, avait dans ses dires officiels, en présence du lord-chancelier, atténué dans une certaine mesure la difformité de lord Fermain Clancharlie, en insistant sur ce détail que Gwynplaine pouvait à volont supprimer l'effet de rire et ramener au sérieux sa face défigurée. Barkilphedro avait probablement même exagéré cette faculté. D'ailleurs, au point de vue aristocratique, qu'est-ce que cela faisait? Lord William Cowper n'était-il pas le légiste auteur de la maxime: En Angleterre, la restauration d'un pair importe plus que la restauration d'un roi? Sans doute la beaut et la dignité devraient être inséparables, il est fâcheux qu'un lord soit contrefait, et c'est là un outrage du hasard; mais, insistons-y, en quoi cela diminue-t-il le droit? Le lord-chancelier prenait des précautions et avait raison d'en prendre, mais, en somme, avec ou sans précautions, qui donc pouvait empêcher un pair d'entrer à la chambre des pairs? La seigneurie et la royauté ne sont-elles pas supérieures à la difformité et à l'infirmité? Un cri de bête fauve n'avait-il pas été héréditaire comme la pairie elle-même dans l'antique famille, éteinte en 1347, des Cumin, comtes de Buchan, au point que c'était au cri de tigre qu'on reconnaissait le pair d'Ecosse?
Ses hideuses taches de sang au visage empêchèrent-elles César Borgia d'être duc de Valentinois? La cécité empêcha-t-elle Jean de Luxembourg d'être roi de Bohême? La gibbosité empêcha-t-elle Richard III d'être roi d'Angleterre? A bien voir le fond des choses, l'infirmité et la laideur acceptées avec une hautaine indifférence, loin de contredire la grandeur, l'affîrment et la prouvent. La seigneurie a une telle majesté que la difformité ne la trouble point. Ceci est l'autre aspect de la question, et n'est pas le moindre. Comme on le voit, rien ne pouvait faire obstacle à l'admission de Gwynplaine, et les précautions prudentes du lord-chancelier, utiles au point de vue inférieur de la tactique, étaient de luxe au point de vue supérieur du principe aristocratique.

En entrant, selon la recommandation que lui avait faite le roi d'armes et que les deux lords parrains lui avaient renouvelée, il avait salué «la chaise royale».

Donc c'était fini. Il était lord.

Cette hauteur, sous le rayonnement de laquelle, toute sa vie, il avait vu son maître Ursus se courber avec épouvante, ce sommet prodigieux, il l'avait sous ses pieds.

Il était dans le lieu éclatant et sombre de l'Angleterre.

Vieille cime du mont féodal regardée depuis six siècles par l'Europe et l'histoire. Auréole effrayante d'un monde de ténèbres.

Son entrée dans cette auréole avait eu lieu. Entrée irrévocable.

Il était là chez lui.

Chez lui sur son siège comme le roi sur le sien.

Il y était, et rien désormais ne pouvait faire qu'il n'y fût pas.

Cette couronne royale qu'il voyait sous ce dais était soeur de sa couronne à lui. Il était le pair de ce trône.

En face de la majesté, il était la seigneurie. Moindre, mais semblable.

Hier, qu'était-il? histrion. Aujourd'hui, qu'était-il? prince.

Hier, rien. Aujourd'hui, tout.

Confrontation brusque de la misère et de la puissance, s'abordant face à face au fond d'un esprit dans une destinée et devenant tout à coup les deux moitiés d'une conscience.

Deux spectres, l'adversité et la prospérité, prenant possession de la même âme, et chacun la tirant à soi. Partage pathétique d'une intelligence, d'une volonté, d'un cerveau, entre ces deux frères ennemis, le fantôme pauvre et le fantôme riche. Abel et Caïn dans le même homme.

V

CAUSERIES ALTIÈRES

Peu à peu les bancs de la chambre se garnirent. Les lords commencèrent à arriver. L’ordre du jour était le vote du bill augmentant de cent mille livres sterling la dotation annuelle de Georges de Danemark, duc de Cumberland, mari de la reine. En outre, il était annoncé que divers bills consentis par sa majest allaient être apportés à la chambre par des commissaires de la couronne ayant pouvoir et charge de les sanctionner, ce qui érigeait la séance en séance royale. Les pairs avaient tous leur robe de parlement par-dessus leur habit de cour ou de ville.

Cette robe, semblable à celle dont était revêtu Gwynplaine, était la même pour tous, sinon que les ducs avaient cinq bandes d’hermine avec bordure d’or, les marquis quatre, les comtes et les vicomtes trois, et les barons deux.

Les lords entraient par groupes. On s’était rencontré dans les couloirs, on continuait les dialogues commencés. Quelques-uns venaient seuls. Les costumes étaient solennels, les attitudes point; ni les paroles.

Tous, en entrant, saluaient le trône.

Les pairs affluaient. Ce défilé de noms majestueux se faisait peu près sans cérémonial, le public étant absent. Leicester entrait et serrait la main de Lichfield; puis Charles Mordaunt, comte de Peterborough et de Monmouth, l’ami de Locke, sur l’initiative duquel il avait proposé la refonte des monnaies; puis Charles Campbell, comte de Loudoun, prêtant l’oreille Fulke Greville, lord Brooke; puis Dorme, comte de Caërnarvon; puis Robert Sutton, baron Lexington, fils du Lexington qui avait conseillé à Charles II de chasser Gregorio Leti, historiographe assez mal avisé pour vouloir être historien; puis Thomas Bellasyse, vicomte Falconberg, ce beau vieux; et ensemble les trois cousins Howard, Howard, comte de Bindon, Bower-Howard, comte de Berkshire, et Stafford-Howard, comte de Stafford; puis John Lovelace, baron Lovelace, dont la pairie éteinte en 1736 permit à Richardson d’introduire Lovelace dans son livre et de créer sous ce nom un type. Tous ces personnages diversement célèbres dans la politique ou la guerre, et dont plusieurs honorent l’Angleterre, riaient et causaient. C’était comme l’histoire vue en négligé.

En moins d’une demi-heure, la chambre se trouva presque au complet. C’était tout simple, la séance étant royale. Ce qui était moins simple, c’était la vivacité des conversations. La chambre, si assoupie tout à l’heure, était maintenant en rumeur comme une ruche inquiétée. Ce qui l’avait réveillée, c’était l’arrivée des lords en retard. Ils apportaient du nouveau.
Chose bizarre, les pairs qui, à l’ouverture de la séance, étaient dans la chambre, ne savaient point ce qui s’y était passé, et ceux qui n’y étaient pas le savaient.

Plusieurs lords arrivaient de Windsor.

Depuis quelques heures, l’aventure de Gwynplaine s’était ébruitée. Le secret est un filet; qu’une maille se rompe, tout se déchire. Dès le matin, par suite des incidents racontés plus haut, toute cette histoire d’une pairie retrouvée sur un tréteau et d’un bateleur reconnu lord, avait fait éclat à Windsor, dans les privés royaux. Les princes en avaient parlé, puis les laquais. De la cour l’événement avait gagné la ville. Les événements ont une pesanteur, et la loi du carré des vitesses leur est applicable. Ils tombent dans le public et s’y enfoncent avec une rapidité inouïe. A sept heures, on n’avait pas Londres vent de cette histoire. A huit heures, Gwynplaine était le bruit de la ville. Seuls, les quelques lords exacts qui avaient devancé l’ouverture de la séance ignoraient la chose, n’étant point dans la ville où l’on racontait tout et étant dans la chambre où ils ne s’étaient aperçus de rien. Sur ce, tranquilles sur leurs bancs, ils étaient apostrophés par les arrivants, tout émus.

— Eh bien? disait Francis Brown, vicomte Mountacute, au marquis de Dorchester.

— Quoi?

— Est-ce que c’est possible?

— Quoi?

— L’Homme qui Rit!

— Qu’est-ce que c’est que l’Homme qui Rit?

— Vous ne connaissez pas l’Homme qui Rit?

— Non.

— C’est un clown. Un boy de la foire. Un visage impossible qu’on allait voir pour deux sous. Un saltimbanque.

— Après?

— Vous venez de le recevoir pair d’Angleterre.

— L’homme qui rit, c’est vous, milord Mountacute.

— Je ne ris pas, milord Dorchester.

Et le vicomte Mountacute faisait un signe au clerc du parlement, qui se levait de son sac de laine et confirmait à leurs seigneuries le fait de l'admission du nouveau pair. Plus les détails.

— Tiens, tiens, tiens, disait lord Dorchester, je causais avec l'évêque d'Ély.

Le jeune comte d'Annesley abordait le vieux lord Eure, lequel n'avait plus que deux ans à vivre, car il devait mourir en 1707.

— Milord Eure?

— Milord Annesley?

— Avez-vous connu lord Linnaeus Clancharlie?

— Un homme d'autrefois. Oui.

— Qui est mort en Suisse?

— Oui. Nous étions parents.

— Qui avait été républicain sous Cromwell, et qui était rest républicain sous Charles II?

— Républicain? pas du tout. Il boudait. C'était une querelle personnelle entre le roi et lui. Je tiens de source certaine que lord Clancharlie se serait rallié si on lui avait donné la place de chancelier qu'a eue lord Hyde.

— Vous m'étonnez, milord Eure. On m'avait dit que ce lord Clancharlie était un honnête homme.

— Un honnête homme! Est-ce que cela existe? Jeune homme, il n'y a pas d'honnête homme.

— Mais Caton?

— Vous croyez à Caton, vous.

— Mais Aristide?

— On a bien fait de l'exiler.

— Mais Thomas Morus?

— On a bien fait de lui couper le cou.

— Et à votre avis, lord Clancharlie?...

— Était de cette espèce. D'ailleurs un homme qui reste en exil, c'est ridicule.

— Il y est mort.

— Un ambitieux déçu. Oh! si je l'ai connu! je crois bien. J'étais son meilleur ami.

— Savez-vous, milord Eure, qu'il s'était marié en Suisse?

— Je le sais à peu près.

— Et qu’il a eu de ce mariage un fils légitime?

— Oui. Qui est mort.

— Qui est vivant.

— Vivant?

— Vivant.

— Pas possible.

— Réel. Prouvé. Constaté. Homologué. Enregistré.

— Mais alors ce fils va hériter de la pairie de Clancharlie?

— Il ne va pas en hériter.

— Pourquoi?

— Parce qu’il en a hérité. C’est fait.

— C’est fait?

— Tournez la tête, milord Eure. Il est assis derrière vous au banc des barons.

Lord Eure se retournait; mais le visage de Gwynplaine se dérobait sous sa forêt de cheveux.

— Tiens! disait le vieillard, ne voyant que ses cheveux, il a déjà adopté la nouvelle mode. Il ne porte pas perruque.

Grantham abordait Colepepper.

— En voilà un qui est attrapé!

— Qui ça?

— David Dirry-Moir.

— Pourquoi ça?

— Il n’est plus pair.

— Comment ça?

Et Henry Auverquerque, comte de Grantham, racontait à John, baron Colepepper, toute «l’anecdote», la bouteille épave portée l’amirauté, le parchemin des comprachicos, le jussu régis contre-signé Jeffreys. la confrontation dans la cave pénale de Southwark, l’acceptation de tous ces faits par le lord-chancelier et par la reine, la prise du test dans le rond-point vitré, et enfin l’admission de lord Fermain Clancharlie au commencement de la séance, et tous deux faisaient effort pour distinguer entre lord Fitz Walter et lord Arundel la figure, dont on parlait tant, du nouveau lord, mais sans y mieux réussir que lord Eure et lord Annesley.

Gwynplaine, du reste, soit hasard, soit arrangement de ses parrains avertis par le lord-chancelier, était placé dans assez d’ombre pour échapper à la curiosité.

— Où ça? où est-il?

C'était le cri de tous en arrivant, mais aucun ne parvenait à le bien voir. Quelques-uns, qui avaient vu Gwynplaine à la Green-Box, étaient passionnément curieux, mais perdaient leur peine. Comme il arrive quelquefois qu'on embastille prudemment une jeune fille dans un groupe de douairières, Gwynplaine était comme enveloppé par plusieurs épaisseurs de vieux lords infirmes et indifférents. Des bons hommes qui ont la goutte sont peu sensibles aux histoires d'autrui.

On se passait de main en main des copies de la lettre en trois lignes que la duchesse Josiane avait, affirmait-on, écrite à la reine sa soeur, en réponse à l'injonction que lui avait faite sa majesté d'épouser le nouveau pair, l'héritier légitime des Clancharlie, lord Fermain. Cette lettre était ainsi conçue:

«Madame,

«J'aime autant cela. Je pourrai avoir lord David pour amant.

Signé Josiane. Ce billet, vrai ou faux, avait un succès d'enthousiasme.

Un jeune lord, Charles d'Okehampton, baron Mohun, dans la faction qui ne portait pas perruque, le lisait et le relisait avec bonheur. Lewis de Duras, comte de Feversham, anglais qui avait de l'esprit français, regardait Mohun et souriait.

— Eh bien, s'écriait lord Mohun, voilà la femme que je voudrais épouser!

Et les voisins des deux lords entendaient ce dialogue entre Duras et Mohun:

— Épouser la duchesse Josiane, lord Mohun!

— Pourquoi pas?

— Peste!

— On serait heureux!

— On serait plusieurs.

— Est-ce qu'on n'est pas toujours plusieurs?

— Lord Mohun, vous avez raison. En fait de femmes, nous avons tous les restes les uns des autres. Qui est-ce qui a eu un commencement?

— Adam, peut-être.

— Pas même.

— Au fait, Satan!

— Mon cher, concluait Lewis de Duras, Adam n'est qu'un prête-nom. Pauvre dupe. Il a endossé le genre humain. L'homme a été fait la femme par le diable.

Hugo Cholmley, comte de Cholmley, fort légiste, était interrog du banc des évêques par Nathanaël Crew, lequel était deux fois pair, pair temporel, étant baron Crew, et pair spirituel, étant évêque de Durham.

— Est-ce possible? disait Crew.

— Est-ce régulier? disait Cholmley.

— L’investiture de ce nouveau venu s’est faite hors de la chambre, reprenait l’évêque, mais on affirme qu’il y a des précédents.

— Oui. Lord Beauchamp sous Richard II. Lord Chenay sous Élisabeth.

— Et lord Broghill sous Cromwell.

— Cromwell ne compte pas.

— Que pensez-vous de tout cela?

— Des choses diverses.

— Milord, comte de Cholmley, quel sera le rang de ce jeune Fermain Clancharlie dans la chambre?

— Milord évêque, l’interruption républicaine ayant déplacé les anciens rangs, Clancharlie est aujourd’hui situé dans la pairie entre Barnard et Somers, ce qui fait que, dans un cas de tour d’opinions, lord Fermain Clancharlie parlerait le huitième.

— En vérité! un bateleur de place publique!

— L’incident en soi ne m’étonne point, milord évêque. Ces choses-là arrivent. Il en arrive de plus surprenantes. Est-ce que la guerre des deux roses n’a pas été annoncée par l’assèchement subit de la rivière Ouse en Bedford le 1er janvier 1399? Or, si une rivière peut tomber en sécheresse, un seigneur peut tomber dans une condition servile. Ulysse, roi d’Ithaque, fit toutes sortes de métiers. Fermain Clancharlie est resté lord sous son enveloppe d’histrion. La bassesse de l’habit ne touche point la noblesse du sang. Mais la prise du test et l’investiture hors séance, quoique légale à la rigueur, peut soulever des objections. Je suis d’avis qu’il faudra s’entendre sur la question de savoir s’il y aurait lieu plus tard questionner en conversation d’état le lord-chancelier. On verra dans quelques semaines ce qu’il y aura à faire.

Et l’évêque ajoutait:

— C’est égal. C’est une aventure comme on n’en a pas vu depuis le comte Gesbodus.

Gwynplaine, l’Homme qui Rit, l’inn Tadcaster, la Green-Box, Chaos vaincu, la Suisse, Chillon, les comprachicos, l’exil, la mutilation, la république, Jeffreys, Jacques II, le jussu regis, la bouteille ouverte à l'amirauté, le père, lord Linnaeus, le fils légitime, lord Fermain, le fils bâtard, lord David, les conflits probables, la duchesse Josiane, le lord-chancelier, la reine, tout cela courait de banc en banc.

Une traînée de poudre, c'est le chuchotement. On s'en ressassait les détails. Toute cette aventure était l'immense murmure de la chambre. Gwynplaine, vaguement, au fond du puits de rêverie o il était, entendait ce bourdonnement sans savoir que c'était pour lui.

Cependant il était étrangement attentif, mais attentif aux profondeurs, non à la surface. L'excès d'attention se tourne en isolement.

Une rumeur daus une chambre n'empêche point la séance d'aller son train, pas plus qu'une poussière sur une troupe ne l'empêche de marcher. Les juges, qui ne sont à la chambre haute que de simples assistants ne pouvant parler qu'interrogés, avaient pris place sur le deuxième sac de laine, et les trois secrétaires d'état sur le troisième. Les héritiers de pairie affluaient dans leur compartiment à la fois dehors et dedans, qui était en arrière du trône. Les pairs mineurs étaient sur leur gradin spécial. En 1705, ces petits lords n'étaient pas moins de douze: Huntingdon, Lincoln, Dorset, Warwick, Bath, Burlington, Derwentwater, destiné à une mort tragique, Longueville, Lonsdale, Dudley and Ward, et Carteret, ce qui faisait une marmaille de huit comtes, de deux vicomtes et de deux barons.

Dans l'enceinte, sur les trois étages de bancs, chaque lord avait regagné son siège. Presque tous les évêques étaient là. Les ducs étaient nombreux, à commencer par Charles Seymour, duc de Somerset, et à finir par Georges Augustus, prince électoral de Hanovre, duc de Cambridge, le dernier en date et par conséquent le dernier en rang. Tous étaient en ordre, selon les préséances; Cavendish, duc de Devonshire, dont le grand-père avait abrit Hardwick les quatrevingt-douze ans de Hobbes; Lennox, duc de Richmond; les trois Fitz-Roy, le duc de Southampton, le duc de Grafton et le duc de-Northumberland; Butler, duc d'Ormond; Somerset, duc de Beaufort; Beauclerk, duc de Saint-Albans; Pawlett, duc de Bolton; Osborne, duc de Leeds; Wriothesley Russell, duc de Bedford, ayant pour cri d'armes et pour devise: Che sara sara, c'est-à-dire l'acceptation des événements; Sheffîeld, duc de Buckingham; Manners, duc de Rutland, et les autres. Ni Howard, duc de Norfolk, ni Talbot, duc de Shrewsbury, ne siégeaient, étant catholiques; ni Churchill, duc de Marlborough, — notre Malbrouck, — qui était en guerre et battait la France en ce moment-là. Il n'y avait point alors de duc écossais, Queensberry, Montrose et Roxburghe n’ayant été admis qu’en 1707.

VI

LA HAUTE ET LA BASSE

Tout à coup, il y eut dans la chambre une vive clarté. Quatre door-keepers apportèrent et placèrent des deux côtés du trône quatre hautes torchères-candélabres chargées de bougies. Le trône, ainsi éclairé, apparut dans une sorte de pourpre lumineuse. Vide, mais auguste. La reine dedans n'y eût pas ajouté grand'chose.

L'huissier de la verge noire entra, la baguette levée, et dit:

— Leurs seigneuries les commissaires de sa majesté.

Toutes les rumeurs tombèrent.

Un clerc en perruque et en simarre parut à la grande porte tenant un coussin fleurdelysé sur lequel on voyait des parchemins. Ces parchemins étaient des bills. A chacun pendait à une tresse de soie la bille ou bulle, d'or quelquefois, qui fait qu'on appelle les lois bills en Angleterre et bulles à Rome.

A la suite du clerc marchaient trois hommes en robes de pairs, le chapeau à plumes sur la tête.

Ces hommes étaient les commissaires royaux. Le premier était le lord haut-trésorier d'Angleterre, Godolphin, le second était le lord-président du conseil, Pembroke, le troisième était le lord du sceau privé, Newcastle.

Ils marchaient l'un derrière l'autre, selon la préséance, non de leur titre, mais de leur charge, Godolphin en tête, Newcastle le dernier, quoique duc.

Ils vinrent au banc devant le trône, firent la révérence à la chaise royale, ôtèrent et remirent leurs chapeaux, et s'assirent sur le banc.

Le lord-chancelier regarda l'huissier de la verge noire, et dit: — Mandez à la barre les communes.

L'huissier de la verge noire sortit.

Le clerc, qui était un clerc de la chambre des lords, posa sur la table, dans le carré des sacs de laine, le coussin où étaient les bills.

Il y eut une interruption qui dura quelques minutes. Deux door-keepers posèrent devant la barre un escabeau de trois degrés. Cet escabeau était de velours incarnat sur lequel des clous dorées dessinaient des fleurs de lys.

La grande porte, qui s'était refermée, se rouvrit, et une voix cria:

— Les fidèles communes d’Angleterre.

C’était l’huissier de la verge noire qui annonçait l’autre moiti du parlement.

Les lords mirent leurs chapeaux.

Les membres des communes entrèrent, précédés du speaker, tous tête nue.

Ils s’arrêtèrent à la barre. Ils étaient en habit de ville, la plupart en noir, avec l’épée.

Le speaker, très honorable John Smyth, écuyer, membre pour le bourg d’Andover, monta sur l’escabeau qui était au milieu de la barre. L’orateur des communes avait une longue simarre de satin noir à larges manches et à fentes galonnées de brandebourgs d’or par derrière et par devant, et moins de perruque que le lord-chancelier. Il était majestueux, mais inférieur.

Tous ceux des communes, orateur et membres, demeurèrent en attente, debout et nu-tête, devant les pairs assis et couverts.

On remarquait dans les communes le chef-justice de Chester, Joseph Jekyll, plus trois sergents en loi de sa majesté, Hooper, Powys et Parker, et James Montagu, solliciteur général, et l’attorney général, Simon Harcourt. A part quelques baronnets et chevaliers, et neuf lords de courtoisie, Hartington, Windsor, Woodstock, Mordaunt, Gramby, Scudamore, Fitz-Harding, Hyde, et Burkeley, fils de pairs et héritiers de pairies, tout le reste était du peuple. Sorte de sombre foule silencieuse.

Quand le bruit de pas de toute cette entrée eut cessé, le crieur de la verge noire, à la porte, dit:

— Oyez!

Le clerc de la couronne se leva. Il prit, déploya et lut le premier des parchemins posés sur le coussin. C’était un message de la reine nommant, pour la représenter en son parlement, avec pouvoir de sanctionner les bills, trois commissaires, savoir:

Ici le clerc haussa la voix.

— Sydney, comte de Godolphin.

Le clerc salua lord Godolphin. Lord Godolphin souleva son chapeau. Le clerc continua:

— ... Thomas Herbert, comte de Pembroke et de Montgomery.

Le clerc salua lord Pembroke. Lord Pembroke toucha son chapeau.

Le clerc reprit:

— ... John Hollis, duc de Newcastle.

Le clerc salua lord Newcastle. Lord Newcastle fit un signe de tête.

Le clerc de la couronne se rassit. Le clerc du parlement se leva. Son sous-clerc, qui était à genoux, se leva en arrière de lui. Tous deux faisant face au trône, et tournant le dos aux communes.

Il y avait sur le coussin cinq bills. Ces cinq bills, votés par les communes et consentis par les lords, attendaient la sanction royale.

Le clerc du parlement lut le premier bill.

C'était un acte des communes, qui mettait à la charge de l'état les embellissements faits par la reine à sa résidence de Hampton-Court, se montant à un million sterling.

Lecture faite, le clerc salua profondément le trône. Le sous-clerc répéta le salut plus profondément encore, puis tournant à demi la tête vers les communes, dit:

— La reine accepte vos bénévolences et ainsi le veut.

Le clerc lut le deuxième bill.

C'était une loi condamnant à la prison et à l'amende quiconque se soustrairait au service des trainbands. Les trainbands (troupe qu'on traîne où l'on veut) sont cette milice bourgeoise qui sert gratis et qui, sous Elisabeth, à l'approche de l'armada, avait donné cent quatrevingt-cinq mille fantassins et quarante mille cavaliers.

Les deux clercs firent à la chaise royale une nouvelle révérence; après quoi le sous-clerc, de profil, dit à la chambre des communes:

— La reine le veut.

Le troisième bill accroissait les dîmes et prébendes de l'évêch de Lichfield et de Coventry, qui est une des plus riches prélatures d'Angleterre, faisait une rente à la cathédrale, augmentait le nombre des chanoines et grossissait le doyenné et les bénéfices, «afin de pourvoir, disait le préambule, aux nécessités de notre sainte religion». Le quatrième bill ajoutait au budget de nouveaux impôts, un sur le papier marbré, un sur les carrosses de louage fixés au nombre de huit cents dans Londres et taxés cinquante-deux livres par an chaque, un sur les avocats, procureurs et solliciteurs, de quarante-huit livres par tête par an, un sur les peaux tannées, «nonobstant, disait le préambule, les doléances des artisans en cuir», un sur le savon, «nonobstant les réclamations de la ville d'Exeter et du Devonshire où l'on fabrique quantité de serge et de drap», un sur le vin, de quatre schellings par barrique, un sur la farine, un sur l'orge et le houblon, et renouvellement pour quatre ans, les besoins de l'état, disait le préambule, devant passer avant les remontrances du commerce, l’impôt du tonnage, variant de six livres tournois par tonneau pour les vaisseaux venant d’occident à dix-huit cents livres pour ceux venant d’orient Enfin le bill, déclarant insuffisante la capitation ordinaire déjà levée pour l’année courante, s’achevait par une surtaxe générale sur tout le royaume de quatre schellings ou quarante-huit sous tournois par tête de sujet, avec mention que ceux qui refuseraient de prêter les nouveaux serments au gouvernement paieraient le double de la taxe. Le cinquième bill faisait défense d’admettre à l’hôpital aucun malade s’il ne déposait en entrant une livre sterling pour payer, en cas de mort, son enterrement. Les trois derniers bills, comme les deux premiers, furent, l’un après l’autre, sanctionnés et faits lois par une salutation au trône et par les quatre mots du sous-clerc «la reine le veut» dits, par-dessus l’épaule, aux communes.

Puis le sous-clerc se remit à genoux devant le quatrième sac de laine, et le lord-chancelier dit:

— Soit fait comme il est désiré.

Ceci terminait la séance royale.

Le speaker, courbé en deux devant le chancelier, descendit reculons de l’escabeau, en rangeant sa robe derrière lui; ceux des communes s’inclinèrent jusqu’à terre, et, pendant que la chambre haute reprenait, sans faire attention à toutes ces révérences, son ordre du jour interrompu, la chambre basse s’en alla.

VII

LES TEMPÊTES D’HOMMES PIRES QUE LES TEMPETES D’OCÉANS

Les portes se refermèrent; l’huissier de la verge noire rentra; les lords commissaires quittèrent le banc d’état et vinrent s’asseoir en tête du banc des ducs, aux places de leurs charges, et le lord-chancelier prit la parole:

— Milords, la délibération de la chambre étant depuis plusieurs jours sur le bill qui propose d’augmenter de cent mille livres sterling la provision annuelle de son altesse royale le prince mari de sa majesté, le débat ayant été épuisé et clos, il va être procédé au vote. Le vote sera pris, selon l’usage, à partir du puîné du banc des barons. Chaque lord, à l’appel de son nom, se lèvera et répondra content ou non content, et sera libre d’exposer ses motifs de vote, s’il le juge à propos. Clerc, appelez le vote.

Le clerc du parlement, debout, ouvrit un large in-folio exhauss sur un pupitre doré, qui était le Livre de la Pairie.

Le puîné de la chambre à cette époque était lord John Hervey, créé baron et pair en 1703, duquel sont issus les marquis de Bristol.

Le clerc appela:

— Milord John, baron Hervey.

Un vieillard en perruque blonde se leva et dit:

— Content.

Puis se rassit.

Le sous-clerc enregistra le vote.

Le clerc continua:

— Milord Francis Seymour, baron Conway de Kiltultagh.

— Content, murmura en se soulevant à demi un élégant jeune homme à figure de page, qui ne se doutait point qu’il était le grand-père des marquis d’Hertford.

— Milord John Leveson, baron Gower, reprit le clerc.

Ce baron, d’où devaient sortir les ducs de Sutherland, se leva et dit en se rasseyant:

— Content.

Le clerc poursuivit:

— Milord Heneage Finch, baron Guernesey.

L’aïeul des comtes d’Aylesford, non moins jeune et non moins élégant que l’ancêtre des marquis d’Hertford, justifia sa devise Aperto vivere voto par la hauteur de son consentement.

— Content, cria-t-il.

Pendant qu’il se rasseyait, le clerc appelait le cinquième baron:

— Milord John, baron Granville.

— Content, répondit, tout de suite levé et rassis, lord Granville de Potheridge, dont la pairie sans avenir devait s’éteindre en 1709.

Le clerc passa au sixième.

— Milord Charles Mountague, baron Halifax.

— Content, dit lord Halifax, porteur d’un titre sous lequel s’était éteint le nom de Saville et devait s’éteindre le nom de Mountague. Mountague est distinct de Montagu et de Mountacute.

Et lord Halifax ajouta:

— Le prince Georges a une dotation comme mari de sa majesté; il en a une autre comme prince de Danemark, une autre comme duc de Cumberland, et une autre comme lord haut-amiral d’Angleterre et d’Irlande, mais il n’en a point comme généralissime. C’est l une injustice. Il faut faire cesser ce désordre, dans l’intérêt du peuple anglais.

Puis lord Halifax fit l’éloge de la religion chrétienne, blâma le papisme, et vota le subside.

Lord Halifax rassis, le clerc repartit:

— Milord Christoph, baron Barnard.

Lord Barnard, de qui devaient naître les ducs de Cleveland, se leva à l’appel de son nom.

— Content.

Et il mit quelque lenteur à se rasseoir, ayant un rabat de dentelle qui valait la peine d’être remarqué. C’était du reste un digne gentilhomme et un vaillant officier que lord Barnard.

Tandis que lord Barnard se rasseyait, le clerc, qui lisait de routine, eut quelque hésitation. Il raffermit ses lunettes et se pencha sur le registre avec un redoublement d’attention, puis, redressant la tête, il dit:

— Milord Fermain Clancharlie, baron Clancharlie et Hunkerville.

Gwynplaine se leva:

— Non content, dit-il.

Toutes les têtes se tournèrent. Gwynplaine était debout. Les gerbes de chandelles placées des deux côtés du trône éclairaient vivement sa face, et la faisaient saillir dans la vaste salle obscure avec le relief qu'aurait un masque sur un fond de fumée.

Gwynplaine avait fait sur lui cet effort qui, on s'en souvient, lui était, à la rigueur, possible. Par une concentration de volonté égale à celle qu'il faudrait pour dompter un tigre, il avait réussi à ramener pour un moment au sérieux le fatal rictus de son visage. Pour l'instant, il ne riait pas. Cela ne pouvait durer longtemps; les désobéissances à ce qui est notre loi, ou notre fatalité, sont courtes; parfois l'eau de la mer résiste la gravitation, s'enfle en trombe et fait une montagne, mais à la condition de retomber. Cette lutte était celle de Gwynplaine.

Pour une minute qu'il sentait solennelle, par une prodigieuse intensité de volonté, mais pour pas beaucoup plus de temps qu'un éclair, il avait jeté sur son front le sombre voile de son âme; il tenait en suspens son incurable rire; de cette face qu'on lui avait sculptée, il avait retiré la joie. Il n'était plus qu'effrayant.

— Qu'est cet homme? ce fut le cri.

Un frémissement indescriptible courut sur tous les bancs. Ces cheveux en forêt, ces enfoncements noirs sous les sourcils, ce regard profond d'un oeil qu'on ne voyait pas, le modelé farouche de cette tête mêlant hideusement l'ombre et la lumière, ce fut surprenant. Cela dépassait tout. On avait eu beau parler de Gwynplaine, le voir fut formidable. Ceux mêmes qui s'y attendaient ne s'y attendaient pas. Qu'on s'imagine, sur la montagne réservée aux dieux, dans la fête d'une soirée sereine, toute la troupe des tout-puissants réunie, et la face de Prométhée, ravagée par les coups de bec du vautour, apparaissant tout à coup comme une lune sanglante à l'horizon. L'Olympe apercevant le Caucase, quelle vision! Vieux et jeunes, béants, regardèrent Gwynplaine.

Un vieillard vénéré de toute la chambre, qui avait vu beaucoup d'hommes et beaucoup de choses, et qui était désigné pour être duc, Thomas, comte de Warton, se leva effrayé.

— Qu'est-ce que cela veut dire? cria-t-il. Qui a introduit cet homme dans la chambre? Qu'on mette cet homme dehors.

Et apostrophant Gwynplaine avec hauteur:

— Qui êtes-vous? d'où sortez-vous?

Gwynplaine répondit:

— Du gouffre.

Et, croisant les bras, il regarda les lords.

— Qui je suis? je suis la misère. Milords, j’ai à vous parler.

II y eut un frisson, et un silence. Gwynplainc continua.

— Milords, vous êtes en haut. C’est bien. Il faut croire que Dieu a ses raisons pour cela. Vous avez le pouvoir, l’opulence, la joie, le soleil immobile à votre zénith, l’autorité sans borne, la jouissance sans partage, l’immense oubli des autres.

Soit. Mais il y a au-dessous de vous quelque chose. Au-dessus peut-être. Milords, je viens vous apprendre une nouvelle. Le genre humain existe.

Les assemblées sont comme les enfants; les incidents sont leur boîte à surprises, et elles en ont la peur, et le goût. Il semble parfois qu’un ressort joue, et l’on voit jaillir du trou un diable. Ainsi en France Mirabeau, difforme lui aussi.

Gwynplaine en ce moment sentait en lui un grandissement étrange.

Un groupe d’hommes à qui l’on parle, c’est un trépied. On est, pour ainsi dire, debout sur une cime d’âmes. On a sous son talon un tressaillement d’entrailles humaines. Gwynplaine n’était plus l’homme qui, la nuit précédente, avait été, un instant, presque petit. Les fumées de cette élévation subite, qui l’avaient troublé, s’étaient allégées et avaient pris de la transparence, et là où Gwynplaine avait été séduit par une vanité, il voyait maintenant une fonction. Ce qui l’avait d’abord amoindri, présent le rehaussait. Il était illuminé d’un de ces grands éclairs qui viennent du devoir.

On cria de toutes parts autour de Gwynplaine:

— Écoutez! Écoutez!

Lui cependant, crispé et surhumain, réussissait à maintenir sur son visage la contraction sévère et lugubre, sous laquelle se cabrait le rictus, comme un cheval sauvage prêt à s’échapper. Il reprit:

— Je suis celui qui vient des profondeurs. Milords, vous êtes les grands et les riches. C’est périlleux. Vous profitez de la nuit. Mais prenez garde, il y a une grande puissance, l’aurore.

L’aube ne peut être vaincue. Elle arrivera. Elle arrive. Elle a en elle le jet du jour irrésistible. Et qui empêchera cette fronde de jeter le soleil dans le ciel? Le soleil, c’est le droit. Vous, vous êtes le privilège. Ayez peur. Le vrai maître de la maison va frapper à la porte. Quel est le père du privilège? le hasard. Et quel est son fils? l’abus. Ni le hasard ni l’abus ne sont solides. Ils ont l’un et l’autre un mauvais lendemain. Je viens vous avertir. Je viens vous dénoncer votre bonheur. Il est fait du malheur d’autrui. Vous avez tout, et ce tout se compose du rien des autres. Milords, je suis l’avocat désespéré, et je plaide la cause perdue. Cette cause, Dieu la regagnera. Moi, je ne suis rien, qu’une voix. Le genre humain est une bouche, et j’en suis le cri. Vous m’entendrez. Je viens ouvrir devant vous, pairs d’Angleterre, les grandes assises du peuple, ce souverain, qui est le patient, ce condamné, qui est le juge. Je plie sous ce que j’ai à dire.

Par où commencer? Je ne sais. J’ai ramassé dans la vaste diffusion des souffrances mon énorme plaidoirie éparse. Qu’en faire maintenant? elle m’accable, et je la jette pêle-mêle devant moi. Avais-je prévu ceci? non. Vous êtes étonnés, moi aussi. Hier j’étais un bateleur, aujourd’hui je suis un lord.

Jeux profonds. De qui? de l’inconnu. Tremblons tous. Milords, tout l’azur est de votre côté. De cet immense univers, vous ne voyez que la fête; sachez qu’il y a de l’ombre. Parmi vous je m’appelle lord Fermain Clancharlie, mais mon vrai nom est un nom de pauvre, Gwynplaine. Je suis un misérable taillé dans l’étoffe des grands par un roi, dont ce fut le bon plaisir. Voilà mon histoire. Plusieurs d’entre vous ont connu mon père, je ne l’ai pas connu. C’est par son côté féodal qu’il vous touche, et moi je lui adhère par son côté proscrit. Ce que Dieu a fait est bien. J’ai été jeté au gouffre. Dans quel but? pour que j’en visse le fond. Je suis un plongeur, et je rapporte la perle, la vérité. Je parle, parce que je sais. Vous m’entendrez, milords.

J’ai éprouvé. J’ai vu. La souffrance, non, ce n’est pas un mot, messieurs les heureux. La pauvreté, j’y ai grandi; l’hiver, j’y ai grelotté; la famine, j’en ai goûté; le mépris, je l’ai subi; la peste, je l’ai eue; la honte, je l’ai bue. Et je la revomirai devant vous, et ce vomissement de toutes les misères éclaboussera vos pieds et flamboiera. J’ai hésité avant de me laisser amener à cette place où je suis, car j’ai ailleurs d’autres devoirs. Et ce n’est pas ici qu’est mon coeur. Ce qui s’est passé en moi ne vous regarde pas; quand l’homme que vous nommez l’huissier de la verge noire est venu me chercher de la part de la femme que vous nommez la reine, j’ai eu un moment l’idée de refuser. Mais il m’a semblé que l’obscure main de Dieu me poussait de ce côté, et j’ai obéi. J’ai senti qu’il fallait que je vinsse parmi vous.

Pourquoi? à cause de mes haillons d’hier. C’est pour prendre la parole parmi les rassasiés que Dieu m’avait mêlé aux affamés.

Oh! ayez pitié! Oh! ce fatal monde dont vous croyez être, vous ne le connaissez point; si haut, vous êtes dehors; je vous dirai moi, ce que c'est. De l'expérience, j'en ai. J'arrive de dessous la pression. Je puis vous dire ce que vous pesez. O vous les maîtres, ce que vous êtes, le savez-vous? Ce que vous faites, le voyez-vous? Non. Ah! tout est terrible. Une nuit, une nuit de tempête, tout petit, abandonné, orphelin, seul dans la création démesurée, j'ai fait mon entrée dans cette obscurit que vous appelez la société. La première chose que j'ai vue, c'est la loi, sous la forme d'un gibet; la deuxième, c'est la richesse, c'est votre richesse, sous la forme d'une femme morte de froid et de faim; la troisième, c'est l'avenir, sous la forme d'un enfant agonisant; la quatrième, c'est le bon, le vrai, et le juste, sous la figure d'un vagabond n'ayant pour compagnon et pour ami qu'un loup.

En ce moment, Gwynplaine, pris d'une émotion poignante, sentit lui monter à la gorge les sanglots.

Ce qui fit, chose sinistre, qu'il éclata de rire.

La contagion fut immédiate. Il y avait sur l'assemblée un nuage; il pouvait crever en épouvante; il creva en joie. Le rire, cette démence épanouie, prit toute la chambre. Les cénacles d'hommes souverains ne demandent pas mieux que de bouffonner. Ils se vengent ainsi de leur sérieux.

Un rire de rois ressemble à un rire de dieux; cela a toujours une pointe cruelle. Les lords se mirent à jouer. Le ricanement aiguisa le rire. On battit des mains autour de celui qui parlait, et on l'outragea. Un pêle-mêle d'interjections joyeuses l'assaillit, grêle gaie et meurtrissante.

— Bravo, Gwynplaine! — Bravo, l'Homme qui Rit! — Bravo, le museau de la Green-Box! — Bravo, la hure du Tarrinzeau-field! — Tu viens nous donner une représentation. C'est bon! bavarde! — En voil un qui m'amuse! — Mais rit-il bien, cet animal-là! — Bonjour, pantin! — Salut à lord Clown! — Harangue, va! — C'est un pair d'Angleterre, ça! — Continue! — Non! non! — Si! si!

Le lord-chancelier était assez mal à son aise.

Un lord sourd, James Butler, duc d'Ormond, faisant de sa main son oreille un cornet acoustique, demandait à Charles Beauclerk, duc de Saint-Albans:

— Comment a-t-il voté?

Saint-Albans répondait:

— Non content.

— Parbleu, disait Ormond, je le crois bien. Avec ce visage-là!

Une foule échappée — et les assemblées sont des foules — ressaisissez-la donc. L'éloquence est un mors; si le mors casse, l'auditoire s'emporte, et rue jusqu'à ce qu'il ait désarçonné l'orateur. L'auditoire hait l'orateur. On ne sait pas assez cela. Se raidir sur la bride semble une ressource, et n'en est pas une. Tout orateur l'essaie. C'est l'instinct.

Gwynplaine l'essaya.

Il considéra un moment ces hommes qui riaient.

— Alors, cria-t-il, vous insultez la misère. Silence, pairs d'Angleterre! juges, écoutez la plaidoirie. Oh! je vous en conjure, ayez pitié! Pitié pour qui? Pitié pour vous. Qui est en danger? C'est vous. Est-ce que vous ne voyez pas que vous êtes dans une balance et qu'il y a dans un plateau votre puissance et dans l'autre votre responsabilité? Dieu vous pèse.

Oh! ne riez pas. Méditez. Cette oscillation de la balance de Dieu, c'est le tremblement de la conscience. Vous n'êtes pas méchants. Vous êtes des hommes comme les autres, ni meilleurs, ni pires. Vous vous croyez des dieux, soyez malades demain, et regardez frissonner dans la fièvre votre divinité. Nous nous valons tous. Je m'adresse aux esprits honnêtes, il y en a ici; je m'adresse aux intelligences élevées, il y en a; je m'adresse aux âmes généreuses, il y en a. Vous êtes pères, fils et frères, donc vous êtes souvent attendris. Celui de vous qui a regardé ce matin le réveil de son petit enfant est bon. Les coeurs sont les mêmes. L'humanité n'est pas autre chose qu'un coeur. Entre ceux qui oppriment et ceux qui sont opprimés, il n'y a de différence que l'endroit où ils sont situés. Vos pieds marchent sur des têtes, ce n'est pas votre faute. C'est la faute de la Babel sociale. Construction manquée, toute en surplombs. Un étage accable l'autre. Écoutez-moi, je vais vous dire. Oh! puisque vous êtes puissants, soyez fraternels; puisque vous êtes grands, soyez doux. Si vous saviez ce que j'ai vu! Hélas! en bas, quel tourment! Le genre humain est au cachot. Que de damnés, qui sont des innocents! Le jour manque, l'air manque, la vertu manque; on n'espère pas; et, ce qui est redoutable, on attend.

Rendez-vous compte de ces détresses. Il y a des êtres qui vivent dans la mort. Il y a des petites filles qui commencent à huit ans par la prostitution et qui finissent à vingt ans par la vieillesse. Quant aux sévérités pénales, elles sont épouvantables. Je parle un peu au hasard, et je ne choisis pas.

Je dis ce qui me vient à l'esprit. Pas plus tard qu'hier, moi qui suis ici, j'ai vu un homme enchaîné et nu, avec des pierres sur le ventre, expirer dans là torture. Savez-vous cela? non.

Si vous saviez ce qui se passe, aucun de vous n’oserait être heureux. Qui est-ce qui est allé à Newcastle-on-Tyne? Il y a dans les mines des hommes qui mâchent du charbon pour s’emplir l’estomac et tromper la faim. Tenez, dans le comté de Lancastre, Ribblechester, à force d’indigence, de ville est devenue village.

Je ne trouve pas que le prince Georges de Danemark ait besoin de cent mille guinées de plus. J’aimerais mieux recevoir l’hôpital l’indigent malade sans lui faire payer d’avance son enterrement. En Caernarvon, à Traith-maur comme à Traith-bichan, l’épuisement des pauvres est horrible. A Strafford, on ne peut dessécher le marais, faute d’argent. Les fabriques de draperie sont fermées dans tout le Lancashire. Chômage partout.

Savez-vous que les pêcheurs de hareng de Harlech mangent de l’herbe quand la pèche manque? Savez-vous qu’à Burton-Lazers il y a encore des lépreux traqués, et auxquels on tire des coups de fusil s’ils sortent de leurs tanières? A Ailesbury, ville dont un de vous est lord, la disette est en permanence. A Penckridge en Coventry, dont vous venez de doter la cathédrale et d’enrichir l’évêque, on n’a pas de lits dans les cabanes, et l’on creuse des trous dans la terre pour y coucher les petits enfants, de sorte qu’au lieu de commencer par le berceau, ils commencent par la tombe. J’ai vu ces choses-là. Milords, les impôts que vous votez, savez-vous qui les paie? Ceux qui expirent. Hélas! vous vous trompez. Vous faites fausse route. Vous augmentez la pauvreté du pauvre pour augmenter la richesse du riche. C’est le contraire qu’il faudrait faire. Quoi, prendre au travailleur pour donner à l’oisif, prendre au déguenillé pour donner au repu, prendre à l’indigent pour donner au prince! Oh, oui, j’ai du vieux sang républicain dans les veines. J’ai horreur de cela.

Ces rois, je les exècre! Et que les femmes sont effrontées! On m’a conté une triste histoire. Oh! je hais Charles II! Une femme que mon père avait aimée s’est donnée à ce roi, pendant que mon père mourait en exil, la prostituée! Charles II, Jacques II; après un vaurien, un scélérat! Qu’y a-t-il dans le roi? un homme, un faible et chétif sujet des besoins et des infirmités.

A quoi bon le roi? Cette royauté parasite, vous la gavez. Ce ver de terre, vous le faites boa. Ce ténia, vous le faites dragon. Grâce pour les pauvres! Vous alourdissez l’impôt au profit du trône. Prenez garde aux lois que vous décrétez.

Prenez garde au fourmillement douloureux que vous écrasez.

Baissez les yeux. Regardez à vos pieds. O grands, il y a des petits! ayez pitié. Oui! pitié de vous! car les multitudes agonisent, et le bas en mourant fait mourir le haut. La mort est une cessation qui n'excepte aucun membre. Quand la nuit vient, personne ne garde son coin de jour. Êtes-vous égoïstes? sauvez les autres. La perdition du navire n'est indifférente à aucun passager. Il n'y a pas naufrage de ceux-ci sans qu'il y ait engloutissement de ceux-là. Oh! sachez-le, l'abîme est pour tous.

Le rire redoubla, irrésistible. Du reste, pour égayer une assemblée, il suffisait de ce que ces paroles avaient d'extravagant.

Être comique au dehors, et tragique au dedans, pas de souffrance plus humiliante, pas de colère plus profonde. Gwynplaine avait cela en lui. Ses paroles voulaient agir dans un sens, son visage agissait dans l'autre; situation affreuse. Sa voix eut tout coup des éclats stridents.

— Ils sont joyeux, ces hommes! C'est bon. L'ironie fait face l'agonie. Le ricanement outrage le râle. Ils sont tout-puissants! C'est possible. Soit. On verra. Ah! je suis un des leurs. Je suis aussi un des vôtres, ô vous les pauvres!

Un roi m'a vendu, un pauvre m'a recueilli. Qui m'a mutilé? Un prince. Qui m'a guéri et nourri? Un meurt-de-faim. Je suis lord Clancharlie, mais je reste Gwynplaine. Je tiens aux grands, et j'appartiens aux petits. Je suis parmi ceux qui jouissent et avec ceux qui souffrent. Ah! cette société est fausse. Un jour viendra la société vraie. Alors il n'y aura plus de seigneurs, il y aura des vivants libres. Il n'y aura plus de maîtres, il y aura des pères. Ceci est l'avenir. Plus de prosternement, plus de bassesse, plus d'ignorance, plus d'hommes bêtes de somme, plus de courtisans, plus de valets, plus de rois, la lumière! En attendant, me voici. J'ai un droit, j'en use. Est-ce un droit?

Non, si j'en use pour moi. Oui, si j'en use pour tous. Je parlerai aux lords, en étant un. O mes frères d'en bas, je leur dirai votre dénûment. Je me dresserai avec la poignée des haillons du peuple dans la main, et je secouerai sur les maîtres la misère des esclaves, et ils ne pourront plus, eux les favorisés et les arrogants, se débarrasser du souvenir des infortunés, et se délivrer, eux les princes, de la cuisson des pauvres, et tant pis si c'est de la vermine, et tant mieux si elle tombe sur des lions!

Ici Gwynplaine se tourna vers les sous-clercs agenouillés qui écrivaient sur le quatrième sac de laine.

— Qu’est-ce que c’est que ces gens qui sont à genoux? Qu’est-ce que vous faites là? Levez-vous, vous êtes des hommes.

Cette brusque apostrophe à des subalternes qu’un lord ne doit pas même apercevoir, mit le comble aux joies. On avait crié bravo, on cria hurrah! Du battement des mains on passa au trépignement.

On eût pu se croire à la Green-Box. Seulement, à la Green-Box le rire fêtait Gwynplaine, ici il l’exterminait. Tuer, c’est l’effort du ridicule. Le rire des hommes fait quelquefois tout ce qu’il peut pour assassiner.

Le rire était devenu une voie de fait. Les quolibets pleuvaient.

C’est la bêtise des assemblées d’avoir de l’esprit. Leur ricanement ingénieux et imbécile écarte les faits au lieu de les étudier et condamne les questions au lieu de les résoudre. Un incident est un point d’interrogation. En rire, c’est rire de l’énigme. Le sphinx, qui ne rit pas, est derrière.

On entendait des clameurs contradictoires:

— Assez! assez! — Encore! encore!

William Farmer, baron Leimpster, jetait à Gwynplaine l’affront de Ryc-Quiney à Shakespeare:

— Histrio! mima!

Lord Vaughan, homme sentencieux, le vingt-neuvième du banc des barons, s’écriait:

— Nous revoici au temps où les animaux péroraient. Au milieu des bouches humaines, une mâchoire bestiale a la parole.

— Écoutons l’âne de Balaam, ajoutait lord Yarmouth.

Lord Yarmouth avait l’air sagace que donne un nez rond et une bouche de travers.

— Le rebelle Linnaeus est châtié dans son tombeau. Le fils est la punition du père, disait John Hough, évêque de Lichfield et de Coventry, dont Gwynplaine avait effleuré la prébende.

— Il ment, affirmait lord Cholmley, le législateur légiste. Ce qu’il appelle la torture, c’est la peine forte et dure, très bonne peine. La torture n’existe pas en Angleterre.

Thomas Wentworth, baron Raby, apostrophait le chancelier.

— Milord chancelier, levez la séance!

— Non! non! non! qu’il continue! il nous amuse! hurrah! hep! hep! hep!

Ainsi criaient les jeunes lords; leur gaîté était de la fureur.

Quatre surtout étaient en pleine exaspération d’hilarité et de haine. C’étaient

Laurence Hyde, comte de Rochester, Thomas Tufton, comte de Thanet, et le vicomte de Hatton, et le duc de Montagu.

— A la niche, Gwynplaine! disait Rochester.

— A bas! à bas! à bas! criait Thanet.

Le vicomte Hatton tirait de sa poche un penny, et le jetait Gwynplaine.

Et John Campbell, comte de Greenwich, Savage, comte Rivers, Thompson, baron Haversham, Warrigton, Escrik, Rolleston, Rockingham, Carteret, Langdale, Banester Maynard, Hundson, Caernarvon, Cavendish, Burlington, Robert Darcy, comte de Holderness, Other Windsor, comte de Plymouth, applaudissaient.

Tumulte de pandémonium ou de panthéon dans lequel se perdaient les paroles de Gwynplaine. On n'y distinguait que ce mot: Prenez garde!

Ralph, duc de Montagu, récemment sorti d'Oxford et ayant encore sa première moustache, descendit du banc des ducs où il siégeait dix-neuvième, et alla se poser les bras croisés en face de Gwynplaine. Il y a dans une lame l'endroit qui coupe le plus et dans une voix l'accent qui insulte le mieux. Montagu prit cet accent-là, et, ricanant au nez de Gwynplaine, lui cria:

— Qu'est-ce que tu dis?

— Je prédis, répondit Gwynplaine.

Le rire fit explosion de nouveau. Et sous ce rire grondait la colère en basse continue. Un des pairs mineurs, Lionel Cranseild Sackville, comte de Dorset et de Middlesex, se leva debout sur son banc, ne riant pas, grave comme il sied à un futur législateur, et, sans dire un mot, regarda Gwynplaine avec son frais visage de douze ans en haussant les épaules. Ce qui fit que l'évêque de Saint-Asaph se pencha à l'oreille de l'évêque de Saint-David assis à côté de lui, et lui dit, en montrant Gwynplaine: — Voilà le fou! et en montrant l'enfant: Voilà le sage!

Du chaos des ricanements se dégageaient des exclamations confuses, — Face de gorgone! — Que signifie cette aventure? — Insulte à la Chambre! — Quelle exception qu'un tel homme! — Honte! honte! — Qu'on lève la séance! — Non! qu'il achève! — Parle, bouffon!

Lord Lewis de Duras, les mains sur les hanches, criait: — Ah! que c'est bon de rire! ma rate est heureuse. Je propose un vote d'actions de grâces ainsi conçu: La Chambre des lords remercie la Green-Box.

Gwynplaine, on s'en souvient, avait rêvé un autre accueil.

Qui a gravi dans le sable une pente à pic toute friable au-dessus d'une profondeur vertigineuse, qui a senti sous ses mains, sous ses ongles, sous ses coudes, sous ses genoux, sous ses pieds, fuir et se dérober le point d'appui, qui, reculant au lieu d'avancer sur cet escarpement réfractaire, en proie à l'angoisse du glissement, s'enfonçant au lieu de gravir, descendant au lieu de monter, augmentant la certitude du naufrage par l'effort vers le sommet, et se perdant un peu plus à chaque mouvement pour se tirer de péril, a senti l'approche formidable de l'abîme, et a eu dans les os le froid sombre de la chute, gueule ouverte au-dessous de vous, celui-là a éprouvé ce qu'éprouvait Gwynplaine.

Il sentait son ascension crouler sous lui, et son auditoire était un précipice.

Il y a toujours quelqu'un qui dit le mot où tout se résume.

Lord Scarsdale traduisit en un cri l'impression de l'assemblée:

— Qu'est-ce que ce monstre vient faire ici?

Gwynplaine se dressa, éperdu et indigné, dans une sorte de convulsion suprême. Il les regarda tous fixement.

— Ce que je viens faire ici? Je viens être terrible. Je suis un monstre, dites-vous. Non, je suis le peuple. Je suis une exception? Non, je suis tout le monde. L'exception, c'est vous.

Vous êtes la chimère, et je suis la réalité. Je suis l'Homme.

Je suis l'effrayant Homme qui Rit. Qui rit de quoi? De vous.

De lui. De tout. Qu'est-ce que son rire? Votre crime, et son supplice. Ce crime, il vous le jette à la face; ce supplice, il vous le crache au visage. Je ris, cela veut dire: Je pleure.

Il s'arrêta. On se taisait. Les rires continuaient, mais bas.

Il put croire à une certaine reprise d'attention. Il respira, et poursuivit:

— Ce rire qui est sur mon front, c'est un roi qui l'y a mis. Ce rire exprime la désolation universelle. Ce rire veut dire haine, silence contraint, rage, désespoir. Ce rire est un produit des tortures. Ce rire est un rire de force. Si Satan avait ce rire, ce rire condamnerait Dieu. Mais l'éternel ne ressemble point aux périssables; étant l'absolu, il est le juste; et Dieu hait ce que font les rois. Ah! vous me prenez pour une exception! Je suis un symbole. O tout-puissants imbéciles que vous êtes, ouvrez les yeux. J'incarne tout. Je représente l'humanité telle que ses maîtres l'ont faite. L'homme est un mutilé. Ce qu'on m'a fait, on l'a fait au genre humain. On lui a déformé le droit, la justice, la vérité, la raison, l'intelligence, comme à moi les yeux, les narines et les oreilles; comme à moi, on lui a mis au coeur un cloaque de colère et de douleur, et sur la face un masque de contentement. Où s'était posé le doigt de Dieu, s'est appuyée la griffe du roi. Monstrueuse superposition. Évêques, pairs et princes, le peuple, c'est le souffrant profond qui rit la surface. Milords, je vous le dis, le peuple, c'est moi.

Aujourd'hui, vous l'opprimez, aujourd'hui vous me huez. Mais l'avenir, c'est le dégel sombre. Ce qui était pierre devient flot. L'apparence solide se change en submersion. Un craquement, et tout est dit. Il viendra une heure où une convulsion brisera votre oppression, où un rugissement répliquera à vos huées. Cette heure est déjà venue, — tu en étais, ô mon père! — cette heure de Dieu est venue, et s'est appelée République, on l'a chassée, elle reviendra. En attendant, souvenez-vous que la série des rois armés de l'épée est interrompue par Cromwell armé de la hache. Tremblez. Les incorruptibles solutions approchent, les ongles coupés repoussent, les langues arrachées s'envolent, et deviennent des langues de feu éparses au vent des ténèbres, et hurlent dans l'infini; ceux qui ont faim montrent leurs dents oisives, les paradis bâtis sur les enfers chancellent, on souffre, on souffre, on souffre, et ce qui est en haut penche, et ce qui est en bas s'entr'ouvre, l'ombre demande à devenir lumière, le damné discute l'élu, c'est le peuple qui vient, vous dis-je, c'est l'homme qui monte, c'est la fin qui commence, c'est la rouge aurore de la catastrophe, et voilà ce qu'il y a dans ce rire, dont vous riez!

Londres est une fête perpétuelle. Soit. L'Angleterre est d'un bout à l'autre une acclamation. Oui. Mais écoutez: Tout ce que vous voyez, c'est moi. Vous avez des fêtes, c'est mon rire.

Vous avez des joies publiques, c'est mon rire. Vous avez des mariages, des sacres et des couronnements, c'est mon rire. Vous avez des naissances de princes, c'est mon rire. Vous avez au-dessus de vous le tonnerre, c'est mon rire.

Le moyen de tenir à de telles choses! le rire recommença, cette fois accablant. De toutes les laves que jette la bouche humaine, ce cratère, la plus corrosive, c'est la joie. Faire du mal joyeusement, aucune foule ne résiste à cette contagion. Toutes les exécutions ne se font pas sur des échafauds, et les hommes, dès qu'ils sont réunis, qu'ils soient multitude ou assemblée, ont toujours au milieu d'eux un bourreau tout prêt, qui est le sarcasme. Pas de supplice comparable à celui du misérable risible. Ce supplice, Gwynplaine le subissait. L’allégresse, sur lui, était lapidation et mitraille. Il était hochet et mannequin, tête de turc, cible. On bondissait, on criait bis, on se roulait. On battait du pied. On s’empoignait au rabat. La majesté du lieu, la pourpre des robes, la pudeur des hermines, l’in-folio des perruques, n’y faisait rien. Les lords riaient, les évoques riaient, les juges riaient. Le banc des vieillards se déridait, le banc des enfants se tordait. L’archevêque de Canterbury poussait du coude l’archevêque d’York. Henry Compton, évêque de Londres, frère du comte de Northampton, se tenait les côtes. Le lord-chancelier baissait les yeux pour cacher son rire probable. Et à la barre, la statue du respect, l’huissier de la verge noire, riait.

Gwynplaine, pâle, avait croisé les bras; et, entouré de toutes ces figures, jeunes et vieilles, où rayonnait la grande jubilation homérique, dans ce tourbillon de battements de mains, de trépignements et de hourras, dans cette frénésie bouffonne dont il était le centre, dans ce splendide épanchement d’hilarité, au milieu de cette gaîté énorme, il avait en lui le sépulcre. C’était fini. Il ne pouvait plus maîtriser ni sa face qui le trahissait, ni son auditoire que l’insultait.

Jamais l’éternelle loi fatale, le grotesque cramponné au sublime, le rire répercutant le rugissement, la parodie en croupe du désespoir, le contre-sens entre ce qu’on semble et ce qu’on est, n’avait éclaté avec plus d’horreur. Jamais lueur plus sinistre n’avait éclairé la profonde nuit humaine.

Gwynplaine assistait à l’effraction définitive de sa destinée par un éclat de rire. L’irrémédiable était là. On se relève tombé, on ne se relève pas pulvérisé. Cette moquerie inepte et souveraine le mettait en poussière. Rien de possible désormais.

Tout est selon le milieu. Ce qui était triomphe à la Green-Box était chute et catastrophe à la chambre des lords.

L’applaudissement là-bas était ici imprécation. Il sentait quelque chose comme le revers de son masque. D’un côté de ce masque, il y avait la sympathie du peuple acceptant Gwynplaine, de l’autre la haine des grands rejetant lord Fermain Clancharlie.

D’un côté l’attraction, de l’autre la répulsion, toutes deux le ramenant vers l’ombre. Il se sentait comme frappé par derrière.

Le sort a des coups de trahison. Tout s’expliquera plus tard, mais, en attendant, la destinée est piège et l’homme tombe dans des chausse-trapes. Il avait cru monter, ce rire l’accueillait; les apothéoses ont des aboutissements lugubres. Il y a un mot sombre, être dégrisé. Sagesse tragique, celle qui naît de l’ivresse. Gwynplaine, enveloppé de cette tempête gaie et féroce, songeait.

A vau-l’eau, c’est le fou rire. Une assemblée en gaité, c’est la boussole perdue. On ne savait plus où l’on allait, ni ce qu’on faisait. Il fallut lever la séance.

Le lord-chancelier, «attendu l’incident», ajourna la suite du vote au lendemain. La chambre se sépara. Les lords firent la révérence à la chaise royale et s’en allèrent. On entendit les rires se prolonger et se perdre dans les couloirs. Les assemblées, outre leurs portes officielles, ont dans les tapisseries, dans les reliefs et dans les moulures, toutes sortes de portes dérobées par où elles se vident comme un vase par des fêlures. En peu de temps, la salle fut déserte. Cela se fait très vite, et presque sans transition. Ces lieux de tumulte sont tout de suite repris par le silence.

L’enfoncement dans la rêverie mène loin, et l’on finit, à force de songer, par être comme dans une autre planète. Gwynplaine tout à coup eut une sorte de réveil. Il était seul. La salle était vide. Il n’avait pas même vu que la séance avait ét levée. Tous les pairs avaient disparu, même ses deux parrains.

Il n’y avait plus çà et là que quelques bas officiers de la chambre attendant pour mettre les housses et éteindre les lampes que «sa seigneurie» fût partie. Il mit machinalement son chapeau sur sa tête, sortit de son banc, et se dirigea vers la grande porte ouverte sur la galerie. Au moment où il franchit la coupure de la barre, un door-keeper le débarrassa de sa robe de pair. Il s’en aperçut à peine. Un instant après, il était dans la galerie.

Les hommes de service qui étaient là remarquèrent avec étonnement que ce lord était sorti sans saluer le trône.

VIII

SERAIT BON FRÈRE S’IL N’ÉTAIT BON FILS

Il n’y avait plus personne dans la galerie. Gwynplaine traversa le rond-point, d’où l’on avait enlevé le fauteuil et les tables, et où il ne restait plus trace de son investiture. Des candélabres et des lustres de distance en distance indiquaient l’itinéraire de sortie.

Grâce à ce cordon de lumière, il put aisément retrouver, dans l’enchaînement des salons et des galeries, la route qu’il avait suivie en arrivant avec le roi d’armes et l’huissier de la verge noire. Il ne faisait aucune rencontre, si ce n’est ça et l quelque vieux lord tardigrade s’en allant pesamment et tournant le dos.

Tout à coup, dans le silence de toutes ces grandes salles désertes, des éclats de parole indistincts arrivèrent jusqu’ lui, sorte de tapage nocturne singulier en un tel lieu. Il se dirigea du côté où il entendait ce bruit, et brusquement il se trouva dans un spacieux vestibule faiblement éclairé qui était une des issues de la chambre. On apercevait une large porte vitrée ouverte, un perron, des laquais et des flambeaux; on voyait dehors une place; quelques carrosses attendaient au bas du perron.

C’est de là que venait le bruit qu’il avait entendu.

En dedans de la porte, sous le réverbère du vestibule, il y avait un groupe tumultueux et un orage de gestes et de voix.

Gwynplaine, dans la pénombre, approcha.

C’était une querelle. D’un côté il y avait dix ou douze jeunes lords voulant sortir, de l’autre un homme, le chapeau sur la tête comme eux, droit et le front haut, et leur barrant le passage.

Qui était cet homme? Tom-Jim-Jack.

Quelques-uns de ces lords étaient encore en robe de pair; d’autres avaient quitté l’habit de parlement et étaient en habit de ville.

Tom-Jim-Jack avait un chapeau à plumes, non blanches, comme les pairs, mais vertes et frisées d’orange; il était brodé et galonn de la tête aux pieds, avec des flots de rubans et de dentelles aux manches et au cou, et il maniait fiévreusement de son poing gauche la poignée d’une épée qu’il portait en civadière, et dont le baudrier et le fourreau étaient passementés d’ancres d’amiral.

C’était lui qui parlait, il apostrophait tous ces jeunes lords, et Gwynplaine entendit ceci:

— Je vous ai dit que vous étiez des lâches. Vous voulez que je retire mes paroles. Soit. Vous n’êtes pas des lâches. Vous êtes des idiots. Vous vous êtes mis tous contre un. Ce n’est pas couardise. Bon. Alors c’est ineptie. On vous a parlé, vous n’avez pas compris. Ici, les vieux sont sourds de l’oreille, et les jeunes, de l’intelligence. Je suis assez un des vôtres pour vous dire vos vérités. Ce nouveau venu est étrange, et il a débité un tas de folies, j’en conviens, mais dans ces folies il y avait des choses vraies. C’était confus, indigeste, mal dit; soit; il a répété trop souvent savez-vous, savez-vous; mais un homme qui était hier grimacier de la foire n’est pas forcé de parler comme Aristote et comme le docteur Gilbert Burnet évêque de Sarum. La vermine, les lions, l’apostrophe au sous-clerc, tout cela était de mauvais goût. Parbleu! qui vous dit le contraire? C’était une harangue insensée et décousue et qui allait tout de travers, mais il en sortait ça et là des faits réels. C’est déjà beaucoup de parler comme cela quand on n’en fait pas son métier, je voudrais vous y voir, vous! Ce qu’il a raconté des lépreux de Burton-Lazers est incontestable; d’ailleurs il ne serait pas le premier qui aurait dit des sottises; enfin, moi, milords, je n’aime pas qu’on s’acharne plusieurs sur un seul, telle est mon humeur, et je demande à vos seigneuries la permission d’être offensé. Vous m’avez déplu, j’en suis fâché. Moi, je ne crois pas beaucoup en Dieu, mais ce qui m’y ferait croire, c’est quand il fait de bonnes actions, ce qui ne lui arrive pas tous les jours. Ainsi je lui sais gré, ce bon Dieu, s’il existe, d’avoir tiré du fond de cette existence basse ce pair d’Angleterre, et d’avoir rendu son héritage à cet héritier, et, sans m’inquiéter si cela arrange ou non mes affaires, je trouve beau de voir subitement le cloporte se changer en aigle et Gwynplaine en Clancharlie. Milords, je vous défends d’être d’un autre avis que moi. Je regrette que Lewis de Duras ne soit pas là. Je l’insulterais avec plaisir. Milords, Fermain Clancharlie a été le lord, et vous avez été les saltimbanques. Quant à son rire, ce n’est pas sa faute. Vous avez ri de ce rire. On ne rit pas d’un malheur. Vous êtes des niais. Et des niais cruels. Si vous croyez qu’on ne peut pas rire de vous aussi, vous vous trompez; vous êtes laids, et vous vous habillez mal. Milord Haversham, j’ai vu l’autre jour ta maîtresse, elle est hideuse. Duchesse, mais guenon. Messieurs les rieurs, je répète que je voudrais bien vous voir essayer de dire quatre mots de suite. Beaucoup d’hommes jasent, très peu parlent. Vous vous imaginez savoir quelque chose parce que vous avez traîné vos grègues fainéantes à Oxford ou à Cambridge, et parce que, avant d’être pairs d’Angleterre sur les bancs de Westminster-Hall, vous avez été ânes sur les bancs du collége de Gonewill et de Caïus! Moi, je suis ici, et je tiens à vous regarder en face. Vous venez d’être impudents avec ce nouveau lord. Un monstre, soit. Mais livré aux bêtes. J’aimerais mieux être lui que vous. J’assistais à la séance, à ma place, comme héritier possible de pairie, j’ai tout entendu. Je n’avais pas le droit de parler, mais j’ai le droit d’être un gentilhomme.

Vos airs joyeux m’ont ennuyé. Quand je ne suis pas content, j’irais sur le Mont Pendlehill cueillir l’herbe des nuées, le clowdesbery, qui fait tomber la foudre sur qui l’arrache. C’est pourquoi je suis venu vous attendre à la sortie. Causer est utile, et nous avons des arrangements à prendre. Vous rendiez-vous compte que vous me manquiez un peu à moi-même?

Milords, j’ai le ferme dessein de tuer quelques-uns d’entre vous.

Vous tous qui êtes ici, Thomas Tufton, comte de Thanet, Savage, comte Rivers, Charles Spencer, comte de Sunderland, Laurence Hyde, comte de Rochester, vous barons, Gray de Rolleston, Cary Hunsdon, Escrick, Rockingham, toi, petit Carteret, toi, Robert Darcy, comte de Holderness, toi William, vicomte Halton, et toi, Ralph, duc de Montagu, et tous les autres qui voudront, moi, David Dirry-Moir, un des soldats de la flotte, je vous somme et je vous appelle, et je vous commande de vous pourvoir en diligence de seconds et de parrains, et je vous attends face contre face et poitrine contre poitrine, ce soir, tout de suite, demain, le jour, la nuit, en plein soleil, aux flambeaux, où, quand et comme bon vous semblera, partout où il y a assez de place pour deux longueurs d’épées, et vous ferez bien de visiter les batteries de vos pistolets et le tranchant de vos-estocs, attendu que j’ai l’intention de faire vos pairies vacantes. Ogle Cavendish, prends tes précautions et songe à ta devise: Cavendo tutus. Marmaduke Langdale, tu feras bien, comme ton ancêtre Gundold, de te faire suivre d’un cercueil. Georges Rooth, comte de Warington, tu ne reverras pas le comté palatin de Chester et ton labyrinthe à la façon de Crète et les hautes tourelles de Dunham Massie. Quant à lord Vaughan, il est assez jeune pour dire des impertinences et trop vieux pour en répondre; je demanderai compte de ses paroles à son neveu Richard Vaughan, membre des communes pour le bourg de Merioneth. Toi, John Campbell, comte de Greemvich, je te tuerai comme Achon tua Matas, mais d’un coup franc, et non par derrière, ayant coutume de montrer mon coeur et non mon dos à la pointe de l’espadon. Et c’est dit, milords. Sur ce, usez de maléfices, si bon vous semble, consultez des tireuses de cartes, graissez-vous la peau avec les onguents et les drogues qui font invulnérable, pendez-vous au cou des sachets du diable ou de la vierge, je vous combattrai bénits ou maudits, et je ne vous ferai point tâter pour savoir si vous avez sur vous des sorcelleries. A pied ou cheval. En plein carrefour, si vous voulez, à Piccadilly ou Charing-Cross, et l’on dépavera la rue pour notre rencontre comme on a dépavé la cour du Louvre pour le duel de Guise et de Bassompierre. Tous, entendez-vous? je vous veux tous. Dorme, comte de Caërnarvon, je te ferai avaler ma lame jusqu’à la coquille, comme fit Marolles à Lisle-Marivaux; et nous verrons ensuite, milord, si tu riras. Toi, Burlington, qui as l’air d’une fille avec tes dix-sept ans, tu auras le choix entre les pelouses de ta maison de Middlesex et ton beau jardin de Londesburg en Yorkshire pour te faire enterrer. J’informe vos seigneuries qu’il ne me convient pas qu’on soit insolent devant moi. Et je vous châtierai, milords. Je trouve mauvais que vous ayez bafoué lord Fermain Clancharlie. Il vaut mieux que vous.

Comme Clancharlie, il a la noblesse, que vous avez, et comme Gwynplaine, il a l’esprit, que vous n’avez pas. Je fais de sa cause ma cause, de son injure mon injure, et de vos ricanements ma colère. Nous verrons qui sortira de cette affaire vivant, car je vous provoque à outrance, entendez-vous bien? et à toute arme et de toute façon, et choisissez la mort qui vous plaira, et puisque vous êtes des manants en même temps que des gentilshommes, je proportionne le défi à vos qualités, et je vous offre toutes les manières qu’ont les hommes de se tuer, depuis l’épée comme les princes jusqu’à la boxe comme les goujats!

A ce jet furieux de paroles tout le groupe hautain des jeunes lords répondit par un sourire. — Convenu, dirent-ils.

— Je choisis le pistolet, dit Burlington.

— Moi, dit Escrick, l’ancien combat de champ clos à la masse d’armes et au poignard.

— Moi, dit Holderness, le duel aux deux couteaux, le long et le court, torses nus, et corps à corps.

— Lord David, dit le comte de Thanet, tu es écossais. Je prends la claymore.

— Moi, l’épée, dit Rockingham.

— Moi, dit le duc Ralph, je préfère la boxe. C’est plus noble.

Gwynplaine sortit de l’ombre.

Il se dirigea vers celui qu’il avait jusque-là nomm Tom-Jim-Jack, et en qui maintenant il commençait à entrevoir autre chose.

— Je vous remercie, dit-il. Mais ceci me regarde. Toutes les tètes se tournèrent.

Gwynplaine avança. Il se sentait poussé vers cet homme qu’il entendait appeler lord David, et qui était son défenseur, et plus encore peut-être. Lord David recula.

— Tiens! dit lord David, c’est vous! vous voilà! Cela se trouve bien. J’avais aussi un mot à vous dire. Vous avez tout l’heure parlé d’une femme qui, après avoir aimé lord Linnaeus Claucharlie, a aimé le roi Charles II

— C’est vrai.

— Monsieur, vous avez insulté ma mère.

— Votre mère? s’écria Gwynplaine. En ce cas, je le devinais, nous sommes...

— Frères, répondit lord David.

Et il donna un soufflet à Gwynplaine.

— Nous sommes frères, reprit-il. Ce qui fait que nous pouvons nous battre. On ne se bat qu’entre égaux. Qui est plus notre égal que notre frère? Je vous enverrai mes parrains. Demain, nous nous couperons la gorge.

I

C’EST A TRAVERS L’EXCÈS DE GRANDEUR QU’ON ARRIVE A L’EXCÈS DE MISÈRE

Comme minuit sonnait à Saint-Paul, un homme, qui venait de traverser le pont de Londres, entrait dans les ruelles de Southwark. Il n’y avait point de réverbères allumés, l’usage étant alors, à Londres comme à Paris, d’éteindre l’éclairage public à onze heures, c’est-à-dire de supprimer les lanternes au moment où elles deviennent nécessaires. Les rues, obscures, étaient désertes. Point de réverbères, cela fait peu de passants. L’homme marchait à grands pas. Il était étrangement vêtu pour aller dans la rue à pareille heure. Il avait un habit de soie brodé, l’épée au côté et un chapeau à plumes blanches, et point de manteau. Les watchmen qui le voyaient passer disaient: — C’est un seigneur qui a fait un pari. — Et ils s’écartaient avec le respect dû à un lord et à une gageure.

Cet homme était Gwynplaine.

Il avait pris la fuite.

Où en était-il? il ne le savait pas. L’âme, nous l’avons dit, a ses cyclones, tournoiements épouvantables où tout se mêle, le ciel, la mer, le jour, la nuit, la vie, la mort, dans une sorte d’horreur inintelligible. Le réel cesse d’être respirable. On est écrasé par des choses auxquelles on ne croit pas. Le néant s’est fait ouragan. Le firmament a blêmi. L’infini est vide.

On est dans l’absence. On se sent mourir. On désire un astre.

Qu’éprouvait Gwynplaine? une soif, voir Dea.

Il ne sentait plus que cela. Regagner la Green-Box, et l’inn Tadcaster, sonore, lumineux, plein de ce bon rire cordial du peuple; retrouver Ursus et Homo, revoir Dea, rentrer dans la vie!

Les désillusions se détendent comme l’arc, avec une force sinistre, et jettent l’homme, cette flèche, vers le vrai.

Gwynplaine avait hâte. Il approchait du Tarrinzeau-field. Il ne marchait plus, il courait. Ses yeux plongeaient dans l’obscurit en avant. Il se faisait précéder par son regard; recherche avide du port à l’horizon. Quel moment que celui où il allait apercevoir les fenêtres éclairées de l’inn Tadcaster!

Il déboucha sur le bowling-green. Il tourna un coin de mur, et eut, en face de lui, à l’autre bout du pré, à quelque distance, l’inn, qui était, on s’en souvient, la seule maison du champ de foire.

Il regarda. Pas de lumière. Une masse noire.

Il frissonna. Puis il se dit qu’il était tard, que la taverne était fermée, que c’était tout simple, qu’on dormait, qu’il n’y avait qu’à réveiller Nicless ou Govicum, qu’il fallait aller l’inn et frapper à la porte. Et il y alla. Il n’y courut pas.

Il s’y précipita.

Il arriva à l’inn, ne respirant plus. On est en pleine tourmente, on se débat dans les invisibles convulsions de l’âme, on ne sait plus si l’on est mort ou vivant, et l’on a pour ceux qu’on aime toutes sortes de délicatesses; c’est à cela que se reconnaissent les vrais coeurs. Dans l’engloutissement de tout, la tendresse surnage. Ne pas réveiller brusquement Dea, ce fut tout de suite la préoccupation de Gwynplaine.

Il approcha de l’inn en faisant le moins de bruit possible. Il connaissait le réduit, ancienne niche de chien de garde, o couchait Govicum; ce réduit, contigu à la salle basse, avait une lucarne sur la place, Gwynplaine gratta doucement la vitre.

Réveiller Govicum suffisait.

Il ne se fit aucun mouvement dans le bedroom de Govicum. A cet âge, se dit Gwynplaine, on a le sommeil dur. Il frappa du revers de sa main un petit coup sur la lucarne. Rien ne remua.

Il frappa plus vivement et deux coups. On ne bougea pas dans le réduit. Alors, avec quelque frémissement, il alla à la porte de l’inn, et cogna.

Personne ne répondit.

Il pensa, non sans ressentir le commencement d’un froid profond: — Maître Nicless est vieux, les enfants dorment durement et les vieillards lourdement. Allons! plus fort!

Il avait gratté. Il avait frappé. Il avait cogné. Il heurta.

Ceci lui rappela un lointain souvenir, Weymouth, quand il avait, tout petit, Dea toute petite dans ses bras.

Il heurta violemment, comme un lord, qu’il était, hélas!

La maison demeura silencieuse.

Il sentit qu’il devenait éperdu.

Il ne garda plus de ménagement. Il appela: Nicless! Govicum!

En même temps il regardait aux fenêtres pour voir si quelque chandelle s’allumait.

Rien dans l’inn. Pas une voix. Pas un bruit. Pas une lueur.

Il alla à la porte cochère et la heurta, et la poussa, et la secoua frénétiquement, en criant: Ursus! Homo!

Le loup n’aboya pas.

Une sueur glacée perla sur son front.

Il jeta les yeux autour de lui. La nuit était épaisse, mais il y avait assez d’étoiles pour que le champ de foire fût distinct.
Il vit une chose lugubre, l’évanouissement de tout. Il n’y avait plus une seule baraque sur le bowling-green. Le circus n’y était plus. Pas une tente. Pas un tréteau. Pas un chariot. Ce vagabondage aux mille vacarmes qui avait fourmillé là avait fait place à on ne sait quelle farouche noirceur vide. Tout s’en était allé.

La folie de l’anxiété le prit. Qu’est-ce que cela voulait dire?
Qu’était-il donc arrivé? Est-ce qu’il n’y avait plus personne?
Est-ce que sa vie se serait écroulée derrière lui? Qu’est-ce qu’on leur avait fait, à tous? Ah! mon Dieu! Il se rua comme une tempête sur la maison. Il frappa à la porte bâtarde, à la porte cochère, aux fenêtres, aux volets, aux murs, des poings et des pieds, furieux d’effroi et d’angoisse. Il appela Nicless, Govicum, Fibi, Vinos, Ursus, Homo. Toutes les clameurs, tous les bruits, il les jeta sur cette muraille. Par instants il s’interrompait et écoutait, la maison restait muette et morte.
Alors, exaspéré, il recommençait. Chocs, frappements, cris, roulements de coups faisant écho partout. On eût dit le tonnerre essayant de réveiller le sépulcre.

A un certain degré d’épouvanté, on devient terrible. Qui craint tout, ne craint plus rien. On donne des coups de pied au sphinx.
On rudoie l’inconnu. Il renouvela le tumulte sous toutes les formes possibles, s’arrêtant, reprenant, inépuisable en cris et en appels, donnant l’assaut à ce tragique silence.

Il appela cent fois tous ceux qui pouvaient être là, et cria tous les noms, excepté Dea. Précaution, obscure pour lui-même, dont il avait encore l’instinct dans son égarement.

Les cris et les appels épuisés, restait l’escalade. Il se dit: Il faut entrer dans la maison. Mais comment? Il cassa une vitre du réduit de Govicum, y fourra son poing en se déchirant la chair, tira le verrou du châssis et ouvrit la lucarne. Il s’aperçut que son épée allait le gêner; il l’arracha avec colère, fourreau, lame et ceinturon, et la jeta sur le pavé. Puis il se hissa aux reliefs de la muraille, et, bien que la lucarne fût étroite, il put y passer. Il pénétra dans l’inn. Le lit de Govicum, vaguement visible, était dans le réduit, mais Govicum n’y était pas. Pour que Govicum ne fût pas dans son lit, il fallait évidemment que Nicless ne fût pas dans le sien. Toute la maison était noire. On sentait dans cet intérieur ténébreux l’immobilité mystérieuse du vide, et cette vague horreur qui signifie: Il n’y a personne. Gwynplaine, convulsif, traversa la salle basse, se cogna aux tables, piétina sur les vaisselles, renversa les bancs, culbuta les brocs, enjamba les meubles, alla à la porte donnant sur la cour, et la défonça d’un coup de genou qui fit sauter le loquet. La porte tourna sur ses gonds. Il regarda dans la cour. La Green-Box n’y était plus.

II

RÉSIDU

Gwynplaine sortit de la maison, et se mit à explorer dans tous les sens le Tarrinzeau-fleld; il alla partout où, la veille, on voyait un tréteau, une tente, ou une cahute. Il n’y avait plus rien. Il frappa aux échoppes, quoique sachant très bien qu’elles étaient inhabitées. Il cogna à tout ce qui ressemblait à une fenêtre, ou à une porte. Pas une voix ne sortit de cette obscurité. Quelque chose comme la mort était venu là.

La fourmilière avait été écrasée. Visiblement une mesure de police avait été prise. Il y avait eu ce qu’on appellerait de nos jours une razzia. Le Tarrinzeau-field était plus que désert, il était désolé, et l’on y sentait dans tous les recoins le grattement d’une griffe féroce. On avait pour ainsi dire retourné les poches de ce misérable champ de foire, et tout vidé.

Gwynplaine, après avoir tout fouillé, quitta le bowling-green, entra dans les rues tortueuses de l’extrémité appelée l’East-point, et se dirigea vers la Tamise.

Il franchit quelques zigzags de ce réseau de ruelles où il n’y avait que des murs et des haies, puis il sentit dans l’air le frais de l’eau, il entendit le glissement sourd du fleuve, et brusquement il se trouva devant un parapet. C’était le parapet de l’Effroc-stone.

Ce parapet bordait un tronçon de quai très court et très étroit.

Sous le parapet la haute muraille Effroc-stone s’enfonçait à pic dans une eau obscure.

Gwynplaine s’arrêta à ce parapet, s’y accouda, prit sa tête dans ses mains, et se mit à penser, ayant cette eau au-dessous de lui.

Regardait-il l’eau? Non. Que regardait-il? L’ombre. Non pas l’ombre hors de lui, mais l’ombre au dedans de lui.

Dans le mélancolique paysage de nuit auquel il ne faisait pas attention, dans cette profondeur extérieure où son regard n’entrait point, on pouvait distinguer des silhouettes de vergues et de mâts. Sous l’Effroc-stone, il n’y avait que le flot, mais le quai en aval s’abaissait en rampe insensible et aboutissait, quelque distance, à une berge que longeaient plusieurs bateaux, les uns en arrivage, les autres en partance, communiquant avec la terre par de petits promontoires d’amarrage, construits exprès, en pierre ou en bois, ou par des passerelles en planches. Ces navires, les uns amarrés, les autres à l’ancre, étaient immobiles. On n’y entendait ni marcher ni parler; la bonne habitude des matelots étant de dormir le plus qu’ils peuvent et de ne se lever que pour la besogne. S’il y avait quelqu’un de ces bâtiments qui dût partir dans la nuit à l’heure de la marée, on n’y était pas encore réveillé.

On voyait à peine les coques, grosses ampoules noires, et les agrès, fils mêlés d’échelles. C’était livide et confus. Ça et là un falot rouge piquait la brume.

Gwynplaine ne percevait rien de tout cela. Ce qu’il considérait, c’était la destinée.

Il songeait, visionnaire éperdu devant la réalité inexorable.

Il lui semblait entendre derrière lui quelque chose comme un tremblement de terre. C’était le rire des lords.

Ce rire, il venait d’en sortir. Il en était sorti souffleté.

Souffleté par qui?

Par son frère.

Et en sortant de ce rire, avec ce soufflet, se réfugiant, oiseau blessé, dans son nid, fuyant la haine et cherchant l’amour, qu’avait-il trouvé?

Les ténèbres.

Personne.

Tout disparu.

Ces ténèbres, il les comparait au songe qu’il avait fait.

Quel écroulement!

Gwynplaine venait d’arriver à ce bord sinistre, le vide. La Green-Box partie, c’était l’univers évanoui.

La fermeture de son âme venait de se faire.

Il songeait.

Qu’avait-il pu se passer? Où étaient-ils? On les avait enlevés évidemment. Sa destinée avait été sur lui Gwynplaine un coup, la grandeur, et sur eux un contre-coup, l’anéantissement. Il était clair qu’il ne les reverrait jamais. On avait pris des précautions pour cela. Et l’on avait fait en même temps main basse sur tout ce qui habitait le champ de foire, à commencer par Nicless et Govicum, afin qu’aucun renseignement ne pût lui être donné. Dispersion inexorable. Cette redoutable force sociale, en même temps qu’elle le pulvérisait, lui, à la chambre des lords, les avait broyés, eux, dans leur pauvre cabane. Ils étaient perdus. Dea était perdue. Perdue pour lui. A jamais.

Puissances du ciel! où était-elle? Et il n’avait pas été l pour la défendre!

Faire des conjectures sur des absents qu’on aime, c’est se mettre à la question. Il s’infligeait cette torture. A chaque coin qu’il s’enfonçait, à chaque supposition qu’il faisait, il avait un sombre rugissement intérieur.

A travers une succession d’idées poignantes, il se souvenait de l’homme évidemment funeste qui lui avait dit se nommer Barkilphedro. Cet homme lui avait écrit dans le cerveau quelque chose d’obscur qui à présent reparaissait, et cela avait ét écrit d’une encre si horrible que c’était maintenant des lettres de feu, et Gwynplaine voyait flamboyer au fond de sa pensée ces paroles énigmatiques, aujourd’hui expliquées: Le destin n’ouvre pas une porte sans en fermer une autre.

Tout était consommé. Les dernières ombres étaient sur lui. Tout homme peut avoir dans sa destinée une fin du monde pour lui seul.

Cela s’appelle le désespoir. L’âme est pleine d’étoiles tombantes.

Voilà donc où il en était!

Une fumée avait passé. Il avait été mêlé à cette fumée. Elle s’était épaissie sur ses yeux; elle était entrée dans son cerveau. Il avait été, au dehors, aveuglé; au dedans, enivré.

Cela avait duré le temps qu’une fumée passe. Puis tout s’était dissipé, la fumée et sa vie. Réveillé de ce rêve, il se retrouvait seul.

Tout évanoui. Tout en allé. Tout perdu. La nuit. Rien.

C’était là son horizon.

Il était seul.

Seul a un synonyme: mort.

Le désespoir est un compteur. Il tient à faire son total. Rien ne lui échappe. Il additionne tout, il ne fait pas grâce des centimes. Il reproche à Dieu les coups de tonnerre et les coups d’épingle. Il veut savoir à quoi s’en tenir sur le destin. Il raisonne, pèse et calcule.

Sombre refroidissement extérieur sous lequel continue de couler la lave ardente.

Gwynplaine s’examina, et examina le sort.

Le coup d’oeil en arrière; résumé redoutable.

Quand on est au haut de la montagne, on regarde le précipice.

Quand on est au fond de la chute, on regarde le ciel.

Et l’on se dit: J’étais là!

Gwynplaine était tout en bas du malheur. Et comme cela était venu vite! Promptitude hideuse de l'infortune. Elle est si lourde qu'on la croirait lente. Point. Il semble que la neige doit avoir, étant froide, la paralysie de l'hiver, et, étant blanche, l'immobilité du linceul. Tout cela est démenti par l'avalanche!

L'avalanche, c'est la neige devenue fournaise. Elle reste glacée, et dévore. L'avalanche avait enveloppé Gwynplaine. Il avait été arraché comme un haillon, déraciné comme un arbre, précipité comme une pierre.

Il récapitula sa chute. Il se fit des demandes et des réponses.

La douleur est un interrogatoire. Aucun juge n'est minutieux comme la conscience instruisant son propre procès.

Quelle quantité de remords y avait-il dans son désespoir?

Il voulut s'en rendre compte et disséqua sa conscience; vivisection douloureuse.

Son absence avait produit une catastrophe. Cette absence avait-elle dépendu de lui? Dans tout ce qui venait de se passer, avait-il été libre? Point. Il s'était senti captif. Ce qui l'avait arrêté et retenu, qu'était-ce? Une prison? non. Une chaîne? non. Qu'était-ce donc? une glu. Il avait été embourb dans de la grandeur.

A qui cela n'est-il pas arrivé, d'être libre en apparence, et de se sentir les ailes empêtrées?

Il y avait eu quelque chose comme un panneau tendu. Ce qui est d'abord tentation finit par être captivité.

Toutefois, et sur ce point sa conscience le pressait, ce qui s'était offert, l'avait-il simplement subi? Non. Il l'avait accepté.

Qu'il lui eût été fait violence et surprise dans une certaine mesure, cela était vrai; mais lui, de son côté, dans une certaine mesure, il s'était laissé faire. S'être laissé enlever, ce n'était pas sa faute; s'être laissé enivrer, c'avait été sa défaillance. Il y avait eu un moment, moment décisif, où la question avait été posée; ce Barkilphedro l'avait mis en face d'un dilemme, et avait nettement donné à Gwynplaine l'occasion de résoudre son sort d'un mot. Gwynplaine pouvait dire non. Il avait dit oui.

De ce oui, prononcé dans l'étourdissement, tout avait découlé.

Gwynplaine le comprenait. Arrière-goût amer du consentement.

Cependant, car il se débattait, était-ce donc un si grand tort de rentrer dans son droit, dans son patrimoine, dans son héritage, dans sa maison, et, patricien, dans le rang de ses aïeux, et, orphelin, dans le nom de son père? Qu’avait-il accepté? une restitution. Faite par qui? par la providence.

Alors il sentait une révolte. Acceptation stupide! quel march il avait fait! quel échange inepte! Il avait traité à perte avec cette providence. Quoi donc! pour avoir deux millions de rente, pour avoir sept ou huit seigneuries, pour avoir dix ou douze palais, pour avoir des hôtels à la ville et des châteaux la campagne, pour avoir cent laquais, et des meutes, et des carrosses, et des armoiries, pour être juge et législateur, pour être couronné et en robe de pourpre comme un roi, pour être baron et marquis, pour être pair d’Angleterre, il avait donné la baraque d’Ursus et le sourire de Dea! Pour une immensit mouvante où l’on s’engloutit et où l’on naufrage, il avait donn le bonheur! Pour l’océan, il avait donné la perle. O insensé! ô imbécile! ô dupe!

Mais pourtant, et ici l’objection renaissait sur un terrain solide, dans cette fièvre de la haute fortune qui l’avait saisi, tout n’avait pas été malsain. Peut-être y aurait-il eu égoïsme dans la renonciation, peut-être y avait-il devoir dans l’acceptation. Brusquement transformé en lord, que devait-il faire? La complication de l’événement produit la perplexité de l’esprit. C’est ce qui lui était arrivé. Le devoir donnant des ordres en sens inverse, le devoir de tous les côtés à la fois, le devoir multiple, et presque contradictoire, il avait eu cet effarement. C’était cet effarement qui l’avait paralysé, notamment dans ce trajet de Corleone-lodge à la chambre des lords, auquel il n’avait pas résisté. Ce que, dans la vie, on appelle monter, c’est passer de l’itinéraire simple l’itinéraire inquiétant. Où est désormais la ligne droite? Envers qui est le premier devoir? Est-ce envers ses proches? Est-ce envers le genre humain? Ne passe-t-on pas de la petite famille à la grande? On monte, et l’on sent sur son honnêteté un poids qui s’accroît. Plus haut, on se sent plus obligé. L’élargissement du droit agrandit le devoir. On a l’obsession, l’illusion peut-être, de plusieurs routes s’offrant en même temps, et à l’entrée de chacune d’elles on croit voir le doigt indicateur de la conscience. Où aller? Sortir? rester? avancer? reculer? que faire? Que le devoir ait des carrefours, c’est étrange. La responsabilité peut être un labyrinthe.

Et quand un homme contient une idée, quand il est l’incarnation d’un fait, quand il est homme symbole en même temps qu’homme en chair et en os, la responsabilité n’est-elle pas plus troublante encore? De là la soucieuse docilité et l’anxiété muette de Gwynplaine; de là son obéissance à la sommation de siéger.

L’homme pensif est souvent homme passif. Il lui avait sembl entendre le commandement même du devoir. Cette entrée dans un lieu où l’on peut discuter l’oppression et la combattre, n’était-ce point la réalisation d’une de ses aspirations les plus profondes? Quand la parole lui était donnée, à lui formidable échantillon social, à lui spécimen vivant du bon plaisir sous lequel depuis six mille ans râle le genre humain, avait-il le droit de la refuser? avait-il le droit d’ôter sa tête de dessous la langue de feu tombant d’en haut et venant se poser sur lui?

Dans l’obscur et vertigineux débat de la conscience, que s’était-il dit? ceci: — Le peuple est un silence. Je serai l’immense avocat de ce silence. Je parlerai pour les muets. Je parlerai des petits aux grands et des faibles aux puissants.

C’est là le but de mon sort. Dieu veut ce qu’il veut, et il le fait. Certes, cette gourde de ce Hardquanonne où était la métamorphose de Gwynplaine en lord Clancharlie, il est surprenant qu’elle ait flotté quinze ans sur la mer, dans les houles, dans les ressacs, dans les rafales, et que toute cette colère ne lui ait fait aucun mal. Je vois pourquoi. Il y a des destinées secret; moi, j’ai la clef de la mienne, et j’ouvre mon énigme.

Je suis prédestiné! j’ai une mission. Je serai le lord des pauvres. Je parlerai pour tous les taciturnes désespérés. Je traduirai les bégaiements. Je traduirai les grondements, les hurlements, les murmures, la rumeur des foules, les plaintes mal prononcées, les voix inintelligibles, et tous ces cris de bêtes qu’à force d’ignorance et de souffrance on fait pousser aux hommes. Le bruit des hommes est inarticulé comme le bruit du vent; ils crient. Mais on ne les comprend pas, crier ainsi équivaut à se taire, et se taire est leur désarmement.

Désarmement forcé qui réclame le secours. Moi, je serai le secours. Moi, je serai la dénonciation. Je serai le Verbe du Peuple. Grâce à moi, on comprendra. Je serai la bouche sanglante dont le bâillon est arraché. Je dirai tout. Ce sera grand.

Oui, parler pour les muets, c’est beau; mais parler aux sourds, c’est triste. C’était là la seconde partie de son aventure.

Hélas! il avait avorté.

Il avait avorté irrémédiablement.

Cette élévation à laquelle il avait cru, cette haute fortune, cette apparence, s’était effondrée sous lui.

Quelle chute! tomber dans l’écume du rire.

Il se croyait fort, lui qui, pendant tant d’années, avait flotté, âme attentive, dans la vaste diffusion des souffrances, lui qui rapportait de toute cette ombre un cri lamentable. Il était venu s’échouer à ce colossal écueil, la frivolité des heureux. Il se croyait un vengeur, il était un clown. Il croyait foudroyer, il avait chatouillé. Au lieu de l’émotion, il avait recueilli la moquerie. Il avait sangloté, on était entré en joie. Sous cette joie, il avait sombré. Engloutissement funèbre.

Et de quoi avait-on ri? De son rire.

Ainsi, cette voie de fait exécrable dont il gardait à jamais la trace, cette mutilation devenue gaîté à perpétuité, ce rictus stigmate, image du contentement supposé des nations sous les oppresseurs, ce masque de joie fait par la torture, cet abîme du ricanement qu’il portait sur la face, cette cicatrice signifiant jussu regis, cette attestation du crime commis par le roi sur lui, symbole du crime commis par la royauté sur le peuple entier, c’était cela qui triomphait de lui, c’était cela qui l’accablait, c’était l’accusation contre le bourreau qui se tournait en sentence contre la victime! Prodigieux déni de justice. La royauté, après avoir eu raison de son père, avait raison de lui.

Le mal qu’on avait fait servait de prétexte et de motif au mal qui restait à faire. Contre qui les lords s’indignaient-ils?

Contre le tortureur? non. Contre le torturé. Ici le trône, l le peuple; ici Jacques II, là Gwynplaine. Certes, cette confrontation mettait en lumière un attentat, et un crime. Quel était l’attentat? se plaindre. Quel était le crime? souffrir.

Que la misère se cache et se taise, sinon elle est lèse-majesté.

Et ces hommes qui avaient traîné Gwynplaine sur la claie du sarcasme, étaient-ils méchants? non, mais ils avaient, eux aussi, leur fatalité; ils étaient heureux. Ils étaient bourreaux sans le savoir. Ils étaient de bonne humeur. Ils avaient trouv Gwynplaine inutile. Il s’était ouvert le ventre, il s’était arraché le foie et le coeur, il avait montré ses entrailles, et on lui avait crié: Joue ta comédie! Chose navrante, lui-même il riait. L’affreuse chaîne lui liait l’âme et empêchait sa pensée de monter jusqu’à son visage. La défiguration allait jusqu’à son esprit, et, pendant que sa conscience s’indignait, sa face lui donnait un démenti et ricanait. C’était fini. Il était l’Homme qui Rit, cariatide du monde qui pleure. Il était une angoisse pétrifiée en hilarité portant le poids d’un univers de calamité, et muré à jamais dans la jovialité, dans l’ironie, dans l’amusement d’autrui; il partageait avec tous les opprimés, dont il était l’incarnation, cette fatalité abominable d’être une désolation pas prise au sérieux; on badinait avec sa détresse; il était on ne sait quel bouffon énorme sorti d’une effroyable condensation d’infortune, évadé de son bagne, passé dieu, mont du fond des populaces au pied du trône, mêlé aux constellations, et, après avoir égayé les damnés, il égayait les élus! Tout ce qu’il y avait en lui de générosité, d’enthousiasme, d’éloquence, de coeur, d’âme, de fureur, de colère, d’amour, d’inexprimable douleur, aboutissait à ceci, un éclat de rire! Et il constatait, comme il l’avait dit aux lords, que ce n’était point là une exception, que c’était le fait normal, ordinaire, universel, le vaste fait souverain tellement amalgamé à la routine de vivre qu’on ne s’en apercevait plus. Le meurt-de-faim rit, le mendiant rit, le forçat rit, la prostituée rit, l’orphelin, pour gagner sa vie, rit, l’esclave rit, le soldat rit, le peuple rit; la sociét humaine est faite de telle façon que toutes les perditions, toutes les indigences, toutes les catastrophes, toutes les fièvres, tous les ulcères, toutes les agonies, se résolvent au-dessus du gouffre en une épouvantable grimace de joie. Cette grimace totale, il était cela. Elle était lui. La loi d’en haut, la force inconnue qui gouverne, avait voulu qu’un spectre visible et palpable, un spectre en chair et en os, résumât la monstrueuse parodie que nous appelons le monde; il était ce spectre.

Destinée incurable.

Il avait crié: Grâce pour les souffrants! En vain.

Il avait voulu éveiller la pitié; il avait éveillé l’horreur.
C’est la loi d’apparition des spectres.

En même temps que spectre, il était homme. C’était là sa complication poignante. Spectre extérieur, homme intérieur.
Homme, plus qu’aucun peut-être, car son double sort résumait toute l’humanité. Et en même temps qu’il avait l’humanité en lui, il la sentait hors de lui.

Il y avait dans son existence de l’infranchissable. Qu’était-il?
un déshérité? non, car il était un lord. Qu’était-il? un lord?
non, car il était un révolté. Il était l’Apporte-lumière; trouble-fête effrayant.
Il n’était pas Satan, certes, mais il était Lucifer. Il arrivait sinistre, un flambeau à la main.

Sinistre pour qui? pour les sinistres. Redoutable à qui? aux redoutés. Aussi ils le rejetaient. Entrer parmi eux? Être accepté? Jamais. L'obstacle qu'il avait sur la face était affreux, mais l'obstacle qu'il avait dans les idées était plus insurmontable encore. Sa parole avait paru plus difforme que sa figure. Il ne pensait pas une pensée possible en ce monde des grands et des puissants dans lequel une fatalité l'avait fait naître et dont une autre fatalité l'avait fait sortir. Il y avait, entre les hommes et son visage, un masque, et, entre la société et son esprit, une muraille. En se mêlant, dès l'enfance, bateleur nomade, à ce vaste milieu vivace et robuste qu'on nomme la foule, en se saturant de l'aimantation des multitudes, en s'imprégnant de l'immense âme humaine, il avait perdu, dans le sens commun de tout le monde, le sens spécial des classes reines. En haut, il était impossible. Il arrivait tout mouillé de l'eau du puits Vérité. Il avait la fétidité de l'abîme. Il répugnait à ces princes, parfumés de mensonges. A qui vit de fiction, la vérité est infecte. Qui a soif de flatterie revomit le réel, bu par surprise. Ce qu'il apportait, lui Gwynplaine, n'était pas présentable; c'était, quoi? la raison, la sagesse, la justice. On le rejetait avec dégoût.

Il y avait là des évêques. Il leur apportait Dieu. Qu'était-ce que cet intrus?

Les pôles extrêmes se repoussent. Nul amalgame possible. La transition manque. On avait vu, sans qu'il y eût eu d'autre résultat qu'un cri de colère, ce vis-à-vis formidable: toute la misère concentrée dans un homme face à face avec tout l'orgueil concentré dans une caste.

Accuser est inutile. Constater suffit. Gwynplaine constatait, dans cette méditation au bord de son destin, l'immensité inutile de son effort. Il constatait la surdité des hauts lieux. Les privilégiés n'ont pas d'oreille du côté des déshérités. Est-ce la faute des privilégiés? non. C'est leur loi, hélas!

Pardonnez-leur. S'émouvoir, ce serait abdiquer. Où sont les seigneurs et les princes, il ne faut rien attendre. Le satisfait, c'est l'inexorable. Pour l'assouvi, l'affamé n'existe point. Les heureux ignorent, et s'isolent. Au seuil de leur paradis comme au seuil de l'enfer, il faut écrire: «Laissez toute espérance.

Gwynplaine venait d'avoir la réception d'un spectre entrant chez les dieux.

Ici tout ce qu'il avait en lui se soulevait. Non, il n'était pas un spectre, il était un homme. Il le leur avait dit, il le leur avait crié, il était l'Homme.

Il n’était pas un fantôme. Il était une chair palpitante. Il avait un cerveau, et il pensait; il avait un coeur, et il aimait; il avait une âme, et il espérait. Avoir trop espéré, c’était même là toute sa faute.

Hélas! il avait exagéré l’espérance jusqu’à croire en cette chose éclatante et obscure, la société. Lui qui était dehors, il y était rentré.

La société lui avait tout de suite, d’emblée, à la fois, fait ses trois offres et donné ses trois dons, le mariage, la famille, la caste. Le mariage? il avait vu sur le seuil la prostitution.

La famille? son frère l’avait souffleté, et l’attendait le lendemain, l’épée à la main. La caste? elle venait de lui éclater de rire à la face, à lui patricien, à lui misérable. Il était rejeté presque avant même d’avoir été admis. Et ses trois premiers pas dans cette profonde ombre sociale avaient ouvert sous lui trois gouffres.

Et c’était par une transfiguration traître que son désastre avait débuté. Et cette catastrophe s’était approchée de lui avec le visage de l’apothéose! Monte! avait signifié: Descends!

Il était une sorte de contraire de Job. C’est par la prospérit que l’adversité lui était venue.

O tragique énigme humaine! Voilà donc les embûches! Enfant, il avait lutté contre la nuit, et il avait été plus fort qu’elle.

Homme, il avait lutté contre le destin, et il l’avait terrassé.

De défiguré, il s’était fait rayonnant, et de malheureux, heureux. De son exil il avait fait un asile. Vagabond, il avait lutté contre l’espace, et, comme les oiseaux du ciel, il y avait trouvé sa miette de pain. Sauvage et solitaire, il avait lutt contre la foule, et il s’en était fait une amie. Athlète, il avait lutté contre ce lion, le peuple, et il l’avait apprivoisé.

Indigent, il avait lutté contre la détresse, il avait fait face la sombre nécessité de vivre, et, à force d’amalgamer à la misère toutes les joies du coeur, il s’était fait de la pauvreté une richesse. Il avait pu se croire le vainqueur de la vie. Tout coup de nouvelles forces étaient arrivées contre lui du fond de l’inconnu, non plus avec des menaces, mais avec des caresses et des sourires; à lui, tout pénétré d’amour angélique, l’amour draconien et matériel était apparu; la chair l’avait saisi, lui qui vivait d’idéal; il avait entendu des paroles de volupt semblables à des cris de rage; il avait senti des étreintes de bras de femme faisant l’effet de noeuds de couleuvre; l’illumination du vrai avait succédé la fascination du faux; car ce n’est pas la chair, qui est le réel, c’est l’âme. La chair est cendre, l’âme est flamme. A ce groupe lié à lui par la parenté de la pauvreté et du travail, et qui était sa véritable famille naturelle, s'était substituée la famille sociale, famille du sang, mais du sang mêlé, et, avant même d'y être entré, il se trouvait face à face avec un fratricide ébauché. Hélas! il s'était laissé reclasser dans cette société dont Brantôme, qu'il n'avait pas lu, a dit: Le fils peut justement appeler le père en duel. La fortune fatale lui avait crié: Tu n'es pas de la foule, tu es de l'élite! et avait ouvert au-dessus de sa tête, comme une trappe dans le ciel, le plafond social, et l'avait lancé par cette ouverture, et l'avait fait surgir, inattendu et farouche, au milieu des princes et des maîtres.

Subitement, autour de lui, au lieu du peuple qui l'applaudissait, il avait vu les seigneurs qui le maudissaient. Métamorphose lugubre. Grandissement ignominieux. Brusque spoliation de tout ce qui avait été sa félicité! Pillage de sa vie par la huée!
arrachement de Gwynplaine, de Clancharlie, du lord, du bateleur, de son sort antérieur, de son sort nouveau, à coups de bec de tous ces aigles!

A quoi bon avoir commencé tout de suite la vie par la victoire sur l'obstacle? A quoi bon avoir triomphé d'abord? Hélas! il faut être précipité, sans quoi la destinée n'est pas complète.

Ainsi, moitié de force, moitié de gré, car après le wapentake, il avait eu affaire à Barkilphedro, et dans son rapt il y avait eu du consentement, il avait quitté le réel pour le chimérique, le vrai pour le faux, Dea pour Josiane, l'amour pour l'orgueil, la liberté pour la puissance, le travail fier et pauvre pour l'opulence pleine de responsabilité obscure, l'ombre où est Dieu pour le flamboiement où sont les démons, le paradis pour l'olympe!

Il avait mordu dans le fruit d'or. Il recrachait la bouchée de cendre.

Résultat lamentable. Déroute, faillite, chute et ruine, expulsion insolente de toutes ses espérances fustigées par le ricanement, désillusion démesurée. Et que faire désormais? S'il regardait le lendemain, qu'apercevait-il? une épée nue dont la pointe était devant sa poitrine et dont la poignée était dans la main de son frère. Il ne voyait que l'éclair hideux de cette épée. Le reste, Josiane, la chambre des lords, était derrière, dans un monstrueux clair-obscur plein de silhouettes tragiques.

Et ce frère, il lui apparaissait comme chevaleresque et vaillant!
Hélas! ce Tom-Jim-Jack qui avait défendu Gwynplaine, ce lord David qui avait défendu lord Clancharlie, il l'avait entrevu peine, il n'avait eu que le temps d'en être souffleté, et de l'aimer.

Que d'accablements!

Maintenant, aller plus loin, impossible. L’écroulement était de tous les côtés. D’ailleurs, à quoi bon? Toutes les fatigues sont au fond du désespoir.

L’épreuve était faite, et n’était plus à recommencer.

Un joueur qui a joué l’un après l’autre tous ses atouts, c’était Gwynplaine. Il s’était laissé entraîner au tripot formidable.

Sans se rendre exactement compte de ce qu’il faisait, car tel est le subtil empoisonnement de l’illusion, il avait joué Dea contre Josiane; il avait eu un monstre. Il avait joué Ursus contre une famille, il avait eu l’affront. Il avait joué son tréteau de saltimbanque contre un siège de lord; il avait l’acclamation, il avait eu l’imprécation. Sa dernière carte venait de tomber sur ce fatal tapis vert du bowling-green désert. Gwynplaine avait perdu. Il n’avait plus qu’à payer. Paye, misérable!

Les foudroyés s’agitent peu. Gwynplaine était immobile. Qui l’eût aperçu de loin dans cette ombre, droit et sans mouvement, au bord du parapet, eût cru voir une pierre debout.

L’enfer, le serpent et la rêverie s’enroulent sur eux-mêmes.

Gwynplaine descendait les spirales sépulcrales de l’approfondissement pensif.

Ce monde qu’il venait d’entrevoir, il le considérait, avec ce regard froid qui est le regard définitif. Le mariage, mais pas d’amour; la famille, mais pas de fraternité; la richesse, mais pas de conscience; la beauté, mais pas de pudeur; la justice, mais pas d’équité; l’ordre, mais pas d’équilibre; la puissance, mais pas d’intelligence; l’autorité, mais pas de droit; la splendeur, mais pas de lumière. Bilan inexorable. Il fit le tour de cette vision suprême où s’était enfoncée sa pensée. Il examina successivement la destinée, la situation, la société, et lui-même. Qu’était la destinée? un piège. La situation? un désespoir. La société? une haine. Et lui-même? un vaincu. Et au fond de son âme, il s’écria: La société est la marâtre. La nature est la mère. La société, c’est le monde du corps; la nature, c’est le monde de l’âme. L’une aboutit au cercueil, à la boîte de sapin dans la fosse, aux vers de terre, et finit là.

L’autre aboutit aux ailes ouvertes, à la transfiguration dans l’aurore, à l’ascension dans les firmaments, et recommence là.

Peu à peu le paroxysme s’emparait de lui. Tourbillonnement funeste. Les choses qui finissent ont un dernier éclair où l’on revoit tout.

Qui juge, confronte. Gwynplaine mit en regard ce que la sociét lui avait fait et ce que lui avait fait la nature. Comme la nature avait été bonne pour lui! comme elle l'avait secouru, elle qui est l'âme! Tout lui avait été pris, tout, jusqu'au visage; l'âme lui avait tout rendu. Tout, même le visage; car il y avait ici-bas une céleste aveugle, faite exprès pour lui, qui ne voyait pas sa laideur et qui voyait sa beauté.

Et c'est de cela qu'il s'était laissé séparer! c'est de cet être adorable, c'est de ce coeur, c'est de cette adoption, c'est de cette tendresse, c'est de ce divin regard aveugle, le seul qui le vît sur la terre, qu'il s'était éloigné! Dea, c'était sa soeur; car il sentait d'elle à lui la grande fraternité de l'azur, ce mystère qui contient tout le ciel. Dea, quand il était petit, c'était sa vierge; car tout enfant a une vierge, et la vie a toujours pour commencement un mariage d'âmes consommé en pleine innocence, par deux petites virginités ignorantes. Dea, c'était son épouse, car ils avaient le même nid sur la plus haute branche du profond arbre Hymen. Dea, c'était plus encore, c'était sa clarté; sans elle tout était le néant et le vide, et il lui voyait une chevelure de rayons. Que devenir sans Dea? que faire de tout ce qui était lui? Rien de lui ne vivait sans elle.

Comment donc avait-il pu la perdre de vue un moment? O infortuné! Entre son astre et lui il avait laissé se faire l'écart, et, dans ces redoutables gravitations ignorées, l'écart est tout de suite l'abîme! Où était-elle, l'étoile? Dea! Dea!

Dea! Dea! Hélas! il avait perdu sa lumière. Otez l'astre, qu'est le ciel? une noirceur. Mais pourquoi donc tout cela s'était-il en allé? Oh! comme il avait été heureux! Dieu pour lui avait refait l'éden; — trop, hélas! — jusqu'à y laisser rentrer le serpent! mais cette fois ce qui avait été tenté, c'était l'homme. Il avait été attiré au dehors, et là, piège affreux, il était tombé dans le chaos des rires noirs qui est l'enfer!

Malheur! malheur! que tout ce qui l'avait fasciné était effroyable! Cette Josiane, qu'était-ce? oh! l'horrible femme, presque bête, presque déesse! Gwynplaine était à présent sur le revers de son élévation, et il voyait l'autre côté.de son éblouissement. C'était funèbre. Cette seigneurie était difforme, cette couronne était hideuse, cette robe de pourpre était lugubre, ces palais étaient vénéneux, ces trophées, ces statues, ces armoiries étaient louches, l'air malsain et traître qu'on respirait là vous rendait fou. Oh! les haillons du saltimbanque Gwynplaine étaient des resplendissements! Oh! o étaient la Green-Box, la pauvreté, la joie, la douce vie errante ensemble comme des hirondelles? On ne se quittait pas, on se voyait à toute minute, le soir, le matin, à table on se poussait du coude, on se touchait du genou, on buvait au même verre, le soleil entrait par la lucarne, mais il n’était que le soleil, et Dea était l’amour. La nuit, on se sentait endormis pas loin les uns des autres, et le rêve de Dea venait se poser sur Gwynplaine, et le rêve de Gwynplaine allait mystérieusement s’épanouir au-dessus de Dea! On n’était pas bien sûr, au réveil, de n’avoir pas échangé des baisers dans la nuée bleue du songe. Toute l’innocence était dans Dea, toute la sagesse était dans Ursus.

On rôdait de ville en ville; on avait pour viatique et pour cordial la franche gaîté aimante du peuple. On était des anges vagabonds, ayant assez d’humanité pour marcher ici-bas, et pas tout à fait assez d’ailes pour s’envoler. Et maintenant, disparition! Où était tout cela? Était-ce possible que tout se fût effacé! Quel vent de la tombe avait soufflé? C’était donc éclipsé! c’était donc perdu! Hélas, la sourde toute-puissance qui pèse sur les petits dispose de toute l’ombre, et est capable de tout! Qu’est-ce qu’on leur avait fait? Et il n’avait pas ét là, lui, pour les protéger, pour se mettre au travers, pour les défendre, comme lord, avec son titre, sa seigneurie et son épée, comme bateleur, avec ses poings et ses ongles! Et ici survenait une réflexion amère, la plus amère de toutes peut-être. Eh bien, non, il n’eût pas pu les défendre! C’était lui précisément qui les perdait. C’était pour le préserver d’eux, lui lord Clancharlie, c’était pour isoler sa dignité de leur contact, que l’infâme omnipotence sociale s’était appesantie sur eux. La meilleure façon pour lui de les protéger, ce serait de disparaître, on n’aurait plus de raison de les persécuter. Lui de moins, on les laisserait tranquilles. Glaçante ouverture o sa pensée entrait. Ah! pourquoi s’était-il laissé séparer de Dea? Est-ce que son premier devoir n’était pas envers Dea?

Servir et défendre le peuple? mais Dea, c’était le peuple! Dea, c’était l’orpheline, c’était l’aveugle, c’était l’humanité! Oh!

que leur avait-on fait? Cuisson cruelle du regret! son absence avait laissé le champ libre à la catastrophe. Il eût partag leur sort. Ou il les eût pris et emportés avec lui, ou il se fût englouti avec eux. Que devenir sans eux maintevant? Gwynplaine sans Dea, était-ce possible? Dea de moins, c’est tout de moins!

Ah! c’était fini. Ce groupe bien-aimé était à jamais enfoui dans l’irréparable évanouissement. Tout était épuisé.

D’ailleurs, condamné et damné comme l’était Gwynplaine, à quoi bon lutter plus longtemps? Il n’y avait plus rien à attendre, ni des hommes, ni du ciel.

Dea! Dea! où est Dea? Perdue! Quoi, perdue! Qui a perdu son âme n'a plus pour la retrouver qu'un lieu, la mort.

Gwynplaine, égaré et tragique, posa fermement sa main sur le parapet comme sur une solution, et regarda le fleuve.

C'était la troisième nuit qu'il ne dormait pas. Il avait la fièvre. Ses idées, qu'il croyait claires, étaient troubles. Il sentait un impérieux besoin de sommeil. Il demeura ainsi quelques instants penché sur cette eau; l'ombre lui offrait le grand lit tranquille, l'infini des ténèbres. Tentation sinistre.

Il ôta son habit, le plia et le posa sur le parapet. Puis il déboutonna son gilet. Comme il allait l'ôter, sa main heurta dans la poche quelque chose. C'était le red-book que lui avait remis le librarian de la chambre des lords. Il retira ce carnet de cette poche, l'examina dans la lueur diffuse de la nuit, y vit un crayon, prit ce crayon, et écrivit, sur la première page blanche qui s'ouvrit, ces deux lignes:

«Je m'en vais. Que mon frère David me remplace et soit heureux.

Et il signa: FERMAIN CLANCHARLIE, pair d'Angleterre.

Puis il ôta le gilet et le posa sur l'habit. Il ôta son chapeau, et le posa sur le gilet. Il mit dans le chapeau le red-book ouvert à la page où il avait écrit. Il aperçut à terre une pierre, la prit et la mit dans le chapeau.

Cela fait, il regarda l'ombre infinie au-dessus de son front.

Puis, sa tête s'abaissa lentement comme tirée par le fil invisible des gouffres.

Il y avait un trou dans les pierres du soubassement du parapet, il y mit un pied, de telle sorte que son genou dépassait le haut du parapet, et qu'il n'avait presque plus rien à faire pour l'enjamber.

Il croisa ses mains derrière son dos et se pencha.

— Soit, dit-il.

Et il fixa ses yeux sur l'eau profonde.

En ce moment il sentit une langue qui lui léchait les mains.

Il tressaillit et se retourna.

C'était Homo qui était derrière lui.

CONCLUSION

LA MER ET LA NUIT

I

CHIEN DE GARDE PEUT ÊTRE ANGE GARDIEN

Gwynplaine poussa un cri:

— C’est toi, loup!

Homo remua la queue. Ses yeux brillaient dans l’ombre. Il regardait Gwynplaine.

Puis il se remit à lui lécher les mains. Gwynplaine demeura un moment comme ivre. La rentrée immense de l’espérance, il avait cette secousse. Homo, quelle apparition! Depuis quarante-huit heures, il avait épuisé ce qu’on pourrait nommer toutes les variétés du coup de foudre; il lui restait à recevoir le coup de foudre de la joie. C’était celui-là qui venait de tomber sur lui. La certitude ressaisie, ou du moins la clarté qui y mène, la soudaine intervention d’on ne sait quelle clémence mystérieuse qui est peut-être dans le destin, la vie disant: me voilà! au plus noir de la tombe, la minute où l’on n’attend plus rien ébauchant brusquement la guérison et la délivrance, quelque chose comme le point d’appui retrouvé à l’instant le plus critique de l’écroulement, Homo était tout cela. Gwynplaine voyait le loup dans de la lumière.

Cependant Homo s’était retourné. Il fit quelques pas, et regarda en arrière comme pour voir si Gwynplaine le suivait.

Gwynplaine s’était mis en marche à sa suite. Homo remua la queue et continua son chemin.

Ce chemin où le loup s’était engagé, c’était la pente du quai de l’Effrocstone. Cette pente aboutissait à la berge de la Tamise.

Gwynplaine, conduit par Homo, descendit cette pente.

De temps en temps, Homo tournait la tête pour s’assurer que Gwynplaine était derrière lui.

Dans de certaines situations suprêmes, rien ne ressemble à une intelligence comprenant tout comme le simple instinct de la bête aimante. L’animal est un somnambule lucide.

Il y a des cas où le chien sent le besoin de suivre son maître, d’autres où il sent le besoin de le précéder. Alors la bête prend la direction de l’esprit. Le flair imperturbable voit clair confusément dans notre crépuscule. Se faire guide apparaît vaguement à la bête comme une nécessité. Sait-elle qu'il y a un mauvais pas, et qu'il faut aider l'homme à le passer? non probablement; oui, peut-être; dans tous les cas, quelqu'un le sait pour elle; nous l'avons dit déjà, bien souvent dans la vie d'augustes secours qu'on croit venir d'en bas viennent d'en haut.

On ne sait pas toutes les figures que peut prendre Dieu. Quelle est cette bête? la providence.

Parvenu sur la berge, le loup s'avança en aval sur l'étroite langue de terre qui longeait la Tamise.

Il ne poussait aucun cri, il n'aboyait pas, il cheminait muet.

Homo, en toute occasion, suivait son instinct et faisait son devoir, mais avait la réserve pensive du proscrit.

Après une cinquantaine de pas, il s'arrêta. Une estacade s'offrait à droite. A l'extrémité de cette estacade, espèce d'embarcadère sur pilotis, on entrevoyait une masse obscure qui était un assez gros navire. Sur le pont de ce navire, vers la proue, il y avait une clarté presque indistincte, qui ressemblait à une veilleuse prête à s'éteindre.

Le loup s'assura une dernière fois que Gwynplaine était là, puis bondit sur l'estacade, long corridor plancheié et goudronné, porté par une claire-voie de madriers, et sous lequel coulait l'eau du fleuve. En quelques instants, Homo et Gwynplaine arrivèrent à la pointe.

Le bâtiment amarré au bout de l'estacade était une de ces panses de Hollande à double tillac rasé, l'un à l'avant, l'autre l'arrière, ayant, à la mode japonaise, entre les deux tillacs, un compartiment profond à ciel ouvert où l'on descendait par une échelle droite et qu'on emplissait de tous les colis de la cargaison. Cela faisait deux gaillards, l'un à la proue, l'autre à la poupe, comme à nos vieilles pataches de rivière, avec un creux au milieu. Le chargement lestait ce creux. Les galiotes de papier que font les enfants ont à peu près cette forme. Sous les tillacs étaient les cabines communiquant par des portes avec ce compartiment central et éclairées de hublots percés dans le bordage. En arrimant la cargaison, on ménageait des passages entre les colis. Les deux mâts de ces panses étaient plantés dans les deux tillacs. Le mât de proue s'appelait le Paul, le mât de poupe s'appelait le Pierre, le navire étant conduit par ses deux mâts comme l'église par ses deux apôtres. Une passerelle, faisant passavant, allait, comme un pont chinois, d'un tillac à l'autre, par-dessus le compartiment du centre.

Dans les mauvais temps, les deux garde-fous de la passerelle s'abaissaient à droite et à gauche, au moyen d'un mécanisme, ce qui faisait un toit sur le compartiment creux, de sorte que le navire, dans les grosses mers, était hermétiquement fermé. Ces barques, très massives, avaient pour barre une poutre, la force du gouvernail devant se proportionner à la lourdeur du gabarit.

Trois hommes, le patron avec deux matelots, plus un enfant, le mousse, suffisaient à manoeuvrer ces pesantes machines de mer.

Les tillacs d'avant et d'arrière de la panse étaient, nous l'avons dit déjà, sans parapet. Cette panse-ci était une large coque ventrue toute noire sur laquelle on lisait en lettres blanches, visibles dans la nuit: Vograat. Rotterdam.

A cette époque, divers événements de mer, et, tout récemment, la catastrophe des huit vaisseaux du baron de Pointi au cap Carnero, en forçant toute la flotte française de refluer sur Gibraltar, avaient balayé la Manche et nettoyé de tout navire de guerre le passage entre Londres et Rotterdam, ce qui permettait aux bâtiments marchands d'aller et venir sans escorte.

2l avril 1705.

Le bateau sur lequel on lisait Vograat, et près duquel Gwynplaine était parvenu, touchait l'estacade par le bâbord de son tillac d'arrière presque à niveau. C'était comme une marche à descendre; Homo d'un saut, et Gwynplaine d'une enjambée, furent dans le navire. Tous deux se trouvèrent sur le pont d'arrière.

Le pont était désert et l'on n'y voyait aucun mouvement; les passagers, s'il y en avait, et c'était probable, étaient à bord, vu que le bâtiment était prêt à partir, et que l'arrimage était terminé, ce qu'indiquait la plénitude du compartiment creux, encombré de balles et de caisses. Mais ils étaient sans doute couchés et probablement endormis dans les chambres de l'entre-pont sous les tillacs, la traversée devant se faire la nuit. En pareil cas, les passagers n'apparaissent sur le pont que le lendemain matin, au réveil. Quant à l'équipage, il soupait vraisemblablement, en attendant l'instant très prochain du départ, dans le réduit qu'on appelait alors «la cabine matelote». De là la solitude des deux points de poupe et de proue reliés par la passerelle.

Le loup sur l'estacade avait presque couru; sur le navire il se mit à marcher lentement, comme avec discrétion. Il remuait la queue, non plus joyeusement, mais avec l'oscillation faible et triste du chien inquiet. Il franchit, précédant toujours Gwynplaine, le tillac d’arrière, et il traversa le passavant.

Gwynplaine, en entrant sur la passerelle, aperçut devant lui une lueur. C’était la clarté qu’il avait vue de la berge. Une lanterne était posée à terre au pied du mât d’avant; la réverbération de cette lanterne découpait en noir sur l’obscur fond de nuit une silhouette qui avait quatre roues. Gwynplaine reconnut l’antique cahute d’Ursus.

Cette pauvre masure de bois, charrette et cabane, où avait roul son enfance, était amarrée au pied du mât par de grosses cordes dont on voyait les noeuds dans les roues. Après avoir été si longtemps hors de service, elle était absolument caduque; rien ne délabre les hommes et les choses comme l’oisiveté; elle avait un penchement misérable. La désuétude la faisait toute paralytique, et, de plus, elle avait cette maladie irrémédiable, la vieillesse. Son profil informe et vermoulu fléchissait avec une attitude de ruine. Tout ce dont elle était faite offrait un aspect d’avarie, les fers étaient rouillés, les cuirs étaient gercés, les bois étaient cariés. Les fêlures rayaient le vitrage de l’avant que traversait un rayon de la lanterne. Les roues étaient cagneuses. Les parois, le plancher et les essieux semblaient épuisés de fatigue, l’ensemble avait on ne sait quoi d’accablé et de suppliant. Les deux pointes dressées du brancard avaient l’air de deux bras levés au ciel. Toute la baraque était disloquée. Dessous, on distinguait la chaîne d’Homo, pendante.

Retrouver sa vie, sa félicité, son amour, et y courir éperdument, et se précipiter dessus, il semble que ce soit la loi et que la nature le veuille ainsi. Oui, excepté dans les cas de tremblement profond. Qui sort, tout ébranlé et tout désorienté, d’une série de catastrophes pareilles à des trahisons, devient prudent, même dans la joie, redoute d’apporter sa fatalité à ceux qu’il aime, se sent lugubrement contagieux, et n’avance dans le bonheur qu’avec précaution. Le paradis se rouvre; avant d’y rentrer, on l’observe.

Gwynplaine, chancelant sous les émotions, regardait.

Le loup était allé silencieusement se coucher près de sa chaîne.

II

BARKILPHEDRO A VISÉ L’AIGLE ET A ATTEINT LA COLOMBE

Le marchepied de la cahute était abaissé; la porte était entre-bâillée; il n’y avait personne dedans; le peu de lumière qui entrait par la vitre du devant modelait vaguement l’intérieur de la baraque, clair-obscur mélancolique. Les inscriptions d’Ursus glorifiant la grandeur des lords étaient distinctes sur les planches décrépites qui étaient tout à la fois la muraille au dehors et le lambris au dedans. A un clou, près de la porte, Gwynplaine vit son esclavine et son capingot, accrochés, comme dans une morgue les vêtements d’un mort.

Il n’avait, lui, en ce moment-là, ni gilet, ni habit.

La cahute masquait quelque chose qui était étendu sur le pont au pied du mât et que la lanterne éclairait. C’était un matelas dont on apercevait un coin. Sur le matelas quelqu’un était probablement couché. On y voyait de l’ombre se mouvoir.

On parlait. Gwynplaine, caché par l’interposition de la cahute, écouta.

C’était la voix d’Ursus.

Cette voix, si dure en dessus, si tendre en dessous, qui avait tant malmené et si bien conduit Gwynplaine depuis son enfance, n’avait plus son timbre sagace et vivant. Elle était vague et basse et se dissipait en soupirs à la fin de chaque phrase. Elle ne ressemblait que confusément à l’ancienne voix simple et ferme d’Ursus. C’était comme la parole de quelqu’un dont le bonheur est mort. La voix peut devenir ombre.

Ursus semblait monologuer plutôt que dialoguer. Du reste le soliloque était, on le sait, son habitude. Il passait pour maniaque à cause de cela.

Gwynplaine retint son haleine pour ne pas perdre un mot de ce que disait Ursus, et voici ce qu’il entendit:

— C’est très dangereux, cette espèce de bateau. Ça n’a pas de rebord. Si on roule à la mer, rien ne vous arrête. S’il y avait du gros temps, il faudrait la descendre sous le tillac, ce qui serait terrible. Un mouvement maladroit, une peur, et voilà une rupture d’anévrisme. J’en ai vu des exemples. Ah! mon Dieu, qu’est-ce que nous allons devenir? Dort-elle? oui. Elle dort. Je crois bien qu’elle dort. Est-elle sans connaissance? non.

Elle a le pouls assez fort. Certainement elle dort. Le sommeil, c'est un sursis. C'est le bon aveuglement. Comment faire pour qu'on ne vienne pas piétiner par ici? Messieurs, s'il y a l quelqu'un sur le pont, je vous en prie, ne faites pas de bruit.

N'approchez pas, si cela vous est égal. Vous savez, une personne d'une santé délicate, il faut des ménagements. Elle a de la fièvre, voyez-vous. C'est tout jeune. C'est une petite qui a de la fièvre. Je lui ai mis ce matelas dehors pour qu'elle ait un peu d'air. J'explique cela afin qu'on ait égard. Elle est tombée de lassitude sur le matelas, comme si elle perdait connaissance. Mais elle dort. Je voudrais bien qu'on ne la réveillât pas. Je m'adresse aux femmes, s'il y a là des ladies.

Une jeune fille, c'est une pitié. Nous ne sommes que de pauvres bateleurs, je demande qu'on ait un peu de bonté, et puis, s'il y a quelque chose à payer pour qu'on ne fasse pas de bruit, je paierai. Je vous remercie, mesdames et messieurs. Y a-t-il quelqu'un là? Non. Je crois qu'il n'y a personne. Je parle en pure perte. Tant mieux. Messieurs, je vous remercie si vous y êtes, et je vous remercie bien si vous n'y êtes pas. — Elle a le front tout en sueur. — Allons, rentrons au bagne, reprenons le collier. La misère est revenue. Nous revoilà à vau-l'eau. Une main, l'affreuse main qu'on ne voit pas, mais qu'on sent toujours sur soi, nous a subitement retournés vers le côté noir de la destinée. Soit; on aura du courage. Seulement, il ne faut pas qu'elle soit malade. J'ai l'air bête de parler haut tout seul comme cela, mais il faut bien qu'elle sente qu'elle a quelqu'un près d'elle si elle vient à se réveiller. Pourvu qu'on ne me la réveille pas brusquement! Pas de bruit, au nom du ciel! Une secousse qui la ferait lever en sursaut ne vaudrait rien. Il serait fâcheux qu'on vînt marcher de ce côté-ci. Je crois que les gens dorment dans le bateau. Je rends grâce à la providence de cette concession. Hé bien! et Homo, où est-il donc? Dans tout ce bouleversement-là, j'ai oublié de l'attacher, je ne sais plus ce que je fais, voilà plus d'une heure que je ne l'ai vu, il aura été chercher son souper dehors. Pourvu qu'il ne lui arrive pas malheur! Homo! Homo!

Homo cogna doucement de sa queue le plancher du pont.

— Tu es là! Ah! tu es là. Dieu soit béni! Homo perdu, c'eût été trop. Elle dérange son bras. Elle va peut-être se réveiller. Tais-toi, Homo. La marée descend. On partira tout l'heure. Je pense qu'il fera beau cette nuit. Il n'y a pas de bise. La banderole pend le long du mât, nous aurons une bonne traversée. Je ne sais plus où nous en sommes de la lune. Mais c'est à peine si les nuages remuent. Il n’y aura pas de mer.

Nous aurons beau temps. Elle est pâle. C’est la faiblesse.
Mais non, elle est rouge. C’est la fièvre. Mais non, elle est rose. Elle se porte bien. Je n’y vois plus clair. Mon pauvre Homo, je n’y vois plus clair. Donc, il faut recommencer la vie.
Nous allons nous remettre à travailler. Il n’y a plus que nous deux, vois-tu. Nous travaillerons pour elle, toi et moi. C’est notre enfant. Ah! le bateau bouge. On part. Adieu, Londres!
bonsoir, bonne nuit, au diable! Ah! l’horrible Londres!

Le navire en effet avait la commotion sourde du dérapement. L’écart se faisait entre l’estacade et l’arrière. On apercevait à l’autre bout du bâtiment, à la poupe, un homme debout, le patron sans doute, qui venait de sortir de l’intérieur du navire et avait délié l’amarre, et qui manoeuvrait le gouvernail. Cet homme, attentif seulement au chenal, comme il convient lorsqu’on est composé du double flegme du hollandais et du matelot, n’entendant rien et ne voyant rien que l’eau et le vent, courb sous l’extrémité de la barre, mêlé à l’obscurité, marchait lentement sur le tillac d’arrière, allant et revenant de tribord à bâbord, espèce de fantôme ayant une poutre sur l’épaule. Il était seul sur le pont. Tant qu’on serait en rivière, aucun autre marin n’était nécessaire. En quelques minutes le bâtiment fut au fil du fleuve. Il descendait sans tangage ni roulis. La Tamise, peu troublée par le reflux, était calme. La marée l’entraînant, le navire s’éloignait rapidement. Derrière lui, le noir décor de Londres décroissait dans la brume.

Ursus poursuivit:

— C’est égal, je lui ferai prendre de la digitale. J’ai peur qu’il ne survienne du délire. Elle a de la sueur dans la paume de la main. Mais qu’est-ce que nous avons donc fait au bon Dieu?
Comme c’est venu vite tout ce malheur-là! Rapidité hideuse du mal. Une pierre tombe, elle a des griffes, c’est l’épervier sur l’alouette. C’est la destinée. Et te voilà gisante, ma douce enfant! On vient à Londres, on dit: c’est une grande ville qui a de beaux monuments. Southwark, c’est un superbe faubourg. On s’y établit. Maintenant, ce sont d’abominables pays. Que voulez-vous que j’y fasse? Je suis content de m’en aller. Nous sommes le 30 avril. Je me suis toujours défié du mois d’avril; le mois d’avril n’a que deux jours heureux, le 5 et le 27, et quatre jours malheureux, le 10, le 20, le 29 et le 30. Cela a été mis hors de doute par les calculs de Cardan. Je voudrais que ce jour-ci soit passé. Être parti, cela soulage. Nous serons au petit jour à Gravesend et demain soir à Rotterdam. Parbleu, je recommencerai la vie d'autrefois dans la cahute, nous la traînerons, n'est-ce pas, Homo?

Un léger frappement annonça le consentement du loup.

Ursus continua;

— Si l'on pouvait sortir d'une douleur comme on sort d'une ville! Homo, nous pourrions encore être heureux. Hélas! il y aurait toujours celui qui n'y est plus. Une ombre, cela reste sur ceux qui survivent. Tu sais qui je veux dire, Homo. Nous étions quatre, nous ne sommes plus que trois. La vie n'est qu'une longue perte de tout ce qu'on aime. On laisse derrière soi une traînée de douleurs. Le destin nous ahurit par une prolixité de souffrances insupportables. Après cela on s'étonne que les vieilles gens rabâchent. C'est le désespoir qui fait les ganaches. Mon brave Homo, le vent arrière persiste. On ne voit plus du tout le dôme de Saint-Paul. Nous passerons tout l'heure devant Greenwich. Ce sera six bons milles de faits. Ah!
je leur tourne le dos pour jamais à ces odieuses capitales, pleines de prêtres, de magistrats, de populaces. J'aime mieux voir remuer les feuilles dans les bois. — Toujours le front en sueur! Elle a de grosses veines violettes que je n'aime pas sur l'avant-bras. C'est de la fièvre qui est là-dedans. Ah! tout cela me tue. Dors, mon enfant. Oh oui, elle dort.

Ici une voix s'éleva, voix ineffable, qui semblait lointaine, qui paraissait venir à la fois des hauteurs et des profondeurs, divinement sinistre, la voix de Dea.

Tout ce que Gwynplaine avait éprouvé jusqu'à ce moment ne fut plus rien. Son ange parlait. Il lui semblait entendre des paroles dites hors de la vie dans un évanouissement plein de ciel.

La voix disait:

— Il a bien fait de s'en aller. Ce monde-ci n'est pas celui qu'il lui faut. Seulement il faut que j'aille avec lui. Père, je ne suis pas malade, je vous entendais parler tout à l'heure, je suis très bien, je me porte bien, je dormais. Père, je vais être heureuse.

— Mon enfant, demanda Ursus avec l'accent de l'angoisse, qu'entends-tu par là?

La réponse fut:

— Père, ne vous faites pas de peine.

Il y eut une pause, comme pour une reprise d'haleine, puis ces quelques mots, prononcés lentement, arrivèrent à Gwynplaine:

— Gwynplaine n’est plus là. C’est à présent que je suis aveugle.
Je ne connaissais pas la nuit. La nuit, c’est l’absence.

La voix s’arrêta encore, puis poursuivit:

— J’avais toujours l’anxiété qu’il ne s’envolât; je le sentais céleste. Il a tout à coup pris son vol. Cela devait finir par là. Une âme, cela s’en va comme un oiseau. Mais le nid de l’âme est dans une profondeur où il y a le grand aimant qui attire tout, et je sais bien où retrouver Gwynplaine. Je ne suis pas embarrassée de mon chemin, allez. Père, c’est là-bas. Plus tard, vous nous rejoindrez. Et Homo aussi.

Homo, entendant prononcer son nom, frappa un petit coup sur le pont.

— Père, reprit la voix, vous comprenez bien que, du moment o Gwynplaine n’est plus là, c’est une chose finie. Je voudrais rester que je ne pourrais pas, parce qu’on est bien forcé de respirer. Il ne faut pas demander ce qui n’est pas possible.
J’étais avec Gwynplaine, c’était tout simple, je vivais.
Maintenant Gwynplaine n’y est plus, je meurs. C’est la même chose. Il faut ou qu’il revienne, ou que je m’en aille.
Puisqu’il ne peut pas revenir, je m’en vais. Mourir, c’est bien bon. Ce n’est pas difficile du tout. Père, ce qui s’éteint ici se rallume ailleurs. Vivre sur cette terre où nous sommes, c’est un serrement de coeur. Il ne se peut pas qu’on soit toujours malheureux. Alors on s’en va dans ce que vous appelez les étoiles, on se marie là, on ne se quitte plus jamais, on s’aime, on s’aime, on s’aime, et c’est cela qui est le bon Dieu.

— La, ne te fâche pas, dit Ursus.

La voix continua.

— Par exemple, eh bien, l’an passé, au printemps de l’an passé, on était ensemble, on était heureux, il y a à présent bien de la différence. Je ne me souviens plus dans quelle petite ville nous étions, il y avait des arbres, j’entendais chanter des fauvettes.
Nous sommes venus à Londres. Cela a changé. Ce n’est pas un reproche que je fais. On vient dans un pays, on ne peut pas savoir. Père, vous rappelez-vous? un soir il y a eu dans la grande loge une femme, vous avez dit: c’est une duchesse! j’ai été triste. Je crois qu’il aurait mieux valu rester dans les petites villes. Après cela, Gwynplaine a bien fait. Maintenant c’est mon tour. Puisque c’est vous-même qui m’avez raconté que j’étais toute petite, que ma mère était morte, que j’étais par terre dans la nuit avec de la neige qui tombait sur moi, et que lui, qui était petit aussi, et tout seul aussi, il m’avait ramassée, et que c’était comme cela que j’étais en vie, vous ne pouvez pas vous étonner que j’aie aujourd’hui absolument besoin de partir, et que je veuille aller voir dans la tombe si Gwynplaine y est. Parce que la seule chose qui existe dans la vie, c’est le coeur, et, après la vie, c’est l’âme. Vous vous rendez bien compte de ce que je dis, n’est-ce pas, père? Qu’est-ce qui remue donc? il me semble que nous sommes dans une maison qui remue. Pourtant je n’entends pas le bruit des roues.

Après une interruption, la voix ajouta:

— Je ne distingue pas beaucoup entre hier et aujourd’hui. Je ne me plains pas. J’ignore ce qui s’est passé, mais il doit y avoir eu des choses.

Ces paroles étaient dites avec une profonde douceur inconsolable, et un soupir, que Gwynplaine entendit, s’acheva ainsi:

— Il faut que je m’en aille, à moins qu’il ne revienne.

Ursus, sombre, grommela à demi-voix:

— Je ne crois pas aux revenants.

Il reprit:

— C’est une barque. Tu demandes pourquoi la maison remue, c’est que nous sommes dans une barque. Calme-toi. Il ne faut pas trop parler. Ma fille, si tu as un peu d’amitié pour moi, ne t’agite pas, ne te donne pas de fièvre. Vieux comme je suis, je ne pourrais pas supporter une maladie que tu aurais. Épargne-moi, ne sois pas malade.

La voix recommença:

— Chercher sur la terre, à quoi bon? puisqu’on ne trouve qu’au ciel.

Ursus répliqua, presque avec un essai d’autorité:

— Calme-toi. Il y a des moments où tu n’as pas d’intelligence du tout. Je te recommande de rester en repos. Après ça, tu n’es pas forcée de savoir ce que c’est que la veine cave. Je serais tranquille si tu étais tranquille. Mon enfant, fais aussi quelque chose pour moi. Il t’a ramassée, mais je t’ai recueillie. Tu te rends malade. C’est mal. Il faut te calmer et dormir. Tout ira bien. Je te jure ma parole d’honneur que tout ira bien. Nous avons un très beau temps d’ailleurs. C’est comme une nuit faite exprès. Nous serons demain à Rotterdam qui est une ville en Hollande, à l’embouchure de la Meuse.

— Père, dit la voix, voyez-vous, quand c’est depuis l’enfance et qu’on a toujours été l’un avec l’autre, il ne faudrait pas que cela se dérangeât, parce qu’alors il faut mourir et qu’il n’y a même pas moyen de faire autrement. Je vous aime bien tout de même, mais je sens bien que je ne suis plus tout à fait avec vous, quoique je ne sois pas encore avec lui.

— Allons, insista Ursus, tâche de te rendormir.

La voix répondit:

— Ce n'est pas cela qui me manquera.

Ursus repartit, avec une intonation toute tremblante:

— Je te dis que nous allons en Hollande, à Rotterdam, qui est une ville.

— Père, continua la voix, je ne suis pas malade, si c'est cela qui vous inquiète, vous pouvez vous rassurer, je n'ai pas de fièvre, j'ai un peu chaud, voilà tout.

Ursus balbutia:

— A l'embouchure de la Meuse.

— Je me porte bien, père, mais voyez-vous, je me sens mourir.

— Ne va pas t'aviser d'une chose pareille, dit Ursus.

Et il ajouta:

— Surtout qu'elle n'ait pas de secousse, mon Dieu!

Il y eut un silence.

Tout à coup Ursus cria:

— Qu'est-ce que tu fais? Pourquoi te lèves-tu? Je t'en supplie, reste couchée!

Gwynplaine tressaillit, et avança la tête.

LE PARADIS RETROUVÉ ICI-BAS

Il aperçut Dea. Elle venait de se dresser toute droite sur le matelas. Elle avait une longue robe soigneusement fermée, blanche, qui ne laissait voir que la naissance des épaules et l'attache délicate de son cou. Les manches cachaient ses bras, les plis couvraient ses pieds. On voyait ses mains où se gonflait en embranchements bleuâtres le réseau des veines chaudes de fièvre. Elle était frissonnante, et oscillait plutôt qu'elle ne chancelait, comme un roseau. La lanterne l'éclairait d'en bas. Son beau visage était indicible. Ses cheveux dénoués flottaient. Aucune larme ne coulait sur ses joues. Il y avait dans ses prunelles du feu, et de la nuit. Elle était pâle de cette pâleur qui ressemble à la transparence de la vie divine sur une figure terrestre. Son corps exquis et frêle était comme mêl et fondu dans le plissement de sa robe. Elle ondoyait tout entière avec le tremblement d'une flamme. Et en même temps on sentait qu'elle commençait à n'être plus que de l'ombre. Ses yeux, tout grands ouverts, resplendissaient. On eût dit une sortie de sépulcre et une âme debout dans une aurore.

Ursus, dont Gwynplaine ne voyait que le dos, levait des bras effarés.

— Ma fille! ah! mon Dieu, voilà le délire qui la prend! le délire! c'est ce que je craignais. Il ne faudrait pas de secousse, car cela pourrait la tuer, et il en faudrait une pour l'empêcher de devenir folle. Morte, ou folle! quelle situation!
que faire, mon Dieu? Ma fille, recouche-toi!

Cependant Dea parlait. Sa voix était presque indistincte, comme si une épaisseur céleste était déjà interposée entre elle et la terre.

— Père, vous vous trompez. Je n'ai aucun délire. J'entends très bien tout ce que vous me dites. Vous me dites qu'il y a beaucoup de monde, qu'on attend, et qu'il faut que je joue ce soir, je veux bien, vous voyez que j'ai ma raison, mais je ne sais pas comment faire, puisque je suis morte et puisque Gwynplaine est mort. Moi, je viens tout de même. Je consens à jouer. Me voici; mais Gwynplaine n'y est plus.

— Mon enfant, répéta Ursus, allons, obéis-moi. Remets-toi sur ton lit.

— Il n'y est plus! il n'y est plus! oh! comme il fait noir!

— Noir! balbutia Ursus, voilà la première fois qu'elle dit ce mot!

Gwynplaine, sans plus de bruit qu'un glissement, monta le marchepied de la baraque, y entra, décrocha son capingot et son esclavine, endossa le capingot, mit l'esclavine à son cou et redescendit de la cahute, toujours caché par l'espèce d'encombrement que faisaient la cabane, les agrès et le mât.

Dea continuait de murmurer, elle remuait les lèvres, et peu à peu ce murmure devint une mélodie. Elle ébaucha, avec les intermittences et les lacunes du délire, le mystérieux appel qu'elle avait tant de fois adressé à Gwynplaine dans Chaos vaincu. Elle se mit à chanter, et ce chant était vague et faible comme un bourdonnement d'abeille:

Noche, quita te de alli, La alba canta...

Nuit, va-t'en. L'aube chante.

Elle s'interrompit:

— Non, ce n'est pas vrai, je ne suis pas morte. Qu'est-ce que je disais donc? Hélas! je suis vivante. Je suis vivante, et il est mort. Je suis en bas, et il est en haut. Il est parti, et moi je reste. Je ne l'entendrai plus parler et marcher. Dieu nous avait donné un peu de paradis sur la terre, il nous l'a retiré. Gwynplaine! c'est fini. Je ne le sentirai plus près de moi. Jamais. Sa voix! je n'entendrai plus sa voix.

Et elle chanta:

Es menester a cielos ir... ... Dexa, quiero, A tu negro Caparazon.

Il faut aller au ciel... ...Quitte, je le veux, Ta noire enveloppe!

Et elle étendit la main comme si elle cherchait où s'appuyer dans l'infini.

Gwynplaine, surgissant à côté d'Ursus brusquement pétrifié, s'agenouilla devant elle.

— Jamais! dit Dea. Jamais! je ne l'entendrai plus!

Et elle se remit à chanter, égarée:

Dexa, quiero, A tu negro Caparazon!

Alors elle entendit une voix, la voix bien-aimée, qui répondait:

O ven! ama! Eres aima, Soy corazon.

Oh! viens! aime! Tu es âme, Je suis coeur.

Et en même temps Dea sentit sous sa main la tête de Gwynplaine.
Elle jeta un cri inexprimable:

— Gwynplaine!

Une clarté d'astre apparut sur sa figure pâle, et elle chancela.

Gwynplaine la reçut dans ses bras.

— Vivant! cria Ursus.

Dea répéta: — Gwynplaine!

Et sa tête se ploya contre la joue de Gwynplaine. Elle dit, tout bas:

— Tu redescends! merci.

Et, relevant le front, assise sur le genou de Gwynplaine, enlacée dans son étreinte, elle tourna vers lui son doux visage, et fixa sur les yeux de Gwynplaine ses yeux pleins de ténèbres et de rayons, comme si elle le regardait.

— C'est toi! dit-elle.

Gwynplaine couvrait sa robe de baisers. Il y a des paroles qui sont à la fois des mots, des cris et des sanglots. Toute l'extase et toute la douleur s'y fondent et éclatent pêle-mêle.

Cela n'a aucun sens, et cela dit tout.

— Oui, moi! c'est moi! moi Gwynplaine! celui dont tu es l'âme, entends-tu? moi dont tu es l'enfant, l'épouse, l'étoile, le souffle! moi dont tu es l'éternité! C'est moi! je suis là, je te tiens dans mes bras. Je suis vivant. Je suis à toi. Ah!

quand je pense que j'étais au moment d'en finir! Une minute de plus! Sans Homo! Je te dirai cela. Comme c'est près de la joie le désespoir! Dea, vivons! Dea, pardonne-moi! Oui! à toi jamais! Tu as raison, touche mon front, assure-toi que c'est moi. Si tu savais! Mais rien ne peut plus nous séparer. Je sors de l'enfer et je remonte au ciel. Tu dis que je redescends, non, je remonte. Me revoici avec toi. A jamais, te dis-je!

Ensemble! nous sommes ensemble! qui aurait dit cela? Nous nous retrouvons. Tout le mal est fini. Il n'y a plus devant nous que de l'enchantement. Nous recommencerons notre vie heureuse, et nous en fermerons si bien la porte que le mauvais sort n'y pourra plus rentrer. Je te conterai tout. Tu seras étonnée. Le bateau est parti. Personne ne peut faire que le bateau ne soit pas parti. Nous sommes en route, et en liberté. Nous allons en Hollande, nous nous marierons, je ne suis pas embarrassé pour gagner ma vie, qui est-ce qui pourrait empêcher cela? Il n'y a plus rien à craindre. Je t'adore.

— Pas si vite! balbutia Ursus.

Dea, tremblante, et avec le frémissement d'un toucher céleste, promenait sa main sur le profil de Gwynplaine. Il l'entendit qui se disait à elle-même:

— C'est comme cela que Dieu est fait.

Puis elle toucha ses vêtements.

— L’esclavine, dit-elle. Le capingot. Il n’y a rien de changé. Tout est comme auparavant.

Ursus, stupéfait, épanoui, riant, inondé de larmes, les regardait et s’adressait à lui-même un aparté.

— Je ne comprends pas du tout. Je suis un absurde idiot. Moi qui l’ai vu porter en terre! Je pleure et je ris. Voilà tout ce que je sais. Je suis aussi bête que si, moi aussi, j’étais amoureux. Mais c’est que je le suis. Je suis amoureux des deux.
Vieille brute, va! Trop d’émotions. Trop d’émotions. C’est ce que je craignais. Non, c’est ce que je voulais. Gwynplaine, ménage-la. Au fait, qu’ils s’embrassent. Cela ne me regarde pas. J’assiste à l’incident. Ce que j’éprouve est drôle. Je suis le parasite de leur bonheur et j’en prends ma part. Je n’y suis pour rien, et il me semble que j’y suis pour quelque chose. Mes enfants, je vous bénis.

Et pendant qu’Ursus monologuait, Gwynplaine s’écriait:

— Dea, tu es trop belle. Je ne sais pas où j’avais l’esprit ces jours-ci. Il n’y a absolument que toi sur la terre. Je te revois, et je n’y crois pas encore. Sur cette barque! Mais, dis-moi, que s’est-il donc passé? Et voilà l’état où l’on vous a mis! Où donc est la Green-Box? On vous a volés, on vous a chassés. C’est infâme. Ah! je vous vengerai! je te vengerai, Dea! on aura affaire à moi. Je suis pair d’Angleterre.

Ursus, comme heurté par une planète en pleine poitrine, recula et considéra Gwynplaine attentivement.

— Il n’est pas mort, c’est clair, mais serait-il fou?

Et il tendit l’oreille avec défiance.

Gwynplaine reprit:

— Sois tranquille, Dea. Je porterai ma plainte à la chambre des lords.

Ursus l’examina encore, et se frappa le milieu du front avec le petit bout de son doigt.

Puis, prenant son parti:

— Ça m’est égal, murmura-t-il. Cela ira tout de même. Sois fou, si tu veux, mon Gwynplaine. C’est le droit de l’homme. Moi, je suis heureux. Mais qu’est-ce que c’est que tout cela?

Le navire continuait de fuir mollement et vite, la nuit était de plus en plus obscure, des brumes qui venaient de l’océan envahissaient le zénith d’où aucun vent ne les balayait, quelques grosses étoiles à peine étaient visibles et s’estompaient l’une après l’autre, et au bout de quelque temps il n’y en eut plus du tout, et tout le ciel fut noir, infini et doux. Le fleuve s’élargissait, et ses deux rives à droite et à gauche n’étaient plus que deux minces lignes brunes presque amalgamées à la nuit.

De toute cette ombre sortait un profond apaisement. Gwynplaine s’était assis à demi, tenant Dea embrassée. Ils parlaient, s’écriaient, jasaient, chuchotaient. Dialogue éperdu. Comment vous peindre, ô joie?

— Ma vie!

— Mon ciel!

— Mon amour!

— Tout mon bonheur!

— Gwynplaine!

— Dea! je suis ivre. Laisse-moi baiser tes pieds.

— C’est toi donc!

— En ce moment-ci, j’ai trop à dire à la fois. Je ne sais par o commencer.

— Un baiser!

— O ma femme!

— Gwynplaine, ne me dis pas que je suis belle. C’est toi qui es beau.

— Je te retrouve, je t’ai sur mon coeur. Cela est. Tu es à moi.
Je ne rêve pas. C’est bien toi. Est-ce possible? oui. Je reprends possession de la vie. Si tu savais, il y a eu toutes sortes d’événements. Dea!

— Gwynplaine!

— Je t’aime!

Et Ursus murmurait:

— J’ai une joie de grand-père.

Homo était sorti de dessous la cahute, et, allant de l’un l’autre, discrètement, n’exigeant pas qu’on fit attention à lui, il donnait des coups de langue à tort et à travers, tantôt aux gros souliers d’Ursus, tantôt au capingot de Gwynplaine, tantôt la robe de Dea, tantôt au matelas. C’était sa façon à lui de bénir.

On avait dépassé Chatham et l’embouchure de la Medway. On approchait de la mer. La sérénité ténébreuse de l’étendue était telle que la descente de la Tamise se faisait sans complication; aucune manoeuvre n’était nécessaire, et aucun matelot n’avait ét appelé sur le pont. A l’autre extrémité du navire, le patron, toujours seul à la barre, gouvernait. A l’arrière, il n’y avait que cet homme; à l’avant, la lanterne éclairait l’heureux groupe de ces êtres qui venaient de faire, au fond du malheur subitement changé en félicité, cette jonction inespérée.

IV

NON. LA-HAUT

Tout à coup, Dea, se dégageant de l’embrassement de Gwynplaine, se souleva. Elle appuyait ses deux mains sur son coeur, comme pour l’empêcher de se déranger.

— Qu’est-ce que j’ai? dit-elle. J’ai quelque chose. La joie, cela étouffe. Ce n’est rien. C’est bon. En reparaissant, ô mon Gwynplaine, tu m’as donné un coup. Un coup de bonheur. Tout le ciel qui vous entre dans le coeur, c’est un enivrement. Toi absent, je me sentais expirer. La vraie vie qui s’en allait, tu me l’as rendue. J’ai eu en moi comme un déchirement, le déchirement des ténèbres, et j’ai senti monter la vie, une vie ardente, une vie de fièvre et de délices. C’est extraordinaire, cette vie-là, que tu viens de me donner. Elle est si céleste qu’on souffre un peu. C’est comme si l’âme grandissait et avait de la peine à tenir dans notre corps. Cette vie des séraphins, cette plénitude, elle reflue jusqu’à ma tête, et me pénètre.

J’ai comme un battement d’ailes dans la poitrine. Je me sens étrange, mais bien heureuse. Gwynplaine, tu m’as ressuscitée.

Elle rougit, puis pâlit, puis rougit encore, et tomba.

— Hélas! dit Ursus, tu l’as tuée.

Gwynplaine étendit les bras vers Dea. L’angoisse suprême survenant dans la suprême extase, quel choc! Il fût lui-même tombé, s’il n’eût eu à la soutenir.

— Dea! cria-t-il frémissant, qu’est-ce que tu as?

— Rien, dit-elle. Je t’aime.

Elle était dans les bras de Gwynplaine comme un linge qu’on a ramassé. Ses mains pendaient.

Gwynplaine et Ursus couchèrent Dea sur le matelas. Elle dit faiblement:

— Je ne respire pas couchée.

Ils la mirent sur son séant.

Ursus dit:

— Un oreiller!

Elle répondit:

— Pourquoi? j’ai Gwynplaine.

Et elle posa sa tête sur l’épaule de Gwynplaine, assis derrière elle et la soutenant, l’oeil plein d’un égarement infortuné.

— Ah! dit-elle, comme je suis bien!

Ursus lui avait saisi le poignet, et comptait les pulsations de l’artère. Il ne hochait pas le front, il ne disait rien, et l’on ne pouvait deviner ce qu’il pensait qu’aux rapides mouvements de ses paupières, s’ouvrant et se refermant convulsivement, comme pour empêcher un flot de larmes de sortir.

— Qu’a-t-elle? demanda Gwynplaine.

Ursus appuya son oreille contre le flanc gauche de Dea.

Gwynplaine répéta ardemment sa question, en tremblant qu’Ursus ne lui répondit.

Ursus regarda Gwynplaine, puis Dea. Il était livide. Il dit:

— Nous devons être à la hauteur de Canterbury. La distance d’ici à Gravesend n’est pas très grande. Nous aurons beau temps toute la nuit. Il n’y a pas à craindre d’attaque en mer, parce que les flottes de guerre sont sur la côte d’Espagne. Nous aurons un bon passage.

Dea, ployée et de plus en plus pâle, pétrissait dans ses doigts convulsifs l’étoffe de sa robe. Elle eut un soupir inexprimablement pensif, et murmura:

— Je comprends ce que c’est. Je meurs.

Gwynplaine se leva terrible. Ursus soutint Dea.

— Mourir! Toi mourir! non, cela ne sera pas. Tu ne peux pas mourir. Mourir à présent! mourir tout de suite! c’est impossible. Dieu n’est pas féroce. Te rendre et te reprendre dans la même minute! Non. Ces choses-là ne se font pas. Alors c’est que Dieu voudrait qu’on doute de lui. Alors c’est que tout serait un piège, la terre, le ciel, le berceau des enfants, l’allaitement des mères, le coeur humain, l’amour, les étoiles! c’est que Dieu serait un traître et l’homme une dupe! c’est qu’il n’y aurait rien! c’est qu’il faudrait insulter la création! c’est que tout serait un abîme! Tu ne sais ce que tu dis, Dea! tu vivras. J’exige que tu vives. Tu dois m’obéir. Je suis ton mari et ton maître. Je te défends de me quitter. Ah ciel! Ah misérables hommes! Non, cela ne se peut pas. Et je resterais sur cette terre après toi! Cela est tellement monstrueux qu’il n’y aurait plus de soleil. Dea, Dea, remets-toi. C’est un petit moment d’angoisse qui va passer. On a quelquefois des frissons, et puis on n’y pense plus. J’ai absolument besoin que tu te portes bien et que tu ne souffres plus. Toi mourir! qu’est-ce que je t’ai fait? D’y penser, ma raison s’en va. Nous sommes l’un à l’autre, nous nous aimons.

Tu n’as pas de motif de t’en aller. Ce serait injuste. Ai-je commis des crimes? Tu m’as pardonné d’ailleurs. Oh! tu ne veux pas que je devienne un désespéré, un scélérat, un furieux, un damné! Dea! je t’en prie, je t’en conjure, je t’en supplie mains jointes, ne meurs pas.

Et, crispant ses poings dans ses cheveux, agonisant d’épouvanté, étouffé de pleurs, il se jeta à ses pieds.

— Mon Gwynplaine, dit Dea, ce n’est pas ma faute.

Il lui vint aux lèvres un peu d’écume rose qu’Ursus essuya d’un pan de la robe sans que Gwynplaine prosterné le vît. Gwynplaine tenait les pieds de Dea embrassés, et l’implorait avec toutes sortes de mots confus.

— Je te dis que je ne veux pas. Toi, mourir! je n’en ai pas la force. Mourir oui, mais ensemble. Pas autrement. Toi mourir, Dea! Il n’y a pas moyen que j’y consente. Ma divinité! mon amour! comprends donc que je suis là. Je te jure que tu vivras.

Mourir! mais c’est qu’alors tu ne te figures pas ce que je deviendrais après ta mort. Si tu avais l’idée du besoin que j’ai de ne pas te perdre, tu verrais que c’est positivement impossible, Dea! Je n’ai que toi, vois-tu. Ce qui m’est arriv est extraordinaire. Tu ne t’imagines pas que je viens de traverser toute la vie en quelques heures. J’ai reconnu une chose, c’est qu’il n’y avait rien du tout. Toi, tu existes. Si tu n’y es pas, l’univers n’a plus de sens. Reste. Aie pitié de moi. Puisque tu m’aimes, vis. Je viens de te retrouver, c’est pour te garder. Attends un peu. On ne s’en va pas comme cela quand on est à peine ensemble depuis quelques instants. Ne t’impatiente pas. Ah! mon Dieu, que je souffre! Tu ne m’en veux pas, n’est-ce pas? Tu comprends bien que je n’ai pas pu faire autrement puisque c’est le wapentake qui est venu me chercher. Tu vas voir que tu vas respirer mieux tout à l’heure. Dea, tout vient de s’arranger. Nous allons être heureux. Ne me mets pas au désespoir. Dea! je ne t’ai rien fait!

Ces paroles n’étaient pas dites, mais sanglotées. On y sentait un mélange d’accablement et de révolte. Il sortait de la poitrine de Gwynplaine un gémissement qui eût attiré des colombes et un rugissement qui eût fait reculer des lions.

Dea lui répondit, d’une voix de moins en moins distincte, s’arrêtant presque à chaque mot:

— Hélas! c’est inutile. Mon bien-aimé, je vois bien que tu fais ce que tu peux. Il y a une heure, je voulais mourir, à présent je ne voudrais plus. Gwynplaine, mon Gwynplaine adoré, comme nous avons été heureux! Dieu t’avait mis dans ma vie, il me retire de la tienne. Voilà que je m’en vais. Tu te souviendras de la Green-Box, n’est-ce pas? et de ta pauvre petite Dea aveugle? Tu te souviendras de ma chanson. N’oublie pas mon son de voix, et la manière dont je te disais: Je t’aime! Je reviendrai te le dire, la nuit, quand tu dormiras. Nous nous étions retrouvés, mais c’était trop de joie. Cela devait finir tout de suite. C’est décidément moi qui pars la première. J’aime bien mon père Ursus, et notre frère Homo. Vous êtes bons.

L’air manque ici. Ouvrez la fenêtre. Mon Gwynplaine, je ne te l’ai pas dit, mais parce qu’il y a eu une fois une femme qui est venue, j’ai été jalouse. Tu ne sais même pas de qui je veux parler. Pas vrai? Couvrez-moi les bras. J’ai un peu froid. Et Fibi? et Vinos? où sont-elles? On finit par aimer tout le monde. On prend en amitié les personnes qui vous ont vu être heureux. On leur sait gré d’avoir été là pendant qu’on était content. Pourquoi tout cela est-il passé? Je n’ai pas bien compris ce qui est arrivé depuis deux jours. Maintenant je meurs. Vous me laisserez dans ma robe. Tantôt en la mettant je pensais bien que ce serait mon suaire. Je veux la garder. Il y a des baisers de Gwynplaine dessus. Oh! j’aurais pourtant bien voulu vivre encore. Quelle vie charmante nous avions dans notre pauvre cabane qui roulait! On chantait. J’écoutais les battements de mains! Comme c’était bon, n’être jamais séparés!

Il me semblait que j’étais dans un nuage avec vous, je me rendais bien compte de tout, je distinguais un jour de l’autre, quoique aveugle, je reconnaissais que c’était le matin parce que j’entendais Gwynplaine, je reconnaissais que c’était la nuit parce que je rêvais de Gwynplaine. Je sentais autour de moi une enveloppe qui était son âme. Nous nous sommes doucement adorés.

Tout cela s’en va, et il n’y aura plus de chansons. Hélas! ce n’est donc pas possible de vivre encore! Tu penseras à moi, mon bien-aimé.

Sa voix allait s’affaiblissant. La décroissance lugubre de l’agonie lui ôtait l’haleine. Elle repliait son pouce sous ses doigts, signe que la dernière minute approche. Le bégaiement de l’ange commençant semblait s’ébaucher dans le doux râle de la vierge.

Elle murmura:

— Vous vous souviendrez, n’est-ce pas, parce que ce serait bien triste que je sois morte si l’on ne se souvenait pas de moi.
J’ai quelquefois été méchante. Je vous demandée tous pardon. Je suis bien certaine que, si le bon Dieu avait voulu, comme nous ne tenons pas beaucoup de place, nous aurions encore été heureux, mon Gwynplaine, puisqu’on aurait gagné sa vie et qu’on aurait ét ensemble dans un autre pays, mais le bon Dieu n’a pas voulu. Je ne sais pas du tout pourquoi je meurs. Puisque je ne me plaignais pas d’être aveugle, je n’offensais personne. Je n’aurais pas mieux demandé que de rester toujours aveugle à côt de toi. Oh! comme c’est triste de s’en aller!

Ses paroles haletaient, et s’éteignaient l’une après l’autre, comme si l’on eût soufflé dessus. On ne l’entendait presque plus.

— Gwynplaine, reprit-elle, n’est-ce pas? tu penseras à moi.
J’en aurai besoin, quand je serai morte.

Et elle ajouta:

— Oh! retenez-moi!

Puis, après un silence, elle dit:

— Viens me rejoindre le plus tôt que tu pourras. Je vais être bien malheureuse sans toi, même avec Dieu. Ne me laisse pas trop longtemps seule, mon doux Gwynplaine! C’est ici qu’était le paradis. Là-haut, ce n’est que le ciel. Ah! j’étouffe! Mon bien-aimé, mon bien-aimé, mon bien-aimé!

— Grâce! cria Gwynplaine.

— Adieu! dit-elle.

— Grâce! répéta Gwynplaine.

Et il colla sa bouche aux belles mains glacées de Dea.

Elle fut un moment comme si elle ne respirait plus.

Puis elle se haussa sur ses coudes, un profond éclair traversa ses yeux, et elle eut un ineffable sourire. Sa voix éclata, vivante.

— Lumière! cria-t-elle. Je vois.

Et elle expira.

Elle retomba étendue et immobile sur le matelas.

— Morte, dit Ursus.

Et le pauvre vieux bonhomme, comme s’écroulant sous le désespoir, prosterna sa tète chauve et enfouit son visage sanglotant dans les plis de la robe aux pieds de Dea. Il demeura là, évanoui.

Alors Gwynplaine fut effrayant.

Il se dressa debout, leva le front, et considéra au-dessus de sa tête l’immense nuit.

Puis, vu de personne, regardé pourtant peut-être dans ces ténèbres par quelqu’un d’invisible, il étendit les bras vers la profondeur d’en haut, et dit:

— Je viens.

Et il se mit à marcher, dans la direction du bord, sur le pont du navire, comme si une vision l’attirait.

A quelques pas c’était l’abîme.

Il marchait lentement, il ne regardait pas à ses pieds.

Il avait le sourire que Dea venait d’avoir.

Il allait droit devant lui. Il semblait voir quelque chose. Il avait dans la prunelle une lueur qui était comme la réverbération d’une âme aperçue au loin.

Il cria: — Oui!

A chaque pas il se rapprochait du bord.

Il marchait tout d’une pièce, les bras levés, la tête renversée en arrière, l’oeil fixe, avec un mouvement de fantôme.

Il avançait sans hâte et sans hésitation, avec une précision fatale, comme s’il n’eût pas eu tout près le gouffre béant et la tombe ouverte.

Il murmurait: — Sois tranquille. Je te suis. Je distingue très bien le signe que tu me fais.

Il ne quittait pas des yeux un point du ciel, au plus haut de l’ombre. Il souriait.

Le ciel était absolument noir, il n’y avait plus d’étoiles, mais évidemment il en voyait une.

Il traversa le tillac.

Après quelques pas rigides et sinistres, il parvint à l’extrême bord.

— J’arrive, dit-il. Dea, me voilà.

Et il continua de marcher. Il n’y avait pas de parapet. Le vide était devant lui. Il y mit le pied.

Il tomba.

La nuit était épaisse et sourde, l’eau était profonde. Il s’engloutit. Ce fut une disparition calme et sombre. Personne ne vit ni n’entendit rien. Le navire continua de voguer et le fleuve de couler.

Peu après le navire entra dans l’océan.

Quand Ursus revint à lui, il ne vit plus Gwynplaine, et il aperçut près du bord Homo qui hurlait dans l’ombre en regardant la mer.

Au bas de la dernière page du manuscrit de l'Homme qui Rit, se trouve la note suivante:

NINETY-THREE

Anonymous translation, 1901

This is Hugo's last novel, which was first published in 1874, shortly after the bloody upheaval of the Paris Commune. The novel portrays the Revolt in the Vendée and Chouannerie, which were the counter-revolutionary revolts in 1793 during the French Revolution. Divided into three parts, though not in chronological order, the novel's three different stories mainly take place in France, as well as the Channel Islands, where Hugo lived in later years.

Ninety-Three begins in the year 1793. During the Royalist insurrection of the Chouannerie, a troop of French Republic soldiers in Brittany encounter Michelle Fléchard, a peasant woman, and her three young children, who are fleeing from the conflict. When she explains that her husband and parents have been killed, the troop's commander, Sergeant Radoub, convinces his men to look after the family.

Throughout the novel's many historical events, Hugo clearly supports the revolutionaries and yet he ensures the Royalist counter-revolutionaries are in no way villainous, giving his portrayal a somewhat realistic approach, despite his overall intentions.

PART FIRST. — AT SEA.

BOOK FIRST. — THE WOODS OF LA SAUDRAIE.

During the last of May, 1793, one of the Parisian battalions led into Brittany by Santerre was scouring the terrible woods of La Saudraie in Astillé. The battalion had only three hundred men left, for it had been decimated by the cruel war. It was at the time when after Argonne, Jemmapes, and Valmy, there remained of the first battalion of Paris, originally numbering six hundred volunteers, twenty-seven men; of the second battalion, thirty-three men; and of the third, fifty-seven. It was a time of epic conflicts.

The battalions sent from Paris to La Vendeé numbered nine hundred and twelve men. Each battalion had three pieces of cannon. The troops had been quickly raised. On the twenty-fifth of April, Gohier being minister of justice, and Bouchotte minister of war, the section of the Bon Conseil, had proposed to send battalions of volunteers to La Vendée. Lubin, member of the commune, had made the report: the first of May, Santerre was ready to send out twelve thousand soldiers, thirty field-pieces and a battalion of gunners. These battalions organized hastily were so well organized, that they serve as models to-day; the companies of the line are made up on the principle governing them; the only change has been in the proportion between the number of soldiers and non-commissioned officers.

On the twenty-eighth of April the commune of Paris gave this order to Santerre’s volunteers: “No mercy, no quarter.” At the end of May, of the twelve thousand Parisian troops, two-thirds were dead.

The battalion engaged in the woods of La Saudraie was proceeding cautiously. They took their time. They looked to the right and to the left, in front of them and behind them at the same time. Kléber has said: “The soldier has an eye in his back.” They had been marching for hours. What time could it be? What part of the day was it? It would have been difficult to say, for there is always a sort of twilight in such wild thickets, and it is never light in these woods.

The forest of La Saudraie was tragic. It was in these woods that the civil war began its crimes in the month of November, 1792. The ferocious cripple, Mousqueton, had come out of these gloomy depths; the number of murders committed there made one’s hair stand on end. There was no place more frightful. The soldiers penetrated there cautiously. Everywhere was abundance of flowers; one was surrounded with a trembling wall of branches, from which hung the charming freshness of the foliage; sunbeams here and there made their way through the green shade; on the ground the gladiolus, the yellow swamp flag, the meadow narcissus, the gênotte, the herald of fine weather, and the spring crocus formed the embroidery and decoration of a thick carpet of vegetation, luxuriant in every kind of moss, from that resembling velvet, to that like stars. The soldiers advanced step by step in silence, noiselessly pushing aside the underbrush. The birds warbled above their bayonets.

La Saudraie was one of those thickets where formerly in times of peace they used to hold the Houicheba, — hunting birds at night; now they were hunting men there.

The wood was full of birch trees, beeches, and oaks; the ground flat; the moss and thick grass deadened the sound of the marching men; every path lost itself abruptly among the holly, wild sloe, ferns, hedges of rest-harrow, tall briers; it was impossible to see a man ten feet away.

Occasionally, a heron or a waterfowl passed through the branches, showing that there were swamps near by.

They marched on. They went at haphazard, full of anxiety, and fearing to find what they they sought. From time to time they came across traces of encampments, burnt places, trodden-down grass, sticks in the form of a cross, bloody branches. There soup had been made, there mass had been said, there wounds had been dressed. But those who had passed this way had disappeared. Where were they? Far away, perhaps. Perhaps close by, concealed, gun in hand. The woods seemed deserted. The battalion redoubled its precaution. Solitude and suspicion. There was nobody to be seen; the more reason for fearing somebody. They had to do with a forest of ill-repute. An ambuscade was probable.

Thirty grenadiers, detached as scouts and commanded by a sergeant, were marching in advance at a considerable distance from the main body of the troop. The vivandière of the battalion accompanied them. The vivandières join the vanguards from choice. They run a risk, but they expect to see something. Curiosity is one form of feminine bravery.

Suddenly the soldiers in this little squad experienced that thrill familiar to huntsmen, which indicates that they have reached their prey. They had heard something like a whisper in the midst of a thicket, and it seemed that some one had just seen a movement among the leaves. The soldiers made signs to each other.

In the sort of watch and search entrusted to scouts, the officers do not need to take part; whatever must be done is done of itself.

In less than a minute, the spot where the movement had been seen was surrounded; a circle of pointed muskets enclosed it, the obscure centre of the thicket was aimed at from all sides at once, and the soldiers with fingers on the trigger and eyes on the suspected place, only waited for the sergeant's command to riddle it with bullets. The vivandière, however, ventured to look through the brambles, and at the instant when the sergeant was about to cry: "Fire!" this woman cried: "Halt!"

And turning towards the soldiers: "Don't shoot, comrades!"

She rushed headlong into the thicket. They followed her.

There was, indeed, some one there.

In the densest part of the thicket, on the edge of one of those little round clearings made in the woods by the charcoal furnaces in burning roots of trees, in a sort of recess among the branches, a kind of leafy chamber, half open like an alcove, a woman was sitting ou the moss, with an infant at the breast, and in her lap the blond heads of two sleeping children.

This was the ambuscade.

"What are you doing here?" cried the vivandière.

The woman raised her head.

The vivandière added fiercely, —

"Are you mad to be here!"

And she continued, —

"A little more and you would have been killed!"

And addressing the soldiers, she added, —

"It is a woman."

"By Jove, we see it is indeed!" said a grenadier.

The vivandière continued, —

"Come into the woods to be massacred! Did ever anybody imagine such stupidity as that?"

The woman stupefied, frightened, petrified, saw all about her as in a dream; these guns, these sabres, these bayonets, these fierce faces.

The two children woke up and began to cry.

"I'm hungry," said one.

"I'm afraid," said the other.

The little one went on nursing.

The vivandière spoke to it.

“You are quite right,” she said.

The mother was dumb with fright.

The sergeant cried out to her, —

“Don’t be afraid, we are the battalion of the Bonnet-Rouge.

The woman trembled from head to foot. She looked at the sergeant, whose rough face showed only his eyebrows, his moustache, and two coals which were his two eyes.

“Formerly the battalion of the Croix-Rouge, added the vivandière.

And the sergeant continued, —

“Who are you, madame?” The woman looked at him, terrified. She was thin, young, pale, and in rags; she wore the large hood of the Breton peasant, and the woollen cloak fastened at the neck with a string. She let her bare breast be seen with utter indifference. Her feet without stockings or shoes were bleeding.

“She is poor,” said the sergeant.

And the vivandière in her soldierly and feminine voice, tenderly withal, resumed, —

“What is your name?”

The woman stammered almost indistinctly, —

“Michelle Fléchard.”

Meanwhile the vivandière caressed the little head of the nursing child with her large hand.

“How old is this baby?” she asked.

The mother did not understand. The vivandière persisted.

“I asked you the age of the child.”

“Ah!” said the mother, “eighteen months.”

“It is too old,” said the vivandière. “It ought not to nurse any longer. You must wean it. We will give it some soup.”

The mother began to grow calmer. The two little ones which had awakened were more curious than frightened. They admired the plumes.

“Ah!” said the mother, “they are very hungry.”

And she added: “I have no more milk.”

“They shall have something to eat,” cried the sergeant, “and you too. But that is not all. What are your political opinions?”

The woman looked at the sergeant, but gave no answer.

"Did you hear my question?"

She stammered: "I was placed in a convent when very young, but I am married, I am not a nun. The sisters taught me to speak French. The village was set on fire. We escaped in such haste that I did not have time to put on my shoes."

"I ask what are your political opinions?"

"I don't know."

The sergeant continued, —

"There are spies about. If caught, spies are shot. You see. Speak. You are not a gypsy. What is your country?"

She still looked at him, evidently without understanding.

The sergeant asked once more: "What is your country?"

"I do not know," she said.

"What, you don't know your own country."

"Ah! my country, yes, indeed."

"Well, what is your country?"

The woman answered: " It is the farm of Siscoignard, in the parish of Azé."

It was the sergeant's turn to be amazed. He remained lost in thought for a moment, then replied, —

"What did you say?"

"Siscoignard."

"But that is not a country."

"It is my country."

And, after a moment of reflection, the woman added,— "I understand, sir. You are from France. I am from Brittany."

"Well?"

"It is not the same country."

"But it is the same fatherland!" exclaimed the sergeant.

The woman merely replied, —

"I am from Siscoignard!"

"Have it Siscoignard, then," replied the sergeant.

"Does your family belong there?"

"Yes."

"What do they do?"

"They are all dead. I have no relatives now."

The sergeant, who was clever with his tongue, continued to question her.

"People have parents, you devil, or have had them! Who are you? Speak!"

The woman heard in amazement this ou on en a eu, which sounded more like the cry of a wild-beast than human speech.

The vivandière felt the need of coming to her aid. She renewed her caresses to the nursing child, and patted the cheeks of the other two.

"What do you call the baby? " she asked; "I see it is a girl,"

The mother answered: "Georgette."

"And the oldest? he is a man, the scamp."

"René-Jean."

"And the younger one? He is a man, too, and a chubby-faced fellow besides."

"Gros-Alain," said the mother.

"They are pretty little things," said the vivandière; you seem to be somebody."

Meanwhile, the sergeant persisted in talking.

"Tell me, madame. Have you a house?"

"I had one."

"Where was it?"

"At Azé."

"Why are you not in your house?"

"Because it is burned."

"Who burned it?"

"I don't know. There was a battle."

"Where did you come from?"

"From there."

"Where are you going?"

"I don't know."

"Come to the point. Who are you?"

"I don't know."

"You don't know who you are?"

"We are people who have escaped."

"To what party do you belong?"

"I don't know."

"Do you belong to the Blues? Do you belong to the Whites? Whom are you with?"

"I am with my children."

Here was a pause. The vivandière said, —

“I never had any children. I didn’t have time.”

The sergeant began again, —

“But your parents. Come, madame, tell us about your parents. My name is Radoub; I am a sergeant, I belong in rue du Gherche-Midi; my father and mother belonged there, too. I can tell you about my parents. Tell us about yours. Tell us who your parents were.”

“They were the Fléchards.”

“Yes; the Fléchards are the Fléchards, as the Radoubs are the Radoubs. But people have some occupation. What was the occupation of your parents? What did they do? What did they make? What did they fledge these Fledghards of yours?”

“They were farmers. My father was infirm and unable to work, because he had been cudgelled by the seigneur, his seigneur, our seigneur, which was a kindness, for my father had poached a rabbit, and the penalty for this offence was death; but the seigneur had mercy and said; ‘Give him only a hundred blows,’ and my father was made a cripple.”

“Go on.”

“My grandfather was a Huguenot. The priest had him sent to the galleys. I was very young.”

“Go on.”

“My husband’s father was a salt smuggler. The king had him hanged.”

“And your husband, what does he do?”

“At the present time he is fighting.”

“For whom?”

“For the king.”

“For whom else?”

“Why, for his seigneur?”

“For whom else?”

“Why, for the priest.”

“The accursed names of brutes!” exclaimed a grenadier.

The woman shook with fear.

“You see, madame, we are Parisians,” said the vivandière kindly.

The woman clasped her hands and cried: “Oh, my Lord Jesus!”

“No superstitions,” resumed the sergeant.

The vivandière sat down beside the woman and drew to her the oldest of the children, who made no resistance. Children feel confidence just as they feel afraid, without knowing why. They have a monitor within.

“My poor good woman, you have some pretty brats, at any rate. I can guess their ages. The largest is four years old, his brother three. Indeed that nursing kid is a famous greedy-gut. You see, madame, you have nothing to fear. You shall join the battalion. You can do as I do. I call myself Houzarde; it is a nickname. But I prefer to be called Houzarde rather than Mamzelle Bicomeau, like my mother. I am the vivandière or canteen-woman, as the one is called who serves out the drink when any one is shot or killed. The devil and his train! Our feet are nearly the same size, I will give you some of my shoes. I was in Paris the tenth of August. I gave Westermann a drink. He was walking. I saw Louis XVI., Louis Capet they call him, guillotined. He didn’t like it. Why, just listen. They say that the thirteenth of January he was having chestnuts cooked, and laughing with his family! When they forced him to lie down on the bascule, as they call it, he had on neither coat nor shoe; he wore only his shirt, a quilted vest, gray cloth breeches, and gray silk stockings. I saw that myself. The carriage he was brought in was painted green. You see, come with us, we have good boys in the battalion; you shall be vivandière number two; I will teach you the profession. Oh! it is very simple! You have your can and your little bell, you go about in the tumult, in the midst of the firing of the platoons, among the cannon shots, in the uproar, shouting: “Who wants a drink, children?” It is no more difficult than that. I give everybody a drink. Yes, indeed. The Whites as well as the Blues; although I am a Blue, and a good Blue too. But I give everybody a drink. The wounded are thirsty. People die without regard for opinions. When people are dying you ought to press their hands. How silly it is to fight! Come with us. If I am killed you will be my successor. You see, that is the way I seem; but I am a good woman and a brave man. Don’t have any fear.”

When the vivandière had stopped speaking, the woman murmured: “ Our neighbor’s name was Marie-Jean, and our servant’s Maria-Claude.”

In the meantime the Sergeant Kadoub was reprimanding the grenadier, —

“Hold your tongue. You have frightened the woman. You mustn’t swear before ladies.”

“All the same, as far as an honest man can understand it, it is a genuine massacre,” replied the grenadier. “The idea of these Chinese peasants having their father-in-law crippled by the seigneur, their grandfather sent to the galleys by the priest, and their father hung by the king, and then insist on fighting. In the name of common sense! And they thrust themselves into a revolt and let themselves be crushed for the seigneur the priest and the king!”

“Silence in the ranks,” cried the sergeant.

“We’ll be silent, sergeant,” continued the grenadier, “but that won’t prevent its being a pity for a pretty woman like that to run the risk of having her neck broken for the handsome eyes of a priest.”

“Grenadier,” said the sergeant, “we are not in the Club des Piques at Paris. None of your eloquence.”

And he turned towards the woman.

“And your husband, madame? What is he doing? What has he become?”

“He hasn’t become anything, because he has been killed.”

“Where?”

“In the hedge.”

“When?”

“Three days ago.”

“Who killed him?”

“I don’t know.”

“What, you don’t know who killed your husband?”

“No.”

“Was it a Blue? Was it a White?”

“It was a bullet.”

“And three days ago?”

“Yes.”

“From which direction?”

“From Ernée. My husband fell. There!”

“And since your husband is dead, what are you going to do?”

“I am carrying away my children.”

“Where are you carrying them?”

“Straight ahead.”

“Where do you sleep?”

“On the ground.”

“What do you get to eat?”

“Nothing.”

The sergeant made up the military face of touching his nose with his moustache.

“Nothing.”

“That is to say wild plums, mulberries in the brambles, if there are any left from last year, myrtle seeds, fern shoots.”

“Yes. As much as to say nothing.”

The oldest of the children, seeming to understand, said: “I’m hungry.”

The sergeant took a piece of soldier’s bread out of his pocket and handed it to the mother. The mother broke the bread in two pieces, and gave them to the children. The little ones eagerly devoured it.

“She hasn’t kept any for herself,” muttered the sergeant.

“It is because she isn’t hungry,” said a soldier.

“It’s because she is their mother,” said the sergeant. The children interrupted them.

“I want a drink,” said one.

“I want a drink,” repeated the other.

“Is there no brook in these devilish woods?” said the sergeant.

The vivandière took the copper cup hanging from her belt beside her bell, turned the spigot of the keg which hung from her shoulder by a strap, let a few drops run into the cup, and held it to the children’s lips.

The first drank and made up a face.

The second one drank and spit it out.

“Why, it’s good,” said the vivandière.

“Is it Coupe-Figure?” asked the sergeant.

“Yes, and of the best. But they are peasants.”

And she wiped the cup.

The sergeant continued, —

“And you are making your escape in this way?”

“I am obliged to.”

“Across the country in a bee line.”

“I ran with all my might, and then I walked, and then I fell down.”

“Poor creature!” said the vivandière.

“People are fighting everywhere,” stammered the woman. “I am surrounded on all sides with gunshot. I don’t know what it all means. They have killed my husband. I only understand that.”

The sergeant thumped the ground with the butt of his musket, and exclaimed, —

“In the name of a jackass, what a beastly war this is!”

The woman continued: “Last night we slept in an émousse.”

“All four of you?”

“All four of us.”

“Slept?”

“Slept.”

“Then,” said the sergeant, “you slept standing.”

And he turned to the soldiers.

“Comrades, a great, old, hollow trunk of a tree, that a man would have to squeeze himself into as if ‘twere a knife-case, these shy creatures call that an émousse. What do you think about it? They are not obliged to be Parisians.”

“Slept in the trunk of a hollow tree!” said the vivandière; “and with three children!”

“And when the little ones bawled,” the sergeant went on to say, “it must have been funny enough for those who were passing and saw nothing at all, to hear a tree crying: ‘Papa! Mamma!’”

“Fortunately, it is summer-time,” sighed the woman.

She looked on the ground, resigned, with an expression in her eyes of that astonishment which comes from sudden misfortune.

The soldiers quietly formed a circle around the pitiful group.

A widow, three orphans, flight, desertion, solitude, mutterings of war all around the horizon, hunger, thirst, no food but grass, no roof but the heavens.

The sergeant approached the woman and looked at the nursing child. The little one left the breast, turned her head gently, looked with her beautiful blue eyes at the frightful hairy face, rough and tawny, which bent over her, and began to smile.

The sergeant straightened himself up, and a great tear was seen to roll down his cheek and rest on the end of his moustache like a pearl.

He raised his voice, —

“After all this, it is my opinion that the battalion ought to become a father. Is it agreed? Let us adopt these three children.”

“Long live the Republic!” cried the grenadiers.

“Done,” said the sergeant.

And he extended his hands above the heads of mother and children.

“Behold,” he said, “the children of the battalion of Bonnet-Rouge.”

The vivandière leaped for joy.

“Three heads in one bonnet!” she cried.

Then she burst into sobs, embraced the poor widow effusively, and said to her, —

“The baby already looks like a general!”

“Long live the Republic!” repeated the soldiers.

And the sergeant said to the mother, —

“Come, citoyenne.”

BOOK SECOND. — THE CORVETTE “CLAYMORE.”

CHAPTER I.

ENGLAND AND FRANCE.

In the spring of 1793, at the time when France, attacked on all her frontiers at once, was touchingly diverted by the fall of the Girondists, this is what took place in the Channel Islands.

One evening, the first of June, in Jersey, in the little lonely bay of Bonnenuit, about an hour before sunset, during one of those fogs convenient for escape, because they are dangerous for navigation, a corvette was preparing to set sail. The crew of this vessel was French, but it belonged to the English fleet stationed on the lookout at the eastern point of the island. The Prince of la Tour-d’Auvergne, who belonged to the house of Bouillon, commanded the English Fleet, and it was by his orders, and for an urgent and special service, that the corvette had been detached.

This corvette, enrolled at Trinity House as the “Claymore,” was to all appearances a merchant ship, but in reality was a sloop of war. She had the clumsy, peaceful aspect of a merchantman; this was a mere blind, however. She had been built for a double purpose, deception and strength: to deceive, if possible; to fight, if necessary. For the service that she had to perform this night, her cargo between decks had been replaced by thirty carronades of heavy calibre. Either because a storm was in prospect, or to give an innocent appearance to the vessel, these thirty carronades were shut in, that is securely fastened within by triple chains, and the mouths pushed up against the closed port-holes; there was nothing to be seen from the outside; the port-holes were concealed; the lids closed; it was as if the corvette wore a mask. These carronades had wheels with bronze spokes, an ancient model, called “modèle radié.”

Corvettes usually have no cannons except on the upper deck; this one, constructed for surprise and stratagem, had no guns on the upper deck and as we have just seen, had been built in such a way as to be able to carry a battery between decks.

The “Claymore” was of a heavy, dumpy build, and yet she was a good sailor. Her hull was one of the most solid in all the English navy, and in battle she was almost equal to a frigate, although her mizzen-mast was small, with merely a brigantine rig. Her rudder, of rare scientific shape, had a uniquely curved frame, which had cost fifty pounds sterling in the dockyards of Southampton.

The crew, all French, was composed of emigrant officers and deserted sailors. They were picked men, not one of them was not a good seaman, good soldier, and good royalist. They had a threefold fanaticism: the ship, the sword, and the king.

Half a battalion of marines, which could be disembarked in case of necessity, was scattered among the crew.

The captain of the corvette “Claymore” was a chevalier of Saint-Louis, the Count de Boisberthelot, one of the best officers of the old Royal Navy; the second officer was the chevalier de la Vieuville, who had commanded the company of the French guards, in which Hoche was the sergeant, and her pilot was Philip Gacquoil, the most intelggent sailor in Jersey.

It was evident that this vessel had some extraordinary service before her. Indeed, a man had just gone on board, who had every appearance of starting on an adventure. He was a tall old man, straight and sturdy, with a stern face, whose age it would have been difficult to tell exactly. because he seemed at once old and young; one of those men, full of years and strength, with white locks on his brow and fire in his eye; forty years in point of vigor, and eighty in point of authority.

At the moment he set foot on the corvette, his seacloak flew open, and it could be seen that underneath this cloak he was dressed in the wide breeches called ‘ bragoubras, top boots, and a vest of goat-skin, showing the upper side of the leather embroidered with silk, and the under side with the hair in its rough, natural state, the complete costume of the Breton peasant.

These old-fashioned Breton vests served a double purpose, being worn for festivals as well as work days, and were reversible, showing as was desirable either the hairy or the embroidered side; goat-skin all the week, gala dress on Sunday.

As if to add a studied and exact truthfulness to the peasant costume worn by the old man, it was threadbare at the elbows and knees, and appeared to have been in use a long time, and his cloak, made of coarse material, resembled that of a fisherman. This old man had on the round hat of the day, with high crown and broad brim, which when turned down gives it a rustic appearance, and when caught up with a cord and cockade has a military air. He wore this hat after the peasant fashion with the rim flattened out, without cord or cockade.

Lord Balcarras, governor of the island, and the Prince of la Tour-d'Auvergne, had accompanied him in person and installed him on board the vessel. Gélambre, the secret agent of the princes, and formerly one of the bodyguard of the Count d'Artois, had himself seen to the arrangement of his cabin, extending his care and attention, although himself an excellent gentleman, so far as to carry the old man's valise. On leaving him to go ashore again, M. de Gélambre had made a profound bow to this peasant; Lord Balcarras had said to him: " Good luck, general," and the Prince of la Tour-d'Auvergne had said: "Au revoir, cousin."

"The peasant" was the name by which the crew began at once to designate their passenger, in the short conversations seamen have together; but without knowing more about him, they understood that this peasant was no more a peasant than the man-of-war was a merchant man.

There was little wind. The "Claymore" left Bonnenuit, passed in front of Boulay Bay, and was for some ttme in sight, running along the shore, then she became dim in the increasing darkness, and was lost to view.

An hour later, Gélambre, having returned home to Saint-Hélier, despatched by the Southampton express to the Count d'Artois, at the Duke of York's headquarters, the following four lines, —

"Monseigneur, she has just sailed. Success certain. In a week the whole coast will be on fire from Granville to Saint-Malo."

Four days before, Prieur, the representative of Marne, on a mission to the army on the coast of Cherbourg, and for the time being residing at Granville, had received a message in the same handwriting as the preceding despatch, reading thus, —

"Citizen representative, June 1st, at flood-tide the sloop of war, "Claymore," with masked battery, will set sail, to carry to the coast of France a man whose description is as follows: tall, old, white hair, peasant's dress, aristocratic hands. I will send you more details to-morrow. He will land on the second, in the morning. Send word to the cruisers, capture the corvette, have the man guillotined."

CHAPTER II.

A NIGHT ON SHIPBOARD, AND CONCERNING THE PASSENGER.

The corvette, instead of going to the south and steering towards Saint-Catherine’s, bore to the north, then turned to the west and ran resolutely into the arm of the sea between Sark and Jersey, called the passage de la Déroute. There was at that time no lighthouse on any point along these two coasts.

The sun had set, the night was dark, more so than usual in summer; there was a moon, but heavy clouds more like autumn than summer covered the sky like a ceiling, and to judge from all appearances the moon would not be visible till she touched the horizon just before setting. Clouds hung low over the sea, and covered it with fog.

All this darkness was favorable.

The intention of the pilot, Gacquoil, was to leave Jersey on the left and Guernsey on the right, and by a bold course between the Hanois and the Douvres to make for a bay somewhere on the shore of Saint-Malo, not so short a route as by the Minquiers, but safer, because the French cruisers had standing orders to keep especial watch between Saint-Hélier and Granville.

If the wind were favorable, if nothing unexpected occurred, and by setting all sails, Gacquoil hoped to reach the French coast by daybreak.

All was going well; the corvette had just passed Gros-Nez; about nine o’clock it began to grow sulky, as the sailors say, and there was some wind and sea; but the wind was favorable, and the sea strong without being violent. However, occasionally a heavy sea swept over the bow of the vessel.

The “peasant” when Lord Balcarras had called “general,” and to whom the Prince of la Tour d’ Auvergne had said, “Cousin” had sea-legs had walked the deck with calm unconcern. He did not seem to notice that the vessel was very much tossed about. Now and then he drew out of his pocket a cake of chocolate, broke off a piece and ate it; although his hair was white, he had all his teeth.

He spoke to no one, except occasionally a few words in a low tone to the captain, who listened with deference, and seemed to consider this passenger more the commander than himself.

The “Claymore,” skilfully piloted, sailed, unnoticed in the fog, by the long northern cliff of Jersey, hugging the shore on account of the dangerous reef Pierres-de-Leeq, in the middle of the straits between Jersey and Sark. Gacquoil, standing at the helm signalling la Grève de Leeq, Gros-Nez, and Plimont in turn, guided the vessel through these chains of reefs, groping his way, as it were, but still with the certainty of a man who is at home and knows his way on the ocean. The corvette had no light forward, for fear of betraying its passage in these guarded waters. They congratulated themselves on having the fog. They reached the Grande-Etape; the fog was so thick that the outline of the tall pinnacle could hardly be discerned. Ten o’clock sounded from the tower of Saint-Ouen, a sign that the wind was still abaft. All continued to go well; the sea grew more tempestuous as they drew near to la Corbière.

A little after ten, the Count de Boisberthelot, and the Chevalier de la Vieuville accompanied the man in peasant’s garb to his cabin, which was the captain’s stateroom. Just as he was about to enter it, lowering his voice, he said to them, —

“You know, gentlemen, the important secret. Be silent till the moment the explosion occurs. You two are the only ones here who know my name.”

“We will carry it to the grave,” replied Boisberthelot. “As for me,” replied the old man, “if I were to die, I would not utter it.”

And he entered his cabin.

CHAPTER III.

NOBLE AND PLEBEIAN IN ALLIANCE.

The commander and the second officer went up on deck again and began to talk together, walking side by side. They were evidently speaking about their passenger, and this is very nearly the conversation that the wind scattered in the darkness.

Boisberthelot muttered low in la Vieuville's ear, —

"We shall see if he is a leader."

La Vieuville replied: "At any rate, he is a prince."

"Almost."

"A nobleman in France, but a prince in Brittany."

"Like the la Trémoilles, and like the Rohans."

"To whom he is related."

Boisberthelot continued: "In France and in the king's coaches, he is a marquis, as I am a count and as you are a chevalier."

"The coaches are far off!" exclaimed la Vieuville. "We are more likely to ride in a tumbril."

A silence ensued.

Boisberthelot went on, —

"For want of a French prince, they take a Breton prince."

"For want of a thrush — no, for want of an eagle — they take a crow."

"I should prefer a vulture," said Boisberthelot.

And la Vieuville replied: "Of course! a beak and talons."

"We shall see."

"Yes," replied la Vieuville, "it is time there was a leader. I am of Tinténiac's opinion: 'A leader and powder!' Wait, commander, I know nearly all the leaders, possible and impossible; those of to-day, of yesterday, and to-morrow; but not one is the figure-head needed. In this devilish la Vendée, a general is needed who is at the same time an attorney; he must annoy the enemy, dispute the mills, the thickets, the ditches, the pebbles with them, have serious quarrels with them, take advantage of everything, be constantly on the watch, make examples of them; he must neither sleep nor show pity. At the present time, there are heroes in this army of peasants, but there are no captains. D'Elbée is nobody; Lescure is ill, Bonchamps is tender-hearted, he is good, he is stupid; La Rochejacquelin is a splendid sub-lieutenant; Silz is an officer for the open field, unequal to a war of expedients; Cathelineau is an innocent wagoner; Stoffier is a tricky gamekeeper; Bérard is silly; Boulainvilliers is absurd; Charette is horrible; and I will say nothing at all of Gaston the barber. For, by thunder! what is the good of a revolution, and what difference is there between the republicans and ourselves, if we are to let noblemen be commanded by wig-makers?”

“This beastly revolution has taken hold of us, as well.”

“An itch that France has caught!’”

“Itch of the Third Estate,” replied Boisberthelot.

“England alone can save us from it.”

“She will do it without doubt, captain.”

“At any rate, it is hideous.”

“Certainly, louts everywhere! The monarchy which has Stoffiet for general-in-chief, M. de Maulevrier’s gamekeeper, has nothing to envy the republic, with Pache, son of the Duke de Castries’s porter, for minister. What counterparts in this war of la Vendée! On one side Santerre, the brewer; on the other, Gaston, the hairdresser!”

“My dear la Vieuville, I make an exception of this Gaston. He hasn’t acted badly in his command at Guéménée. He shot three hundred Blues very prettily, after making them dig their own graves.”

“Very good; but I could have done just as well myself.”

“Indeed, without doubt. And so could I.”

“The great deeds of war,” continued la Vieuville, “require nobility in those who accomplish them. These are matters for chevaliers, not for wig-makers.”

“Still in this Third Estate,” replied Boisberthelot, “there are estimable men. Take, for example, the clockmaker Joly. He was a sergeant in the Flanders regiment; he becomes a Vendéan chief; he commands a company on the coast; he has a son, who is a republican, and while the father serves with the Whites, the son serves with the Blues. They meet. Battle. The father takes his son prisoner, and blows his brains out.”

“That is good,” said la Vieuville.

“A royalist Brutus,” replied Boisberthelot.

“That doesn’t prevent it from being intolerable to be commanded by a Coquereau, a Jean-Jean, a Moulins, a Focart, a Bouju, a Chouppes!”

“My dear chevalier, the indignation is the same on both sides. We are full of bourgeois; they are full of nobles. Do you suppose that the sans-culottes are content to be commanded by the Count de Canclaux, the Viscount de Miraud, the Viscount de Beauharnais, the Count de Valence, the Marquis de Custine, and the Duke de Biron!”

“What slop!”

“And the Duke de Chartres!”

“Son of Egalité. Ah, when will he be king, that fellow? Never!”

“He is on his way to the throne. His crimes assist him.”

“And his vices hinder him,” said Boisberthelot.

Again there was a silence, and Boisberthelot went on to say, —

“He wished, however, for a reconciliation. He came to see the king. I was there at Versailles, when they spat on his back.”

“From the grand staircase?”

“Yes.”

“They did well.”

“We called him, Bourbon le Bourbeaux.”

“He is bald, he has pimples, he is a regicide. Bah!”

And la Vieuville added: “I was with him at Ouessant.”

“On the ‘Saint-Esprit’?”

“Yes.”

“If he had obeyed the signal that Admiral d’Orvilliers gave him to keep to the windward, he would have hindered the English from passing.”

“Certainly.”

“Is it true that he hid himself in the hold?”

“No, but we must say so, all the same.”

And la Vieuville burst out laughing.

Boisberthelot continued: “There are some fools yet. Take this Boulainvilliers, of whom you were speaking, M. Vieuville; I knew him, I have seen him near to. At first the peasants were armed with pikes; if he didn’t get it into his head to make pikemen of them! He wanted to teach them the exercise de la pique-en-biais et de la pique-trainante-le-fer-devant! He dreamed of transforming these savages into soldiers of the line. He pretended to teach them how to mass battalions, and to form battalions into hollow squares. He jabbered to them in the old military language; for chief of a squad, he said ‘cap d’escade,’ a term applied to corporals under Louis XVI. He was determined to form a regiment with all these poachers; he had regular companies, the sergeants of which formed a circle every evening, receiving the countersign from the colonel’s sergeant; he repeated it to the sergeant of the lieutenants, and he repeated it to his neighbor, who passed it to the one nearest, and so on from ear to ear, till the last. He cashiered an officer for not rising with head uncovered to receive the word of command from the mouth of the sergeant. You can judge how that succeeded. This booby couldn’t understand that peasants like to be led in peasant-fashion, and that you can’t make drilled soldiers out of backwoodsmen. Yes, I know that Boulainvilliers.”

They walked on a few steps, each busied with his own thoughts.

Then the conversation continued, —

“By the way, is it true that Dampierre has been killed?”

“Yes, commander.”

“Before Condé?”

“In the camp of Pamaro; by a cannon-ball.”

Boisberthelot sighed.

“The Count de Dampierres. Another one of us, who was on their side!”

“A pleasant journey to him!” said la Vieuville.

“And the ladies, where are they?”

“At Trieste.”

“Still?”

“Still.”

“And la Vieuville exclaimed: “Oh, this republic! What havoc to so little purpose! To think that this revolution has come about from the deficit of a few millions!”

“Look out for insignificant beginnings.”

“Everything is going wrong,” replied la Vieuville.

“Yes, la Rouarie is dead; du Dresnay, an idiot. What melancholy leaders all these bishops are: this Coucy, bishop of la Rochelle; this Beaupoil Saint-Aulaire, bishop of Poitiers; this Mercy, bishop of Luçon, Mme. de l’Eschasserie’s lover—”

“Her name is Servanteau, you know, commander: l’Eschasserie is the name of her estate.”

“And that false bishop of Agra, who is the curate of I don’t know what!”

“Of Dol. His name is Guillot de Folleville. He is brave, however, and he fights.”

“Priests when we want soldiers! Bishops, who are no bishops! Generals who are no generals!”

La Vieuville interrupted Boisberthelot.

“Commander, have you the Moniteur in your cabin?”

“Yes.”

“What are they playing in Paris, now?”

“‘Adèle,’ ‘Paulin’ and the ‘Cavern.’”

“I should like to see that.”

“You will see it. We shall be in Paris in a month.”

Boisberthelot thought a moment and added, —

“At the latest. Mr. Windham has told Lord Hood so.”

“Then, commander, everything is not going so badly?”

“Gracious! All would go well, if only the war in Brittany were well conducted.”

La Vieuville shook his head.

“Commander,” he asked, “shall we land the marines?”

“Yes, if the coast is for us; no, if it be hostile. Sometimes war has to break open the doors, sometimes she slips through. Civil war should always have a false key in her pocket. Everything possible will be done. The most important thing is the chief.”

And Boisberthelot added thoughtfully, —

“La Vieuville, what would you think of the Chevalier de Dieuzie?”

“The young man?”

“Yes.”

“For a commander?”

“Yes.”

“That he, again, is an officer for the open field, and for pitched battles. The thicket only knows the peasant.”

“Then resign yourself to General Stoffiet and to General Cathelineau.”

La Vieuville considered a moment and said, —

“We need a prince — a prince of France — a prince of the blood — a real prince.”

“Why? He who names a prince — —”

“Names a coward. I know it, commander. But it is for the effect on the great, stupid eyes of the louts.”

“My dear chevalier, princes would not come.”

“We can dispense with them.”

Boisberthelot made that mechanical movement of rubbing the forehead with the hand, as if expecting to bring out an idea.

He continued: “At last, let us consider the present general.”

“He is a great nobleman.”

“Do you believe that he will answer?”

“If he is strong!” said la Vieuville.

“That is to say, cruel,” said Boisberthelot.

The count and the chevalier looked at each other.

“Monsieur du Boisberthelot, you have spoken the word. Cruel. Yes that is what we need. This is a merciless war. It is the time for bloodthirsty men. Regicides have cut off Louis XVI.’s head; we will tear the four limbs from the regicides. Yes, the general necessary is General Inexorable. In Anjou and upper Poitou the chiefs play the magnanimous; they flounder in generosity, nothing succeeds. In the Marais and in the Retz country, the chiefs are terrible, everything moves on. It is because Charette is cruel that he holds out against Parrein. Hyena against hyena.”

Boisberthelot had no time to reply to la Vieuville. La Vieuville was suddenly cut short by a cry of despair, and at the same time a noise was heard wholly unlike any other sound. This cry and these sounds came from within the vessel.

The captain and lieutenant rushed towards the gun-deck, but could not get down. All the gunners were pouring up in dismay. Something terrible had just happened.

CHAPTER IV.

TORMENTUM BELLI.

One of the carronades of the battery, a twenty-four pounder, had broken loose.

This is the most dangerous accident that can possibly take place on shipboard. Nothing more terrible can happen to a sloop of war in open sea and under full sail.

A cannon that breaks its moorings suddenly becomes some strange, supernatural beast. It is a machine transformed into a monster. That short mass on wheels moves like a billiard-ball, rolls with the rolling of the ship, plunges with the pitching, goes, comes, stops, seems to meditate, starts on its course again, shoots like an arrow, from one end of the vessel to the other, whirls around, slips away, dodges, rears, bangs, crashes, kills, exterminates. It is a battering ram capriciously assaulting a wall. Add to this, the fact that the ram is of metal, the wall of wood.

It is matter set free; one might say, this eternal slave was avenging itself; it seems as if the total depravity concealed in what we call inanimate things had escaped, and burst forth all of a sudden; it appears to lose patience, and to take a strange mysterious revenge; nothing more relentless than this wrath of the inanimate. This enraged lump leaps like a panther, it has the clumsiness of an elephant, the nimbleness of a mouse, the obstinacy of an axe, the uncertainty of the billows, the zigzag of the lightning, the deafness of the grave. It weighs ten thousand pounds, and it rebounds like a child’s ball. It spins and then abruptly darts off at right angles.

And what is to be done? How put an end to it? A tempest ceases, a cyclone passes over, a wind dies down, a broken mast can be replaced, a leak can be stopped, a fire extinguished, but what will become of this enormous brute of bronze? How can it be captured? You can reason with a bull-dog, astonish a bull, fascinate a boa, frightened a tiger, tame a lion; but you have no resource against this monster, a loose cannon. You cannot kill it, it is dead; and at the same time it lives. It lives with a sinister life which comes to it from the infinite. The deck beneath it gives it full swing. It is moved by the ship, which is moved by the sea, which is moved by the wind. This destroyer is a toy. The ship, the waves, the winds, all play with it, hence its frightful animation. What is to be done with this apparatus? How fetter this stupendous engine of destruction? How anticipate its comings and goings, its returns, its stops, its shocks? Any one of its blows on the side of the ship may stave it in. How foretell its frightful meanderings? It is dealing with a projectile, which alters its mind, which seems to have ideas, and changes its direction every instant. How check the course of what must be avoided? The horrible cannon struggles, advances, backs, strikes right, strikes left, retreats, passes by, disconcerts expectation, grinds up obstacles, crushes men like flies. All the terror of the situation is in the fluctuations of the flooring. How fight an inclined plane subject to caprices? The ship has, so to speak, in its belly, an imprisoned thunderstorm, striving to escape; something like a thunderbolt rumbling above an earthquake.

In an instant the whole crew was on foot. It was the fault of the gun captain, who had neglected to fasten the screw-nut of the mooring-chain, and had insecurely clogged the four wheels of the gun carriage; this gave play to the sole and the framework, separated the two platforms, and finally the breeching. The tackle had given way, so that the cannon was no longer firm on its carriage. The stationary breeching, which prevents recoil, was not in use at this time. A heavy sea struck the port, the carronade insecurely fastened, had recoiled and broken its chain, and began its terrible course over the deck.

To form an idea of this strange sliding, let one image a drop of water running over glass.

At the moment when the fastenings gave way, the gunners were in the battery. Some in groups, others scattered about, busied with the customary work among sailors getting ready for a signal for action. The carronade, hurled forward by the pitching of the vessel, made a gap in this crowd of men and crushed four at the first blow; then sliding back and shot out again as the ship rolled, it cut in two a fifth unfortunate, and knocked a piece of the battery against the larboard side with such force as to unship it. This caused the cry of distress just heard. All the men rushed to the companion-way. The gun deck was vacated in a twinkling.

The enormous gun was left alone. It was given up to itself. It was its own master, and master of the ship. It could do what it pleased. This whole crew, accustomed to laugh in time of battle, now trembled. To describe the terror is impossible.

Captain Boisberthelot and Lieutenant la Vieuville, although both dauntless men, stopped at the head of the companion-way and dumb, pale, and hesitating, looked down on the deck below. Some one elbowed past and went down.

It was their passenger, the peasant, the man of whom they had just been speaking a moment before.

Reaching the foot of the companion-way, he stopped.

CHAPTER V.

VIS ET VIR.

The cannon was rushing back and forth on the deck. One might have supposed it to be the living chariot of the Apocalypse. The marine lantern swinging overhead added a dizzy shifting of light and shade to the picture. The form of the cannon disappeared in the violence of its course, and it looked now black in the light, now mysteriously white in the darkness.

It went on in its destructive work. It had already shattered four other guns and made two gaps in the side of the ship, fortunately above the water-line, but where the water would come in, in case of heavy weather. It rushed frantically against the framework; the strong timbers withstood the shock; the curved shape of the wood gave them great power of resistance; but they creaked beneath the blows of this huge club, beating on all sides at once, with a strange sort of ubiquity. The percussions of a grain of shot shaken in a bottle are not swifter or more senseless. The four wheels passed back and forth over the dead men, cutting them, carving them, slashing them, till the five corpses were a score of stumps rolling across the deck; the heads of the dead men seemed to cry out; streams of blood curled over the deck with the rolling of the vessel; the planks, damaged in several places, began to gape open. The whole ship was filled with the horrid noise and confusion.

The captain promptly recovered his presence of mind and ordered everything that could check and impede the cannon’s mad course to be thrown through the hatchway down on the gun deck — mattresses, hammocks, spare sails, rolls of cordage, bags belonging to the crew, and bales of counterfeit assignats, of which the corvette carried a large quantity — a characteristic piece of English villany regarded as legitimate warfare.

But what could these rags do? As nobody dared to go below to dispose of them properly, they were reduced to lint in a few minutes.

There was just sea enough to make the accident as bad as possible. A tempest would have been desirable, for it might have upset the cannon, and with its four wheels once in the air there would be some hope of getting it under control. Meanwhile, the havoc increased.

There were splits and fractures in the masts, which are set into the framework of the keel and rise above the decks of ships like great, round pillars. The convulsive blows of the cannon had cracked the mizzen-mast, and had cut into the main-mast.

The battery was being ruined. Ten pieces out of thirty were disabled; the breaches in the side of the vessel were increasing, and the corvette was beginning to leak.

The old passenger, having gone down to the gun deck, stood like a man of stone at the foot of the steps. He cast a stern glance over this scene of devastation. He did not move. It seemed impossible to take a step forward. Every movement of the loose carronade threatened the ship's destruction, A few moments more and shipwreck would be inevitable.

They must perish or put a speedy end to the disaster; some course must be decided on; but what? What an opponent was this carronade! Something must be done to stop this terrible madness — to capture this lightning — to overthrow this thunderbolt.

Boisberthelot said to La Vieuville, —

"Do you believe in God, chevalier?"

La Vieuville replied: "Yes — no. Sometimes."

"During a tempest."

"Yes, and in moments like this."

"God alone can save us from this," said Boisberthelot.

Everybody was silent, letting the carronade continue its horrible din.

Outside, the waves beating against the ship responded with their blows to the shocks of the cannon. It was like two hammers alternating.

Suddenly, in the midst of this inaccessible ring, where the escaped cannon was leaping, a man was seen to appear, with an iron bar in his hand. He was the author of the castastrophe, the captain of the gun, guilty of criminal carelessness, and the cause of the accident, the master of the carronade. Having done the mischief, he was anxious to repair it. He had seized the iron bar in one hand, a tiller-rope with a slip-noose in the other, and jumped down the hatchway to the gun deck.

Then began an awful sight; a Titanic scene; the contest between gun and gunner; the battle of matter and intelligence, the duel between man and the inanimate.

The man stationed himself in a corner, and with bar and rope in his two hands, he leaned against one of the riders, braced himself on his legs, which seemed two steel posts, and livid, calm, tragic, as if rooted to the deck, he waited.

He waited for the cannon to pass by him.

The gunner knew his gun, and it seemed to him as it the gun ought to know him. He had lived long with it. How many times he had thrust his hand into its mouth! It was his own familiar monster. He began to speak to it as if it were his dog.

“Come!” he said. Perhaps he loved it.

He seemed to wish it to come to him.

But to come to him was to come upon him. And then he would be lost. How could he avoid being crushed? That was the question. All looked on in terror.

Not a breast breathed freely, unless perhaps that of the old man, who was alone in the battery with the two contestants, a stern witness.

He might be crushed himself by the cannon. He did not stir.

Beneath them the sea blindly directed the contest.

At the moment when the gunner, accepting this frightful hand-to-hand conflict, challenged the cannon, some chance rocking of the sea caused the carronade to remain for an instant motionless and as if stupefied. “Come, now!” said the man. It seemed to listen.

Suddenly it leaped towards him. The man dodged the blow.

The battle began. Battle unprecedented. Frailty struggling against the invulnerable. The gladiator of flesh attacking the beast of brass. On one side, brute, force; on the other, a human soul.

All this was taking place in semi-darkness. It was like the shadowy vision of a miracle.

A soul — strange to say, one would have thought the cannon also had a soul; but a soul full of hatred and rage. This sightless thing seemed to have eyes. Th« monster appeared to lie in wait for the man. One would have at least believed that there was craft in this mass. It also chose its time. It was a strange, gigantic insect of metal, having or seeming to have the will of a demon. For a moment this colossal locust would beat against the low ceiling overhead, then it would come down on its four wheels like a tiger on its four paws, and begin to run at the man. He, supple, nimble, expert, writhed away like an adder from all these lightning movements. He avoided a collision, but the blows which he parried fell against the vessel, and continued their work of destruction.

An end of broken chain was left hanging to the carronade. This chain had in some strange way become twisted about the screw of the cascabel.

One end of the chain was fastened to the gun-carriage. The other, left loose, whirled desperately about the cannon, making all its blows more dangerous.

The screw held it in a firm grip, adding a thong to a battering-ram, making a terrible whirlwind around the cannon, an iron lash in a brazon hand. This chain complicated the contest.

However, the man went on fighting. Occasionally, it was the man who attacked the cannon; he would creep along the side of the vessel, bar and rope in hand; and the cannon, as if it understood, and as though suspecting some snare, would flee away. The man, bent on victory, pursued it.

Such things cannot long continue. The cannon seemed to say to itself, all of a sudden, “Come, now! Make an end of it!” and it stopped. One felt that the crisis was at hand. The cannon, as if in suspense, seemed to have, or really had — for to all it was a living being — a ferocious malice prepense. It made a sudden, quick dash at the gunner. The gunner sprang out of the way, let it pass by, and cried out to it with a laugh, “Try it again!” The cannon, as if enraged, smashed a carronade on the port side; then, again seized by the invisible sling which controlled it, it was hurled to the starboard side at the man, who made his escape. Three carronades gave way under the blows of the cannon; then, as if blind and not knowing what more to do, it turned its back on the man, rolled from stern to bow, injured the stern and made a breach in the planking of the prow. The man took refuge at the foot of the steps, not far from the old man who was looking on. The gunner held his iron bar in rest. The cannon seemed to notice it, and without taking the trouble to turn around, slid back on the man, swift as the blow of an axe. The man, driven against the side of the ship, was lost. The whole crew cried out with horror.

But the old passenger, till this moment motionless, darted forth more quickly than any of this wildly swift rapidity. He seized a package of counterfeit assignats, and, at the risk of being crushed, succeeded in throwing it between the wheels of the carronade. This decisive and perilous movement could not have been made with more exactness and precision by a man trained in all the exercises described in Durosel’s “Manual of Gun Practice at Sea.”

The package had the effect of a clog. A pebble may stop a log, the branch of a tree turn aside an avalanche. The carronade stumbled. The gunner, taking advantage of this critical opportunity, plunged his iron bar between the spokes of one of the hind wheels. The cannon stopped. It leaned forward. The man using the bar as a lever, held it in equilibrium. The heavy mass was overthrown, with the crash of a falling bell, and the man, rushing with all his might, dripping with perspiration, passed the slip-noose around the bronze neck of the subdued monster.

It was ended. The man had conquered. The ant had control over the mastodon; the pigmy had taken the thunderbolt prisoner.

The mariners and sailors clapped their hands.

The whole crew rushed forward with cables and chains, and in an instant the cannon was secured.

The gunner saluted the passenger.

“Sir,” he said, “you have saved my life.”

The old man had resumed his impassive attitude, and made no reply.

CHAPTER VI.

THE TWO SCALES OF THE BALANCE.

The man had conquered, but the cannon might be said to have conquered as well. Immediate shipwreck had been avoided, but the corvette was not saved. The damage to the vessel seemed beyond repair. There were five breaches in her sides, one, very large, in the bow; twenty of the thirty carronades lay useless in their frames. The one which had just been captured and chained again was disabled; the screw of the cascabel was sprung, and consequently levelling the gun made impossible. The battery was reduced to nine pieces. The ship was leaking. It was necessary to repair the damages at once, and to work the pumps.

The gun deck, now that one could look over it, was frightful to behold. The inside of an infuriated elephant's cage would not be more completely demolished.

However great might be the necessity of escaping observation, the necessity of immediate safety was still more imperative to the corvette. They had been obliged to light up the deck with lanterns hung here and there on the sides.

However, all the while this tragic play was going on, the crew were absorbed by a question of life and death, and they were wholly ignorant of what was taking place outside the vessel. The fog had grown thicker; the weather had changed; the wind had worked its pleasure with the ship; they were out of their course, with Jersey and Guernsey close at hand, farther to the south than they ought to have been, and in the midst of a heavy sea. Great billows kissed the gaping wounds of the vessel — kisses full of danger. The rocking of the sea threatened destruction. The breeze had become a gale. A squall, a tempest, perhaps, was brewing. It was impossible to see four waves ahead.

While the crew were hastily repairing the damages to the gun-deck, stopping the leaks, and putting in place the guns which had been uninjured in the disaster, the old passenger had gone on deck again.

He stood with his back against the main-mast.

He had not noticed a proceeding which had taken place on the vessel. The Chevalier de la Vieuville had drawn up the marines in line on both sides of the main-mast, and at the sound of the boatswain’s whistle the sailors formed in line, standing on the yards.

The Count de Boisberthelot approached the passenger.

Behind the captain walked a man, haggard, out of breath, his dress disordered, but still with a look of satisfaction on his face.

It was the gunner who had just shown himself so skilful in subduing monsters, and who had gained the mastery over the cannon.

The count gave the military salute to the old man in peasant’s dress, and said to him, —

“General, there is the man.”

The gunner remained standing, with downcast eyes, in military attitude.

The Count de Boisberthelot continued, —

“General, in consideration of what this man has done, do you not think there is something due him from his commander?”

“I think so,” said the old man.

“Please give your orders,” replied Boisberthelot.

“It is for you to give them, you are the captain.”

“But you are the general,” replied Boisberthelot.

The old man looked at the gunner.

“Come forward,” he said. The gunner approached.

The old man turned towards the Count de Boisberthelot, took off the cross of Saint-Louis from the captain’s coat and fastened it on the gunner’s jacket.

“Hurrah!” cried the sailors.

The mariners presented arms.

And the old passenger pointing to the dazzled gunner, added, —

“Now, have this man shot.”

Dismay succeeded the cheering.

Then in the midst of the death-like stillness, the old man raised his voice and said, —

“Carelessness has compromised this vessel. At this very hour, it is perhaps lost. To be at sea is to be in front of the enemy. A ship making a voyage is an array waging war. The tempest is concealed, but it is at hand. The whole sea is an ambuscade. Death is the penalty of any misdemeanor committed in the face of the enemy. No fault is reparable. Courage should be rewarded, and negligence punished.”

These words fell one after another, slowly, solemnly, in a sort of inexorable metre, like the blows of an axe upon an oak.

And the man, looking at the soldiers, added, —

“Let it be done.”

The man on whose jacket hung the sinning cross of Saint-Louis, bowed his head.

At a signal from Count de Boisberthelot, two sailors went below and came back bringing the hammock-shroud; the chaplain, who since they sailed had been at prayer in the officers’ quarters, accompanied the two sailors; a sergeant detached twelve marines from the line and arranged them in two files, six by six; the gunner, without uttering a word, placed himself between the two files. The chaplain, crucifix in hand, advanced and stood beside him. “March,” said the sergeant. — The platoon marched with slow steps to the bow of the vessel. The two sailors carrying the shroud, followed. A gloomy silence fell over the vessel. A hurricane howled in the distance.

A few moments later, a light flashed, a report sounded through the darkness, then all was still, and the sound of a body falling into the sea was heard.

The old passenger, still leaning against the mainmast, had crossed his arms, and was buried in thought.

Boisberthelot pointed to him with the forefinger of his left hand, and said to la Vieuville in a low voice, —

“La Vendée has a head.”

CHAPTER VII.

A VOYAGE IS A LOTTERY.

But what was to become of the corvette?

The clouds which all night long had mingled with the waves, at last shut down over the water till the horizon had entirely disappeared, and the sea was, as it were, wrapped in a mantle. Nothing but fog. Always a perilous situation, even for a ship in seaworthy condition.

In addition to the fog there was a heavy swell.

The time had been profitably employed; the corvette had been lightened by throwing overboard everything that could be cleared away of the wreck made by the carronade — the disabled guns, the broken gun carriages, timbers twisted off or unnailed, pieces of broken wood and iron; the portholes had been opened, and the corpses and human remains wrapped in tarpaulins, slid on planks into the sea.

The sea was beginning to be too rough for safety. Not that a tempest was exactly impending; on the contrary, the hurricane howling behind the horizon seemed to be decreasing in force, and the squall moving to the north; but the waves were still very high, indicating shallow water, and crippled as the vessel was, she had little power of resistance to the shocks of the great waves, and they might be death to her.

Gacquoil was at the helm, thoughtful.

Sea captains are wont to put the best face on the matter, in misfortune.

La Vieuville who was naturally gay in times of disaster, addressed Gacquoil, —

“Well, pilot,” he said, “the hurricane missed us. Its attempt to sneeze came to naught. We shall get out of it. We shall have wind, that is all.”

Gacquoil replied seriously, —

“A heavy wind makes a heavy sea.”

Neither gay nor sad, such is the sailor. His reply had a meaning of alarm in it. For a leaking ship to be in a heavy sea is to fill rapidly. Gacquoil had emphasized this prophecy with a slight frown. Perhaps la Vieuville had spoken these almost jovial and trifling words a little too soon after the disaster of the gun and the gunner. There are things which bode ill luck when at sea. The ocean is secret; one, never knows what she will do. It is necessary to be on the watch.

La Vieuville felt the need of becoming serious.

“Where are we, pilot?” he asked.

The pilot replied, —

“We are in the hands of God.”

A pilot is a master; it is always best to let him have his own way, and often to have his own say.

Besides, this sort of man speaks but little. La Vieuville walked away.

La Vieuville had asked the pilot a question, the horizon gave the answer.

The sea suddenly burst into sight.

The fog which hung over the waves lifted, all the dark upheaving of the billows was spread out in a mysterious twilight as far as one’s eyes could reach, and this is what was seen, —

The sky seemed to have a lid of clouds over it; but the clouds no longer touched the sea; in the east appeared a whiteness, which was the dawn of day; in the west, another fading whiteness, which was the setting of the moon. These two bright places opposite each other, made two narrow bands of pale light along the horizon, between the dark sea and the cloudy sky.

Against these two bright strips were outlined black figures, straight and motionless. To the west, three high rocks, standing like Celtic cromlechs, stood out against the moonlit sky.

To the east, against the pale morning sky, rose eight sail ranged in order, and at regular distances, in a threatening line.

The three rocks were a reef; the eight sail, a squadron.

Behind the corvette was the Minquiers, a rock of ill repute; before her, the French fleet. In the west, destruction; in the east carnage; she was between a shipwreck and a battle.

For facing the reef, the corvette had a broken hull, disjointed rigging, shattered masts; for facing battle, she had a battery of which twenty-one guns out of thirty were disabled, and the best of her gunners were dead.

The dawn was very faint, and there was still a little night before them. This darkness might even last for some time, being caused principally by high, heavy, dense clouds, having the appearance of a solid arch.

The wind which had at last carried away the low fog was driving the vessel on the Minquiers.

In her excessively weak and disabled condition, she scarcely obeyed the helm, she rolled rather than sailed, and buffeted by the waves gave herself up to their mercy.

The tragic reef of the Minquiers was more rugged then than at the present time. Several of the towers of this citadel of destruction have been worn away by the incessant undermining of the sea; the shape of the reefs is constantly changing; waves are not called lames without reason; each tide is a saw-tooth. At this time, to touch on the Minquiers, was to perish.

As for the cruisers, they were the squadron from Cancale, afterwards made famous under the command of that Captain Duchesne whom Léquinio called “Father Duchêne.”

The situation was critical. The corvette had unconsciously, while the cannon was loose, deviated from her course and sailed more towards Granville than towards Saint-Malo. Even if she had been manageable and able to carry sail, the Minquiers would have barred her return to Jersey, and the cruisers barred her from reaching France.

However, there was no tempest, but as the pilot had said, there was a heavy sea. The sea tumbling beneath a rough wind, and over the rocky bottom, was wild.

The sea never tells at once what it means to do. There is everything in this abyss, even chicanery. One might almost say that the sea had designs; it advances and retreats, it proposes and retracts, it prepares a squall and then gives up its plan, it promises destruction and does not keep its word, it threatens the North, and strikes the South. All night the corvette “Claymore” had been in the fog, and feared a storm; the sea had just broken its promise, and in a cruel fashion; it had given warning of a tempest and brought out a reef. It was still shipwreck in another form.

To destruction on the rocks was added extermination in battle. One enemy supplemented the other.

La Vieuville cried out with a bold laugh, —

“Shipwreck on one hand, battle on the other. Both sides have thrown double fives.”

CHAPTER VIII.

9 — 380.

The corvette was now nothing but a wreck.

In the pale, scattered light, in the blackness of the clouds, in the confused shifting of the horizon, in the mysterious wrinkling of the waves, there was a sepulchral solemnity. Except the hostile whistling of the wind, everything was silent. The catastrophe was rising majestically from the depths. It seemed more like an apparition than an attack. Nothing moved on the rocks, nothing stirred on the ships. It was a strange, colossal silence. Were they dealing with reality? It was like a dream passing over the sea. In legends there are such visions: the corvette was, in a certain sense, between a demon reef and a phantom fleet.

The Count de Boisberthelot gave orders in an undertone to La Vieuville, who went down to the gun-deck; then the captain seized his spyglass and came and stood at the stern near the pilot.

Gacquoil was bending all his efforts to keep the vessel out of the trough of the sea; for, if it were struck on the side by the wind and the waves, it would inevitably capsize.

“Pilot,” said the captain, “where are we?”

“Off the Minquiers.”

“On which side?”

“The worst.”

“What bottom?”

“Small rocks.”

“Can we bring the broadside to bear on them?”

“One can always die,” said the pilot.

The captain directed his glance toward the west and examined the Minquiers; then he turned it toward the east and scrutinized the sails in sight.

The pilot continued, as if talking to himself, —

“It is the Minquiers. It serves as a resting-place for the laughing sea-mew and the great black-mantled gull, on their way from Holland.”

In the meantime, the captain had counted the ships.

There really were eight vessels correctly disposed and raising their warlike profiles above the water. In the centre stood the lofty hull of a three-decker.

The captain questioned the pilot, —

“Do you know these ships?”

“Certainly!” replied Gacquoil.

“What are they?”

“It is the squadron.”

“Of France?”

“Of the devil.”

There was silence. The captain continued, —

“Are all the cruisers there?”

“Not all.”

In fact, the second of April, Valazé had announced to the Convention that ten frigates and six ships of the line were cruising in the channel. The captain recollected this.

“In all,” he said, “the squadron has sixteen vessels. “There are only eight here.”

“The rest,” said Gacquoil, “are spying along the coast farther down.”

The captain, still looking through the glass, murmured: “A three-decker, two first-class frigates, and five of the second class.”

“But I too made them out,” grumbled Gacquoil.

“Good vessels,” said the captain. “I have had some command of them myself.”

“For my part,” said Gacquoil, “I have seen them close to. I don’t mistake one for another. I have their description in my head.”

The captain handed his spyglass to the pilot.

“Pilot, can you make out the three-decker distinctly?”

“Yes, commander, it is the ‘Cöte d’Or.’”

“They have re-named her,” said the captain. “She used to be the ‘Etats de Bourgogne.’ A new ship. Hundred and twenty-eight guns.”

He took a note-book and pencil out of his pocket, and wrote in the former the number one hundred and twenty-eight.

He went on to say: “Pilot, what is the first sail to port?”

“It is the ‘Experimenté.’”

“First-class frigate; fifty-two guns. She was fitted out at Brest two months ago.”

The captain put the number fifty-two down in his note-book.

“Pilot,” he continued, “what is the second sail to port?”

“The’Dryade.’”

“First-class frigate; forty eighteen-pounders. She has been in India. She has a fine naval record.”

And he wrote down forty under the number fifty-two; then, raising his head, he said, —

“Now to starboard.”

“Commander, these are all second-class frigates. There are five of them.”

“What is the first, starting from the three-decker?”

“The ‘Résolue.’”

“Thirty-two eighteen-pounders. And the second?”

“The ‘Richemont.’”

“Same strength. Next?”

“The ‘Athée.’”

“Queer name to go to sea with. Next?”

“The ‘Calypso.’”

“What next?”

“The ‘Preneuse.’”

“Five frigates of thirty-two guns each.”

The captain wrote one hundred and sixty under the first numbers.

“Pilot,” he said, “you recognize them well.”

“You,” replied Gacquoil, “know them well, captain. To recognize is one thing, to know is better.”

The captain was looking intently at his note-book, and was adding up the numbers to himself.

“Hundred and twenty-eight, fifty-two, forty, hundred and sixty.”

Just at this moment, la Vieuville came up on deck.

“Chevalier,” the captain cried out to him, “we are in the face of three hundred and eighty cannon.”

“So be it,” said la Vieuville.

“You have just been inspecting, la Vieuville; just how many guns have we fit for use?”

“Nine.”

“So be it,” said Boisberthelot in his turn.

He took the spyglass from the pilot’s hands and studied the horizon.

The eight still, black ships seemed motionless, but they were growing larger.

They were approaching imperceptibly.

La Vieuville gave the military salute.

“Commander,” he said, “here is my report. I distrusted this corvette ‘Claymore.’ It is always annoying to embark suddenly on a vessel which does not know you, or that does not love you. English ship — traitor to the French — that slut of a carronade proved it. I have made the inspection. Anchors good. They are not of half-finished iron, but of forged bars soldered with the trip-hammer. The flukes are solid. Cables excellent, easy to pay out, of the regular length, hundred and twenty fathoms. Ammunition in abundance. Six gunners dead. A hundred and seventy-one rounds apiece.”

“Because there are only nine guns left,” murmured the captain.

Boisberthelot pointed his spyglass towards the horizon. The squadron was still slowly approaching.

There is one advantage about the carronades, three men are enough to work them, but they have one inconvenience, they do not carry as far nor aim as accurately as cannon. So it was necessary to let the squadron come within range of the carronades.

The captain gave his orders in an undertone. Silence reigned on the vessel. No signal to make ready for battle was given, but the order was executed all the same. The corvette was as unfit to fight against men as it was to battle with the waves. Every possible expedient was employed with this remnant of a war vessel. All the hawsers and spare cables were collected together at the gangway, near the tiller ropes, to use for strengthening the masts in case of necessity. The cockpit was prepared for the wounded. According to the naval custom of that day, the deck was barricaded, which was a safeguard against bullets but not against cannon balls. The ball-gauges were brought, although it was a little late to test their calibres; but so many accidents had not been foreseen. Each sailor received a cartridge-box, and placed a pair of pistols and a dirk in his belt. The hammocks were stowed away, the artillery pointed, the musketry prepared, the axes and grappling-irons put in their places, the stores of cartridges and bullets made ready, and the powder-magazine opened. Each man took his post. All this without a word spoken, and as if in a death chamber. It was swift and melancholy.

Then the corvette showed her broadside. She had six anchors, like a frigate. They cast all six of them; the cock-bill at the bow, the hedge anchor at the stern, the flood anchor toward the open sea, the ebb anchor toward the rocks, the bower anchor to starboard, and the sheet anchor to port.

The nine carronades remaining in good condition were]iut into form, all nine of them on one side, — the side toward the enemy.

The squadron had no less silently completed their preparations. The eight vessels now formed a semicircle, of which the “Minquiers” made the chord. The “Claymore,” enclosed in this semicircle, and pinioned by its own anchor besides, was backed by the reef; that is to say, by shipwreck.

It was like a pack of hounds around a wild boar, making no sound, but showing their teeth.

It seemed as if one side were waiting for the other.

The gunners of the “Claymore” were stationed by their guns.

Boisberthelot said to la Vieuville, —

“I think it would be well to open fire,”

“A flirt’s notion,” said la Vieuville.

CHAPTER IX.

SOME ONE ESCAPES.

The passenger had not left the deck, he was watching everything, unmoved.

Boisberthelot approached him. “Sir,” he said, “the preparations are completed. Here we are cramped into our tomb, but we shall not yield. We are prisoners of the squadron or of the reef. To surrender to the enemy or founder on the rocks, we have no other alternative. Only one resource remains, death. To fight is better than shipwreck. I would rather be shot than drowned; if I must die, I prefer fire to water. But to die is our fate, not yours. You are the man chosen by the princes, you have a great mission, to direct the war in La Vendée. Without you, the monarchy may be lost; you must live then. It is our duty to remain here, yours to get away. Go, general, — leave the ship. I will give you a man and a boat. It is not impossible to reach the shore by a roundabout way. It is not yet day, the waves are high, the sea is dark, you will escape. There are times when to flee is to conquer.”

With his stern head, the old man made a solemn sign of acquiescence.

The Count de Boisberthelot raised his voice,

“Soldiers and sailors,” he cried.

All movement ceased, and from every part of the vessel faces were turned toward the captain.

He continued, —

“The man who is among us represents the king. He has been entrusted to our care, we must preserve him. He is necessary to the throne of France; for want of a prince he will be, at least so we hope, the chief of la Vendée. He is a great general. He was to reach France with us, he must reach it without us. To save his life is to save all.”

“Aye, aye, aye!” cried all the voices of the crew.

The captain continued, —

“He too, will incur serious dangers. To reach the shore is no easy matter. It ought to be a large boat to brave the high sea, but it must be a small one to escape the cruisers. It is important to land at some point which will be safe, and rather in the vicinity of Fougères than of Coutances. It needs a plucky sailor, a good swimmer, and a good oarsman; one who belongs to this country and knows the channel. It is still dark enough for the boat to get away from the vessel without being discovered. And then we shall have smoke which will help to conceal her. Her small size will take her through shallow water. Where the panther is caught, the weasel escapes. There is no help for us; there is for him. The oars will carry the boat away: the hostile ships will not see it; and besides, we will divert their attention meanwhile. Is it agreed?”

“Aye, aye, sir!” cried the crew.

“There is not a minute to lose,” continued the captain, “Is there a man willing to go?”

A sailor stepped out of the ranks in the darkness and said: “I am.”

CHAPTER X.

DOES HE ESCAPE?

A few moments later, one of those little boats called a “gig,” especially designed for the captain’s use, left the ship. In this boat there were two men, the old passenger in the stern, and the sailor who had volunteered to go, in the bow. The night was still very dark. The sailor, conforming to the captain’s design, rowed vigorously in the direction of the Minquiers. No other way of escape was possible. Some provisions had been thrown in the bottom of the boat, a bag of biscuit, a smoked beefs tongue, and a cask of water.

“As soon as the boat touched the water, la Vieuville, scoffer even in the face of destruction, leaned over the stern of the corvette and sneered out this farewell to the boat: “She is a good one for escape, and a fine one for drowning.”

“Sir,” said the pilot, “jest no more.”

The boat quickly rowed off, and was almost immediately a good distance away from the corvette. Wind and waves seconded the oarsman, and the little craft was rapidly making her escape, rocking in the twilight, and concealed in the great furrows of the waves.

A strange, gloomy suspense hung over the sea.

Suddenly, in this vast, tumultuous ocean silence, rose a voice, which, increased by the speaking-trumpet, as by the brazen mask of ancient tragedy, seemed almost superhuman.

It was Captain Boisberthelot who was speaking, —

“Mariners of the king,” he cried, “nail the white flag to the main-mast. We are going to see our last sunrise.”

And a cannon shot left the corvette.

“Long live the king!” shouted the crew.

Then from the edge of the horizon was heard another cry, immense, distant, confused, but yet distinct, —

“Long live the Republic!”

And a noise like that of three hundred thunderbolts burst over the depths of the ocean.

The battle was beginning.

The sea was covered with fire and smoke.

Clouds of spray made by the shots falling into the water burst from the waves on every side.

The “Claymore” began to shower flame on the eight ships. At the same time, the whole squadron, grouped in a crescent around the “Claymore,” opened fire from all its batteries. The horizon was all ablaze. It was like a volcano rising out of the sea. The wind twisted round and round the vast crimson of battle, in the midst of which the ships appeared and disappeared like spectres. In the foreground, the corvette stood out against this red background like a black skeleton.

From the top of the main-mast the white banner with its design of fleur-de-lis could be made out.

The two men in the boat were silent.

The triangular-shaped shoals of the Minquiers, a kind of submarine Trinacrium, are larger than the whole island of Jersey; the sea covers them; their culminating point is a plateau, rising above the highest tides, and separated from this toward the northeast are six mighty rocks ranged in a straight line, giving the effect of a great wall crumbling away here and there. The sound between the plateau and the six rocks is only navigable to craft drawing very little water.

Beyond this sound is the open sea.

The sailor who had taken charge of the boat, entered the sound. In this way he put the Minquiers between the battle and the boat. He pulled skilfully through the narrow channel, avoiding the reef to port as well as to starboard; the rocks now concealed the battle. The glare on the horizon, and the furious din of the cannonading began to decrease as the distance became greater; but from the continuance of the reports it was evident that the corvette was still holding her own, and that she intended to exhaust her hundred and seventy-one broadsides to the very last. Soon the boat entered safe water, beyond the reef, beyond the battle, beyond the reach of bullets.

Gradually, the appearance of the sea became less gloomy, shimmering patches abruptly drowned in darkness increased in size, the foam burst into jets of light, pale gleams floated over the tops of the waves. Day dawned.

The boat was out of the reach of the enemy; but the most difficult task was yet to be accomplished. The boat was saved from the cannon shots, but not from shipwreck. It was in a high sea, a mere shell, without deck, without sail, without compass, with nothing to rely on but oars, in the face of the ocean and the storm, an atom at the mercy of monsters.

Then in this boundlessness, in this solitude, lifting a face made pallid by the dawn, the man in the bow of the boat fixed his gaze on the man in the stern and said to him, —

“I am the brother of the one you ordered shot.”

BOOK THIRD. — HALMALO.

CHAPTER I.

THE PERSUASIVE POWER OF HUMAN SPEECH.

The old man slowly raised his head.

The sailor who had just spoken to him was about thirty years old. His face was sea-tanned, his eyes were strange; they had the shrewd glance of the sailor and the open frankness of the peasant. He held the oars firmly in his two hands. He looked gentle.

In his belt he had a dirk, two pistols, and a rosary.

“Who are you?” said the old man.

“I have just told you.”

“What do you want of me?”

The man laid down his oars, folded his arms, and replied, —

“To kill you.”

“As you like,” said the old man.

The other raised his voice.

“Prepare.”

“For what?”

“To die.”

“Why?” asked the old man.

There was a silence. The sailor seemed confused for a moment by the question. He replied, —

“I say that I mean to kill you.”

“And I ask why?”

The sailor’s eyes flashed, —

“Because you have killed my brother.”

The old man replied calmly, —

“I began by saving his life.”

“That is true. You saved him first and then killed him.”

“It was not I who killed him.”

“Who did kill him, then?”

“His own fault.”

The sailor stared with open mouth at the old man; then his eyebrows contracted again into a savage frown.

“What is your name?” asked the old man.

"My name is Halmalo, but I can kill you without your knowing my name."

At this moment the sun rose. A sunbeam struck the sailor full in the eyes and vividly lighted up his wild face. The old man regarded him attentively.

The cannonading which still continued, now began to be interrupted and agonizingly irregular. A dense smoke sank down over the horizon. The boat, no longer guided by the oarsman, was drifting to leeward.

The sailor drew one of the pistols out of his belt with his right hand and took his rosary in his left.

The old man rose and drew himself up to his full height.

"Do you believe in God?" he asked.

"Our Father who art in Heaven," replied the sailor, making the sign of the cross.

"Have you a mother?"

"Yes."

He made the sign of the cross a second time. Then he continued, —

"I have said it. I give you one minute, monseigneur." And he cocked his pistol.

"Why do you call me monseigneur?"

"Because you are a seigneur. That is evident."

"Have you a seigneur, yourself?"

"Yes, and a great one. Can one live without a seigneur?"

"Where is he?"

"I don't know. He has left the country. He is the Marquis de Lantenac, Viscount de Fontenay, prince in Brittany; he is the seigneur of the Sept-Forêts (seven forests). I have never seen him, but that doesn't prevent his being my master."

"And if you were to see him, would you obey him?"

"Certainly. I should be a pagan if I didn't obey him! One owes obedience first to God; then to the king, who stands in the place of God; and then to the seigneur, who represents the king. But that is not the question; you have killed my brother, and I must kill you."

The old man replied, —

"In the first place, I killed your brother. I did right."

The sailor tightened his grasp on the pistol.

"Now then."

"Go on," said the old man.

And calmly added, “Where is the priest?”

The sailor looked at him. “The priest?”

“Yes, the priest. I gave your brother a priest, you owe me a priest.”

“I have none,” said the sailor.

And he added: “Do they have priests in mid-ocean?”

The convulsive reports of the battle were growing more and more distant.

“Those who are dying over yonder have theirs,” said the old man.

“It is true,” muttered the sailor. “They have the chaplain.”

The old man continued: “You will be the means of losing my soul, which is a serious matter.”

The sailor bowed his head in thought.

“And in losing my soul,” the old man went on to say, “you lose your, own. Listen. I pity you. You may do what you wish. As for me, I did my duty just now; first, in saving your brother’s life, and then in taking it from him; and I am doing my duty at this moment in trying to save your soul. Consider. It concerns you. Do you hear the cannon shots at this instant? There are men dying over there; there are desperate souls in mortal agony; there are husbands there who will nevermore see their wives; there are fathers who will nevermore see their children; brothers who, like yourself, will never see their brothers again. And whose fault is it? It is the fault of your own brother. You believe in God, do you not? Well, you know that God is suffering at this very moment; God suffers in His Christian son, the king of France, who is a child like the child Jesus, and who is imprisoned in the fortress of the Temple; God suffers in His church in Brittany; God suffers in His insulted cathedrals, in his desecrated Gospels, in His violated houses of prayer; God suffers in His assassinated priests. What did we come to do, we ourselves, in this vessel which is perishing at this very moment? We came to God’s assistance. If your brother had been a good servant, if he had faithfully performed the duty of a wise and useful man, the accident would not have happened to the carronade, the corvette would not have been disabled; she would not have gone out of her course; she would not have fallen into the hands of this fleet of destruction, and we should be landing on the shores of France now, of all us, brave warriors and seamen as we are, sword in hand, waving the white banner, numerous, content, joyful, and we should be aiding the brave peasants of La Vendée in saving France, in saving the king, in doing God’s work. That is what we came to do, that is what we should be doing, that is what I, the only one left, set out to do. But you are against it. In this contest of the godless against the priest, in this strife of regicides against the king, in this conflict of Satan against God, you are for Satan. Your brother was the first auxiliary of the devil, you are the second. He began, you are finishing it. You are for the regicides against the throne, you are for the godless against the church. You take God’s last resource away from Him. Because I shall not be there, — I who represent the king, — hamlets will go on burning, families weeping, priests bleeding, Brittany suffering, the king will remain in prison, and Jesus Christ in distress. And who will have done all this? You. Go on; it is your affair. I counted on you to bring about the contrary. I am deceived. Ah, yes, — it is true, — you are right, — I have killed your brother. Your brother was courageous, I rewarded him; he was guilty, I punished him. He failed in his duty; I have not failed in mine. What I have done, I would do again. And I swear it, by the great Saint Ann d’Auray, who sees us now, that, under similar circumstances to those in which I had your brother shot, I would shoot my own son. Now you are the master. Yes. I pity you. You have lied to your captain. You, a Christian, are faithless; you, a Breton, are without honor; I have been entrusted to your loyalty, and accepted by your treason; you give me dead to those to whom you promised me alive. Do you know whom you destroy here? It is yourself. You take my life from the king, and you give your eternity to the devil. Go on; commit your crime; it is well. You sell your part in Paradise cheaply. Because of you, the devil will conquer; because of you, the churches will fall; because of you, the pagans will continue to melt bells into cannon; they will shoot men with that which saved their souls. While I am speaking, the bell which rang for your baptism may be killing your mother. Go on; aid the devil. Don’t stop. Yes, I condemned your brother; but know this, that I am an instrument of God. Ah! you judge the means God chooses! Are you going to take it on yourself to judge the thunderbolt which is in heaven? Wretched man, it will judge you. Take care what you do. Do you even know whether I am in a state of grace? No. Go on all the same. Do what you will. You are free to cast me into hell, and to cast yourself in with me. The damnation of us both is in your hands. The one responsible before God will be yourself. We are alone, face to face in the abyss. Go on, — make an end of it, — finish. I am old, and you are young; I am without arms, and you are armed; kill me.”

While the old man, standing all the while, uttered these words in a voice above the noise of the sea, the undulations of the billows made him appear now in shadow, now in the light; the sailor had grown livid; great drops of sweat fell from his brow; he trembled like a leaf; occasionally, he kissed his beads; when the old man had ended, he threw down his pistol and fell on his knees.

“Forgive me, monseigneur! Pardon me,” he cried. “You speak like the good God. I am wrong. My brother did wrong. I will do everything to atone for his crime. Dispose of me. Order, and I will obey.”

“I forgive you,” said the old man.

CHAPTER II.

A PEASANT’S MEMORY IS WORTH A CAPTAIN’S KNOWLEDGE

The provisions in the boat were not useless.

The two fugitives, obliged to take a very circuitous route, were thirty-six hours in reaching the shore. They passed a night on the sea; but the night was fine, with too much moon, however, for people who were trying to escape.

They were obliged first to keep away from France, and to reach the open sea towards Jersey.

They heard the final cannonade of the battered corvette, like the final roar of a lion killed by hunters in the woods. Then silence fell over the sea.

This corvette, the “Claymore,” died in the same way as the “Vengeur,” but glory has ignored it. He who fights against his country is never a hero.

Halmalo was a marvellous mariner. He worked miracles of skill and intelligence; this improvised journey amid the reefs, the billows, and the enemy’s watch, was a masterpiece. The wind had decreased and the sea become smoother.

Halmalo avoided the Caux des Minquiers, passed the “Chausée-aux-Boeufs,” and, in order to rest a few hours, took shelter in the little creek situated to the north at low tide, and then rowing back to the south found a way to pass between Granville and the Chausey islands, without being detected either from the lookout at Chausey or at Granville. He entered the bay of Saint-Michael, a bold venture on account of the vicinity of Cancale, an anchorage for the cruisers.

On the evening of the second day, about an hour before sunset, he left Mount Saint-Michael behind him, and started to land on a beach which is always deserted, because its shifting sands are unsafe.

Fortunately, the tide was high.

Halmalo pushed the boat as far up as he could, tried the sand, found it firm, ran aground, and jumped ashore.

The old man stepped over the side of the boat after him, and examined the horizon.

“Monseigneur,” said Halmalo, “we are at the mouth of the Couesnon. There is Beauvoir to starboard, and Huisnes to port. The bell tower in front of us is Ardevon.”

The old man bent down over the boat, took a biscuit out of it and put it in his pocket, and said to Halmalo, —

“Take the rest.”

Halmalo put what remained of the meat, with the rest of the biscuits, in a bag, and threw it over his shoulder. Having done this, he said, —

“Monseigneur, shall I lead the way or follow you.”

“Neither.”

Halmalo looked in amazement at the old man.

The old man continued: “Halmalo, we are going to separate. It will not do for us to be together. There must be a thousand or only one.”

He paused and drew out of one of his pockets a bow of green silk, very like a cockade, in the centre of which was embroidered a fleur-de-lis, in gold. He continued, —

“Can you read?”

“No.”

“Very good. A man who can read is a nuisance. Have you a good memory?”

“Yes.”

“Good. Listen, Halmalo. You must go to the right, and I will go to the left. I shall go in the direction of Fougères, and you must go towards Bazouges. Keep your bag, which gives you the appearance of a peasant. Conceal your weapons. Cut a stick for yourself in the hedges. Creep through the rye, which is high. Crawl behind the fences. Climb over the hedges, and go across the fields. Keep at a distance from those you meet. Avoid the roads and bridges. Do not enter Pontorson. Ah! you will have to cross the Couesnon. How will you do that?”

“Swim across?”

“Good. And then there is a ford. Do you know where it is?”

“Between Ancey and Vieux-Viel.”

“Good. You really belong to the country.”

“But night is coming on. Where will monseigneur sleep?”

“I will take care of myself. But where will you sleep?”

“There are hollow-trees. Before I was a sailor, I was a peasant.”

“Throw away your sailor cap; it will betray you. You will easily find a carapousse somewhere.”

"Oh, a tarpaulin. — I can find that anywhere. The first fisherman I see will sell me his."

"Good. Now, listen. You know the woods."

"Everywhere."

"All over the country?"

"From Noirmoutier to Laval."

"Do you know their names too?"

"I know the woods, I know their names, I know all about them."

"You will not forget anything?"

"Nothing."

"Good. Now, pay attention. How many leagues can you walk a day?"

"Ten, fifteen, eighteen, twenty, if necessary."

"It will be necessary. Don't lose a word of what I am going to tell you. You must go to the woods of Saint-Aubin."

"Near Lamballe?"

"Yes. On the edge of the ravine between Saint-Rieul, and Plédélica there is a great chestnut-tree. You must stop there. You will see nobody."

"Which does not prove that nobody will be there, I know."

"You must make the call. Do you know how to make the call?"

Halmalo puffed out his cheeks, turned toward the sea, and the "to-who," of an owl was heard.

It seemed to come from the depths of night; it was a perfect imitation and uncanny.

"Good," said the old man. "You have it."

He handed the green silk bow to Halmalo,

"Here is my badge of command. Take it. It is important that nobody should know my name at present. But this bow will be enough. The fleur-de-lis was embroidered by Madame Royale, in the Temple prison."

Halmalo put one knee on the ground. He received the embroidered bow with trembling, and touched it to his lips; then, stopping, as if afraid to kiss it, —

"May I?" he asked.

"Yes, since you kiss your crucifix."

Halmalo kissed the fleur-de-lis.

"Get up," said the old man.

Halmalo rose and placed the knot in his breast. The old man continued: "Listen carefully to this. This is the order: 'Rise in revolt. No quarter.' Then on the edge of the woods of Saint-Aubin give the call. You must give it three times. The third time you will see a man come out of the ground.”

“From a hole under the trees, I know.”

“This man is Planchenault, also called Cœur-de-Roi. Show him this knot. He will understand. Then go, whatever way you can, to the woods of Astillé; you will find there a knock-kneed man surnamed Mousqueton, and who shows pity to nobody. You will tell him that I love him, and that he is to stir up his parishes. You will then go to the woods of Couesbon, which is one league from Ploërmel. Make the call of the owl; a man will come, out of a hole; it will be M. Thuault, seneschal of Ploërmel, who has belonged to what is called the Constitution Assembly, but on the good side. Tell him to arm the castle of Couesbon, belonging to the Marquis de Guer, a refugee. Ravines, groves, uneven ground, good place. M. Thuault is an upright man, and a man of sense. Then go to Saint-Guen-les-Toits, and speak to Jean Chouan, who is, in my eyes the real chief. Then go to the woods of Ville-Anglose, where you will see Guitter, called Saint-Martin. Tell him to have an eye or a certain Courmesnil, son-in-law of old Goupil de Préfeln, and who leads the Jacobins of Argentan. Remember all this well. I write nothing because nothing must be written. La Rouarie wrote out a list, but that lost everything. Then go to the woods of Rougefeu, where Miélette is, who leaps ravines, balancing himself on a long pole.”

“That is called a leaping-pole.”

“Do you know how to use it?”

“Should I be a Breton, and should I be a peasant, if I didn’t? The leaping-pole is our friend. It makes our arms large and our legs long.”

“That is to say, it makes the enemy small and the distance short. A good machine.”

“Once with my ferte I held out against three excise men armed with sabres.”

“When was that?”

“Ten years ago.”

“Under the king?”

“Indeed it was.”

“Did you fight under the king then?”

“Indeed I did.”

“Against whom?”

“Faith, I don’t know. I was a salt smuggler.”

"Good."

"They called that fighting against the gabelles. Are the gabelles the same thing as the king?"

"Yes, no. But it isn't necessary for you to understand that."

"I beg pardon of monseigneur, for having asked monseigneur a question."

"Let us go on. Do you know la Tourgue?"

"Do I know la Tourgue! I come from there."

"How is that?"

"Because I am from Parigné."

"To be sure, la Tourgue adjoins Parigné."

"Do I know la Tourgue! The big round castle which belongs to my seigneur's family. There is a great iron door separating the new building from the old; it couldn't be burst open with a cannon. In the new building is the famous book about Saint Bartholomew, that people come to see out of curiosity. There are frogs in the grass. I played with the frogs there when I was a little boy. And the underground passage! I know. There is, perhaps, no other person but myself who knows it."

"What underground passage? I don't know what you mean."

"It was made for other days, for the times when la Tourgue was besieged. The people inside could escape by passing through a tunnel under the ground which comes out in the forest."

"To be sure there is a subterranean passage of this kind from the castle of "la Jupellière," and one from the castle of la Hunaudaye, and from the tower of Champéon; but there is nothing of the kind at la Tourgue."

"Yes, there is, monseigneur. I don't know the passages which monseigneur mentions. I know the one at la Tourgue, because I belong to that country. And besides, there is nobody but myself who knows this way. It is never spoken of. It has been forbidden, because this passage served Monsieur de Rohan, in times of war. My father knew the secret, and he showed it to me. I know the secret of entering it, and the secret of getting out. If I am in the forest I can go into the tower, and if I am in the tower I can go into the forest, without being seen. And when the enemy enters, there is nobody there. That is what la Tourgue is. Ah! I know it." The old man remained silent for a moment.

"You are evidently mistaken; if there were such a secret there, I should know it."

"Monseigneur, I am sure of it. There is a turning stone there."

"Oh, yes! You peasants believe in turning stones, in singing stones, in stones which go to drink in the night from a neighboring brook. All sheer nonsense."

"But as I have made it turn, the stone—"

"As others have heard them sing, comrade. La Tourgue is a strong, secure fortress, easy to defend; but he who counted on getting out through an underground passage would be a simpleton."

"But, monseigneur,—"

The old man shrugged his shoulders.

"We have no time to lose. Let us talk business."

This peremptory tone put an end to Halmalo's persistence.

The old man continued, —

"Let us go on. Listen. From Rougefeu, go to the woods of Montchevrier, where Bénédicité is, — the chief of the Twelve. He is another good man. He says his benedicite while he is having people shot. In war, no sentimentality. From Montchevrier go to—"

He stopped short.

"I am forgetting the money."

He took from his pocket a purse and a pocketbook and placed them in Halmalo's hands.

"In this pocketbook there are thirty thousand francs in assignats, something like three livres, ten sous: to be sure the assignats are counterfeit, but the genuine ones are worth no more; and in this purse, — pay attention, — there are one hundred louis d'or. I give you all that I have. I do not need anything here. Besides, it is better that no money should be found on my person. To go back again. From Montchevrier go to Antrain, where you will see Monsieur de Frotté. From Antrain go to la Jupellière, where you will see Monsieur de Rochecotte; from la Jupellière to Noirieux, where you will see the Abbé Baudonin. Can you remember all that?"

"As well as my Pater."

"You will see Monsieur Dubois-Guy at Saint Brice-en-Cogle, M. de Turpin at Morannes, which is a fortified town, and the Prince de Talmont at Château Gonthier."

"Will a prince speak to me?"

"If I speak to you."

Halmalo took off his cap.

“Everybody will receive you well when they see Madame Royale’s fleur-de-lis. Do not forget that you will have to go to places where there are montagnards and patards. You must disguise yourself. That is easy enough. These republicans are so stupid, that with a blue blouse, a three-cornered hat and a tricolored cockade, you can go anywhere. There are no longer regiments, there are no longer uniforms, the companies are not numbered; everybody wears whatever rag he pleases. Go to Saint-Mhervé. There you will see Gaulier, called Grand-Pierre. Go to the district of Parmé, where the men blacken their faces. They put gravel and a double charge of powder in their guns in order to make more noise. They do well; but tell them above all to kill, to kill, to kill. Go to the camp of La Vache Noire, which is on a height, in the midst of the wood of La Charnie, then to the camp of L’Avoine, then to the camp of Vert, then to the camp of the Fourmis. Go to the Grand-Bordage, also called the Haut-du-Pré, which is inhabited by a widow whose daughter Treton, called the Englishman, married. The Grand-Bordage is in the parish of Quelaines. You must go to Epineux-le-Chevreuil, Sillé-le-Guillaume, Parannes, and all the men in every wood. You will find friends, and you must send them to the border of the upper and the lower Maine; see Jean Treton in the parish of Vaisges, Sans-Regret at Bignon, Chambord at Bonchamps, the Corbin brothers at Maisoncelles, and Petit-Sans-Peur at Saint-Jean-sur-Erve. He is the same as Bourdoiseau. Having done all this, and given the word of command ‘Revolt! No quarter!’ you must rejoin the grand army, the royal, catholic army, wherever it may be. You will see MM. d’Elbée, de Lescure, de la Rochejaquelein, all the chiefs who are still alive. Show them my badge of command. They will know what it means. You are only a sailor, but Cathelineau is only a carter. Tell them this from me: ‘It is time to unite the two wars, the great and the small.’ The great one makes more noise, the small one does more work. La Vendée is good, La Chouannerie is worse, and in civil war the worse is the better. The success of a war is measured by the amount of harm that it does.”

He stopped speaking.

“Halmalo, I am telling you all this. You do not understand the words, but you understand the meaning. You won my confidence by the way you managed the boat; you do not know geometry, but you work marvels of skill on the water: he who can steer a boat, can pilot an insurrection; from the way you managed the intricacies of the sea, I am sure that you will be successful in carrying out all my commissions. To return. Tell all this to the chiefs, as near as you can, in your own words, but it will be all right, —

"'I prefer war in the forest to war in the open field; I do not intend to draw up a hundred thousand peasants in line before the shot of the Blues, and Monsieur Carnot's artillery; before the end of a month, I want five hundred thousand slaughterers in ambush in the woods. The republican army is my game. Poaching is waging war. I am the strategist of the thickets.' Well, there is another word that you will not understand; never mind, you will take in this: No quarter! and ambuscades everywhere! I want a guerilla warfare in Vendée. Add that the English are on our side. Let us place the republic between two fires. Europe will help us. Let us put an end to the Revolution. Kings will war against it with kingdoms, let us war against it with parishes. Say that. Do you understand?"

"Yes. We must have fire and blood everywhere."

"That's it."

"No quarter."

"Not for anybody. That's it."

"I am to go everywhere."

"And be on your guard. For in this country it is an easy matter to put a man to death."

"Death doesn't concern me. He who takes his first step may be wearing his last shoes."

"You are a brave man."

"And if I am asked the name of monseigneur?"

"It must not be known yet. Say that you do not know it and that will be the truth."

"Where shall I see monseigneur again?"

"Where I shall be."

"How shall I know it?"

"Because everybody will know it. Before the end of a week, I shall be talked about. I shall make examples; I shall avenge the king and religion, and you will know that it is I of whom they are talking."

"I understand."

"Forget nothing."

"Have no fear."

"Start now. God be with you. Go."

“I will do all that you have told me. I will go. I will speak the word. I will obey. I will command.”

“Very well.”

“And if I succeed—”

“I will make you chevalier de Saint-Louis.”

“Like my brother; and if do not succeed, you will have me shot?”

“Like your brother.”

“Agreed, monseigneur.”

The old man bowed his head and seemed lost in deep reverie. When he raised his eyes, he was alone. Halmalo was only a black speck on the horizon.

The sun had just set. The gulls and the hooded seamews were flocking in from the sea outside.

That sort of restlessness just before night was felt in the air; the tree-frogs croaked, the kingfishers flew up whistling from the pools of water, the gulls, the rooks, the carabins, made their evening commotion; the birds on the shore called to each other; but not a human sound. It was a profound solitude. Not a sail in the bay, not a peasant on the land. As far as the eye could reach, a desert expanse. The great sand-thistles rustled. The white sky of twilight cast a broad pale gleam over the beach. The ponds in the distance, scattered over the dark plain, looked like sheets of pewter spread out on the ground. The wind blew from the sea.

BOOK FOURTH. — TELLMARCH.

CHAPTER I.

THE TOP OF THE DUNE.

The old man waited till Halmalo had disappeared from sight, then he wrapped his cloak about him and set forth. He walked slowly, thoughtfully. He went toward Huisnes, while Halmalo had gone toward Beauvoir.

Behind him, an enormous black triangle, with a cathedral for tiara, and a fortress for breastplate, with its two great towers to the east, one round, the other square, which help the mountain to bear the weight of church and village, rose Mount Saint-Michael, which is to the ocean what Cheops is to the desert.

The quicksands in the bay of Saint-Michael’s change their sand-dunes imperceptibly. At that time between Huisnes and Ardevon there was a very high dune, which has now entirely disappeared. This dune, levelled by an equinoctial storm, was exceptional in being ancient, and bearing on its summit a memorial stone erected in the twelfth century in commemoration of a council held at Avranches against the assassins of Saint Thomas of Canterbury. From the top of this dune, the whole country could be seen, and one could get his bearings.

The old man went toward this dune and ascended it. When he had reached the top, he stopped by the monument, sat down on one of the four posts which marked the corners, and began to examine the sort of map lying at his feet. He seemed to be trying to find a route in a country once familiar to him. In this vast landscape, indistinct in the twilight, there was nothing clear but the horizon, a black line on the white sky.

He could see the roofs of eleven towns and villages; he could make, out several leagues away, the steeples along the coast, which are very high, in order to serve as landmarks to people at sea.

After a few moments, the old man seemed to have found in the dim twilight what he was looking for; his eyes fastened on an enclosure of trees, walls, and roofs, which could just be seen half-way between the plain and the wood; this was a farm; he nodded his head with satisfaction as though saying to himself: “There it is,” and he began to trace with his finger in the air a way through the hedges and fields. Now and then he examined a rather indistinct and shapeless object, moving above the principal roof of the farm, and he seemed to ask: “What is it?” It was colorless and confused because of the gloom; it was not a weathercock, because it fluttered, and there was no reason why it should be a flag.

He was weary: he was willing to rest on this spot where he was sitting, and he gave himself up to that sort of vague forgetfulness, which the first moment of repose brings to a tired man. There is an hour of the day which might be called noiseless, it is the quiet twilight hour. It was that hour now. He was enjoying it; he was looking about; he was listening; to what? tranquillity. Even the cruel have their sad moments. Suddenly this tranquillity was not disturbed, but made more intense, by passing voices; they were the voices of women and children. There are sometimes such unexpected chimes of joy in the darkness. The group from which the voices came could not be seen on account of the thickets, but it was walking along at the foot of the dune, going toward the plain and the forest. These voices came up clear and fresh to the old man lost in thought; they were so near that he caught all they said.

A woman’s voice said, —

“We must hurry along, Flécharde. Is this the way?”

“No, it is this way.”

And the dialogue continued between the two voices, one loud, the other timid.

“What do you call this farm where we are living now?”

“L’Herbe-en-Pail.”

“Are we far from it?”

“About a quarter of an hour.”

“Let us hurry, so as to get our soup.”

“We really are late.”

“We must run. But your babies are tired. We are only two women, we can’t carry three brats. And then, Flécharde, you are already carrying one. A regular lump of lead. You have weaned the greedy little thing, but you are always carrying her. A bad habit; oblige me by making her walk. Well! so much the worse, our soup will be cold!”

“Oh, what good shoes you have given me! I should think they were made for me.”

“They are better than going barefooted.”

“Hurry up now, René-Jean.”

“He is the one who has kept us back. He has to speak to every little peasant girl he meets. That is because he is a man.”

“To be sure, he is going on five years.”

“Tell me, René-Jean, why did you speak to that little girl in the village?”

A child’s voice, — that of a boy, replied, —

“Because I know her.”

The woman added, —

“What, you know her?”

“Yes,” replied the boy, “ ever since she played with me this morning.”

“Oh, how big he is!” exclaimed the woman, “we have only been in the country three days, he is no larger than my thumb, and he has a sweetheart already.”

The voices grew fainter. All sound died away.

CHAPTER II.

AURES HABET ET NON AUDIET.

The old man remained still. He was not thinking, hardly even dreaming. All about him was peace, drowsiness, confidence, solitude. It was still daylight on the dune, but almost night on the plain, and entirely so in the woods. The moon was rising in the east. A few stars pierced the pale blue of the zenith. This man, though full of tremendous cares, had plunged himself into the unspeakable tenderness of the infinite. He felt arising in him that obscure dawn of hope, if the word hope can be applied to the expectations of civil war. For the moment, it seemed to him that in escaping from the sea which had been so inexorable to him, and in touching land, all danger had vanished. No one knew his name, he was alone, lost to the enemy, without a trace left behind him, for the surface of the sea betrays nothing, concealed, ignored, not even suspected. He felt a strange, supreme composure. A little more and he would have been asleep.

It was the profound silence over the earth and in the heavens which had for this man, who had been a prey to tumult within and without, such a strange charm in this serene hour.

Nothing was heard except the wind blowing from the sea, but the wind is a continuous bass, which almost ceases to be a sound, it is so habitual.

Suddenly, he started to his feet.

His attention had just been abruptly awakened; he looked about the horizon. Something gave his eye a peculiar fixed expression.

He was looking at the steeple of Cormeray, directly in front of him beyond the plain. Indeed, something extraordinary was taking place in this steeple.

The outline of this steeple was clearly defined; the tower could be seen, surmounted by the spire, and between the tower and the spire, the belfry, square, without screen, and open on all four sides, according to the style of Breton bell towers.

But this belfry appealed alternately open and closed at regular intervals; its lofty window showed all white, then all black; the sky could be seen through, then it was seen no longer; it would be light, then eclipsed, and the opening and shutting followed each other a second apart, with the regularity of a hammer on an anvil.

This steeple in Cormeray was about two leagues away in front of the old man; just about as far to his right on the horizon, he saw the steeple of Baguer-Pican; the belfry of this steeple was opening and shutting in the same way as that in Cormeray.

He looked to his left at the steeple of Tanis; the belfry of the tower at Tanis was opening and shutting just the same as that at Baguer-Pican.

He looked at all the steeples on the horizon, one after another, to the left, the steeples of Courtils, of Précey, of Crollon, and of Croix-Avranchin; to the right, the steeples of Raz-sur-Couesnon, Mordrey, and the Pas; in front of him, the steeple of Pontorson. The belfries of all the steeples were alternately black and white.

What did it all mean?

It signified that all the bells were ringing.

To appear and disappear in this way they must be pulled furiously.

What was it then? evidently the tocsin.

They were sounding the alarm, sounding it frantically, sounding it everywhere, in all the belfries, in every parish, in every village, and not a sound reached his ears.

This was owing to the distance, which prevented the sounds from reaching so far, and because of the sea breeze blowing from the opposite direction, which carried all land noises far away from him.

All these bells madly calling from every side, and at the same time, silence; nothing could be more weird.

The old man looked and listened.

He did not hear the tocsin, but he saw it.

To see the tocsin — a strange sensation.

With whom are these bells angry?

Against whom is this tocsin sounding?

CHAPTER III.

THE ADVANTAGE OF LARGE LETTERS.

Certainly they were after somebody.

Who?

This man of steel shuddered.

He could not be the one. No one could have found out his coming; it was impossible for the acting representatives to have been informed already; he had hardly landed. The corvette had evidently foundered without a man escaping. And even in the corvette no one knew his name except Boisberthelot and La Vieuville.

The bells continued their wild play. He watched them and counted them mechanically, and his thoughts, driven from one conjecture to another, fluctuated between complete security and terrible uncertainty. However, after all, this tocsin could be explained in many ways, and he finally assured himself, by repeating, “Surely, nobody knows of my arrival, and nobody knows my name.”

For some moments there had been a slight sound above and behind him. This sound was like the rustling of a leaf on a wind-shaken tree. At first, he paid no heed to it; then, as the sound continued, one might say insisted, he at last turned around. It was a leaf to be sure, but a leaf of paper. The wind was trying to detach a large placard pasted to the monument above his head. This placard had been put up only a short time before, for it was still damp, and yielded to the wind, which had begun to play with it and to unfasten it. The old man had climbed up the dune from the opposite side, and had not seen this placard when he reached the top.

He mounted the post on which he had been sitting, and placed his hand on the corner of the placard which was flapping in the wind; the sky was cloudless the twilights are long in June; the foot of the dune was dark, but the top was light; a part of the placard was printed in large letters, and there was still enough daylight to read them He read this, —

“The French Republic, one and indivisible.

“We, Prieur de la Marne, active representative of the people near the army of tlie coast of Cherbourg, order: The former Marquis de Lantenac, viscount de Fontenay, the so-called prince of Brittany, secretly landed on the coast of Granville, is declared an outlaw. A price is put on his head. The sum of sixty thousand livres will be paid to him who will deliver him up, dead or alive. This sum will not be paid in assignats, but in gold. A battalion of the army of the coast of Cherbourg will be sent immediately in pursuit of the former Marquis de Lantenac. The parishes are ordered to lend every assistance. Given at the town hall of Granville, this second day of June, 1793. Signed

“Prieur de la Marne.”

Underneath this name there was another signature in much smaller characters, which was not legible, because there was so little daylight left.

The old man pulled down his hat over his eyes, drew his cloak closely up under his chin, and went quickly down the dune. It was evidently unsafe to remain longer on this prominent summit.

He had possibly stayed there too long already; the top of the dune was the only point in the whole landscape which still remained visible.

When he reached the foot of the dune and was in darkness, he walked more slowly.

He started to go, as he had planned, towards the farm, probably having good reasons for thinking he would be safe in this direction.

Everything was deserted. It was an hour when there were no passers-by. He stopped behind a thicket, took off his cloak, turned the hairy side of his vest out, fastened his ragged cloak around his neck again by the cord, and started on his way.

It was bright moonlight.

He came to a place where two roads met and where there stood an old stone cross. On the pedestal of the cross, he noticed a white square, probably a placard like the one he had just read. He went nearer to it.

“Where are you going?” said a voice.

He turned around.

A man was there in the thicket, tall like himself, old like himself, like him with white hair, and with garments more ragged. Almost his double. This man was leaning on a long stick.

The man said again, —

“I ask where you are going?”

“In the first place, where am I?” he said, with an almost haughty calnmess.

The man replied, —

“You are in the seigneurie of Tanis. I am its beggar, you are its seigneur.”

“I?”

“Yes, you, sir, the Marquis de Lantenac.”

CHAPTER IV.

THE CAIMAND.

The Marquis de Lantenac, — henceforth we will call him by his name, — replied gravely, —

“You are right. Deliver me up.”

The man continued, —

“We are both at home here: you in the castle, I in the thicket.”

“Make an end of it. Do your work. Give me up,” said the marquis.

The man continued, —

“You were going to the farm of Herbe-en-Pail, were you not?”

“Yes.”

“Don’t go there.”

“Why?’”

“Because the Blues are there.”

“How long since?”

“For three days.”

“Did the inhabitants of the farm and the hamlet make any resistance?”

“No, they opened all the doors.”

“Ah!” said the marquis.

The man pointed to the roof of the farmhouse, which could be seen some distance away, above the trees.

“Do you see the roof, monsieur le marquis?”

“Yes.”

“Do you see what is above it?”

“Floating?”

“Yes.”

“It is a flag.”

“The Tricolor,” said the man.

This was the object which had already attracted the marquis’s attention when he was on the top of the dune.

Are they not sounding the tocsin?” asked the marquis.

“Yes.”

“Why?”

“Evidently on your account.”

“But it can’t be heard.”

“The wind prevents it.”

The man continued, “Have you seen your placard?”

“Yes.”

“They are searching for you;” and glancing towards the farm, he added, “There is a half battalion there.”

“Of repubicans?”

“Parisians.”

“Well,” said the marquis, “let us go on.”

And he took a step in the direction of the farm.

The man seized him by the arm.

“Don’t go there.”

“And where would you have me go?”

“Home with me.”

The marquis looked at the beggar.

“Listen, marquis, my home is not fine, but it is safe. A hut lower than a cave. For a floor, a bed of seaweed, for ceiling, a roof of branches and grass. Come. You would be shot at the farm. With me you will go to sleep. You must be tired; and to-morrow morning the Blues will march away, and you can go wherever you please.”

The marquis. scrutinized the man.

“On which side are you?” asked the marquis. “Are you a republican? Are you a royalist?”

“I am poor.”

“Neither royalist, nor republican?” “I think not.”

“Are you for or against the king?”

“I have no time for that.”

“What do you think of what is going on?”

“I have nothing to live on.”

“Why do you come to my assistance?”

“I saw that you were an outlaw. What is the law? So one can be out of it. I don’t understand. As for me, am I in the law? am I out of the law? I know nothing about it. To die of hunger, is that to be in the law?”

“How long have you been dying of hunger?”

“All my life.”

“And you wish to save me?”

“Yes.”

“Why?”

“Because I said, ‘There is another poorer than I. I have the right to breathe, he has not.’”

“It is true. And you would save me?”

“Surely. We are brothers, monseigneur. I ask for bread, you ask for life. We are both beggars.”

“But do you know that a price has been put on my head?”

“Yes.”

“How did you know?”

“I read the placard.”

“You know how to read?”

“Yes, and to write, too. Why should I be a brute?”

“Then, since you know how to read, and since you have read the placard, you know that the man who betrays me will win sixty thousand francs.”

“I know it.”

“Not in assignats.”

“Yes, I know, in gold.”

“Do you know that sixty thousand francs is a fortune?”

“Yes.”

“And that the one who will deliver me up will make his fortune?”

“Well, what next?”

“His fortune!”

“That is just what I thought. When I saw you, I said to myself, ‘Only think of it, the one who betrays this very man, will win sixty thousand francs and make his fortune! Let us hasten to conceal him.’”

The marquis followed the poor man. They entered a thicket. Here was the beggar’s den. It was a sort of room that a grand old oak had let this man have in its heart. It was hollowed out under its roots, and covered with its branches. It was dark, low, concealed, out of sight. There was room for two people in it.

“I foresaw that I was going to have a guest,” said the beggar.

This sort of underground dwelling, more common than one would suppose in Brittany, is called in the language of the peasants, “carnichot.” This name also applies to hiding-places made inside of thick walls.

It was furnished with several pots, a pallet of straw or seaweed, washed and dried, with a thick covering of kersey; some tallow dips, with a tinder-box, and hollow twigs of furze for matches.

They bent down, crept along a little way, entered the room, cut up into odd compartments by the great tree-roots, and sat down on a heap of seaweed, which formed the bed. The space between two roots, where they entered, and which served as a doorway, let in some light. Night had come, but the eye adjusts itself to darkness, and there is always a trace of light to be found in darkness. A reflection of moonlight threw a mysterious pallor over the entrance. In a corner there was a jug of water, a loaf of buckwheat bread, and some chestnuts.

“Let us have some supper,” said the poor man.

They shared the chestnuts; the marquis added his piece of biscuit: they bit the same loaf of buckwheat, and drank from the jug one after the other.

They talked together.

The marquis began to question the man.

“So, whether anything happens or not, it is all the same to you?”

“Very nearly. You are seigneurs, you people. These are your affairs.”

“But what happens ”

“Happens beyond our reach.”

The beggar added, “And then there are other things happening still farther away from us, the sun rising, the moon waxing and waning; it is with such things that I am concerned.”

He took a alp from the jug, and said, —

“What good, fresh water!” Then he added, “How do you like this water, monseigneur?”

“What is your name?” said the marquis.

“My name is Tellmarch, and they call me the caimand.”

“I know. Caimand is one of your provincial words.”

“Which means beggar. They have named me besides, the old man.” He continued: “For forty years I have been called the old man.”

“Forty years! Why, you are young.”

“I never was young. You are always young, monsieur le marquis. You have the legs of twenty, you climb up the great dune; as for me I can hardly walk at all; a quarter of a league tires me out. Still, we are of the same age; but the rich have an advantage over us, for they eat every day. Eating preserves one.”

After a silence, the beggar continued: “Poverty and riches — it is a troublesome problem. That is the cause of calamities. At least, so it seems to me. The poor want to be rich, the rich do not want to be poor. I believe that is at the bottom of it. I don't mix myself up with it. Events are events. I am neither for the debtor nor for the creditor. I know that there is a debt and that it is being paid. That is all. I should have liked it better if they had not killed the king, but it would be difficult for me to tell why. In reply to that they tell me: But once they used to hang men to trees for nothing at all. I myself have seen a man with a wife and seven children hanged for shooting one of the king's deer. There are two sides to be considered."

He was silent again, then added, —

"You understand. I don't know exactly, people come and go, and things happen, but as for me, I am up among the stars."

Tellmarch stopped again to think, then continued, —

"I am a little of a bone-setter, a little of a doctor. I am familiar with herbs, and have some experience with plants; the peasants see me in a brown study and that makes me pass for a sorcerer. Because I dream, they think I know."

"You belong to this country?" asked the marquis.

"I have never been out of it."

"Do you know me?"

"Certainly. The last time I saw you was when you passed through here, two years ago. You went from here to England, Just now I noticed a man on the top of the dune. A tall man. Tall men are rare; Brittany is a country of small men. I looked carefully. I had read the placard. I said wait! And when you came down, it was moonlight and I recognized you."

"But I do not know you."

"You have seen me, but you never looked at me."

And Tellmarch, the caimand, added, —

"I used to see you. A beggar does not look with the same eyes as the passers-by."

"Have I ever met you before?"

"Often, for I am your own beggar. I was the poor man at the foot of the road to your castle. You used to give me alms, sometimes; but the giver pays no attention, the receiver watches and observes. A beggar is a spy. But as for me, though often sad, I try not to be a malicious spy. I held out my hand, you saw the hand only, and you dropped in it the alms which I needed in the morning to keep me from dying of hunger at night. I have sometimes been twenty-four hours without eating. Sometimes, a sou saved my life. I owe life to you. I give it back to you."

“’Tis true, you are saving me.”

“Yes, I am saving you, monseigneur.”

And Tellmarch’s voice grew serious.

“On one condition.”

“What is that?”

“That you do not come here to work evil.”

“I come here to do good,” said the marquis.

“Let us go to sleep,” said the beggar.

They lay down side by side on the bed of seaweed. The beggar fell asleep immediately. The marquis, although very tired, remained absorbed in thought for a time, then he looked at the poor man in the darkness, and lay down again. Lying on this pallet was like lying on the ground; he took advantage of it to put his ear to the earth and listen. There was a dull humming underground; sound is known to be propagated under the earth; he heard the noise of the bells.

The tocsin was still sounding.

The marquis fell asleep.

CHAPTER V.

SIGNED “GAUVAIN.”

When he awoke it was day.

The beggar was up, not in the hut, for there was not room to stand upright there, but outside near the entrance. He was leaning on his stick. The sun shone on his face.

“Monseigneur,” said Tellmarch, “it has just struck four from the belfry of Tanis. I heard the four strokes. So the wind has changed, it is blowing off shore: I hear no other sound, so the tocsin has ceased. Everything is quiet at the farm and in the hamlet of Herbe-en-Pail. The Blues are either asleep, or have gone. The worst of the danger is over; it would be wise for us to separate. It is my time for going away.”

He indicated a point on the horizon.

“I am going that way.”

He pointed in the opposite direction.

“You must go this way.”

The beggar saluted the marquis solemnly.

Pointing to what was left of the supper he added: “Carry the chestnuts with you, if you are hungry.”

A moment later, he had disappeared among the trees.

The marquis rose and went in the direction Tellmarch had pointed out to him.

It was the charming morning hour called in the old Norman peasant tongue, the “piperette du jour,” — the song sparrow of the day. The finches and hedge sparrows were chirping. The marquis followed the path by which they had come the night before. He left the thicket and was again at the parting of the roads marked by the stone cross. The placard was still there, white and almost gay in the light of the rising sun. He remembered that there was something at the bottom of the placard which he could not read the evening before because the letters were so small, and there was so little light. He went up to the pedestal of the cross. The placard ended, just under the signature, “Preur de la Marne” with these two lines in small characters: “The identity of the former Marquis de Lantenac verified, he will be immediately executed. Signed: Chief of battalion, commanding the reconnoitring column, Gauvain."

"Gauvain!" said the Marquis.

He stopped in deep amazement, his eyes fastened on the placard.

"Gauvain!" he repeated.

He started off, turned back, looked at the cross, retraced his steps and read the placard once more.

Then he walked slowly away. If any one had been near him, they would have heard him murmur in an undertone: "Gauvain!"

At the foot of the cross road where he was stealing along, the roofs of the farm, which lay behind him to his left, could not be seen. He was skirting a steep height, all covered with furze in bloom, of the species called long-thorn. The summit of this height was one of those points of land called in the country a hure or head. At the foot of the height the view was abruptly lost in the trees. The foliage was, as it were, soaked in light. All nature rejoices deeply in the morning.

Suddenly, the landscape became terrible. It was like an ambuscade bursting forth. A strange deluge of wild cries and gunshots fell over the fields and woods full of sunlight, and in the direction of the farm a great smoke pierced by bright flames arose, as if the hamlet and the farm were nothing but a bundle of straw burning. It was sudden and fearful, an abrupt change from peace to madness, a burst of hell in the clear dawn, a horror with, out warning. They were fighting near Herbe-en-Pail. The marquis stopped.

There is no one, who, under similiar circumstances would not have felt that curiosity is stronger than danger; one must know, if he has to die in consequence. He climbed up the height, at the foot of which passed the hollow path. From there he might be seen, but he could see. In a few moments he was on the "hure." He looked about him.

To be sure there was firing and a fire. The noise could be heard, the fire could be seen. The farm was the centre of some strange calamity. What was it? Was the farm of Herbe-en-Pail attacked? And by whom? Was it a battle? Was it not rather a military execution? The Blues, as they had been ordered by a revolutionary decree, very often punished refactory farms and villages by setting them on fire; to make an example of them they burned every farm and every hamlet which had not felled the trees prescribed by law, and which had not opened passages through the thickets for the republican cavalry. This had been notably carried out, and very recently, in the parish of Bourgon, near Ernée. Was Herbe-en-Pail in the same condition? It was evident that none of the strategic openings ordered by the decree had been made in the thickets and hedges of Tanis and Herbe-en-Pail. Was this the punishment? Had the advance guard now occupying the farm received orders? Was not this advance-guard a part of one of those investigating columns called colonnes infernales, or columns of hell.

The height on the summit of which the marquis had taken up his place of observation, was surrounded on every side by a very wild, dense thicket. This thicket, called the grove of Herbe-en-Pail, but which had the proportions of a wood, extended as far as the farm, and hid in its depths, like all Breton thickets, a network of ravines, paths, and byways, labyrinths where the republican armies would lose themselves.

The execution, if it were an execution, must have been cruel, for it was short. Like all brutal things it was soon over. The atrocity of civil warfare admits of such cruelties. While the marquis, multiplying his conjectures, hesitating to go down, hesitating to remain, was listening and watching, this din of extermination ceased, or rather was dispersed. The marquis was aware of something in the thicket like the scattering of an infuriated and joyous troop. There was a frightful swarming under the trees. They were rushing from the farm into the woods. Drums were beating. No more firing was heard. It was now like a battue; they seemed to be hunting about, pursuing, tracking; it was evident that they were in search of some one: the noise was widespread and deep; it was a medley of words of anger and of triumph, a clamorous uproar; nothing could be distinguished; suddenly, as a feature stands out against smoke, something became articulate and certain in this tumult. It was a name, — a name repeated by a thousand voices, and the marquis heard clearly this cry, —

“Lantenac! Lantenac! the Marquis de Lantenac!”

He was the one for whom they were searching.

CHAPTER VI.

THE SUDDEN CHANGES OF CIVIL WAR.

Suddenly all around him, and on every side at once, the thicket was filled with guns, bayonets, and swords, a tricolored flag arose in the shade, the cry of “Lantenac!” burst on his ear, and at his feet through the brambles and branches passionate faces appeared. The marquis was alone, standing on a summit which could be seen from every point of the wood. He could hardly see those who were crying his name, but all could see him. If there were a thousand guns in the woods, he was a target for them. He could distinguish nothing in the thicket but eager eyes fixed on him.

He took off his hat, turned up the rim, broke a long, dry thorn from a furze-bush, drew a white cockade from his pocket, fastened the brim and the cockade back to the crown of the hat with the thorn, and putting the hat on his head again, so that the raised rim showed his forehead and his cockade, he said in a loud voice, speaking to the whole forest at once, —

“I am the man you are seeking. I am the Marquis de Lantenac, Viscount de Fontenay, Prince of Brittany, Lieutenant-general of the armies of the king. Make an end of it. Aim! Fire!”

And opening his goat-skin vest, he exposed his bare breast.

He dropped his eyes, looking for the pointed guns, and saw himself surrounded with men on their knees.

A great cry arose: “Long live Lantenac! Long live monseigneur! Long live the general!”

At the same time, hats were thrown in the air, swords flourished joyfully, and throughout the whole thicket sticks were seen rising with brown woollen caps whirling on the end of them.

It was a Vendean band, which surrounded him. This band fell on their knees when they saw him.

A legend runs that in the old Thuringian forests there used to be strange beings, a race of giants, more or less than men, who were considered by the Romans as horrible beasts, and by the Germans as divine incarnations, and who, according to the occasion, ran the risk of being exterminated or worshipped.

The marquis felt something the same as one of these beings must have done, when, expecting to be treated as a monster, he was straightway worshipped as a god.

All these eyes, full of a terrible fire, were fixed on the marquis with a sort of savage love.

This tumultuous crowd was armed with guns, swords, scythes, poles, sticks; all had large felt hats, or brown caps, with white cockades, a profusion of rosaries and amulets, wide breeches open at the knee, sheepskin jackets, leather gaiters, bare legs, long hair, and while some looked fierce, ail had a frank expression in their faces.

A young, handsome-looking man made his way through the kneeling soldiers, and with long strides went up towards the marquis. Like the peasants, this man wore a felt hat with turned-up rim and a white cockade, and a sheepskin jacket, but his hands were white and his linen fine, and he wore outside his vest a scarf of white silk, from which hung a sword with a gold hilt.

When he reached the hure, he threw down his hat, unfastened his scarf, knelt on one knee, presented scarf and sword to the marquis, and said, —

“We were searching for you, and we have found you. Here is the sword of command. These men are now yours. I was their commander, I am promoted to a higher rank, I am your soldier. Accept our homage, monseigneur. Give your orders, general.”

Then he made a sign, and the men bearing the tricolored flag, came out of the woods. They climbed up to where the marquis stood, and laid down the flag at his feet. It was the flag he had just caught a glimpse of through the trees.

“General,” said the young man who had presented him with the sword and scarf, “this is the flag we have just taken from the Blues, who were at the farm of Herbe-en-Pail. Monseigneur, my name is Gavard. I belong to the Marquis de la Rouaire.”

“Very good,” said the marquis.

And, calm and serious, he put on the scarf. Then he drew the sword, and waving it above his head, he said, —

“Stand, and long live the king!”

All rose to their feet. And through the depths of the wood sounded a wild, triumphant shout: “Long live the king! Long live our marquis! Long live Lantenac!”

The marquis turned towards Gavard.

"How many are you?"

"Seven thousand."

As they were going down from the height, and while the peasants tore away the underbrush before the steps of the Marquis de Lantenae, Gavard continued, —

"Monseigneur, nothing could be more simple. Everything is explained by a word. The people were only waiting for a spark. The notice posted up by the republicans, in making known your presence, has roused the country to insurrection for the king. Besides, we had been secretly informed by the Mayor of Granville, who is one of our men, and the same who saved the Abbé Ollivier. Last night they sounded the tocsin."

"For whom?"

"For you."

"Ah!" said the marquis.

"And here we are," added Gavard.

"And there are seven thousand of you?"

"To-day. To-morrow there will be fifteen thousand. It is the contingent of the country. When Monsieur Henri de la Rochejaquelin set out to join the Catholic army, they sounded the tocsin, and in one night six parishes, Isernay, Corqueux, Echaubroignes, Aubiers, Saint-Aubin, and Nueil, raised ten thousand men for him. They had no ammunition, but they found sixty pounds of blasting-powder at a quarry-master's, and Monsieur de la Rochejaquelin set out with that. We were quite sure that you would be somewhere in this forest, and we were searching for you."

"And you attacked the Blues at the farm of Herbe-en-Pail?"

The wind had prevented their hearing the toscin. They suspected nothing; the people of the hamlet, who are a set of louts, had received them well. This morning we invested the farm, the Blues were asleep, and by a turn of the hand the thing was done. I have a horse. Will you condescend to accept it, general?"

"Yes."

A peasant led forward a white horse in military harness. The marquis, without making use of the assistance Gavard offered him, mounted the horse.

"Hurrah!" cried the peasants, for English cries are very much employed on the Breton coast, which has constant intercourse with the Channel Islands.

Gavard gave the military salute, and asked, —

“Where will your headquarters be, monseigneur?”

“At first in the forest of Fougrèes.”

“That is one of your seven forests, marquis.”

“We must have a priest.”

“We have one.”

“Who?”

“The vicar of La Chapelle-Erbrée.”

“I know him. He has made the voyage to Jersey.”

A priest stepped out of the ranks and said, —

“Three times.”

The marquis turned his head.

“Good- morning, vicar. You are going to have some business.”

“So much the better, marquis.”

“You will have many to confess. Those who wish it. We force nobody.”

“Monsieur le Marquis,” said the priest, Gaston, at Guèménée forced the republicans to confession.”

“He is a wig-maker,” said the marquis; “but death should be free.”

Gavard, who had gone to give some orders, returned, —

“General, I await your command.”

“At first the rendezvous will be in the forest of Fougères. Let the men disperse and go there.”

“The order is given.”

“Didn’t you tell me that the people of Herbe-en-Pail had received the Blues well?”

“Yes, general.”

“Did you burn the farm?”

“Yes.”

“Did you burn the hamlet?”

“No.”

“Bum it.”

“The Blues tried to defend themselves, but they were a hundred and fifty, and we were seven thousand.”

“Who are these Blues?”

“Santerre’s Blues.”

“Who ordered the drums to beat while the king’s head was being cut off. So it is a Parisian battalion?”

“A half battalion.”

“What is it called?”

“General, ‘Battalion of Bonnet-Rouge’ is on their flag.”

“Wild beasts.”

“What is to be done with the wounded?”

“Put an end to them.”

“What is to be done with the prisoners?

“Shoot them.”

“There are about eighty.”

“Shoot them all.”

“There are two women.”

“Shoot them also.”

“There are three children.”

“Bring them here. We will see what can be done with them.”

And the marquis started off on his horse.

CHAPTER VII.

NO MERCY: THE WATCHWORD OF THE COMMUNE. NO QUARTER: THE WATCHWORD OF THE PRINCES.

While this was taking place near Tanis, the beggar was travelling toward Crollon. He penetrated the ravines, under vast hollow bowers, inattentive to everything, attentive to nothing, as he had said himself, dreaming rather than thinking, for thoughts have an aim, but dreams have none, wandering, roving, stopping, eating here and there a bunch of wild sorrel, drinking from the springs, occasionally raising his head to catch distant sounds, then returning to the dazzling fascination of nature, sunning his rags, perhaps hearing the noise of men but listening to the songs of the birds.

He was old and slow; he could not go far; as he had said to the Marquis de Lantenac, a quarter of a league wearied him; he took a short cut toward la Croix-Avranchin, and it was evening when he returned.

A little way beyond Macey, the path that he followed led over a sort of culminating point free from trees, from which one could see a long distance, and follow the whole horizon from the west to the sea.

His attention was attracted by smoke.

Nothing is more gentle than smoke, nothing more frightful. There is the smoke of peace, and the smoke of villany. Smoke, the density and color of smoke, it makes ail the difference between peace and war, between brotherhood and hatred, between hospitality and the grave, between life and death. Smoke rising through the trees may signify the most charming thing in the world, the hearth; or the most terrible, a conflagration; and all the happiness, as well as all the unhappiness of man, is sometimes centred in the very thing scattered to the wind.

The smoke that Tellmarch saw was alarming.

It was black, with now and then a sudden gleam of redness, as if the coals from which it came were irregular and had begun to die out, and it rose above Herbe-en-Pail.

Tellmarch hastened towards this smoke. He was very weary, but he was anxious to know what it was. He reached the top of a hill adjoining the hamlet and the farm.

Neither hamlet nor farm was there.

A heap of ruins was burning, and this was Herbe-en-Pail.

It is a more impressive sight to see a hut burn than a palace. A hut on fire is lamentable. Devastation falling on misery, a vulture attacking an earthworm, there is a strange contrariety about it that oppresses the heart.

According to the Bible story, the sight of a conflagration changes a human being to a statue; Tellmarch was for a moment such a statue. The spectacle under his eyes made him immovable. This destruction was going on in silence. Not a cry arose; not a human sigh mingled with the smoke; this furnace was struggling to devour this village, and succeeding, without a sound save the snapping of the timbers and the crackling of the thatch. Occasionally, the smoke cleared away, the roofs fallen in, displayed the yawning rooms, the brazier showed its rubies, scarlet rags and poor old crimson colored furniture appeared in these vermilion interiors, and Tellmarch was dazed with the viciousness of the disaster.

Some trees belonging to a chestnut-grove next the houses had taken fire and were blazing up.

He listened, trying to catch the sound of a voice, an appeal, a cry; nothing stirred except the flames; all was silent except the fire. Had all of them fled?

Where was that group of people living and working at Herbe-en-Pali? What had become of this little people?

Tellmarch came down from the hill.

A funereal enigma confronted him. He approached it slowly and with a steady gaze. He advanced toward this ruin with the slowness of a shadow; he felt like a phantom in this tomb.

He reached what had been the door of the farmhouse; and he looked into the court, which now was without walls and was confounded with the hamlet grouped around it.

What he had seen before was nothing. He had only seen the terrible as yet, — the horrible appeared to him now.

In the middle of the court, there was a black heap, vaguely outlined on one side by flames, on the other by the moon; this heap was a pile of men; these men were dead.

All around this heap there was a great pool, smoking a little; the fire was reflected in this pool; but it had no need of fire to make it red; it was blood.

Tellmarch approached it. He began to examine, one after another, these prostrate bodies; all were corpses.

The moon was shining; the fire too.

These corpses were soldiers. All were barefooted; their shoes had been taken off; their weapons had been taken away, too; they still had on their uniforms, which were blue. Here and there, in the heap of limbs and heads, could be seen hats full of holes with tricolored cockades. They were republicans. They were the Parisians who, the day before, were there all alive, keeping garrison in the farm of Herbe-en-Pail. These men had been executed; this was proved by the symmetrical position of the bodies: they had been struck down on the spot, and with care. They were all dead. Not a death-rattle sounded from the heap.

Tellmarch passed the corpses in review without omitting a single one; all were riddled with bullets.

Those who had shot them, probably in haste to go elsewhere, had not taken time to bury them.

As he was going away, his eyes fell on a low wall in the courtyard, and he saw four feet protruding from behind the corner of this wall.

These feet had shoes on; they were smaller than the others; Tellmarch went towards them. They were the feet of women.

Two women were lying side by side behind the wall; they also had been shot.

Tellmarch bent over them. One of these women wore a sort of uniform; beside her was a cask, broken and empty; she was a vivandière. She had four bullets in her head. She was dead.

Tellmarch examined the other. She was a peasant woman. She was pallid and her mouth was open. Her eyes were closed. There was no wound on her head. Her clothing, which her wearisome wandering had doubtless torn to rags, had come open in her fall, and exposed her half-naked body. Tellmarch pushed them open still more, and saw a round wound made by a bullet in her shoulder; her collar-bone was broken. He looked at her livid breasts.

“A nursing mother,” he murmured.

He touched her. She was not cold.

She had no other injury than the broken collar-bone and the wound on her shoulder.

He placed his hand on her heart and felt a feeble fluttering. She was not dead.

Tellmarch rose to his feet and cried in a terrible voice: —

“Is there nobody here?” “It is you, the caimand!” replied a voice, so low that he could hardly hear it.

And at the same time a head appeared from a hole ia the ruins.

Then another face appeared in another place.

They were two peasants, who were hiding; the only ones who had survived.

The familiar voice of the caimand had reassured them, and brought them out of the nook where they were crouching.

They came up to Tellmarch still all of a tremble.

Tellmarch could have screamed, but he was unable to speak: such are deep emotions.

He pointed to the woman stretched out at his feet.

“Is she still alive?” said one of the peasants.

Tellmarch nodded assent.

“Is the other woman alive?” asked the other peasant.

Tellmarch shook his head.

The peasant who appeared first added, —

“All the others are dead, are they not? I saw it all. I was in my cellar. How one thanks God in times like these for not having a family! My house was burned. Lord Jesus! they have killed them all. This woman had children. Three children, all little things! The children cried: “Mother!” The mother cried: “My children!” They killed the mother and carried away the children. I saw it all, my God! my God! my God! Those who massacred them all have gone. They were satisfied. They took away the little ones and killed the mother. But she is not dead, is she; she is not dead? Tell me, caimand, do you believe you can save her? Do you want us to help you carry her to your carnichot?”

Tellmarch nodded assent.

The woods touched the farm. They quickly fashioned a litter out of leaves and brakes. They placed the woman, still motionless, on the litter and started to go through the thicket, the two peasants carrying the litter, one at her head, the other at her feet, while Tellmarch held the woman’s arm, and felt her pulse.

As they went along, the two peasants talked, and, over the bleeding woman, whose pale face was lighted up by the moon, they gave utterance to exclamations of dismay.

“All killed!”

“Everything burned!”

“Ah, Lord God! Is this the way it is going to be now?”

“It was that tall old man who wanted it done.”

“Yes, he gave the orders.”

“I did not see him when they were shooting. Was he there?”

“No, he had gone. But it is all the same: it was all done by his order.”

“Then he was the one who did it all.”

“He said: ‘Kill! Burn! No quarter!’”

“He is a marquis.”

“Yes, for he is our marquis.”

“What do they call him?”

“He is Monsieur de Lantenac.”

Tellmarch raised his eyes towards heaven first, and muttered between his teeth, —

“If I had known it!”

PART SECOND — IN PARIS.

BOOK FIRST. — CIMOURDAIN.

CHAPTER I.

THE STREETS OF PARIS AT THIS PERIOD.

The people lived in public, they ate from tables spread in front of their doors, the women sat on church steps making lint and singing the Marseillaise; Pare Monceaux and the Luxembourg gardens were parade grounds; there were smiths' shops in full blast at every crossing; they made guns under the eyes of the passers-by, who applauded them; this was the word in everybody's mouth: "Patience, we are in the midst of revolution." The people smiled heroically. They went to the play as they did in Athens during the Peloponnesian War; there were notices posted at the corners of the streets: "The Siege of Thionville." "The Mother of a Family Rescued from the Flames."

"The Club of Sans Souci."

"The Oldest of the Popes Joan."

"The Philosopher-Soldiers."

"The Art of Loving in the Village."

The Germans were at the gates; it was rumored that the king of Prussia had engaged boxes at the opera. Everything was frightful and nobody was frightened. The mysterious law against the suspected, Merlin de Donai's crime, made the guillotine threaten the heads of all. A denounced lawyer, named Seran, sat by his window, in dressing-gown and slippers and played the flute while waiting to be arrested.

Nobody seemed to have time enough. Everybody was in haste. Not a hat without a cockade. The women said: The red cap is becoming to us. Paris seemed to be full of removals. The bric-à-brac shops were encumbered with crowns, mitres, sceptres of gilded wood and decorated with fleurs-de-lis, the relics of royal houses: the destruction of the monarchy was in progress. In old-clothes shops there were copes and rochets to be had for the asking. At the Porcherons' and at Ramponneau's, men decked out in surplices and stoles, mounted on asses, caparisoned with chasubles, had wine from the public-house poured into a cathedral ciboria. In Rue Saint-Jacques, barefooted street-pavers stopped a pedler's cart with boots and shoes to sell, clubbed together, and bought fifteen pairs of shoes to send to the Convention for our soldiers.

Busts of Franklin, Rousseau, Brutus, and it must be added, of Marat, were everywhere; underneath one of these busts of Marat, in Rue Cloche-Perce, was hung up under glass, in a black wooden frame, a speech against Malouet, with testimony in support of it and these two lines on the margin:

"These details were given me by Sylvian Bailly's mistress, a good patriot who was kindly disposed toward me. Signed: Marat."

In the Place du Palais-Royal, the inscription on the fountain: Quantos effundit in usus! was covered over with two great pictures painted in distemper, one representing Cahier de Gerville denouncing the rallying cry of the "Chiffonistes" of Aries to the National Assembly the other, Louis XVI., brought back from Varennes in his royal coach, and under this coach a plank fastened by ropes, on each end of which was a grenadier with fixed bayonet.

Few large shops were open; haberdashers' and toy shops on wheels were dragged about by women, and were lighted with candles, the tallow dripping over the goods; stalls in the open air were kept by ex-nuns in blonde wigs; one stocking-mender, darning stockings in a stall, was a countess: another seamstress was a marchioness: Madame de Bouffiers lived in a garret from which she could see her own mansion. Street criers went about, offering newspapers. Those who wore cravats hiding their chins were called "écrouelleux," — scrofulous. Strolling singers swarmed. The crowd hooted Pitou, the royalist song-writer, formerly so popular, because he had been imprisoned twenty-two times, and was brought before the revolutionary tribunal for having slapped his hindquarters in pronouncing the word civisme; seeing that his head was in danger, he exclaimed: "But it is the opposite of my head, which is guilty!" this made the judges laugh, and saved him. This same Pitou made fun of the fashion for Greek and Latin names; his favorite song was about a cobbler named "Cujus," and whose wife he called " Cujusdam."

They made revolutionary songs and dances; they no longer said gentleman and lady, but citizen and citizeness. They danced in ruined cloisters, with church lamps on the altar, with two sticks crossed and bearing four candles under the arched roof, and tombs beneath their feet.

They wore blue tyrant jackets. They had "liberty cap" shirt pins made of red, white, and blue stones. Rue Richelieu was called the Street of the Law; the Faubourg Saint-Antoine, was called the Faubourg of Glory; there was a statue of Nature in the Place de la Bastille.

Certain well-known characters were pointed out: Chatelet, Didier, Nicolas, and Garnier-Delaunay, who stood guard at Duplay the carpenter's door; Voullaut, who never missed a guillotine day, and followed the wagons carrying the condemned, and who called it, "going to the red mass"; Montflabert,a revolutionary juror, and a marquis, who called himself "Dix-Août" (tenth of August.)

People watched the pupils of the Military School as they passed by; they were termed by the decree of the Convention "aspirants to the School of Mars," and by the people, "Robespierre's pages."

The people read the proclamations of Fréron, denouncing those suspected of the crime of "negotiantism." Young swells collected at the door of the mayoralty, to scoff at civil marriages, placing themselves in the way of the bride and bridegroom and saying: "married civilly." At the Invalides the statues of saints and kings had on Phrygian caps. They played cards on the curbstones at the crossings; playing-cards, too, were in a state of revolution; kings were replaced by genii; queens, by the Goddess of Liberty; knaves, by Equality personified; and aces, by characters representing Law.

They tilled the public gardens; they ploughed up the gardens of the Tuileries. With all this, especially among the conquered parties, was mingled a strange, haughty weariness of life; a man wrote to Fouquier-Tinville, —

"Have the kindness to release me from life. Here is my address." Champcenetz was arrested for having cried out in full sight of the Palais-Royal: "When will the revolution of Turkey be? I want to see the republic à la Porte."

Newspapers were everywhere. Wig-makers curled women's wigs in public, while the master read the Moniteur aloud; others, surrounded by a crowd, made comments, with vehement gesticulations, on the journal Entendons-nous, belonging to Dubois-Crancé, or the Trompéte du Père Belle-rose. Sometimes, barbers were also pork-butchers; and hams and chitterlings might be seen hanging beside a dummy with golden hair; Merchants sold wines of the emigrés on the public streets; one merchant proclaimed wines of fifty-two sorts; others sold second-hand harp-shaped clocks, and duchesse sofas; one wig-maker had this for a sign: "I shave the clergy, comb the hair of the nobility, accommodate the Third Estate."

“People went to have their fortunes told by Martin, number 173 Rue d’Anjou, formerly Rue Dauphine. There was lack of bread, there was lack of coal, there was lack of soap; numbers of milch cows might be seen passing along as they came from the provinces. At la Vallée, lamb sold for fifteen francs a pound. An order of the Commune assigned a pound of meat to each person every ten days. The people formed in line in front of the shops; one of these lines has become famous; it reached from the door of a grocer’s shop in Rue du Petit-Carreau to the middle of Rue Montorgueil. Forming the line, was called “holding the cord” on account of a long rope which those in file held in their hands one behind another. The women were brave and sweet in their misery. They spent whole nights awaiting their turn to enter the bakers’ shops. Expedients were used with success during the revolution; this universal distress was alleviated by two perilous means, the assignat and the maximum; the assignat was the lever, the maximum the fulcrum. This empiricism was the saving of France. The enemy, both in Coblentz and in London, gambled in assignats.

Girls went about selling lavender water, garters, and braids of hair, and dabbling in stocks. On the Perron, in Rue Vivienne, there were stockbrokers with dirty shoes, greasy hair, and fur capes trimmed with fox tails, and magoiets from Rue de Valois, in polished boots, toothpicks in their mouths, shaggy hats on their heads, to whom the girls spoke familiarly. The people went in pursuit of them as they did of the thieves, whom the royalists called “active citizens.” Beyond this, there was very little theft. Cruel destitution, stoical integrity. The barefooted and the starving, with eyes solemnly cast down, passed by the windows of the jewelry shops in the Palais Egalité. While the Section Antoine was searching the house of Beaumarchais, a woman picked a flower in the garden; the people boxed her ears. Wood cost four hundred francs in silver, a cord; people could be seen in the streets sawing up their beds for wood; in winter-time, the fountains were frozen: two pails of water cost twenty sous; everybody turned water-carrier. A Louis d’or was worth three thousand, nine hundred and fifty francs. A ride in a hackney-coach cost six hundred francs. After using a hackney-coach for a day this conversation was overheard: —

“Coachman, how much do I owe you?”

“Six thousand francs.”

A greengrocer woman made twenty thousand francs a day. A beggar said: “For the sake of charity, assist me! I need two hundred and thirty livres to pay for my shoes."

At the entrance to the bridges might be seen colossal figures sculptured and painted by David, which Mercier insulted by calling them: "Enormous wooden puppets." These enormous figures represented Federalism and Coalition overthrown. No faltering among this people. The gloomy joy of having made an end of thrones. Volunteers abounded, exposing their breasts. Each street had its battalion. The flags of the districts came and went, each with its own device. On the flag of the district of the Capucins was this inscription: "Nobody shall shave us." On another: "No more nobility except, in the heart." On every wall there were placards large, small, white, yellow, green, red, printed, and written, with this exclamation: "Long live the Republic!" The little children lisped: "Ca ira!"

These little children were to be the great future.

Later on, the tragic city was succeeded by the cynical city; the streets of had two very distinct aspects during the revolution, before and after the ninth Thermidor; the Paris of Saint-Just gave place to the Paris of Tallien; and, these are the continual antitheses of God; immediately after Sinai, la Courtille appeared.

An outburst of public madness now appeared. It was a repetition of what had been seen eighty years before. The people left Louis XIV. as they left Robespierre, with a great need for breath; hence the Regency which opens the century and the Directory with which it closes. Two saturnalia after two reigns of terror. France fled from the puritan cloister as from the monarchical cloister, with the joyfulness of an escaped nation.

After the ninth Thermidor, Paris was gay, insanely gay. An unhealthy joy burst forth. The frenzy of dying was succeeded by the frenzy of living, and grandeur outdid itself. They had a Trimalcion, called "Grimod de la Regnière;" they had the "Almanach des Gourmands." They dined to the sound of trumpets in the entresols of the Palais Royal, with orchestras of women beating the drum and sounding the trumpet.

The "rigodooner" reigned, bow in hand; they took supper "in oriental fashion" at Méot's house, surrounded with perfumes. The artist Boze, painted his daughters, charming, innocent girls of sixteen years, "en guillotines," that is to say in low-necked dresses with red underwaists.

The boisterous dances in the ruined churches were followed by the balls of Ruggieri, of Luquet Wenzel, of Mauduit, of la Montansier; serious women making lint, were followed by sultanas, savages, nymphs; barefooted soldiers covered with blood, mud, and dust, were followed by barefooted women decorated with diamonds; dishonesty appeared simultaneously with immodesty; it had its purveyors in the upper classes, and associations of thieves in the lower classes; a swarm of pickpockets filled Paris, and everybody was obliged to keep watch over his “luc,” that was his pocketbook; it was one of the pastimes to go to the Place-du-Palais-de-Justice to see the women thieves on the stool; they were obliged to fasten their petticoats securely.

As people came from the theatres, street-boys offered cabs, saying “citizen and citizeness there is room for two; they no longer cried “The old Franciscan” and the “Friend of the People,” but in their places “Punch’s Letter” and “The Rogues’ Petition;” the Marquis de Sade presided over the Section des Piques, in Place Vendôme.

The reaction was jocund and ferocious; the “Dragons of Liberty” of ‘92 came to life again under the name of “Chevaliers of the Dagger.” At the same time, there appeared in the booths the type, Jocrisse. They had “The Wonder,” and besides these marvellous women the “Inconceivables,” they swore by the “paole victimé” and the “paole verte;” they retrograded from Mirabeau to Bobèche.

Thus Paris sways to and fro; it is the enormous pendulum of civilization; it touches alternately one pole and then the other, Thermopylæ and Gomorrha. After ‘93, the, Revolution passed through a singular occultation, the century seemed to forget to finish what it had begun, some strange orgy was interposed, took the foreground, pushed the frightful apocalypse in to the background, veiled the inordinate vision, and burst into a laugh after the fright; tragedy disappeared in parody, and on the edge of the horizon, carnival smoke mysteriously effaced Medusa.

But in ‘93, where we now are, the streets of Paris still had all the grandiose and wild appearance of the beginning. They had their orators; there was Varlet, who went about in a booth on wheels, from the top of which he harangued to the passers-by; they had their heroes, one of which was called “the captain of the iron-tipped sticks.” They had their favorites — Guffroy, author of the pamphlet “Rougiff.” Some of these popular favorites were mischievous; others were healthful. One among them all was honest and fatal; he was Cimourdain.

CHAPTER II.

CIMOURDAIN.

Cimourdain was a pure-minded but gloomy man. He had “the absolute” within him. He had been a priest, which is a solemn thing. Man may have, like the sky, a dark and impenetrable serenity; that something should have caused night to fall in his soul is all that is required. Priesthood had been the cause of night within Cimourdain. Once a priest, always a priest.

Whatever causes night in our souls may leave stars. Cimourdain was full of virtues and truth, but they shine out of a dark background.

His history was quickly told. He had been a village priest and a tutor in a great family; then a little inheritance fell to him, and he became free.

He was, above all, an obstinate man. He made use of meditation as one does of pincers, he believed that he had no right to leave an idea till he had thought it out to the end; he thought desperately. He knew all the languages of Europe and others somewhat; this man studied ceaselessly, which helped him to keep his chastity, but there is nothing more dangerous than such repression.

As a priest he had, though pride, chance, or loftiness of soul, kept his vows; but he had not been able to keep his belief. Science had destroyed his faith; dogma had vanished in him. Then examining himself, he had felt as though he were mutilated, and being unable to change himself as a priest, he tried to make himself over as a man, but in an austere fashion; he had been deprived of a family, he adopted his country; he had been refused a wife, he espoused humanity. Such vast repletion is at bottom emptiness.

His parents, peasants, in making a priest, of him, had wished to remove him from the people; he had come back to the people.

And he had returned with passionate fondness. He regarded their suffering with a fierce tenderness. First a priest, then philosopher, and lastly, athlete. Louis XV. was still alive when Cimourdain began to feel dimly that he was a republican. Of what republic? The republic of Plato, perhaps, and perhaps also of the republic of Draco.

It was forbidden him to love, he began to hate. He hated lies, monarchy, theocracy, his priestly robes; he hated the present, and he called aloud to the future; he foresaw it, he anticipated it, he imagined it frightful and magnificent; he knew, that for the liberation of this lamentable human misery, something like an avenger, who would be at the same time a liberator, was needed. He worshipped the catastrophe from afar.

In 1789, this catastrophe came, and found him ready. Cimourdain threw himself into this vast plan of human renovation, logically, that means for a mind of his stamp inexorably; logic is pitiless. He had lived during the great years of the Revolution, and had been thrilled by all its commotions: in ‘89 the fall of the Bastille, the end of torture for the people; in ‘90, the nineteenth of June, the end of feudalism; in ‘91 Varennes, the end of royalty; in ‘92 the coming of the Republic. He had seen the sunrise of the Revolution; he was not a man to be afraid of this giantess; far from that, this growth on every side had given him new life; and although almost an old man, — he was fifty years old, and a priest ages sooner than other men, — he began to grow too. From year to year, he had watched events as they increased in size, and he had grown like them. At first, he had feared that the Revolution would miscarry, he watched it, it was in the right, he insisted that it would succeed; and in proportion to its frightfulness his confidence increased. He wished that this Minerva, crowned with the stars of the future, might be also a Pallas, with Medusa’s head for a buckler. He wished that her divine eye might be able in time of need to cast an infernal glare at the demons and pay them back terror for terror.

Thus he had come to ‘93.

“Ninety-three” was the war of Europe against France, and of France against Paris. And what was the Revolution? It was the victory of France over Europe, and of Paris over France. Hence the immensity of that terrible moment?, ‘93, greater than all the rest of the century.

Nothing could be more tragic than Europe attacking France and France attacking Paris. A drama with epic proportions.

“Ninety-three” was a year of intensity. The storm was raging then in all its fury and all its grandeur. Cimourdain felt at ease in it. This life of bewilderment, savage and splendid, suited his spread of wings. This man, like the sea-eagle, possessed a deep, internal composure, together with a taste for external danger. Certain winged creatures, ferocious and calm, are made to struggle against mighty winds. Souls of the tempest, like these, exist.

He was capable of exceptional pity, which he reserved alone for the wretched. To the kind of suffering which causes horror, he was ready to devote his life. Nothing was loathsome to him. In this consisted his characteristic kindness. He was hideously and divinely helpful. He sought for ulcers that he might kiss them. Fine actions, ugly in appearance, are the most difficult to perform; these he preferred. One day, at the Hôtel-Dieu, a man was dying, choked by a tumor in his throat, a horrible, fetid abscess, possibly contagious, and which had to be emptied at once. Cimourdain was there. He applied his mouth to the tumor, sucked it, spitting out as his mouth filled, emptied the abscess, and saved the man’s life. As he was still wearing the priest’s robes at this time, some one said, —

“If you should do that for the king, you would be made a bishop.”

“I would not do it for the king!” replied Cimourdain.

This action and this reply made him popular in the dismal quarters of Paris.

So much so that he could do what he pleased with those who suffered, those who wept, and those who threatened. At the time of the indignation against the monopolists, — an indignation so prolific in error, — it was Cimourdain who, without a word, prevented the plundering of a vessel laden with soap at the Saint-Nicholas quay, and scattered the infuriated mob who were stopping the carriages at the barrier of Saint-Lazare.

It was he who, ten days after the tenth of August, led the people to overthrow the statues of the kings. In their fall, they killed; in Place Vendôme, a woman, Reine Violet, was crushed by Louis XIV., around whose neck she had put a rope that she was pulling. This statue of Louis XIV. had been standing a hundred years; it was erected the twelfth of August, 1692; it was pulled down the twelfth of August, 1792. In the Place de la Concorde, a man named Guinguerlot, was beaten to death on the pedestal of Louis XV. for having called the demolishers rascals. The statue was broken to pieces. Later, they made it into sous. One arm alone escaped; it was Louis XV.’s right arm that he extended with the gesture of a Roman emperor. It was at Cimourdain’s request that the people sent a deputation to carry this arm to Latude, the man who had been buried thirty-seven years in the Bastille. When Latude, with the iron collar about his neck, and chains about his loins, lay rotting alive in the bottom of this prison, by order of the king whose statue dominated Paris, who could have told him that this prison would fall? that this statue would fall? that he would escape from the tomb, and that the monarchy would enter in? that he, the prisoner, would be master of this bronze hand which had signed his warrant? and that nothing would be left of this king of mud but this brazen arm?

Cimourdain was one of those men who have a voice within them, and who listen to it. Such men seem absent-minded; they are not; they are all attention.

Cimourdain knew everything and nothing. He knew everything about science, and nothing at all about life. Hence his inflexibility. His eyes were bandaged like Homer's Themis. He had the blind certainty of the arrow, which sees only the mark and flies to it. In a revolution, nothing is more terrible than a straight line. Cimourdain went straight ahead, as sure as fate.

Cimourdain believed that, in social geneses, the extreme point is the solid earth; an error peculiar to minds which replace reason with logic. He went beyond the Convention; he went beyond the Commune; he belonged to the Evêché.

This convention, called the Evêché because it holds its meetings in a hall of the old Episcopal palace, was rather a complication of men than an assembly. There, as at the Commune, were seen silent and significant spectators who, as Garat said, had as many pistols about them as pockets. The Evêché was a strange mixture, — a mixture both cosmopolitan and Parisian, which is not a contradiction, for Paris is the place where the heart of nations beats. There was the great plebeian incandescence. Compared to the Evêché, the Convention was cold, and the Commune lukewarm. The Evêché was one of those revolutionary formations, like volcanic formations. The Evêché was made up of everything: ignorance, stupidity, integrity, heroism, anger, and the police. Brunswick had agents in it. There were men in it worthy of Sparta, and men worthy of the galleys. Most of them were mad but honest. La Gironde, through the mouth of Isnard, temporary president of the Convention, had uttered this monstrous prediction, —

"Be on your guard, Parisians. There will not be left one stone on another of your city, and people will one day search for the place where Paris stood."

This speech created the Evêché. There were men, and, as we have just said, men of all nations, who had felt the need of gathering close about Paris. Cimourdain joined this group.

This group reacted against reaction. It was born of that public need of violence, which is the terrible and mysterious side of revolutions. Strong in this force, the Evêché began its work immediately. In the commotion of Paris, the Commune made use of the cannon, the Evêché sounded the tocsin.

Cimourdain believed, in his implacable ingenuousness, that everything is right in the service of truth; this fitted him for ruling the extreme parties. Rascals felt that he was honest, and were satisfied. Crimes are flattered to be presided over by a virtue. It both restrains them and pleases them. Palloy, the architect, who planned the destruction of the Bastille and sold the stones to his own profit, and who, when appointed to whitewash Louis XVI.’s dungeon, in his zeal covered the wall with bars, chains and iron collars; Gonchon, the suspected orator of the faubourg Saint-Antoine, whose receipts were afterwards found; Fournier, the American, who, on the seventeenth of July, fired a pistol at Lafayette, which it was said Lafayette had paid for; Henriot, who came out of Bicêtre, and had been valet, mountebank, thief and spy before he was a general, and levelled his guns at the convention; La Reynie, formerly grand vicar of Chartres, who had replaced his breviary with Père Duchesne; all these men respected Cimourdain, and at times, all that was necessary to keep the worst of them from flinching, was to let them feel this terrible, convincing frankness before them in judgment.

In this way, Saint-Just terrified Schneider.

At the same time, the majority of the Evêché, composed largely of poor, violent men, who were good, believed in Cimourdain and followed him. He had as vicar, or aide-de-camp, as one pleases, another republican priest, Danjou, whom the people loved because he was so tall, and they had christened him the Abbé Six-Pieds, or Six-Feet. Cimourdain had led that intrepid chief, called Général la Pique, wherever he pleased, and also that bold Truchon, called the Grand-Nichoias, who tried to save Madame de Lamballe’s life, by giving her his arm, and making her jump over the corpses; which would have been successful had it not been for the barber Carlot’s cruel jestings.

The Commune watched the Convention, the Evêché watched the Commune; Cimourdain, a just mind, and loathing intrigue, had broken many a mysterious thread in the hands of Pache, whom Beurnonville called the “man in black.” Cimourdain, at the Evêché, was on an equality with everybody. He was consulted by Dobsent and Momoro. He spoke Spanish to Gusman, Italian to Pio, English to Arthur, Flemish to Pereyra, German to the Austrian Proly, bastard son of a prince. He created an understanding between these discordant elements. Hence his situation was obscure but strong. Hébert feared him.

Cimourdain had, at this time, and among these tragic groups, the power of the fates. He was a spotless man who thought himself infallible. Nobody had ever seen him shed a tear. Unapproachable, icy virtue. He was the frightfully just man.

There was no half way for a priest in revolution. A priest could only give himself up to this prodigious and atrocious chance, from the lowest or the highest motives; he must be infamous or sublime. Cimourdain was sublime, but sublime in isolation, in inaccessibility, in inhospitable gloom; sublime when surrounded by precipices. The lofty mountains have such forbidding virginity.

Cimourdain had the appearance of an ordinary man, dressed in common clothes, poor in aspect. When young, he had been tonsured; when old, he was bald. The little hair he had was gray. His forehead was broad, and on this forehead there was a sign for a close observer. Cimourdain had an abrupt, impassioned, and solemn way of speaking; his voice, stern, his tone peremptory; his mouth sad and bitter; his eye clear and penetrating, and over all his face there was a strange look of scorn.

Such was Cimourdain.

No one to-day knows his name. History has more than one such terrible Unknown.

CHAPTER III.

A HEEL NOT DIPPED IN THE STYX.

Was such a man really a man? Could the servant of the human race have any affection? Had he not too much soul to have any heart? This world-wide embrace, which took in all and everything, could it reserve itself for any one person? Could Cimourdain love? Let us answer, Yes.

When he was young, and a tutor in an almost princely mansion, he had one pupil, the son and heir of the family, and he loved him. It is so easy to love a child. What can one not forgive a child? One can pardon him for being a seigneur, a prince, a king. The innocence of his tender years makes one forget the crimes of his race; the feebleness of the creature makes one forget the exaggeration of rank. He is so small that one pardons him for being great. The slave pardons him for being the master. The old negro worships the little white boy.

Cimourdain had conceived a passion for his pupil. Childhood is so ineffable that one can pour out all one's affection on it. All the power of loving in Cimourdain had, so to speak, fallen on this child; the sweet, innocent being had become a sort of prey to this heart condemned to solitude. He loved him with all the tenderness at once of father, brother, friend and creator. He was his son, the son not of his flesh, but of his spirit. He was not his father, and this was not his work; but he was the master, and this was his masterpiece. Of this little lord he had made a man. Who knows? a great man, perhaps. For such are dreams. Unknown to the family, — does one need permission to create an intelligence, a will, an integrity? — he had communicated to the young viscount, his pupil, all the progress that he had in himself, he had inoculated him with the dreadful virus of his virtue; he had infused into his veins his convictions, his conscience, his ideals; into this aristocratic brain he had poured the soul of the people.

The mind suckles, intelligence is a breast. There is an analogy between the nurse giving her milk, and the teacher giving his thought. Sometimes the teacher is more the father than the father himself, just as the nurse is more the mother than the mother herself.

This deep spiritual paternity bound Cimourdain closely to his pupil. The mere sight of this child touched him.

Let us add this: it was easy to replace the father, for the child had no father; he was an orphan; his father was dead, his mother was dead; he had no one to watch over him but a blind grandmother, and a great uncle who was away. The grandmother died; the great uncle, the head of the family, a soldier and possessed of great estates, appointed to offices at court, avoided the old family castle, lived at Versailles, went to the army, and left the orphan alone in the solitary towers. So the tutor was master in every sense of the word.

Let us add this, besides; Cimourdain had seen the child who had been his pupil, born. The orphan child when very small had had a serious illness; Cimourdain, at this time of danger, had watched over him day and night; the physician attends the patient, the nurse saves his life, and Cimourdain had saved the child. His pupil owed to him not only his education, his instruction, his knowledge, but he owed to him his recovery, and health; his pupil not only owed to him his thoughts, but he owed to him his life. We adore those who owe everything to us. Cimourdain adored this child.

The natural separation of their lives came about. When his education was completed, Cimourdain was obliged to leave the child, grown to a young man. With what cold and unconscionable cruelty those separations are made! How calmly families dismiss the teacher who has left his thought in a child, a nurse who leaves in it her love. Cimourdain, paid and sent away, left high life, and went back to the lower ranks of society; the partition between the great and the lowly was closed again; the young lord, an officer of birth and instantly made captain, set out for a garrison somewhere; the humble tutor already in the bottom of his heart an unsubmissive priest, hastened to go down again to that dark ground-floor of the church, called the lower clergy, and Cimourdain lost sight of his pupil.

The revolution had come; the memory of this being, of whom he had made a man, continued to smoulder in him, hidden but not extinguished by the immensity of public matters.

To model a statue and give it life is a noble work; to model an intelligence and give it truth, is still nobler. Cimourdain was the Pygmalion of a soul.

A mind can have a child.

This pupil, this child, this orphan, was the only being on earth that he loved.

But, even in such an affection, was such a man vulnerable?

We shall see.

BOOK SECOND. — THE PUBLIC HOUSE OF THE RUE DU PAON.

CHAPTER I.

MINOS, ÆACUS, AND RHADAMANTHUS.

In Rue du Paon there was a public house, called a café. This café had a back room, which is now historical. It was there that men, so powerful and so closely watched that they hesitated to speak to one another in public, occasionally met almost secretly. It was there, on the twenty-third of October, 1792, that the famous kiss was exchanged between la Montague and la Gironde. Although he does not admit it in his “ Mémoires,” it was there that Garat came for information that gloomy night, when he stopped his carriage on the Port-Royal, to listen to the tocsin, after he had put Clavière in a place of safety in Rue de Beaune.

On the twenty-eighth of June, 1793, three men were gathered around a table in this back room. Their chairs did not touch; they were seated on different sides of the table, leaving the fourth vacant. It was about eight o’clock in the evening; it was still light in the street, but dark in the back room, and a hanging lamp, then a luxury, lighted the table.

The first of these three men was pale, young, solemn, with thin lips, and a cold face. He had a nervous twitching in his cheek, which must have hindered him from smiling. He was powdered and gloved, there was not a wrinkle in his light blue coat, well brushed and buttoned up. He wore nankeen breeches, white stockings, a high cravat a plaited shirt frill, shoes with silver buckles.

The two other men were one, a sort of giant, the other a sort of dwarf. The tall man was carelessly dressed in a loose coat of scarlet cloth, his neck bare in a necktie unfastened and falling below his shirt frill, his vest open for lack of buttons; he wore top-boots; his hair was in disorder, though it showed traces of having been dressed, and there was horse-hair in his wig. His face was pitted with smallpox, he had an angry frown between his eyelids, a kindly pucker in the corners of his mouth, thick lips, large teeth, a porter’s hand, flashing eyes. The small man was yellow, and looked deformed when he was seated; he carried his head thrown back, his eyes were bloodshot, there were livid spots on his face; he wore a handkerchief tied over his smooth, greasy hair; he had no forehead, and a terrible, enormous mouth. He wore long pantaloons, slippers, a waistcoat which seemed to have been white satin once, and over this waistcoat, a loose jacket, in the folds of which a hard straight line betrayed a dagger.

The first of these men was called Robespierre; the second, Danton; the third, Marat.

They were alone in this room. In front of Danton stood a glass and a wine-bottle covered with dust, suggesting Luther's beer-glass; in front of Marat, a cup of coffee; in front of Robespierre, papers.

Near the papers was seen one of those heavy leaden inkstands, round and ridged, which will be remembered by those who were schoolboys in the beginning of this century. A pen was thrown down beside the inkstand. On the papers was placed a large copper seal bearing the words, " Palloy fecit," and which formed an exact miniature model of the Bastille.

A map of France was spread out in the centre of the table.

Outside the door was stationed Marat's watch-dog, that Laurent Basse, porter at number 18 Rue des Cordeliers, who, the thirteenth of July, or about two weeks after this twenty-eighth of June, was to strike the head of a woman named Charlotte Corday, with a chair; she was at this time in Caen, dreaming vague dreams. Laurent Basse was the printer's devil of the Ami du Peuple. This evening he had been brought by his master to the café in Rue du Paon, and ordered to keep the room closed where Marat, Danton, and Robespierre were, and not to let anybody enter unless it were some one from the Committee, of Public Safety, from the Commune, or the Évêché.

Robespierre did not wish to close the door against Saint-Just, Danton did not wish to close it against Pache, Marat did not wish to close it against Gusman.

The conference had already lasted a long time. Its subject was the pile of papers on the table which Robespierre had been reading. The voices began to grow higher. Something like anger was brewing between these three men. Outside, loud words were occasionally heard from within. At this period the custom of public tribunals seemed to have created the right to listen. It was the time when Fabricius Pâris, the copying clerk looked through the key-hole to see what the Committee of Public Safety was doing. Which, by the way, was not in vain, for it was Pâris who warned Danton the night of the thirtieth of March, 1794. Laurent Basse had put his ear to the door of the back room where Danton, Marat, and Robespierre were. Laurent Basse served Marat, but he belonged to the Évêché.

CHAPTER II.

MAGNA TESTANTUR VOCE PER UMBRAS.

Danton had just arisen, quickly pushing back his chair.

“Listen,” he cried. “There is only one urgency, the Republic in danger, I know but one thing, that is to deliver France from the enemy. For that all means are good. All! All! All! When I am dealing with every danger, I have recourse to every expedient, and when I fear everything, I risk everything. My thought is a lioness. No half-way measures, no prudery in revolution. Nemesis is not a prude. Let us be frightful and useful. Does the elephant look where he puts his foot? Let us crush the enemy.”

Robespierre replied gently,— “I am willing,” and he added, “The question is to know where the enemy is.”

“It is outside, and I have driven it there,” said Danton.

“It is within, and I am watching it,” said Robespierre.

“And I will drive it out again,” replied Danton.

“You cannot drive away an internal enemy.”

“What can be done then?”

“It must be exterminated.”

“I give my consent,” said Danton in his turn, and he continued: “I tell you it is outside, Robespierre.”

“Danton, I tell you it is within.”

“Robespierre, it is on the frontier.”

“Danton, it is in Vendée.”

“Calm yourselves,” said a third voice “it is every where; and you are lost.”

It was Marat who spoke.

Robespierre looked at Marat and replied calmly, —

“Truce to generalities. I am exact. Here are the facts.”

“Pedant!” grumbled Marat.

Robespierre placed his hand on the pile of papers before him, and continued, —

“I have just read you the despatches from Prieur de la Marne. I have just communicated to you the information given by this Gélainbre. Danton, listen, foreign war is nothing, civil war is everything. Foreign war is a scratch on the elbow; civil war is an ulcer which eats your vitals. This is the result of all that I have just read to you: La Vendée until now scattered among several chiefs, is on the point of concentrating herself. She is henceforth going to have a single captain,—”

“A central brigand,” murmured Danton.

“He is” continued Robespierre, “the man landed near Ponterson the second of June. You have seen what he is. Notice that this landing coincides with the arrest of the acting representatives, Prieur de la Côte d’Or and Rom me at Bayeux, by the traitorous district of Calvados, the second of June, the same day.”

“And their removal to the castle of Caen,” said Danton.

Robespierre went on: —

“I will continue the summing up of the despatches. The forest war is organizing on a vast scale. At the same time, a descent from the English is in preparation; Vendéans and English; that is, Britain with Brittany. The Hurons of Finisterre speak the same language as the Topinambous of Cornwall. I have laid before your eyes an intercepted letter from Puisaye, in which it says that ‘twenty thousand redcoats distributed among the insurgents will raise a hundred thousand.’ When the peasant insurrection is completed, the English will make their descent. This is the plan, follow it on the map.”

Robespierre placed his finger on the map and continued, —

“The English have the choice of landing from Cancale to Paimpol. Craig would prefer the bay of Saint-Brieuc; Cornwallis, the bay of Saint-Cast. That is mere detail. The left bank of the Loire is guarded by the Rebel Vendéan army, and for twenty-eight leagues of open country between Ancenis and Pontorson, forty Norman parishes have promised their aid. The invasion will be made at three points, Plérin, Iffiniac, and Pléneuf; from Plérin they will go to Saint-Brieuc, and from Pléneuf to Lamballe; the second day, they will reach Dinan, where there are nine hundred English prisoners, and at the same time they will occupy Saint Jouan and Saint-Méen, and will leave cavalry there; the third day, two columns will go, one toward Jouan-sur-Bédée, the other to Dinan-sur-Becherel, which is a natural fortress, and where they will set up two batteries; the fourth day, they will be at Rennes. Rennes is the key of Brittany. Whoever has Rennes has all. If Rennes is taken, Châteauneuf and Saint-Malo will fall. There are a million cartridges and fifty field-pieces at Rennes.”

“Which they would sweep away,” murmured Danton.

“I will finish. From Rennes, three columns will attack — one, Fougères; one, Vitré; the other, Redon. As the bridges are cut away, the enemy will provide themselves with pontoons and madriers, — you have seen this fact, stated precisely, — and they will have guides for the points where the cavalry can ford. From Fougères they will radiate to Avranches; from Redon, to Ancenis; and 115 from Vitré to Laval. Nantes will surrender, Brest will surrender. Redon opens the way the entire length of the Vilaine, Fougères gives them the road to Normandy, Vitré gives them the road to Paris. In two weeks they will have an array of brigands, with three hundred thousand men, and all Brittany will belong to the King of France.”

“ That is to say, to the King of England,” said Danton.

“No, to the King of France.”

And Robespierre added, —

“ The King of France is worse. A foreigner can be driven out in fifteen days, but it takes eighteen hundred years to root out a monarchy.”

Danton, who had sat down again, put his elbows on the table and rested his head in his hands, deep in thought.

“ You see the danger,” said Robespierre, “ Vitré gives the road to Paris to the English.”

Danton raised his head and brought his two great clenched hands down on the map, as though it were an anvil. “ Robespierre, didn’t Verdun open the way to Paris for the Prussians?”

“Well?”

“Well, we will drive out the English as we drove out the Prussians.”

And Danton rose from his seat again.

Robespierre laid his cold hand on Danton’s feverish fingers. “ Danton, Champagne was not for the Prussians, and Brittany is for the English. To recapture Verdun was foreign war; to recapture Vitré is civil war.”

And Robespierre muttered in a cold, deep voice, —

“A serious difference.”

He added, —

“ Sit down again, Danton, and look at the map instead of pounding it with your fist.”

But Danton clung to his own opinion.

“ That is carrying it too far! “ he exclaimed, “ to look for the catastrophe in the west, when it is coming in the east. Robespierre, I agree with you that England is rising on the ocean; but Spain is rising from the Pyrénées; but Italy is rising from the Alps, and Germany is rising across the Rhine. And the great Russian Bear is at the bottom of it. Robespierre, the danger is in a circle, and we are within it. Coalition without, treason within. In the South, Servant has left the door of France ajar for the king of Spain. In the North, Dumouriez is passing over to the enemy. Moreover, he has always threatened Holland less than Paris. Nerwinde wipes out Jemmapes and Valmy. The philosopher, Radaut SaintEtienne, a traitor, like the Protestant that he is, corresponds with the courtier Montesquieu. The army is reduced. There is not a battalion now with more than four hundred men; the brave regiment of Deux Ponts is reduced to a hundred and fifty men; the camp of Pamars has surrendered; there are no more than five hundred bags of flour left at Givet; we are falling back on Landau; Wurmser pressed Kléber; Mayence is yielding bravely; Condé, cowardly; Valenciennes, also. But this does not prevent Chancel, who is defending Valenciennes, and old Féraud, who is defending Condé from being two heroes, as well as Meunier, who was defending Mayence. But all the others are traitors: Dharville, at Aix-la-Chapelle; Mouton, at Brussels; Valence, at Bréda; Meuilly, at Limbourg; Miranda, at Maestricht; Stengel, a traitor; Lanou, a traitor; Ligonnier, a traitor; Menou, a traitor; Dillon, a traitor; — hideous com of Dumouriez. We ought to make examples of them. Custine’s countermarches look suspicious to me; I suspect Custine of preferring the lucrative prize of Frankfort to the useful prize of Coblentz. Frankfort can pay four millions of war tribute. Grant it. What is that compared to crushing that nest of refugees? Treason, I call it. Meunier died the thirteenth of June; Kléber is alone. Meantime, Brunswick is increasing and advancing. He sets up the German flag in all the French places that he takes. The Margrave of Brandenburg is the arbiter of Europe; he pockets our provinces, he will appropriate Belgium, you will see; one would say that we were working for Berlin. If that goes on, and if we do not see to it, the French Revolution will have been made for the benefit of Potsdam; its sole result will have been the enlargement of Frederick II.’s little state, and we shall have killed the King of France for the King of Prussia.”

And Danton burst into a frightful laugh.

Danton’s laugh made Marat smile.

“You each have your hobby; yours, Danton, is Prussia; yours, Robespierre, la Vendée. Now I will give my views. You do not see the real danger; it is here, — the cafés and the gaming-houses. The café of Choiseul is Jacobin, the café Patin is royalist; the café Rendez-Vous attacks the National Guard, the café of Porte-Saint-Martin defends it; the café of the Regence is against Brissot, the café Corezza is for it; the café Procope swears by Diderot, the café of the Théâtre-Français swears by Voltaire; at the Rotonde they tear up the assignats; the cafés Saint-Marçéau are in a rage; the café Manouri is debating the question of flour; at the café Foy there is gluttony and uproar; at the Perron, there is the buzzing of the hornet-drones of finance. This is the serious matter.”

Danton laughed no longer. Marat continued to smile. The smile of a dwarf, worse than a giant’s laugh.

“Are you jesting, Marat?” growled Danton.

Marat gave that convulsive movement of his hip, which was famous. His smile died away.

“Ah, I recognize you. Citizen Danton. It was you who called me that fellow Marat, before the whole convention. Listen. I pardon you. We are passing through a period of folly. Ah, am I jesting? Indeed, what sort of a man am I? I denounced Chazot, I denounced Pétion, I denounced Kersaint, I denounced Moreton, I denounced Dufriche-Valazé, I denounced Ligonnier, I denounced Menou, I denounced Banneville, I denounced Gensonné, I denounced Biron, I denounced Lidon and Chambon; was I wrong? I scent treason in the traitor, and I find it worth while to denounce the criminal before the crime. I am in the habit of saying the day before, what the rest of you say the day after. I am the man who proposed a complete plan of criminal legislation to the assembly. What have I done just now? I have asked that the sections be instructed, in order to discipline them for revolution; I have broken the seals of thirty-two strong boxes; I have reclaimed the diamonds placed in Roland’s hands; I have proved that the Brissotins gave blank warrants to the Committee of General Safety; I have noted the omissions in Lindet’s report on the crimes of Capet; I voted the execution of the tyrant within twenty-four hours; I defended the battalions, Mauconseil and Republican; I prevented the reading of the letter from Narbonne and from Malouet; I have made a motion in favor of the wounded soldiers; I caused the suppression of the Committee of Six; in the affair of Mons, I foresaw the treason of Dumouriez; I have asked that a hundred thousand relatives of the refugees be taken as hostages for the commissioners surrendered to the enemy; I proposed that all representatives who should cross the barriers be declared traitors; I unmasked the Rolandine faction in the troubles at Marseilles; I insisted that a price should be put on the head of the son of Egalite; I defended Bouchotte; I called for the nominal appeal that Isnard might be driven from the chair; I caused it to be declared that the Parisians were worthy of their country; — that is why I am treated like a dancing-jack by Louvet. Finisterre demanded my expulsion, the city of London hopes to have me exiled, the city of Amiens wishes to have me muzzled, Coburg wants to have me arrested, and Lecointe-Puiraveau proposes to the convention to declare me mad. Ah! Citizen Danton, why did you bring me to your secret meeting, if it was not to have my advice? Did I ask you for permission to come? Far from it. I have no taste for interviews with contra-revolutionists such as Robespierre and yourself. Moreover, I ought to have expected it, you have not understood me; you no more than Robespierre, Robespierre no more than you. So there is no statesman here? you must be taught to spell politics; you must dot your i's. What I have said to you, means this: you are both mistaken. The danger is neither in London, as Robespierre believes; nor in Berlin, as Danton believes: it is in Paris. It is in the absence of unity, in the right that each one has to draw his own conclusions; to commence with you two, in minds grovelling in the dust, in the anarchy of wills — —"

"Anarchy!" interrupted Danton, "who has caused that if not you?"

Marat did not stop.

"Robespierre, Danton, the danger is in this heap of cafés, in this heap of gaming-houses, in this heap of clubs: club of the Noirs; club of the Fédérés; club of the Dames; club of the Impartiaux, which dates from Clermont-Tonnerre, and was the monarchical club of 1790; a social circle conceived by the priest, Claude Fauché; club of the Bonnets de Laine, founded by the gazetteer Prudhomme, et cætera; without counting your club of the Jacobins, Robespierre; and your club of the Cordeliers, Danton. The danger is in the famine which caused the bag-porter Blin to hang the baker of the market Palu, Francois Denis, to the lantern of the Hotel de Ville, and in the justice which hung the bag-porter Blin for having hung the baker Denis. The danger is in the paper money, which is depreciating. An assignat of a hundred francs fell on the ground in Rue du Temple, and a passer-by, a man of the people, said: " It is not worth the trouble of picking it up. " The stockjobbers and the monopolists, there lies the danger! To hang the black flag from the Hotel de Ville, a fine step! You arrest the Baron of Trenck, that is not enough. I would have the neck of that old prison intriguer wrung. Do you think you have escaped from the difficulty because the president of the Convention placed a civic crown on the head of Labertèche who received forty-one sabre cuts at Jemmapes, and whose eulogist Chenier became? Comedies and jugglery. Ah! you do not look at Paris! Ah! you look for the danger from afar, when it is near at hand. What good does your police do, Robespierre? For you have your spies: Payan, in the Commune; Coffinhal, in the Revolutionary Tribunal; David, in the Committee of General Safety; Couthon, in the Committee of Public Welfare. You see that I am informed. Well, know this: the danger is above your heads, the danger is under your feet; conspiracy, conspiracy, conspiracy; the people in the streets read the papers together, and shake their heads at one another; six thousand men, without tickets of civism — returned refugees, Muscadins, and Mathevons, — are concealed in cellars and attics, and in the wooden galleries of the Palais-Royal; people form a line in the baker’s shop; good women wring their hands on the doorsteps, saying: “When shall we have peace?” It is of no use for you to shut yourselves up in the hall of the Executive Counsel to be by yourselves, for all that you say is known; and to prove it, Robespierre, here are the words you said last evening to Saint-Just: “ Barbaroux is beginning to have a big belly, which will hinder him in his flight.” Yes, the danger is everywhere, and, above all, at the centre. In Paris the ex -nobles plot, the patriots go barefooted, the aristocrats, arrested the ninth of March, are already released. The splendid horses, which ought to be put to the cannons on the frontier. spatter us in the streets; bread is worth three francs, twelve sous for four pounds, the theatres play immoral pieces, and Robespierre will have Danton guillotined.”

“Ugh!” said Danton.

Robespierre examined the map attentively.

“What we need,” cried Marat, abruptly, “is a dictator. Robespierre, you know that I want a dictator.”

Robespierre raised his head.

“I know, Marat, either you or me.”

“I or you,” said Marat.

Danton muttered, between his teeth, —

“The dictatorship, try it!”

Marat saw Danton's frown.

"Wait," he added. "One last effort. Let us come to some agreement. The situation is worth the trouble. Haven't we already come to an agreement about the thirty-first of May? The question as a whole is more serious than Girondism, which is a question of detail. There is truth in what you say; but the truth, the whole truth, the real truth, is what I say. In the South, Federalism; in the West, Royalism; in Paris, the duel of the Convention and the Commune; on the frontiers, the retreat of Custine, and the treason of Dumouriez. What does it all amount to? Dismemberment. What do we need? Union. Our safety lies in that; but we must make haste. Paris must take the management of the Revolution. If we lose an hour, the Vendéans may be at Orleans, and the Prussians in Paris to-morrow. I grant you this, Danton; I yield that to you, Robespierre. So be it. Well, the conclusion is the dictatorship. Let us take the dictatorship, and let us three represent the Revolution. We are the three heads of Cerberus. Of these three heads, one speaks, that is you, Robespierre; the other roars, that is you, Danton — —"

"The other bites," said Danton; "that is you, Marat."

"All three bite," said Robespierre.

There was a silence. Then the conversation, full of portentous repartees, began again.

"Listen, Marat; before marrying, we must become acquainted. How did you know what I said yesterday to Saint-Just?"

"That concerns me, Robespierre."

"Marat!"

"It is my duty to enlighten myself, and it is my business to keep myself informed."

"Marat!"

"I love knowledge."

"Marat!"

"Robespierre, I know what you said to Saint-Just, as I know what Danton said to Lacroix, as I know what happens on the Quai des Théatins, in the mansion of Labriffe, a den where the nymphs of emigration repair; as I know what takes place in the house of the Thilles, near Gonesse, belonging to Valmerange, former administrator of the posts, where Maury and Cazalès used to go, where Sieyès and Vergniaud have gone since, and where now a certain one goes once a week."

As he said "A certain one," Marat looked at Danton.

Danton exclaimed, —

"If I had two atoms of power, this would be terrible."

Marat continued, —

"I know what you said, Robespierre, as I know what happened in the tower of the Temple, when they fattened Louis XVI. there so well, that in the month of September alone, the wolf, the she- wolf, and the cubs ate eighty-six baskets of peaches. At the same time, the people were starving. I know this as I know that Roland was hidden in a house looking out on a back court in Rue de la Harpe; as I know that six hundred pikes of the fourteenth of July were made by Faure, the Duke of Orléans's locksmith; as I know what was done at the house of Saint-Hilaire, Sillery's mistress; on days when there was to be a ball, old Sillery himself rubbed chalk on the floors of the yellow drawing-room in Rue Neuve-des-Mathurin; Buzot and Kersaint dined there. Saladin dined there the twenty-seventh, and with whom, Robespierre? With your friend, Lasource."

"Words, words," murmured Robespierre. "Lasource is not my friend."

And he added thoughtfully, —

"Meanwhile, there are eighteen manufactories of false assignats in London."

Marat continued in a calm voice, but with a slight trembling, which was alarming, —

"You are the Faction des Importants. Yes, I know it all, in spite of what Saint-Just calls "State silence."

Marat emphasized these words, looked at Robespierre and went on to say, —

"I know what is said at your table when Lebas invites David to eat the cooking of his betrothed, Elizabeth Duplay, your future sister-in-law, Robespierre. I am the enormous eye of the people, and from the depths of my cellar, I look on. Yes, I see; yes, I hear; yes, I know. Little things content you. You admire yourself. Robespierre courts the admiration of his Madame de Chalabre, the daughter of the Marquis de Chalabre, who played whist with Louis XV. the evening of Damiens' execution. Yes, people carry their heads high. Saint-Just lives in a cravat. Legendre is proper, new overcoat and white vest, and a shirt frill to make one forget his apron. Robespierre imagines that history will care to know that he had on an olive frock coat at the Constituante, and a sky-blue coat at the Convention. He has his portrait all over the walls of his room — —"

Robespierre interrupted him in a voice even more calm than Marat's.

"And you, Marat, you have yours in all the sewers."

They continued in a conversational tone, the slowness of which emphasized their replies and repartees, and added a strange irony to the threats.

"Robespierre, you have termed those who desire the overthrow of thrones, the 'Don Quixotes of the human race.'"

"And you, Marat, after the fourth of August, in number 559 of your Ami du Peuple, — Ah, I have kept the number, it will be useful, — you have asked to have the nobles receive their titles back again. You said: 'A duke is always a duke.'"

"Robespierre, in the meeting of the seventh of December, you defended the Roland woman against Viard."

"Just as my brother defended you, Marat, when you were attacked at the Jacobins. What does that prove? Nothing."

"Robespierre, we know the cabinet of the Tuileries, where you said to Garat: 'I am weary of the Revolution.'"

"Marat, it was here in this public-house, that you embraced Barbaroux, the twenty-ninth of October."

"Robespierre, you said to Buzot: 'What is the Republic?'"

"Marat, it was in this public-house that you invited three men from Marseilles to breakfast with you."

"Robespierre, you have a strong marketman, armed with a cudgel, to escort you."

"And you, Marat, the day before the tenth of August, you asked Buzot to help you escape to Marseilles, disguised as a jockey."

"In September when the courts were in session, you hid yourself, Robespierre."

"And you, Marat, you displayed yourself."

"Robespierre, you flung the red cap on the ground."

"Yes, when a traitor hung it up. What adorns Dumouriez, defiles Robespierre."

"Robespierre, you refused to veil Louis XVI.'s head, while the soldiers were passing by."

"I did better than to veil his head, I cut it off."

Danton interfered, but as oil interferes in fire.

"Robespierre, Marat, calm yourselves."

Marat did not like to be named second. He turned round.

“Why does Danton meddle in this?” he said.

“Why do I meddle? For this reason. To prevent fratricide; to prevent a quarrel between two men who serve the people; because there is enough foreign war, because there is enough civil war, and because there will be too much domestic war; because it was I who brought about the Revolution, and I do not want it spoiled. That is why I am meddling.”

Marat replied without raising his voice, —

“You had better meddle with making your accounts.”

“My accounts!” exclaimed Danton. “Go ask for them in the defiles of Argonne, in Champagne delivered, in conquered Belgium, in the armies where I have already four times exposed my breast to bullets! Go ask for them in the Place de la Révolution, on the scaffold of the twenty-first of January, on the throne abolished, on the guillotine, that widow — —”

Marat interrupted Danton.

“The guillotine is a virgin; men lie with her, but she does not become fruitful.”

“What do you know about it, Danton? I would make her pregnant!”

“We shall see,” said Marat.

And he smiled.

Danton saw this smile.

“Marat,” he exclaimed, “you are a sneak, I am a man for open air and daylight. I hate the life of a reptile. It would not suit me to be a wood-louse. You live in a cellar; I live in the street. You have nothing to say to anybody; any passer-by can see me and speak to me.”

“Pretty boy, will you come up where I live?” muttered Marat.

And ceasing to smile, he assumed a peremptory tone.

“Danton, give account of the thirty-three thousand crowns, ready money, that Montmorin paid to you in the name of the king, under pretext of indemnifying you in your capacity of attorney at the Châtelet.”

“I was concerned with the fourteenth of July,” said Danton, haughtily.

“And the Garde-Meuble? and the crown diamonds?”

“I was concerned with the sixth of October.”

“And the plunder committed by your alter ego, Lacroix, in Belgium?”

“I was concerned with the twentieth of June.”

“And the loans made à la Montansier?”

“I impelled the people to the return from Varennes.”

“And the opera house, built with money furnished by you?”

“I armed the sections of Paris.”

“And the hundred thousand francs, the secret funds of the Minister of Justice?”

“I caused the tenth of August.”

“And the two millions for the Assembly’s secret expenses, of which you took a fourth?”

“I stopped the marching enemy and prevented the allied kings from passing.”

“Prostitute!” said Marat.

Danton rose.

“Yes,” he cried, “I am a harlot, I have sold my body, but I have saved the world.”

Robespierre began to bite his nails. He could neither laugh nor smile. Laughing, Danton’s lightning, and smiling, Marat’s sting, were left out of him.

Danton replied, —

“I am like the ocean; I have my ebb and flow; at low tide my shallow places appear, at high tide my billows are seen.”

“Your froth,” said Marat.

“My tempest,” said Danton.

Marat had arisen at the same time as Danton. He too burst forth. The adder suddenly became a dragon.

“Ah!” he cried, “ah, Robespierre! ah, Danton! You are now willing to listen to me! Well, I tell you, you are lost. Your policy results in the impossibility to go any farther; there is no exit for you; and you have managed to close all the doors before you, except that of the grave.”

“That is our greatness,” said Danton.

And he shrugged his shoulders.

Marat continued, —

“Danton, take care. Vergniaud, too, has a large mouth, thick lips, and an angry frown; Vergniaud, too, is pock-marked like Mirabeau and like you; that did not prevent the thirty-first of May. Ah! you shrug your shoulders. Sometimes shrugging the shoulders shakes off one’s head. Danton, I tell you, your harsh voice, your loose necktie, your Hessian boots, your little suppers, your big pockets, all look to Louisette.”

Louisette was the pet name Marat gave to the guillotine.

He continued, —

“And as for you, Robespierre, you are a Modérée, but that will not do you any good. Go, powder yourself, dress your hair, play the coxcomb, wear fine linen, prink, and be curled and painted, but you will go to Place-de-Grève, all the same; read Brunswick’s declaration; still you will be treated like the regicide Damiens, and you will look as fine as a new pin while waiting to be quartered alive.”

“Echo of Coblentz,” said Robespierre between his teeth.

“Robespierre, I am not an echo of anything, I am the outcry of all. Ah! you are young. How old are you, Danton? Thirty-four years. How old are you, Robespierre? Thirty-three. Well, as for me, I have always been alive; I am suffering humanity, I am six thousand years old.”

“That is true,” replied Danton, “for six thousand years, Cain has been preserved in hatred like a toad in a stone. The rock is broken, and Cain leaps forth among men, and that is Marat.”

“Danton!” exclaimed Marat, and a livid light appeared in his eyes.

“Well, what?” said Danton.

Thus these three terrible men went on talking. A quarrel of thunderbolts.

CHAPTER III.

THE THRILL OF HIDDEN CHORDS.

There was a lull in the conversation; for a moment these Titans each became lost in thought. Lions are disturbed by hydras. Robespierre had grown very pale, and Danton very red. Both trembled. The light died out of Marat's eye; a calmness, an imperious calmness came over the face of this man, the terror of the terrible."

Danton felt that he was conquered, but was unwilling to admit it. He resumed, —

"Marat talks very loud about dictatorship and unity, but he has only one power, that of dissolution."

Robespierre compressed his thin lips, and added, —

"I am of the opinion of Anacharsis Cloots; I say neither Roland nor Marat."

"And for my part," replied Marat, "I say, neither Danton nor Robespierre."

He looked steadily at both and added, —

"Let me give you some advice, Danton. You are in love, you think of marrying again, don't meddle any more with politics, be wise!"

And stepping back towards the door to go out, he gave them this ominous farewell.

"Adieu, gentlemen."

Danton and Robespierre shuddered.

At the same time, a voice rose from the other end of the room, saying, —

"You are wrong, Marat."

All turned round. During Marat's outburst, some one had come in by the rear door, without their notice.

"It is you, Citizen Cimourdain," said Marat. "Good evening."

It was Cimourdain, indeed.

"I say that you are wrong, Marat," he repeated.

Marat turned green, which was his way of growing pale.

Cimourdain added, —

"You are useful, but Robespierre and Danton are necessary. Why do you threaten them? Union, union, citizen! the people want to be united."

This coming in had the effect of cold water, and like the arrival of a stranger in midst of a family quarrel, it calmed at least the surface, if not the depths.

Cimourdain stepped towards the table.

Danton and Robespierre knew him. They had often noticed in the public tribunes of the Convention, this powerful but obscure man whom the people saluted. Robespierre, always inclined to formality, asked, —

"Citizen, how did you get in?"

"He belongs to the Evêché," replied Marat, in a voice with a strange touch of submission in it.

Marat defied the Convention, led the Commune, and feared the Evêché.

This is a law.

Mirabeau felt Robespierre moving at an unknown depth, Robespierre felt Marat moving, Marat felt Hébert moving, Hébert felt Babeuf moving. As long as the strata under-ground are quiet, the political man may walk along, but under the most revolutionary there is a subsoil, and the bravest stop in alarm when they feel beneath their feet the movement that they have caused above their heads.

To know how to distinguish the agitation arising from covetousness, from the agitation arising from principles, to fight the one and aid the other, in this lies the genius and the power of great revolutionary leaders.

Danton saw that Marat was yielding.

"Oh! Citizen Cimourdain is welcome," he said.

And he held out his hand to Cimourdain. Then he said, —

"Parbleu, let us explain the situation to Citizen Cimourdain. He comes at just the right moment. I represent the Mountain, Robespierre represents the Committee of Public Welfare, Marat represents the Commune, Cimourdain represents the Evêché. He shall be our umpire."

"So be it," said Cimourdain, solemnly and simply. "What is the question?"

"About la Vendée," replied Robespierre.

"La Vendée!" said Cimourdain.

And he added, —

"There lies the great danger. If the Revolution comes to naught, it will come to naught through la Vendée. One Vendée is more to be feared than ten Germanys. For France to live, Vendée must be killed."

These few words won Robespierre.

Robespierre, however, put this question, —

“Were you not formerly a priest?”

His priestly air did not escape Robespierre. He recognized by his exterior what was in the man.

Cimourdain replied: “Yes, citizen.”

“What of that?” exclaimed Danton. “When priests are good, they are worth more than other men. In times of revolution, priests are melted up into men, as bells into money and cannons. Danjou is a priest, Daunou is a priest, Thomas Lindet is bishop of Evreux. Robespierre, you sit at the Convention side by side with Massieu, Bishop of Beauvais. The grand-vicar Vaugeois belonged to the Committee of Insurrection of the tenth of August. Chabot is a Capuchin. It was Dom Gerle who invented the oath of the tennis court; it was the Abbé Audran who caused the National Assembly to be declared superior to the king; it was the Abbé Goutte who asked the Legislature to have the dais taken away from Louis XVI.’s arm-chair; it was the Abbé Grégoire who provoked the abolition of royalty.”

“Supported by the player, Collot-d’Herbois,” sneered Marat. “The two together did the work; the priest overthrew the throne, the comedian threw down the king.”

“Let us return to la Vendée,” said Robespierre.

“Well,” asked Cimourdain, “what is the matter there? What is this Vendée doing?”

Robespierre replied, —

“She has a chief. She is going to be tremendous.”

Who is this chief, Citizen Robespierre?”

“He is a former Marquis de Lautenac, who calls himself Prince of Brittany.”

Cimourdain started.

“I know him,” he said. “I have been a priest at his house.”

He thought for a moment, and then added, —

“He was fond of women before he became a warrior.”

“Like Biron, who was a Lauzun,” said Danton.

And Cimourdain added thoughtfully —

“Yes, he was formerly a man of pleasure. He must be terrible.”

“Frightful,” said Robespierre. “He burns villages, puts an end to the wounded, massacres the prisoners, shoots the women.”

“The women?”

“Yes, among others he had a mother of three children shot. Nobody knows what became of the children. Besides he is a captain. He understands warfare.”

“To be sure,” replied Cimourdain. “He was in the war with Hanover, and the soldiers said: ‘Richelieu uppermost, Lantenac at the bottom.’ Lantenac was the real general. Talk about him to your colleague, Dussaulx.”

Robespierre remained thoughtful for a moment, then the conversation continued between him and Cimourdain.

“Well, Citizen Cimourdain, this man is in Vendée.”

“How long has he been there?”

“Three weeks.”

“He must be outlawed.”

“That has been done.”

“A price must be set on his head.”

“It has been done.”

“A large sum of money must be offered to the one who captures him.”

“It has been done.”

“Not in assignats.”

“It has been done.”

“In gold.”

“It has been done.”

“And he must be guillotined.”

“It will be done.”

“By whom?”

“By you.”

“By me?”

“Yes, you will be commissioned by the Committee of Public Welfare with full power.”

“I accept,” said Cimourdain.

Robespierre was swift in his selections, a characteristic of a statesman. He took from the pile before him a sheet of white paper, with this printed heading: French Republic, one and indivisible. Committee of Public Welfare.

Cimourdain continued, —

“Yes, I accept. Terror against terror, Lantenac is cruel. I shall be cruel. War to the death against this man. I will deliver the Republic from him, so it please God.”

He stopped, then added, —

“I am a priest; all the same, I believe in God.”

“God has gone out of fashion.”

“I believe in God,” said Cimourdain, unmoved.

“With a nod of the head, Robespierre gloomily assented,

Cimourdain continued, —

“To whom shall I be sent as a delegate?”

“The commandant of the reconnoitring column sent against Lantenac. Only, I warn you, he is a noble.”

Danton exclaimed, —

“There is another thing that I care very little about.

A noble? Well, what of it? It is the same with nobles as with priests. If they are good, they are excellent. Nobility is a prejudice, but one must not have it more in one sense than in another, not more for than against it. Robespierre, isn’t Saint-Just a noble? Florelle de Saint-Just. Parbleu! Anacharsis Cloots is a baron. Our friend, Charles Hesse, who never misses a meeting of the Cordeliers, is a prince, and brother of the reigning landgrave of Hesse-Rothenburg. Montaut, Marat’s intimate friend, is Marquis de Montaut. In the Revolutionary tribunal, there is a member who is a priest, Vilate, and a member who is a noble, Leroy, Marquis de Montflabert. Both are trustworthy.”

“And you forget,” added Robespierre, “the head of the Revolutionary jury,—”

“Antonelle?”

“Who is the Marquis Antonelle,” said Robespierre.

Danton added, —

“Dampierre was a nobleman, who has just given his life before Condé, for the Republic; and Beaurepaire, who blew his brains out rather than open the gates of Verdun to the Prussians, was a nobleman.”

“Which does not alter the fact,” growled Marat, “that the day Condorcet exclaimed, ‘The Gracchi were noblemen!’ Danton cried out to him: ‘All noblemen are traitors, beginning with Mirabeau, and ending with yourself!’”

Cimourdain’s solemn voice now rose.

“Citizen Danton, Citizen Robespierre, perhaps you are right in your confidence, but the people are distrustful, and they are not wrong in their distrust. When a priest is charged to look after a nobleman, the responsibility is increased twofold, and the priest must be inflexible."

"Certainly," said Robespierre.

Cimourdain added: "And inexorable."

"Well said, Citizen Cimourdain. You will have to deal with a young man. You will have the advantage over him, being twice his age. You will have to direct him, but you must manage him. It seems that he has military talents; all accounts are agreed on that point. He belongs to a corps of the army of the Rhine, which has been detached to go to Vendée. He has reached the frontier, where he is showing admirable intelligence and bravery. He is leading the reconnoitring column in a superior manner. For two weeks, he has held the old Marquis de Lantenac in check. He restrains him and drives him before him. He will end by driving him back to the sea, and overthrowing him there. Lantenac has the art of an old general, and he has the audacity of a young captain. This young man already has enemies, and some are envious of him. The Adjutant-General, Léchelle, is jealous of him."

"This Léchelle," interrupted Danton, "wants to be general in chief! he has nothing to recommend him, but a pun: a ladder is needed to mount upon a wagon. Nevertheless, Charette is beating him."

"And he doesn't want any one but himself to beat Lantenac," continued Robespierre. "The misfortune of the Vendéan war lies in such rivalries as these. Heroes badly commanded, that is what our soldiers are. A mere captain of hussars, Chérin, enters Saumur with a trumpet playing. "Ca ira"; he takes Saumur, and might have gone on and taken Cholet, but he had no orders, and stopped. All the commands of la Vendée ought to be changed. The body-guards are scattered, the forces dispersed; a scattered army is a paralyzed army; it is a rock ground to powder. In the camp at Paramé there are nothing but tents. Between Tréguier and Dinan there are a hundred little useless posts which might be made into a division to cover the whole coast. Léchelle, supported by Parrein, is leaving the northern coast unguarded, under pretext of protecting the southern coast, and in this way opening France to the English. To raise half a million peasants, and a descent from England on France, is Lantenac's design. The young commander of the reconnoitring column is pushing on this Lantenac at the point of the sword, and defeating him without Léchelle's permission; but Léchelle is his general; so Léchelle complains of him. Opinions concerning this young man are divided. Léchelle wants to have him shot. Prieur de la Marne wants to make him adjutant-general.”

“This young man,” said Cimourdain, “has great qualities, so it seems to me.”

“But he has one fault.”

It was Marat who interrupted.

“What is it?” asked Cimourdain.

“Clemency,” said Marat.

And Marat added, —

“He is decided in battle and soft-hearted afterwards. That makes him indulgent, that makes him pardon; be merciful, protect the religieuses and nuns, save the wives and the daughters of the aristocracy, release prisoners, set priests at liberty.”

“A serious fault,” murmured Cimourdain.

“A crime,” said Marat.

“Sometimes,” said Danton.

“Often,” said Robespierre.

“Almost always,” added Marat.

“When dealing with the enemies of one’s own country, always,” said Cimourdain.

Marat turned toward Cimourdain.

“And what would you do with a Republican general who gave a Royalist general his liberty?”

“I should be of Léchelle’s opinion, I should have him shot.”

“Or guillotined,” said Marat.

“Either,” said Cimourdain.

Danton began to laugh.

“I should like one as well as the other.”

“You are sure to have one or the other,” growled Marat.

And his eyes, leaving Danton, turned to Cimourdain.

“So, Citizen Cimourdain, if a Republican general flinches, you would have his head cut off?”

“Within twenty-four hours.”

“Well,” replied Marat, “I am of Robespierre’s opinion; we must send Citzen Cimourdain as a delegate of the Committee of Public Welfare to the commandant of the reconnoitring column of the coast army. What is the name of this commandant?"

Robespierre replied, —

"He is a ci-devant, a noble."

And he began to turn over the papers.

"Let us send the priest to guard the noble," said Danton,

"I distrust a priest alone; I distrust a noble alone; when they are together, I am not afraid of them; one will watch over the other, and they will do."

The expression of indignation peculiar to Cimourdain's eyebrows deepened; but finding the observation just at bottom, he began to speak in his harsh voice, without looking toward Danton.

"If the Republican commandant who is entrusted to my care makes a false step, the penalty will be death."

Robespierre, with his eyes still on the papers, said, —

"Here is the name. Citzen Cimourdain, the commandant over whom you will have full power is a former viscount; his name is Gauvain."

Cimourdain grew pale.

"Gauvain!" he exclaimed.

Marat noticed Cimourdain's pale face.

"The Viscount Gauvain!" repeated Cimourdain.

"Yes," said Robespierre.

"Well?" said Marat, fixing his eye on Cimourdain.

There was a pause. Then Marat said, —

"Citzen Cimourdain, on the conditions named by yourself, do you accept the mission of delegate to the commandant, Gauvain? Is it agreed?"

"Agreed," said Cimourdain.

He grew paler and paler.

Robespierre took the pen near him, wrote in his slow and formal handwriting four lines on the sheet of paper with the heading, "Committee of Public Welfare," signed it, and passed the sheet and the pen to Danton; Danton signed it; and then Marat, who did not take his eyes from Cimourdain's pale face, signed it after Danton."

Robespierre took the sheet of paper again, dated it, and gave it to Cimourdain, who read, —

"Year II. of the Republic.

"Full power is granted to Citizen Cimourdain, delegated commissioner from the Committee of Public Welfare to Citizen Gauvain, commandant of the reconnoitring column of the coast army.

Robespierre. — Danton. — Marat."

And below these signatures, —

"Twenty-eighth of June, 1793."

The Revolutionary Calendar, called the Civil Calendar, was not in existence legally at this period, and was not adopted by the Convention, according to the proposition of Romme, till the fifth of October, 1793.

Marat watched Cimourdain while he read the paper.

Marat said in an undertone, as if speaking to himself:

"All that will have to be specified by a decree of the Convention, or by a special resolution of the Committee of Public Welfare. There is something yet to be done."

"Citzen Cimourdain," asked Robespierre, "where do you live?"

"Court of Commerce."

"Wait; so do I," said Danton; "you are my neighbor."

Robespierre added, —

"There is not a moment to be lost. To-morrow, you will receive your commission in due form, signed by all the members of the Committee of Public Welfare. This is a confirmation of the commission which will accredit you especially with the active representatives Phillieaux, Prieur de la Marne, Lecointre, Alquier, and others. We know who you are. Your powers are unlimited. You can make Gauvain general or send him to the scaffold. You will have your commission to-morrow at three o'clock. When will you start?"

"At four o'clock," said Cimourdain.

And they separated.

On his way home, Marat informed Simonne Evrard that he should go to the Convention the following day.

BOOK THIRD. — THE CONVENTION.

CHAPTER I.

THE CONVENTION.

We are approaching the mountain top.

Here is the Convention.

The attention must be fixed on this summit.

Never did anything higher appear on man’s horizon.

There is Mt. Himalaya, and there is the Convention.

The Convention is perhaps the culminating point in history.

During the lifetime of the Convention, for it lived as an assembly, people did not realize its significance. Its grandeur was exactly what escaped the contemporaries; they were too much frightened to be dazzled. There is a sacred horror about everything grand. It is easy to admire mediocrity and hills; but whatever is too lofty, a genius as well as a mountain, an assembly as well as a masterpiece, seen too near, is appalling. Every summit seems an exaggeration. Climbing wearies. The steepnesses take away one’s breath; we slip on the slopes, we are hurt by the sharp points which are its beauty; the foaming torrents betray the precipices, clouds hide the mountain tops; mounting is full of terror, as well as a fall. Hence, there is more dismay than admiration. People have a strange feeling of aversion to anything grand. They see abysses, they do not see sublimity; they see the monster, they do not see the prodigy. Thus the Convention was judged at first. The Convention was measured by the shortsighted, when it was made to be contemplated by eagles.

To-day it is in perspective, and it stands out against the deep sky in a serene and tragic distance — the immense profile of the Revolution.

II.

The fourteenth of July gave it birth.

The tenth of August thundered it forth.

The twenty-first of September founded it.

Tho twenty-first of September, the equinox, the equilibrium, Libra. The balance. In accordance with Romme’s suggestion, “t was under this sign of Equality and Justice that the Republic was proclaimed. A constellation announced its coming.

The Convention is the first avatar of the people. With the Convention, the great new page is turned, and the future of to-day begins.

Every idea must have a visible covering; every principle must have a dwelling-place; a church is God within four walls; every dogma must have a temple. When the Convention came into existence, there was a first problem to be solved; where to locate the Convention.

First, the Ménage was taken, then the Tuileries. A frame- work was raised, with scenery, a great camaieu, painted by David, seats systematically arranged, a square tribune, parallel pilasters, with socles like blocks, and long rectilinear stems, rectangular alveoles, where the multitude crowded, and which were called public tribunes; a Roman velarium, Greek draperies, and within these right angles and these straight lines the Convention was established; in this geometrical space the tempest was confined. On the tribune, the red cap was painted in gray. The Royalists began by laughing at this gray red cap, this artificial hall, this monument of pasteboard, this sanctuary of papier-maché, this pantheon of mud and spittle. How quickly all that was to disappear! The columns were of barrel staves, the arches of batten, the bas-reliefs of mastic, the entablatures were of deal boards; the statues were made of plaster, the marbles were paint, the walls were linen; and out of this temporary structure, France has made an everlasting institution.

When the Convention held its sessions in the hall of the Ménage, the walls were completed, covered with notices which had flooded Paris at the time of the return from Varennes. One read thus: “The king returns; whoever cheers him will be beaten, whoever insults him will be hanged.” Another, thus: “Peace. Hats on the head. He is going to pass before his judges.” Another, thus: “The king has aimed at the nation. He has hung fire; it is the nation’s turn to shoot now.” Another: “Law! Law!” It was within these walls that the Convention judged Louis XVI.

At the Tuilleries, where the Convention began to sit on the tenth of May, 1793, and which was called the National Palace, the place of assembly occupied the entire space between the Pavilion de I’Horloge, called Pavilion of Unity, and the Pavilion Marsan, called Pavilion of Liberty. The Pavilion de Flore was called the Pavilion of Equality. The assembly hall was reached by the grand staircase of Jean Bullant. Under the second story occupied by the assembly, the entire ground floor of the palace was a sort of long guardroom, filled with bundles and camp beds of the armed troops which watched over the Convention. The assembly had a guard of honor, called the “grenadiers of the Convention.”

A tricolored ribbon separated the castle, where the assembly was held, from the garden where the people came and went.

III.

Let us finish describing the hall where the sessions were held. Everything about that terrible place is full of interest.

What struck one’s notice on entering was a lofty statue of Liberty, standing between two large windows.

Forty-two metres long, ten metres wide, eleven metres high, these were the dimensions of what had once been the theatre of the king, and which was to be the theatre of the Revolution. The elegant, magnificent hall built by Vigarani for the courtiers disappeared beneath the rough timber-work which in ‘93 supported the weight of the people. This framework on which the public tribunes were erected, had for its only point of support, a single post, a detail worthy of note. This post was in one single piece, and was ten metres in length. Few caryatides have accomplished as much as this post; for years it held up the weight of the Revolution. It bore cheering, enthusiasm, insults, noise, tumult, the immense chaos of anger, riot. It never gave way. After the Convention, it saw the Conseil des Anciens. The eighteenth Brumaire relieved it.

Percier then replaced the wooden pillar with columns of marble, which were less durable.

The ideal of architecture is sometimes strange; the architect of the Rue de Rivoli had the trajectory of a cannon-ball for his ideal, the architect of Carlsruhe had a fan for his ideal; a gigantic bureau drawer seems to have been the ideal of the architect who planned the hall where the Convention first sat the tenth of May, 1793; it was long, high, and flat. On one of the long sides of the parallelogram was a wide semicircle; this was the amphitheatre, with seats for the representatives, but without tables or desk; Garan-Coulon, who wrote much, wrote on his knee; opposite the seats was the tribune; in front of the tribune, a bust of Lepelletier-Saint-Fargeau; behind the tribune, the president’s arm-chair.

The head of the bust came a little above the edge of the tribune, which caused its removal later on.

The amphitheatre was composed of nineteen semi-circular benches, rising one behind another; portions of the benches, prolonged the amphitheatre into the two corners.

Below, in the horseshoe at the foot of the tribune, stood the ushers.

On one side of the tribune, in a black wooden frame, was fastened to the wall a placard nine feet high, bearing on two pages, separated by a sort of sceptre, the declaration of the rights of man; on the other side was an empty space which was filled later by a similar frame containing the constitution of the year II., the two pages of which were separated by a sword. Above the tribune, above the head of the orator, from a deep box divided into two compartments, filled with people, fluttered three great tricolored flags resting almost horizontally on an altar bearing this word, “LAW.” Behind this altar rose, like the sentinel of free speech, an enormous Roman fasces, as tall as a column. Colossal statues straight against the wall, faced the representatives. The president had Lycurgus on his right and Solon on his left, above the Mountain was Plato.

The pedestals of these statues were simple dies, placed on a long, projecting cornice extending all around the hall and separating the people from the assembly. The spectators leaned their elbows on this cornice.

The black wooden frame containing the rights of man, reached to the cornice and cut into the design of the entablature, breaking the straight line; this caused Chabot to complain, “It is ugly,” he said to Vadier.

The heads of the statues were crowned alternately with wreaths of oak and laurel.

A green drapery, painted with similar crowns in a darker shade of green, fell in deep, straight folds from the cornice of the periphery, and entirely covered the wall of the lower part of the hall occupied by the assembly. Above this drapery, the wall was white and cold. In this wall, as if hollowed out with a punch, with neither moulding nor foliage were two rows of public tribunes, square at the base and round at the top; according to the rule, for Vitruvius was not dethroned; the archivaults were superimposed on the architraves. There were ten tribunes on each of the long sides of the hall, and at each of the two ends two huge boxes; in all, twenty-four. Into these the multitudes flocked.

The spectators in the lower row of tribunes overflowed on all the gunnels, and formed in groups on all the reliefs of the architecture. A long iron car, securely fastened breast high, served as a railing for the upper tribunes and protected the spectators from the crowding of the throngs coming up the staircase. Once, however, a man was pushed over into the assembly; he fell a little on Massieu, bishop of Beauvais, and so was not killed, and said: “Well! so a bishop is really good for something!”

The hall of the Convention could hold two thousand people: on days of insurrection, three thousand.

The convention had two sessions, one in the daytime, one in the evening.

The back of the president’s chair was round, decorated with gilt nails. His table rested on four winged monsters with a single foot, that seemed to have come out of the Apocalypse to be present at the Revolution. They looked as if they had been taken out of Ezekiel’s chariot to draw Samson’s tumbrel.

On the president’s table there was a great bell, almost as large as a church bell, a large copper inkstand, and a folio volume bound in parchment, which contained the official reports.

Decapitated heads, borne on the end of a pike, dripped blood on this table.

The tribune was reached by means of nine steps. These steps were high, steep, and difficult to mount; Gensonné stumbled one day as he was ascending them. “They are scaffold stairs!” he said. “Serve your apprenticeship,” exclaimed Carrier.

In the corners of the hall, where the wall semed too bare, the architect had placed fasces for ornamentation, with the axe outside.

On the right and on the left of the tribune, there were pedestals bearing two candelabra twelve feet high, each with four pairs of lamps. Each public box had similar candelabra. On the pedestals of these candelabra there were carved circles, which the people called “guillotine collars.”

The seats of the Assembly rose almost to the cornice of the tribunes; the representatives and the people could converse together.

The exits of the tribunes opened into a labyrinth of corridors, usually filled with a furious din.

The convention crowded the palace and overflowed into the neighboring mansions. Hôtel de Longueville and Hôtel de Coigny. Hôtel de Coigny was where the royal furniture was removed after the tenth of August, if a letter of Lord Bradford’s can be believed. It took two months to dismantle the Tuileries.

The commitee had their quarters in the vicinity of the hall; the Committees of Legislature, Agriculture, and Commerce were in the Pavilion Egalité; those of the Marine, Colonies, Finance, Assignats and Public Welfare in the Pavilion Liberté. The committee of War was in the Pavilion Unité.

The Committee of General Safety communicated directly with the Committee of Public Welfare by means of a dark passage lighted day and night by a reflector, where the spies of every party came and went. People never spoke there.

The bar of the Convention was several times removed. Usually, it was at the president's right hand.

At the ends of the hall, the vertical partitions which closed the concentric semicircles of the aniphithentre, left between them and the wall two narrow, deep lobbies from which opened two dark square doors. These were means of entrance and exit.

The representatives entered the hall directly by a door opening from the Terrace des Feuillants.

This hall, dimly lighted in the daytime by small windows, poorly lighted in the evening with ghastly lamps, had a strange nocturnal gloom about it. This dim illumination, together with the evening shades, made the sessions by lamplight dismal. The people could not see each other; from one end of the hall to the other, from right to left, groups of indistinct faces insulted each other. People met without recognizing one another. One day as Laignelot was hurrying to the tribune he ran against some one in the inclined passage. “Beg pardon, Robespierre,” he said. “Whom do you take me for?” replied a harsh voice. “Beg pardon, Marat,” said Laignelot.

Two of the lower tribunes, to the right and left of the president were reserved, for strange to say, there were privileged spectators at the Convention. These were the only tribunes having any drapery. In the centre of the architrave this drapery was caught up by two gold tassels. The tribunes for the people were bare.

The effect of all this was intense, savage, regular. Savage correctness; this is a suggestion of the whole Revolution. The hall of the Convention offers the most complete specimen of what artists have since called “architecture Messidor”; it was massive and slender. The builders of that period took symmetry for beauty. The last word of the Renaissance had been spoken under Louis XV., and a reaction followed. The noble in art had been carried to insipidity, and purity to monotony. There is such a thing as prudery in architecture. After the dazzling orgies in form and color of the eighteenth century, art was put on a diet, and allowed nothing but the straight line. This sort of progress ended in ugliness. Art reduced to a skeleton, was the result. This was the advantage of this kind of wisdom and abstinence; the style was so sober that it became lean.

Setting aside all political feeling, and looking at it from an architectural point of view, there was something about this hall that made one shiver. One recalled confusedly, the former theatre, the garlanded boxes, its blue and crimson ceiling, its facetted chandeliers, its girandoles, with diamond reflections, its dove-colored hangings, its profusion of cupids and nymphs on the curtains and draperies, the whole royal and erotic idyl painted, carved and gilded, which had filled this stern place with its smile, and one saw all about him these hard right angles, cold and sharp as steel; it was something like Boucher guillotined by David.

IV.

Whoever saw the Assembly never gave a second thought to the hall. Whoever saw the drama gave no thought to the theatre. Nothing was more deformed, nor more sublime. A pile of heroes, a herd of cowards. Wild beasts on a mountain, reptiles in a marsh. There swarmed, jostled, challenged, threatened, fought and lived, all those combatants who are to-day but phantoms.

A gathering of Titans.

On the right, the Gironde, — a legion of thinkers; on the left the mountain, — a group of athletes. On one side, Buissot, who received the keys of the Bastille; Barbaroux, whom the Marseilles troops obeyed; Kervélégan, who had the battalion of Brest garrisoned in the Faubourg Saint Marceau, under his hand; Gersonné, who established the supremacy of representatives over generals; the fatal Gaudet, to whom the queen showed the sleeping dauphin one night at the Tuileries, Gaudet kissed the child’s forehead and caused the father to lose his head; Salles, the fanciful denouncer of the intimacies between the Mountain and Austria; Sillery, the humpback of the Right, as Couthon was the cripple of the Left. Lause-Duperret, who when called a “rascal” by a journalist, invited him to dine with him, saying: “I know that rascal means simply a man who does not think as we do”; Rabaut-Saint-Etienne, who commenced his Almanac of 1790 with these words: “The revolution is ended”; Quinette, one of those who overthrew Louis XVI.; the Jansenist Camus, who framed the evil constitution of the clergy, believed in the miracles of the deacon Pâris, and knelt down every night before a Christ seven feet high, nailed against the wall of his room; Fauchet, a priest who, with Camille Desmoulins, caused the fourteenth of July; Isnarn, who committed the crime of saying “Paris will be destroyed,” at the same moment that Brunswick said: “Paris will be burned”; Jacob Dupont, the first one to exclaim “I am an Atheist,” and to whom Robespierre replied: “Atheism is aristocratic”; Lanjuinais, a stern, wise, and brave Breton; Ducos, the Euryalus of Boyer-Fonfréde; Rebecqui, the pylades of Barbaroux, Rebecqui gave in his resignation because Robespierre had not been guillotined; Richaud, who fought the permanency of the Sections; Lasource, who uttered this murderous apophthegm: “Woe to thankful nations!” and who afterwards at the foot of the scaffold, was to contradict himself by hurling this proud speech at those of the Mountain: “We die because the people are asleep, and you will die because the people will awaken”; Biroteau, who had the abolition of inviolability decreed, and was thus unconsciously the forger of the chopping-knife, and erected the scaffold for himself; Charles Villatte, who shielded his conscience behind this protestation: “I do not wish to vote under the knife”; Louvet, the author of Faublas, who was to end as a bookseller in the Palais Royal with Lodoïska behind the counter; Mercier, the author of the “Tableau de Paris,” who exclaimed: “Every king felt for the nape of his neck the twenty-first of January”; Marec, whose anxiety was the faction of ancient boundaries; the journalist Carra, who said to the executioner at the foot of the scaffold: “It annoys me to die. I should have liked to see what follows”; Vigée, who had the title of grenadier in the second battalion of Mayence-et-Loire, who, when threatened by the public tribunes, cried out: “I ask that at the first murmur of the public tribunes, we withdraw and march to Versailles, sword in hand!” Buzot, destined to die of hunger; Valazé, victim of his own dagger; Condorcet, who was to die at Bourg-la-Reine, changed to Bourg-Egalité, denounced by the Horace he carried in his pocket; Pétion, whose fate was to be worshipped by the multitude in 1792, and devoured by the wolves in 1794; twenty others beside, Pontécoulant, Marboz, Lidon, Saint-Martin, Dussaulx, the translator of “Juvenal,” who took part in the campaign of Hanover; Boileau, Bertrand, Lesterp-Beauvais, Lesage, Gomaire, Gardien, Mainvielle, Duplantier, Lacaze, Antiboul, and at their head a Barnave called Vergniaud.

On the other side, Antoine-Louise-Léon Florelle de Saint-Just, pale, with a low forehead, regular profile, mysterious eye, exceedingly melancholy, twenty-three years of age; Merlin de Thionville, whom the Germans called Feuer-Teufel, “fire devil”; Merlin de Douai, the guilty author of the “Law of the Suspected”; Soubrany, whom the people of Paris, on the first Prairial asked to have for a general; the former priest Lebon, holding a sword in his hand which had once scattered holy water; Billaud-Varennes, who foresaw the magistracy of the future, no judges but arbiters; Fabre d’Eglantine who made a charming discovery, the Republican calendar, just as Rouget de Lisle had a sublime inspiration, the Marseillaise, and neither were guilty of a second offence; the attorney of the Commune, who said: “A dead king is not a man less”; Grougon, who entered Tripstadt, Newstadt, and Spire, and saw the Prussian army flee; Lacroix, a lawyer turned general, made chevalier de Saint-Louis six days before the tenth of August; Fréron Thersite, son of Fréron-Zoile; Ruth the inexorable investigator of the iron press, destined for a great Republican suicide: — he was to kill himself the day the Republic died; Fouché, with the soul of a demon, and the face of a corpse; Camboulas, the friend of Father Duchesne, who said to Guillotin: “You belong to the club of the Feuillants, but your daughter belongs to the club of the Jacobins”; Jagot, who gave this savage reply to those complaining about the nakedness of the prisoner: “ A prison is a garment of stone; “Javogues, the terrible spoiler of the tombs of Saint-Denis; Osselin, the proscriber, who hid in his house Madame Charry, one of the proscribed; Bentabolle, who, when he presided, made signs to the tribunes to cheer or to hoot; the journalist Robert, the husband of Mademoiselle Kéralio, who wrote: “Neither Robespierre nor Marat come to my house; Robespierre may come whenever he wishes; Marat never”; Garan-Coulon, who had proudly demanded, when Spain interposed in the trial of Louis XVI., that the Assembly should not condescend to read a letter from a king in behalf of a king; Grégoire at first a worthy bishop of the Primitive Church, but who afterwards under the Empire obliterated the Republican Grégoire with Count Grégoire; Amar, who said, —

“The whole earth condemns Louis XVI. To whom then shall we appeal for judgment? To the planets?”

Rouyer, who was opposed to having the cannon fired from the Pont-Neuf the twenty-first of January, saying, —

“A king’s head will not make any more noise in falling than the head of any other man;” Chénier, André’s brother; Vadier, one of those who laid a pistol on the tribune; Tanis, who said to Momoro, —

“I want Marat and Robespierre to embrace each other at my table in my house.”

“Where do you live?”

“At Charenton.”

“I should have been surprised if it were anywhere else,” said Momoro. Legendre, who was the butcher of the French Revolution, as Pride was the butcher of the Revolution of England.

“Come, let me knock you down!” he exclaimed to Lanjuinais. And Lanjuinais replied, —

“First let it be decreed that I am an ox.” Collot d’Herbois, that melancholy comedian, wearing over his face the ancient mask with two mouths which said yes and no, approving with one what it blamed with the other, branding Carrier at Nantes and defying Châlier at Lyons, sending Robespierre to the scaffold, and Marat to the Pantheon; Génissieux who demanded the penalty of death for those who wore the medallion, “Louis XVI. martyrisé; Léonard Bourdon, the schoolmaster, who offered his house to the old man of Mont Jura; Topsent, the sailor; Goupilleau, the lawyer; Laurent Lecointre, a merchant; Duhem, a physician; Sergent, the sculptor; David, the painter; Joseph Egalité, a prince.

Besides these, Lecointe Puiraveau, who asked to have Marat decreed to be “in a state of lunacy;” Robert Lindet, the disquieting creator of that devil-fish, whose head was the Committee of General Safety, and which covered France with twenty-one thousand arms called the Revolutionary Committees; Lebœuf, about whom Girey-Dupré, in his “Christmas of False Patriots” wrote this verse, —

“Lebœuf saw Legendre and bellowed.”

Thomas Paine, an American, and merciful; Anacharsis Cloots, a German baron, a millionaire, atheist, Hébertist, candid; the upright Lebas, friend of the Duplays; Rovére, one of those rare men who are wicked for wickedness’ sake, because art for art’s sake exists more than people are aware of; Charlier who wished to have the aristocrats formally addressed; Tallien, an elegist and cruel, who will cause the ninth Thermidor from love;

Cambacérès, an attorney who will be prince; Carrier, an attorney who will be a tiger; Laplanche, who exclaimed one day: “I demand priority for the alarm-gun;” Thuriot, who wanted to have the jury of the Revolutionary Tribunal vote by acclamation; Bourdon de I’Oise, who challenged Chambon, denounced Paine, and was denounced by Hébert; Fayau who proposed “to send an incendiary army” to la Vendée; Tavaux, who came near being a mediator between la Gironde and the Mountain; Venier, who asked to have the Girondist Chiefs and the chiefs of the Mountain serve as common soldiers; Rewbell, who shut himself up in Mayence; Bourbotte, who had his horse killed under him, at the taking of Saumur; Guimberteau, who directed the army of the coast of Cherbourg; Jard-Panvilliers, who directed the army of the coast of Rochelle; Lecarpentier, who directed the squadron of Cancale; Roberjot, for whom the ambush of Rastad was waiting; Prieur de la Marne, who in camp wore his old counter-epaulet of major; Levasseurde la Sarthe, who with a word decided Surrent, commandant of the battalion of Saint-Amand, to commit suicide; Reverchon, Maure, Bernard de Saintes, Charles Richard, Lequinio, and at the head of this group a Mirabeau called Danton.

Outside these two camps, and respected by both, rose a single man, Robespierre.

V.

Below crouched Terror, which can be noble, and Fear which is base. Beneath passion, beneath heroism, beneath devotion, beneath rage, was the melancholy crowd of the anonymous. The dregs of the Assembly were called la Plaine. It contained everything drifting; men who doubted, who hesitated, who recoiled, who procrastinated, those who were spies, each fearing somebody. The Mountain was the elite; la Plaine was the common crowd. La Plaine was summed up and condensed in Sieyés.

Sieyés was a deep man who had grown shallow. He had stopped at the Third-Estate and had never been able to rise to the height of the people. Certain minds are so constituted that they never pass beyond mediocrity. Sieyés called Robespierre a tiger, and he called Sieyés a mole. This metaphysician had arrived not at wisdom, but at prudence. He was the courtier, not the servitor of the Revolution. He took a shovel and went to work with the people in the Champ-de-Mars, harnessed to the same wagon with Alexandre de Beauharnais. He advised energy, but never made use of it. He said to the Girondists: “Put the cannon on your side.” There are thinkers who are fighters, such as Condorcet with Vergniaud, or Camille Desmoulins with Danton. There are thinkers who are anxious to live; such were with Sieyés.

The most generous vats have their dregs. Below even the Plaine there was the Marais. Hideous stagnation disclosing the transparencies of egotism. There the fearful trembled in dumb expectation. The infamous without shame; latent anger; revolt under servitude. They were cynically frightened; they had all the courage of cowardice; they preferred la Gironde and chose the Mountain; the final result depended on them; they poured out on the successful side; they delivered Louis XVI. to Vergniaud, Vergniaud to Danton, Danton to Robespierre, Robespierre to Tallien. They pilloried Marat while he was alive, and deified Marat after he was dead. They upheld everything till the day when they overthrew everything. Their instinct was to give a decisive push to everything that tottered. In their eyes, as they had been brought into service on condition that there should be solidity, to waver was to betray them. They were numbers, they were force, they were fear. Hence the daring of baseness.

They were the cause of May 31st, the eleventh Germinal, the ninth Thermidor; tragedies knotted by giants and untied by dwarfs.

VI.

With these men full of passion, were mingled men full of dreams. The Utopia was there in all its forms; in its warlike form, which admitted the scaffold, and in its innocent form which abolished capital punishment; a spectre when facing thrones, an angel when facing the people. Opposed to the fighting minds were the brooding minds. The first had war in their heads; the others, peace; one brain, Carnot, gave birth to fourteen armies; another brain, Jean Derby, meditated an universal democratic confederation. In the midst of this furious eloquence, among these voices howling and raging, there were fecund silences. Lakanal was silent, and thought out public national education; Lanthenas was silent, and created the primary schools; Revellière-Lepaux was silent, and dreamed of elevating philosophy to the dignity of religion. Others busied themselves with questions of detail, less pretentious and more practical. Guyton-Morveaux studied the salubrity of hospitals; Maire, the abolition of actual servitude; Jean-Bon-Saint-André, the suppression of arrest and imprisonment for debt; Romme, the proposition of Chappe; Duboë, the ordering of the archives; Coren-Fustier, the creation of the cabinet of Anatomy and the Museum of Natural History; Guyomard, river navigation and the damming of the Escaut.

Art had its monomaniacs; January 21st, while the head of the monarchy was falling in the place de la Revolution, Bézard, representative from l’Oise, went to see a picture by Rubens, found in a garret in Rue Saint-Lazare. Artists, orators, prophets, great men like Danton, petty men like Cloots, gladiators and philosophers, all were striving for the same end, — progress. Nothing disconcerted them. The grandeur of the Convention lay in finding out how much reality there was in what men called impossible. At one extreme, Robespierre had his eye fixed on Law; at the other extreme, Condorcet had his eye fixed on Duty.

Condorcet was a dreamer and a clear-sighted man; Robespierre was a man of executive ability; and sometimes in the final crises of worn-out societies, execution means extermination. Revolutions have two slopes, ascent and descent, and bear, terraced on these slopes, all the seasons from ice to flowers. Each zone of these slopes produces men suited to its climate, from those who live in the sun to those who live in lightning.

VII.

People showed each other the corner of the passage on the left where Robespierre whispered in the ear of Garat, Clavière’s friend, this terrible epigram: “Clavière has conspired wherever he has respired.” In this same nook, convenient for asides and whispered anger, Fabre and d’Eglantine had quarrelled with Romme, and reproached him for disfiguring his calendar by changing Fervidor to Thermidor.

People pointed out the corner where the seven representatives of the Haute-Garonne sat, elbow to elbow; the first called to pronounce their verdict on Louis XVI., they replied one after another: Mailhe, “death”; Delmas, “death”; Projean, “death”; Calés, “death”; Ayral, “death”; Julien, “death”; Dasaby, “death.”

An eternal reverberation which has filled all history, and which, since human justice exists, has always given the echo of the grave to the wall of the tribunal. People pointed out, among this riotous crowd of faces, all those men who had been the cause of the hubbub of tragic votes: — Paganel, who said, —

“Death. A king is of no use until he is dead.” Millaud, who said, —

"If death did not exist to-day, it would be necessary to invent it." The old Raffron du Trouillet, who said, —

"Death, come quickly!" Goupilleau, who exclaimed, —

"The scaffold immediately. Slowness aggravates death." Sieyés, who exclaimed with funereal conciseness, —

"Death." Thuriot, who rejected the appeal to the people proposed by Buzot, —

"What! primary assemblies! what! forty-four thousand tribunals! Trial without end. The head of Louis XVI. would have time to turn white before it would fall." Augustin-Bon Robespierre, who exclaimed after his brother, —

"I know nothing of a humanity which slaughters nations, and pardons despots; to ask a reprieve is to substitute an appeal to tyrants for the appeal to the people. Foussedoire, Bernardin de Saint-Pierre's substitute, who said, —

"I have a horror of shedding human blood, but the blood of a king is not the blood of a man. Death." Jean-Bon-Saint-André, who said, —

"No free people, unless the tyrant dies." Lavicomterie, who proclaimed this formula, —

"While the tyrant breathes, liberty suffocates. Death." Chateauneuf-Randon, who cried, —

"The death of Louis the Last." Guyardin, who gave utterance to this wish, —

"Let the 'Barrière-Renversée' be executed (the Barrière-Renversée, or overthrown barrier, was the Barrière du Trône). Tellier, who said, —

"Let a cannon of the size of Louis XVI.'s head be forged, to use against the enemy."

And the indulgents: Gentil, who said, —

"I vote for imprisonment. To make a Charles I. is to make a Cromwell." Bancal, who said, —

"Exile. I want to see the first king of the universe condemned to learn a trade in order to earn his living." Albouys, who said, —

"Banishment. Let this living spectre go to wander about thrones." Zangiacomi, who said, —

"Let us keep Capet alive for a scarecrow." Chaillon, who said, —

"Let him live, I would not put to death one whom Rome would canonize."

While these sentences were falling from these stern lips, and one after another became historical, in the tribunes, women wearing low-necked dresses and jewels, holding the list, counted the voices and pricked each vote with a pin.

Wherever tragedy enters in, horror and pity remain.

To see the Convention during any period of its reign was to see the judgment of the last Capet over again; the legend of January 21st seemed mingled with all its proceedings; the dreadful assembly was full of those fatal breaths, which had blown over the old torch of monarchy lighted for eighteen centuries, and had put it out; the decisive trial for all kings in one king was like the crises in the great war on the Past; at whatever session of the Convention one was present, the shadow cast by the scaffold of Louis XVI. seemed to brood over it; the spectators related to each other the resignation of Kersaint, the resignation of Roland, how Duchâtel, the deputy of the Deux-Sèvres, being ill, was brought on his bed, and, while dying, voted for the king's life, which caused Marat to laugh; people looked around for the representative, forgotten by history to-day, who, after that session of thirty-seven hours, dropped on his bench overcome with weariness and sleep, and, awakened by the usher when it was his turn to vote, opened his eyes, said "Death!" and fell asleep again.

At the time Louis XVI. was condemned to die, Robespierre had eighteen months longer to live; Danton, fifteen months; Vergniaud, nine months; Marat, five months and three weeks; Lepelletier-Saint-Fargeau, one day. Short and terrible breath from human mouths!

VIII.

The people had one window opening on the Convention, the public tribunes, and when this was insufficient they opened the door, and the street entered the Assembly.

These invasions of the multitude into the senate are one of the most extraordinary sights of history. These irruptions were usually cordial. The street-crossing fraternized with the curule-chair. But it was a terrible cordiality which the people showed one day when in three hours they took the cannon and forty thousand guns, from the Invalides.

Each instant the session was interrupted by a march of men; deputations, petitions, homages, offerings were received at the bar. The pike of honor from the Faubourg-Saint-Antoine entered, borne by women. The English offered twenty thousand shoes to our bare-footed soldiers.

"Citizen Arnoux," said the Moniteur, "priest of Aubignan, commandant of the battalion de la Drôme, asks to march to the frontiers, and to have his parish preserved for him."

Delegates came from the sections, bringing on hand-barrows, dishes, patens, chalices, monstrances, piles of gold, silver, and silver-gilt, as offerings to the country from this multitude in rags, and asked as a recompense permission to dance the carmagnole, or Revolutionary dance, before the Convention. Chenard, Narbonne, and Vallière came singing verses in honor of the Mountain.

The Section of Mont-Blanc brought the bust of Lepelletier, and a woman placed a red cap on the head of the president, who kissed it; "the citizenesses of the Section du Mail" threw flowers to "the legislators"; the "pupils of the country" came, to the sound of music, to thank the Convention for having "prepared the prosperity of the age"; the women from the Section of the Gardes-Françaises offered roses; the women from the Section of the Champs-Elysées offered a wreath of oak leaves; the women from the Section of the Temple came to the bar to take the oath "to marry none but true Republicans"; the Section of Molière presented a medal of Franklin, which was decreed to be suspended from the crown of the statue of Liberty; the Enfants-Trouvés, declared "children of the Republic" filed in, dressed in the national uniform; the young girls from the Section of Ninety-two came in long, white dresses, and the following day the Moniteur contained this line: "The president received a bouquet from the hands of a young beauty."

The orators saluted the crowds; sometimes they flattered them, they said: "You are infallible, you are irreproachable, you are sublime"; the people have a childish side, they like these sugarplums. Sometimes the disturbance went through the Assembly, entering in a rage and going out peacefully, as the Rhône passes through Lake Leman, looking like mud when it enters, and deep blue when it leaves it.

Sometimes it was less pacific, and Henriot had gridirons for heating the cannon balls brought to the door of the Tuileries.

IX.

At the same time the Assembly freed itself from the revolution; it produced civilization. A furnace, but a forge. In this vat where terror boiled, progress fermented. Out of this chaos of shadow and this stormy flight of clouds, shone immense rays of light parallel to the eternal laws. Rays which have remained on the horizon and forever visible in the sky of the people, and which are justice, toleration, goodness, reason, truth, love.

The Convention promulgated this great axiom: “The liberty of one citizen ends where the liberty of another citizen begins,” which comprises in two lines the entire law of human society. It declared indigence sacred; it declared infirmity sacred, in the blind and the deaf-mutes who became wards of the State; maternity sacred, in the girl-mother, whom it consoled and relieved; childhood sacred, in the orphan that it caused to be adopted by the country; innocence sacred, in the acquittal of the accused, whom it indemnified. It branded the slave trade; it abolished slavery. It proclaimed civic joint responsibility. It decreed gratuitous instruction. It organized national education: by the normal school in Paris, by the central school in the principal towns, and primary schools in the Commune. It created conservatories and museums. It decreed unity of the Code, unity of weights and measures, unity of calculation by the decimal system. It established the finances of France, and caused public credit to follow the long monarchical bankruptcy. It brought the telegraph into use, gave endowed hospitals for the aged, clean hospitals to the sick, the Polytechnic school to instruction, the Bureau of Longitudes to science, the institute to the human mind.

It was cosmopolitan as well as national. Of the eleven thousand two hundred and ten decrees passed by the Convention, one third have a political aim, two thirds have a humanitarian aim. It declared morals to be the universal foundation of society, and conscience the universal foundation of law. And all this — slavery abolished, brotherhood proclaimed, humanity protected, human conscience rectified, the law of work transformed to a privilege, and from being onerous made helpful, national wealth strengthened, childhood brightened and assisted, letters and science propagated, light shed on every summit, help for all the wretched, encouragement of all principals, — all this the Convention brought about, having in its vitals that hydra, la Vendée, and on its shoulders that pile of tigers, the kings.

X.

Tremendous stage! All types; human, inhuman, and superhuman were there. Epic gathering of antagonism; Guillotine avoidmg David, Bagire insulting Chabot, Gaudet jeering at Saint-Just, Vergniaud scorning Danton, Louvet attacking Robespierre, Buzot denouncing Egalité, Chambon branding Pache, — all execrating Marat.

And how many other names ought to be recorded still! Armonville, called Bonnet-Rouge, because he would only sit in a Phrygian cap, a friend of Robespierre, and wishing “after Louis XVI. to have Robespierre guillotined” from a love of equilibrium; Massieu, a colleague and double of that good Lamourette, a bishop made to leave his name to a kiss; Lehardy du Morbihan stigmatizing the priests of Brittany; Barère, the man of majorities, who presided when Louis XVI. appeared at the bar, and who was to Paméla what Louvet was to Lodoïska: the orator Daunou, who said, “Let us gain time;” Dubois Crancé, in whose ear Marat stooped to whisper; the Marquis de Chateauneuf; Laclos, Hérault de Séchelles, who drew back before Henriot, exclaiming, “Gunners, to your guns!” Julien who compared the Mountain to Thermopylæ; Gamon, who wished to have one of the public tribunes reserved solely for women; Laloy, who bestowed the honors of the session on bishop Gobel, who came to the Convention to lay down the mitre and to don the red cap; Lecomte, who exclaimed, “So the honors are for any who will lay down his priestly robes!” Féraud, whose head Boissy-d’Anglas saluted, leaving it an open question to history, whether Boissy-d’Anglas saluted the head, that is to say the victim, or tbe pike, that is to say the assassins; the two brothers Duprat, one a Montagnard, the other, a Girondist, who hated each other, as did the two brothers Chénier.

At this tribune were spoken those giddy words which sometimes, though unknown to him who has uttered them, produce the prophetic accent of revolutions, and in consequence of which material facts seem abruptly to assume a strange discontent and passion, as if they had taken offence at the things they had just heard; passing events seem incensed at what is spoken; catastrophes arise full of wrath, and as if exasperated by the words of men. So a voice in the mountain is enough to let loose an avalanche. A word too much may be followed by a caving in. If the word had not been spoken, it would not have happened. It seems sometimes as if events were irascible.

It was in this way, by the chance word of an orator misunderstood, that Madame Elizabeth’s head was made to fall. At the Convention, intemperance of language was allowable. Threats flew and crossed each other in a discussion like firebrands in a conflagration.

Pétion. Robespierre come to the point.

Robespierre. The point is yourself, Pétion. I will come to it, and you will see it.

A Voice. Death to Marat.

Marat. The day Marat dies there will be no more Paris, and the day Paris perishes, there will be no more Republic.

Billaud-Varennes rises and says: “We are willing.” — Barère interrupts him: “You speak like a king.” Another day Phillipeaux said: “A member has drawn his sword on me.”

Audouin. President, call the assassin to order.

The President. Attention.

Audouin. President, I call you to order myself.

The people laughed rudely.

Lecointre. The priest of Chant-de-Bout complains of Fauchet, his bishop, who forbids him to marry.

A Voice. I don’t see why Fauchet, who has his mistresses, wishes to prevent others from having wives.

Another Voice. Priest take a wife!

The tribunes joined in the conversation. They addressed the Assembly familiarly. One day Representative Ruamps went up into the tribune. One of his hips was much larger than the other. One of the spectators cried out to him: “Turn that to the right side, for you have a cheek like David.” Such were the liberties that people took with the Convention. Once, however, in the tumult of April 11th, 1793, the president caused a disorderly spectator in the tribune to be arrested.

One day the session had old Buonarotti for a witness. Robespierre takes the floor and speaks two hours, looking at Danton, sometimes straight in the eye, which was serious, sometimes askance, which was worse. He thundered to the end, however. He ended in an explosion of indignation, full of ominous words: “We know the intriguers, we know the corrupters and the corrupted, we know the traitors; they are in this assembly. They hear us, we see them and our eyes do not leave their faces. Let them look above their heads, and they will see the sword of the law; let them look into their consciences and they will see their infamy. Let them be on their guard.” And when Robespierre had ended, Danton with his face turned to the ceiling, his eyes half-closed, one arm over the back of his seat, throws himself back and is heard to hum, —

“Cadet Roussel fait des discours
Qui ne sont pas longs quand ils sont courts.”

The imprecations called for retorts. — Conspirator! — Assassin! — Villain! — Factionist! — Moderate! — They denounced each other to the bust of Brutus which was there. Apostrophes, insults, challenges. Angry looks from one side to the other, threatening fists, pistols half shown, daggers half drawn. Tremendous blazing of the tribune. Some talked as if they were leaning against the guillotine. Heads wagged, ominous and terrible. Montagnards, Giroudins, Feuillants, Modérantistes, Terroristes, Jacobins, Cordeliers, eighteen regicide priests.

All these men! A mass of smoke driven in every direction.

XI.

Minds, a prey to the wind.

But this wind a miraculous wind.

To be a member of the Convention was to be a billow of the ocean. And this was true of the greatest. The impelling force came from above. In the Convention there was a will power belonging to all and belonging to none. This will power was an idea, indomitable and boundless, which blew from the height of heaven into the darkness below. We call this the Revolution. When this idea passed, it overcame one and lifted up another; it carried away some on the top of the wave, and shipwrecked others. This idea knew where it was going, and drove the gulf before it. To impute the Revolution to men is to impute the tide to the billows.

Revolution is an action of the Unknown. Call it good action or bad, according as you aspire to the future or the past, but leave it to whatever has caused it. It seems the common work of great events and great individuals combined, but it is in reality the resultant of events. Events spend, men pay. Events dictate, men sign. July 14 is signed Caraille Desmoulins, August 10 is signed Danton, September 2 is signed Marat, September 21 is signed Grégoire, January 21 is signed Robespierre; but Desmoulins, Danton, Marat, Grégoire, and Robespierre are mere clerks. The immense and awful author of these great pages has a name, God; and a mark, Fate. Robespierre believed in God. Of course!

Revolution is one form of the inherent phenomenon which presses us on every side, and which we call necessity.

Before this mysterious complication of benefits and suffering arises the "Why?" of history.

"Because." This, the reply of one who knows nothing, is also the reply of one who knows everything.

In the presence of these climacteric catastrophes which destroy and give life to civilization, one hesitates to judge the details. To blame or praise men on account of the result, is almost like praising or blaming figures on account of the sum total. Whatever is to happen, happens; whatever is to blow, blows. The eternal serenity does not suffer from these north winds. Above Revolutions, Truth and Justice reign, as the starry heavens above the tempest.

XII.

Such was this boundless Convention; an intrenched camp of the human race attacked by all the powers of darkness at once, the night fires of a besieged army of ideas, the immense bivouac of minds on the edge of a precipice. Nothing in history can be compared to this gathering, both senate and populace, conclave and street crossing, areopagus and public square, tribunal and the accused.

The Convention always yielded to the wind; but the wind came from the mouth of the people and was the breath of God.

And to-day, after eighty years have passed, each time that the Convention comes up before the thought of a man, whatever he may be, historian or philosopher, that man stops and meditates. It is impossible not to give attention to this great procession of shades.

CHAPTER II.

MARAT IN THE LOBBY.

As he had announced to Simonne Evrard, Marat went to the Convention the next day after the meeting in Rue du Paon.

At the Convention there was present a Maratist marquis, Louis de Montaut, the one who later on presented a decimal clock, surmounted by a bust of Marat, to the Convention.

As Marat entered, Chabot had just approached Montaut.

“Ci-devant,” he said.

Montaut raised his eyes.

“Why do you call me ci-devant?”

“Because that is what you are.”

“I?”

“Since you were a marquis.”

“Never.”

“Bah!”

“My father was a soldier, my grandfather was a weaver.”

“What are you singing about, Montaut?”

“My name is not Montaut?”

“What is it then?”

“I call myself Maribon.

“Indeed,” said Chabot, “it is all the same to me.”

And he added between his teeth, —

“He won’t be a marquis.”

Marat stopped in the passageway at the left and looked at Montaut and Chabot.

Every time that Marat entered, it created a commotion, but at a distance from him. All around him it was silent. Marat paid no attention to it. He scorned the “croaking in the marsh.”

In the obscurity of the lower row of seats, Conpé de l’Oise, Prunelle, Villars, a bishop who later became a member of the French Academy, Boutroue, Petit, Plaichard, Bonet, Thibaudeau, Valdruche, pointed him out one to another.

“See, Marat!” “Is he ill?”

“Yes, for he is in his dressing-gown.”

“In his dressing-gown?”

“By Heavens, yes!”

“He dares to do anything.”

“He dares to come to the Convention in this way!”

“Since he came here one day crowned with laurels, he may as well come in his dressing-gown!”

“Face of copper, teeth of verdigris.”

“His dressing-gown looks new.”

“What is it made of?”

“Of rep.”

“Striped.”

“Look at his lapels.”

“They are fur.”

“Tiger skin.”

“No, ermine.”

“Imitation.”

“And he has on stockings.”

“That is strange.”

“And buckles on his shoes.”

“Of silver!”

“The sabots of Camboulas will not forgive him that.”

On the other benches they pretended not to see Marat. The people talked of other things. Santhonax addressed Dussaulx.

“Dussaulx, you know—”

“What?”

“The ci-devant Count de Brienne?”

“Who was at la Force with the ci-devant duke de Villeroy?”

“Yes.”

“I knew both of them. Well?”

“They were so much frightened that they saluted all the redcaps of all the turnkeys, and one day they refused to play a game of piquet because they were given a pack of cards with kings and queens.”

“Well?”

“They were guillotined yesterday.”

“Both of them?”

“Both of them.”

"On the whole, how did they behave in prison?"

"Like cowards."

"And how were they on the scaffold?"

"Fearless."

And Dussaulx uttered this exclamation, —

"It is easier to die than to live."

Barère was in the midst of reading a report concerning la Vendée. Nine hundred men of Morbihan bad set out with cannon to the relief of Nantes. Redon was threatened by the peasants. Paimbœuf was attacked. A fleet was cruising about Maindrin to prevent invasion. From Ingrande to Maure, the entire left bank of the Loire was bristling with Royalist batteries. Ten thousand peasants had possession of Pornic. They were crying, "Long live the English!" A letter from Santerre to the Convention, which Barère read, ended thus: "Seven thousand peasants have attacked Vannes. We repulsed them and they left four cannon in our hands—"

"And how many prisoners?" interupted a voice.

Barére continued,— "Postscript of the letter: 'We have no prisoners, because we no longer take any.'"

Marat, always immovable, was not listening; he seemed to be absorbed by his own stern thoughts. In his hand he held a paper which he crumpled between his fingers, and if any one had unfolded this paper he could have read these lines in Momoro's handwriting and which were probably a reply to some question asked by Marat.

"Nothing can be done against the sovereign power of the delegated commissioners, above all, against the delegates of the Committee of Public Welfare. It was in vain that Génisseux said, in the session of May sixth: 'Each commissioner is more than a king,' it was of no use. They have power over life and death. Massade, at Angers; Trullard, at Saint-Amand; Nyon, near General Marcé's; Parrein, with the army of the Sables; Millier, with the army of the Niort; — each is all-powerful. The club of the Jacobins has gone so far as to name Parrein, brigadier-general. Circumstance pardons everything. A delegate from the Committee of Public Welfare holds in check a commander-in-chief."

Marat finished crumpling the paper, put it in his pocket, and went slowly towards Montaut and Chabot who were still talking and had not seen him enter.

Chabot was saying, —

“Maribon or Montaut, listen to this: I come from the Committee of Public Welfare.”

“And what are they doing there?”

“They are sendmg a noble to watch a priest.”

“Ah!”

“A noble like yourself—”

“I am not a noble,” said Montaut.

“To a priest—”

“Like yourself.”

“I am not a priest,” said Chabot.

Both burst out laughing.

“Give the particulars of the story,” continued Montaut.

“Here they are. A priest called Cimourdain has been delegated with full powers to a viscount named Gauvain; this viscount has command of the investigating column of the coast army. The question is to prevent the noble from cheating, and the priest from treason.”

“That is very simple,” replied Montaut; “all that is necessary is to introduce death into the matter.”

“I come for that,” said Marat.

They raised their heads.

“Good-morning, Marat,” said Chabot, “you come but seldom to our sessions.”

“My physician has ordered baths for me,” replied Marat.

“You must beware of baths,” replied Chabot. “Seneca lied in a bath.”

Marat smiled.

“Chabot, there is no Nero here.”

“You are here,” said a harsh voice.

It was Danton who passed by on his way up to his seat.

Marat did not turn around.

He bent his head down between the two faces of Montaut and Chabot.

“Listen, I have come for a serious matter, one of us three must propose to-day the draft of a decree to the Convention.”

“Not I,” said Montaut, “they would not listen to me, I am a marquis.”

“They would not listen to me,” said Chabot, “I am a Capuchin.”

“And they would not listen to me,” said Marat, “I am Marat.”

There was a silence between them.

It was not easy to question Marat when he was absorbed in thought. However Montaut ventured to ask, —

“Marat, what is the decree you wish for?”

“A decree for punishing with death any military leader who lets a rebel prisoner escape.”

Cabot interrupted him.

“This decree already exists; it was voted the last of April.”

“Then it is as good as a dead letter,” said Marat. “All through la Vendee they are letting prisoners go, and giving them protection with impunity.”

“Marat, that is because the decree is not in force.”

“Chabot, it must be given new life.”

“Without doubt.”

“And to do that, it is necessary to speak to the Convention.”

“The end will be reached,” added Montaut, “if the Committee of Public Welfare have the decree posted up in all the communes of la Vendée and make two or three good examples.”

“Of the great leaders,” continued Chabot. “Of the generals.”

Marat growled: “To be sure, that will do.”

“Marat,” continued Chabot, “go yourself and say so to the Committee of Public Welfare.”

Marat looked at him full in the face, which was not agreeable even for Chabot.

“Chabot,” he said, “the Committee of Public Welfare is at Robespierre’s house; I do not go to Robespierre’s house.”

“I will go myself,” said Montaut.

“Good,” said Marat.

The following day an order from the Committee of Public Welfare was sent in every direction, commanding notices to be put up in the towns and villages of Vendée, and the strict execution of the decree of death to any one conniving in the escape of brigands and rebel prisoners.

This decree was but a first step; the Convention was to go still farther. Some months later, the eleventh Brumaire, year II. (November, 1793), with regard to Laval which had opened its doors to the Vendéan fugitives, it decreed that any town which should give asylum to the rebels should be demolished and destroyed.

In their turn the princes of Europe, in the Duke of Brunswick’s manifesto, inspired by the refugees, and framed by the Marquis de Linnon, intendant of the Duke of Orleans, declared that all Frenchmen taken armed should be shot, and that if a hair fell from the king’s head, Paris should be razed.

Cruelty against barbarism.

PART THIRD. — IN VENDEE.

BOOK FIRST. — LA VENDEE.

CHAPTER I.

THE FORESTS.

At that time there were seven terrible forests in Brittany. The Véndèan war was a priestly revolt. The forests were an auxiliary to this revolt. The spirits of darkness give one another aid.

The seven Black Forests of Brittany were the forest of Fougères, which bars the way between Dol and Avranches; the forest of Princé, eight leagues in circumference; the forest of Paimpont, full of ravines and brooks, almost inaccessible from the side of Baignon, but easily penetrated from Concornet, a royalist market-town; the forest of Rennes, from which was heard the tocsin of the republican parishes, always numerous near the towns (it was there that Puysaye ruined Focard); the forest of Machecoul, where the wild beast Charette had his den; the forest of la Garnache, which belonged to la Trémoille, Gauvain, and the Rohans: the forest of Broceliande, which belonged to the fairies.

A nobleman in Brittany had the title of “Seigneur of the Seven Forests.” It was the Viscount de Fontenay, a Breton prince.

For the Breton prince was entirely distinct from the French prince. The Rohans were Breton princes. Garnier de Saintes, in his report to the Convention, the fifteenth Nivose, year II, thus described the Prince de Talmont: “That Capet of the brigands, Sovereign of the Marne and of Normandy.”

The history of the forests of Brittany, from 1792 to 1800, would form a history by itself, and it would mingle like a legend in the great scheme of La Vendée.

History has its truth, so has legend. Legendary truth is of a different nature from historical truth. Legendary truth is invention, the result of which is reality. Still, history and legend have the same end, depicting man eternal in the man of the passing moment.

La Vendée can only be fully explained by supplementing history with legend; history is necessary for the effect as a whole, and legend for the detail.

We may say that La Vendée is worth the trouble. La Vendée is a prodigy.

That war of the Ignorant, so stupid and so splendid, abominable and magnificent, desolated France and made it proud. La Vendée is a scar which is a glory.

At certain times human society has its problems; problems which are resolved into light for the wise, and for the ignorant into obscurity, violence, and barbarity. The philosopher hesitates to bestow blame. He takes account of the trouble that is caused by the problems. The problems do not pass without casting beneath them a shadow like that of clouds.

If you would understand la Vendée, imagine this antagonism: on one side the French Revolution; on the other, the Breton peasant. Opposite these unequalled events, seriously threatening all benefits at once, outburst of angry civilization, outburst of mad progress, boundless and unintelligible improvement, place this savage, serious and strange, this man with a clear eye and long hair, living on milk and chestnuts, limited to his thatched roof, his hedge, and his ditch, distinguishing each neighboring hamlet by the sound of its bell, using water only for drink, wearing a leather jacket ornamented with arabesques in silk, uneducated and wearing embroidered garments, tattooing his clothes as his ancestors the Celts tattooed their faces, respecting a master in his executioner, speaking a dead language, which causes him to dwell in a mental tomb, goading his oxen, whetting his scythe, hoeing his grain, kneading his buckwheat bread, venerating first his plough, then his grandmother, believing in the Blessed Virgin and the White Lady, a devotee before the altar and also before the tall, mysterious stone standing in the midst of the moor, a husbandman in the field, a fisherman on the sea-coast, a poacher in the thicket, loving his kings, his seigneurs, his priests, his lice; thoughtful, often perfectly still for hours together on the great deserted sandy shore, listening gloomily to the sound of the sea.

And ask yourself if this blind being could accept this light.

CHAPTER II.

THE MEN.

The peasant is dependent on two things; the field which yields his nourishment, the wood where he hides.

It would be difficult for one to imagine what the forests of Brittany were; they were towns. Nothing could be more silent, more mute and wild than those inextricable tangles of thorns and branches; those widespread thickets were the dwelling-places of silence and repose, no desert could seem more dead and more sepulchral.

If the trees could have been cut away suddenly and with a single stroke, like lightning, a swarm of men would have come abruptly into view.

Round, narrow pits, screened outside with coverings of stones and branches, first placed vertically, then horizontally, spread out underground like tunnels, ending in dark, gloomy chambers; that is what Cambyses found in Egypt, and Westermann found in Brittany; the former were in the desert, the latter in Brittany; in the caves of Egypt there were dead men, in the caves of Brittany there were living beings. One of the wildest clearings in the wood of Misdon, completely perforated with galleries and cells where a mysterious people came and went, was called “la Grande ville.” Another clearing not less deserted above ground, and not less inhabited below, was called “la Place royale.”

This subterranean life had existed in Brittany, from time immemorial. Man had always fled before man there. Hence these dens of reptiles hollowed out under the trees. They dated back to the Druids, and some of these crypts were as ancient as the cromlechs. The larvæ of legend and the monsters of history, all passed over this black country, Teutatès, Cæsar, Hoël, Néomènes, Geoffrey of England, Alain-gant-de-fer, Pierre Mauclerc, the French house of Blois, the English house of Montfort, kings and dukes, the nine barons of Brittany, the judges of the Grands-Jours, the counts of Nantes quarrelling with the counts of Rennes, highwaymen, banditti, the Free companies, René II., Viscount de Rohan, the governors for the king, the “good Duke de Chaulnes,” hanging peasants under Madame de Sévigné’s window , in the fifteenth century, the seigneurial butcheries; in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, the religious wars; in the eighteenth century, thirty thousand dogs trained to hunt men; under this frightful trampling underfoot the people resolved to disappear. The Troglodytes to escape the Celts, the Celts to escape the Romans, the Britons to escape the Romans, the Huguenots to escape the Catholics, the smugglers to escape the excisemen, — each in turn took refuge first in the forests, then under the ground. The resource of wild beasts. Thus it is that tyranny reduces nations. For two thousand years, despotism in all its forms, conquest, feudalism, fanaticism, the exchequer, all hunted down this wretched, desperate Brittany; a sort of inexorable battue, which only ceased in one form to begin under another. The men went to ground.

Dismay, which is a kind of anger, was all ready in their souls, the caves were all ready in the woods, when the French Republic burst forth. Brittany rose in revolt, finding herself oppressed by this forced deliverance, the customary mistake of slaves.

CHAPTER III.

MEN AND FORESTS IN CONNIVANCE.

The tragic forests of Brittany resumed their old rôle again and became the servants and accomplices of this rebellion, as they had been of all the others.

The subsoil of these forests was a sort of madrepore, pierced and traversed in every direction by a labyrinth of saps, cells, and galleries. Each of these blind cells sheltered five or six men. The difficulty was in getting air there. There are certain strange figures, which explain this powerful organization of the widespread peasant revolt. In Ille-et-Vilaine, in the forest of Pertre, asylum of the Prince of Talmont, not a breath could be heard, not a human footstep was to be found, and yet there were six thousand men there with Focard. In Morbihan, in the forest of Meulac, no one was seen, and yet eight thousand men were there. These two forests, the Pertre and Meulac are not numbered among the great forests of Brittany. If one entered them it was terrible. These deceitful thickets, full of combatants crouching in a sort of underground labyrinth, were like enormous concealed sponges, from which, under pressure of that gigantic foot, the Revolution, gushed forth civil war.

Invisible battalions were lying in wait. These unknown armies meandered beneath the Republican troops, came suddenly out of the ground and then went back again, leaping forth in vast numbers and vanished out of sight, it was everywhere and nowhere; an avalanche, then dust, giants with the gift of diminishing in size; giants for fighting, dwarfs for disappearing. Jaguars with the habits of moles.

Beside the forests there were the woods. Just as below cities there are villages, so below forests there are thickets. The forests were bound together by a maze of woods spreading in every direction. The ancient castles, which were fortresses; hamlets, which were camps; freeholds which were enclosures of ambushes and snares; farms, surrounded with trenches and palisades of trees, — these were the meshes of that net which caught the Republican armies.

This whole was called the Bocage.

There was the wood of Misdon, in the centre of which was a pond, and which belonged to Jean Chouan; there was the wood of Gennes, belonging to Taillefer; there was the wood of la Huisserie, belonging to Gouge-le-Bruant; the wood of la Charnie, belonging to Courtillé-le-Batard, called the apostle Saint Paul, chief of the camp of the Vache-Noire; the wood of Burgault, belonging to that puzzling Monsieur Jacques, destined to a mysterious end in the vault of Juvardeil; there was the wood of Charreau, where Pimousse and Petit-Prince, attacked by the garrison of Châteauneuf, seized the grenadiers in the republican ranks around the waist and carried them away prisoner; the wood of la Heureuserie, scene of the rout of the post of the Longue-Faye; the wood of Aulne, from which the route between Rennes and Laval could be seen; the wood of la Gravelle, which a prince of la Trémoille won in playing bowls; the wood of Lorges on the Côtes-de-Nord, where Charles de Boishardy ruled after Bernard de Villeneuve; the wood of Bagnard near Fontenay, where Lescure challenged Chalbos, who, although one against five, accepted the offer; the wood of la Durondais, formerly disputed by Alain le Redru and Hérispoux, son of Charles the Bald; the wood of Croqueloup, on the boundary of that moor where Coquereau sheared the prisoners; the wood of la Croix-Bataille which lent its aid to the Homeric insults given by Jambe-d’Argent to Morière and by Morière to Jambe-d’Argent; the wood of la Saudraie, which we have seen scoured by a Parisian battalion. There were many others beside.

In several of these forests and woods, there were not only subterranean villages grouped about the leader’s burrow, but there were also veritable hamlets of low huts concealed under the trees, and so numerous that sometimes the forest was filled with them. Often their smoke betrayed them. Two of these hamlets in the wood of Misdon have become famous, Lorrière, near Létang, and the group of huts called Rue-de-Bau, on the side of Saint-Ouen-les-Toits.

The women lived in the huts, and the men, in the caves. For this war they made use of the galleries of fairies and the old Celtic mines. They brought food to the men buried in the caves. There were those who were forgotten and died of hunger. Beside, there were some who were not bright enough to know how to open their pits. Usually, the cover made of moss and branches, was so artistically fashioned that although impossible to distinguish it outside in the grass, it was very easily opened and closed from within. These retreats were hollowed out with great care. They threw the earth which they removed from the cave into some neighboring pond. The walls inside and the ground were covered with ferns and moss. They called this habitation “la loge.” They thrived in them although they were without daylight, without fire, without bread, and without air.

To rise without precaution among the living, and to exhume themselves unseasonably was a serious matter. They might find themselves among the legs of a marching army. Terrible woods; snares with a double trap. The Blues did not dare to enter; the Whites did not dare to leave.

CHAPTER IV.

THEIR LIFE UNDERGROUND.

The men in these dens became restless. Sometimes at night, in spite of the danger, they would leave them and go forth to dance on the neighboring moor. Or else they prayed, to kill time. “All day long,” said Bourdoiseau, “Jean Chouan made us tell our beads.”

It was almost impossible when the time came round, to prevent those of the lower Maine from leaving to take part in the Fête de la Gerbe. Some had their own ideas. Denys, called Tranche-Montagne, disguised himself as a woman to go to see the comedy at Laval; then he went back to his cave.

They would suddenly make away with themselves, leaving the dungeon for the grave.

Sometimes they would raise the cover of their hole and listen for distant fighting; they followed the struggle with their ears. The firing of the Republicans was regular, that of the Royalists, intermittent; this was their guide. If the firing of the platoons ceased suddenly, it was a sign that the Royalists were worsted; if the irregular firing continued and seemed to disappear in the distance, it was a sign that they had the advantage. The Whites always pursued; the Blues never, for the country was against them.

These underground warriors were admirably drilled. Nothing was swifter than their communications, nothing more mysterious. They had broken down all the bridges, they had destroyed all the wagons, and yet they found a way to tell each other everything and to warn each other in season. Relays of emissaries were established from forest to forest, from village to village, from farm to farm, from hut to hut, from bush to bush.

This stupid-looking peasant went along carrying messages in his stick, which was hollow.

A former constituent, Boétidoux, to enable them to go from one end of Brittany to the other, furnished them with Republican passports of the new design, with a blank for their names, of which this traitor had large bundles. It was impossible to detect them. “Secrets entrusted to more than four hundred thousand individuals,” said Puysaye, “were religiously kept.”

It seemed that this square, enclosed on the south by the boundary of the Sables to Thouars, on the east by the boundary of Thouars to Saumur and by the river of Thoué, on the north by the Loire, and on the west by the ocean, had a common nervous system, so that, not a point of this ground could stir without the whole being set in motion. In a twinkling, they were informed of Noirmoutier at Luçon, and the camp of La Loué knew what was going on in the camp of Croix-Morineau. One would have said that the birds had something to do with it. Hoche wrote, the seventh Messidor, year III: “One would have believed that they had telegraphs.”

They had clans, like the Scotch. Each parish had its captain. My father took part in that war, and I am able to say something about it.

CHAPTER V.

THEIR LIFE IN TIME OF WAR.

Many of them had no arms but pikes. They had plenty of good fowling-pieces. Their were no more skilful marksmen than the poachers of the Bocage and the smugglers of Loroux.

They were strange, frightful, fearless warriors. The decree to raise three hundred thousand men caused the tocsin to sound in six hundred villages. The crackling of fire burst from every point at once. Le Poitou and Anjou exploded the same day. We may say that the first peal of thunder was heard before 1792, the eighth of July, a month before the tenth of August, on the moor of Kerbader. Alain Redeler, to-day forgotten, was the forerunner of La Rochejaquelein and Jean Chouan. The royalists compelled all able-bodied men to march, under pain of death. They requisitioned horses, wagons, and provisions. Immediately, Sapinaud had three thousand soldiers; Cathelineau, ten thousand; Stofflet, twenty thousand, and Charette was master of Noirmontier. The Viscount de Scépeaux roused Haut Anjou; the Chevalier de Dieuzie, l’Entre-Vilaine-et-Loire; Tristan-l’Hermite, the Bas-Maine; the barber Gaston, the town of Guéménée; and the Abbé Bornier, all the rest. A little thing was enough to raise these multitudes.

In the tabernacle of a priest who had taken the oaths, a préte jureur as he was called, they placed a large black cat which jumped out suddenly during the mass. “It is the devil!” cried the peasants, and the whole canton rose in revolt. A breath of fire came from the confessionals.

For attacking the Blues and for leaping ravines, they had a long stick, fifteen feet in length, the ferte, a weapon and an aid to flight. In the thickest of the conflict, when the peasants were attacking the Republican squares, if they met a cross or a chapel on the battlefield, ail would fall on their knees, repeating their prayers under fire; as soon as their beads were told, those who were left jumped to their feet and rushed on the enemy. Alas, what giants! They loaded their guns as they ran, that was their talent. They could be made to believe anything; some priests showed them other priests whose necks they had reddened with a drawn cord, and said to them: “These are the guillotined brought back to life.” They had their fits of chivalry; they honored Fesque, a republican ensign, who let himself be sabred without dropping his flag. These peasants jested; they called the married priests Republicans: des sans-calottes devenus sans-culottes.

At first, they were afraid of the cannons; afterwards they jumped on them with their sticks and took them. To begin with, they took a fine bronze cannon, which they named the Missionary; then another dating back to the Catholic wars and on which were engraved the arms of Richelieu and a figure of the Virgin; they called it Marie-Jeanne. When they lost Fontenay, they lost Marie-Jeanne, around which six hundred peasants fell without flinching; then they recaptured Fontenay in order to recapture Marie-Jeanne, and they brought it back under the flag embroidered with a fleur-de-lis, covering it with flowers, and made the women kiss it as they passed by. But two cannons were very little. Stofflet had taken Marie-Jeanne; Cathelineau, jealous, left Poir-en-Mange, besieged Jallais, and took a third cannon; Forest attacked Saint Florent and took a fourth. Two other captains, Chouppes and Saint-Pol, did better; they represented cannons with trunks of trees and gunners with manikins, and with this artillery, which they laughed about heartily, they drove back the Blues at Mareuil. This was the period of their greatness.

Later, when Chalbos routed La Marsonnière, the peasants left thirty-two cannon, with the arms of England, behind them on the dishonored battlefield. Then England paid the French princes, and they sent “the funds to Monseigneur,” Nantiat wrote, the tenth of May, 1794, “because Pitt had been told that it was proper to do so.” Mellinet, in a report the thirty-first of March, said: “The cry of the rebels is: ‘Long live the English!’”

The peasants lingered behind to plunder. These devotees were robbers. Savages have vices. It was through these that civilization captured them later. Puysaye says, Vol. II., page 187: “I have several times saved the town of Plélan from pillage.” And further on, page 434, he abstains from entering Montfort: “I made a circuit to prevent the pillage of the houses of the Jacobins.” They plundered Cholet; the sacked Challans. After having missed Granville, they pillaged Ville-Dieu. They called the countrymen who joined the Blues, “the Jacobin crowd,” and they made an end of these sooner than any others. They loved carnage like soldiers, and massacre like brigands. To shoot the “Patauds” that is the bourgeois, pleased them; they called it “se décarémer or unrelenting. At Fontenay, one of their priests, the Curé Barbotin, struck down an old man with his sabre. At Saint-Germain-sur-Ille, one of their captains, a nobleman, shot the attorney of the Commune dead, and took his watch. At Machecoul, they cut down the Republicans regularly, at the rate of thirty a day for five weeks; each chain of thirty was called “the rosary.” They placed the chain in front of a ditch and shot the men; as they were shot they fell into the ditch sometimes alive, but they were buried all the same. We have already seen this custom. Joubert, president of the district, had his hands sawed off. They put sharp-edged handcuffs, forged for the purpose, on the prisoners of the Blues. They put them to death in the public square, to the sound of war cries. Charette, who signed: “Fraternity; Chevalier Charette,” and who, like Marat, wore a handkerchief on his head, tied above his eyebrows, burned the city of Porni and the inhabitants in their houses.

At this time, Carrier was frightful. Terror answered to terror. The insurgent Breton had almost the same appearance as the insurgent Greek, with his short jacket, gun slung over his shoulder, leggings and wide breeches similar to the Greek fustand; the peasant boy resembled the Greek klephth. Henri de la Rochejaquelein, at the age of twenty-one, set out for this war with a stick and a pair of pistols.

The Vendéan army numbered a hundred and fifty-four divisions. They made regular sieges; they held Bressuire blockaded for three days. One Good Friday, ten thousand peasants, cannonaded the town of the Sables with red hot balls. They succeeded in destroying fourteen republican cantonments, from Montigné to Courbeveilles, in one single day.

On the high wall at Thouars, this superb dialogue was heard between La Rochejaquelein and a peasant boy, —

“Carl!”

“Here I am.”

“Let me climb up on your shoulders.”

“All right.”

“Your gun.”

“Take it.”

And la Rochejaquelein leaped into the town, and the towers which Dugueselin had beseiged, were taken without ladders.

They preferred a cartridge to a louis-d’or. They wept when they lost sight of their own belfry. To flee seemed easy to them; then their chiefs would exclaim: “Throw away your sabots, but keep your guns!” When ammunition gave out, they told their beads and took powder from the ammunition wagons of the Republicans; later d’Elbée demanded powder from the English. When the enemy drew near, if they had any wounded, they concealed them in the tall wheat or among the virgin ferns, and after the affair was ended came back to get them.

They wore no uniforms. Their clothing was in tatters. Peasants and noblemen were dressed in the first rags they could find. Roger Mouliniers wore a turban and a cloak taken from the wardrobe of the theatre of La Fleche; the Chevalier de Beauvilliers wore an attorney’s robe and a woman’s hat over a woollen cap. All wore the white scarf and belt; the different ranks were distinguished by knots. Stofflet had a red knot; La Rochejaquelein, a black knot; Wimpfen, a semi-Girondist, who never left Normandy, wore the brassart of the Carabots of Caen. They had women in their ranks; Madame de Lescure, who became Madame de Rochejaquelein later; Thérese de Mollien, La Rouaire’s mistress, who burned the list of the parish chiefs; Madame de La Rochefoucauld beautiful, young, sword in hand, rallying the peasants at the foot of the great towers of the castle of Puy-Rousseau; and Antoinette Adams, called Chevalier Adams, who was so courageous that after her capture when she was shot, they stood out of respect.

This epic time was cruel. The people were mad. Madame de Lescure purposely made her horse walk over the disabled republicans lying on the ground; “dead,” said she; perhaps they were only wounded.

Sometimes the men were traitors; the women, never. Mademoiselle Fleury of the Théâtre Français left Rouarie for Marat, but from love. The captains were often as ignorant as the soldiers; Monsieur de Sapinaud did not know how to spell; he wrote “orions” for aurions, “couté” instead of côté.

The leaders hated each other; the captains of the Marais cried: “Down with those of the High Country!” Their cavalry was not very numerous, and difficult to bring together. Puysaye wrote: “A man who would cheerfully give me his two sons grows cold if I ask for one of his horses.” Fertes, pitchforks, scythes, guns old and new, hunting knives, spits, cudgels tipped and studded with iron, such were their arms; some of them carried crosses made of dead men’s bones.

They made their attacks with loud cries, springing forth suddenly on every hand, from the woods, the hills, the underbrush, hollow paths; they formed crescents, killing, exterminating, blasting, and disappearing. When they passed through a Republican town, they cut down the Tree of Liberty, burned it and danced in a circle around the fire. All their pleasures were at night. This was the Vendéan rule, always to be unexpected. They would go fifteen leagues in silence without bending a blade of grass on their way. When evening came after determining between the chiefs and the war council, the place where they were to surprise the Republican posts the next morning, they would load their guns, mumble their prayers, take off their sabots, and file in long columns through the woods, barefooted, over the heather and moss, without a sound, without a word, without a breath. A march of cats in the darkness.

CHAPTER VI.

THE SOUL OF THE EARTH ABSORBED BY MEN.

La Vendee during the revolt numbered no less than five hundred thousand men, women, and children. Half a million of soldiers, these were the figures given by Tuffin de la Rouarie.

The federalists gave their assistance; the Gironde was a party to la Vendée, la Lozère sent thirty thousand men to the Bocage. Eight departments united; five in Brittany, three in Normandy. Evreux, which fraternized with Caen, was represented in the rebellion by Chaumont, its mayor, and Gardembas, one of its leading men. Buzot, Gorsas, and Barbaroux, at Caen; Brissot, at Moulins; Chassann, at Lyons; Rabaut Saint-Etienne, at Nismes: Meillan and Duchâtel, in Brittany, — all these mouths blew the furnace.

There were two Vendées, Great Vendée, which carried on the forest war; and Little Vendée, which carried on the war of the thickets, — that was the slight difference which separated Charette from Jean Chouan, Little Vendée was innocent; Great Vendée was corrupt. Little Vendée was more important. Charette was made marquis, lieutenant-general of the king’s armies and was decorated with the great cross of Saint Louis; Jean Chouan remained Jean Chouan. Charette inclined to the bandit, Jean Chouan was more of a knight-errant.

As for those magnanimous chiefs, Bonchamps, Lescure, la Rochejaquelein, they were mistaken. The great Catholic army was a foolish attempt; disaster was inevitable. Can one imagine a tempest of peasants attacking Paris? a coalition of villages besieging the Panthéon? a pack of Christmas carols and orisons barking around the Marseillaise? a crowd of sabots rushing on a legion of intellects? Le Mans and Savenay punished this madness. It was impossible for la Vendée to pass the Loire. She could accomplish anything except this stride. Civil war does not conquer. Crossing the Rhine is the crowning work of Cæsar and the additional glory of Napoleon; crossing the Loire kills la Rochejaquelein.

The true sphere of la Vendée is within her own boundaries, there she is more than invulnerable, she is intangible. The Vendéan at home is a smuggler, a farmer, soldier, shepherd, poacher, sharpshooter, goatherd, bellringer, peasant, spy, assassin, sacristan, wild beast of the woods.

La Rochejaquelein is only Achilles; Jean Chouau is Proteus.

La Vendée miscarried.

Other revolts have been successful; the Swiss insurrection for example. There was this difference between a mountainous revolt like the Swiss, and a forest revolt like the Vendéan, that almost always because of the fatal influence of environment, the one is struggling for an ideal, and the other for prejudices. One soars, the other crawls. One fights for humanity; the other, for solitude. One desires liberty; the other, isolation. One defends the Commune; the other, the parish.— “Communism! Communism!” cried the heroes of Marat. — One has to do with precipices; the other, with quagmires. One is the man of torrents and foamy waters; the other, the man of stagnant puddles where fever lurks. The head of one is among the stars; that of the other, in the thicket. The one is on a summit; the other, in a shadow.

Education arising from mountain tops and low lands is not the same.

The mountain is a citadel; the forest, an ambuscade: one inspires boldness; the other, strategy. Antiquity placed the gods on pinnacles, and satyrs in grooves. The satyr is the savage; half man, half beast. Free countries have their Appenines, their Alps, their Pyrenees an Olympus. Parnassus is a mountain. Mont Blanc was the colossal auxiliary of William Tell; behind and above the great contests of spirits, against the darkness which fills the poems of India, the Himalayas are seen. Greece, Spain, Italy, Helvetia, have the mountain for a type; Cimmeria, Germany, or Brittany have the woods. The forest is barbarous.

The formation of the ground affects many of man’s actions. It is more of an accomplice than is realized. In sight of some wild landscapes, one is tempted to exonerate man, and incriminate creation; one feels the silent rebellion of nature; the desert is sometimes injurious to conscience, especially an unenlightened conscience; conscience may be gigantic, as with Jesus and Socrates; it may be dwarfed, as with Atreus and Judas. A small conscience quickly becomes reptile; the shady forest trees, the brambles, the thorns, the marshes under the branches, are a fatal habitation for it; it is mysteriously permeated there by evil persuasions. Optical illusions, inexplicable shadows, terrors of the hour or place, throw men into a sort of fear, half religious, half brutal, which in ordinary times engenders superstition, and in periods of violence, brutality. Hallucinations hold the torch which lights the path of murder. There is a touch of madness in the brigand. Wonderful nature has a double meaning, which dazzles great minds and blinds uncultivated souls. When man is ignorant, when the desert is filled with visions, the darkness of solitude is added to the darkness of intelligence; hence, in man, the possibilities of perdition.

Certain rocks, certain ravines, certain copses, certain wild openings through the trees at evening, impel man to mad and awful deeds. One might almost say that there are evil places.

What tragic deeds that gloomy hill between Baignon and Plélan has witnessed!

Wide horizons lead the soul to broad ideas; circumscribed horizons engender narrow ideas; this sometimes condemns great hearts to become small minded: as, for example, Jean Chouan.

Broad ideas hated by narrow ideas, — this is the very struggle of progress.

Country, Fatherland, — these two words comprise the whole Vendéan war; a quarrel of the local idea with the universal idea; peasants against patriots.

CHAPTER VII.

LA VENDÉE WAS THE END OF BRITTANY.

Brittany is an old rebel. Every time that it had revolted for two thousand years, it had been in the right; the last time it was in the wrong. Still, in reality, against the Revolution as against the monarchy, against the acting representatives as against the governing dukes and peers, against the assignats as against the subsidies, whoever the combatants might be, Nicolas Rapin, François de la Noue, Captain Pluviaut and Lady de la Garnache, or Stofflet, Coquereau, and Lechandelier de Pierreville, under Monsieur de Rohan against the king, and under Monsieur de La Rochejaquelein for the king, Brittany was always waging the same war, — the war of the local mind against the central mind.

These ancient provinces were like a pond: these sluggish waters were averse to running; the winds blowing over them did not give them life, it irritated them. France ended at Finisterre; the field given to man terminated there, and there the march of generations stopped. Halt! cried the ocean to the earth, and barbarism to civilization. Every time that the centre, Paris, gives an impulse, whether it comes from royalty or the Republic, whether it be in the direction of despotism or liberty, it is a novelty and Brittany bristles. Let us be in peace. What do they want of us? The Marais takes its pitchfork, the Bocage takes its carbine. All our attempts, our initiative in legislation and education, our encyclopaedias, our philosophies, our geniuses, our glories, have come to naught before the Houroux; the tocsin in Bazouges threatens the French revolution, the moor of Faou revolts against our stormy public squares, and the bell of Haut-des Prés declares war on the tower of the Louvre.

Terrible blunder.

The Vendéan insurrection was a dismal mistake.

A colossal skirmish, chicanery of Titans, boundless rebellion, destined to leave to history but a single word, — a word notorious and black; committing suicide for the absent, devoted to egoism, spending its time in offering great bravery to cowardice, without calculation, without stratagem, without tactics, without plan, without aim, without a chief, without responsibility; showing to what extent will can be powerless; chivalric and savage; absurdity in rut, building a parapet of shadows against the light; ignorance making a long, stupid, superb resistance to truth, justice, right, reason, and deliverance; the dismay of eight years, the ravage of fourteen departments, the devastation of fields, the destruction of crops, burning villages, ruining towns, pillaging houses, the massacre of women and children, a torch in the cottages, a sword in the hearts of the people, the terror of civilization, the hope of Pitt; such was this war, — an unconscious attempt at parricide.

Taken all in all, by demonstrating the necessity of penetrating in every way the old Breton shadow and of piercing that thicket with all the arrows of light at once, la Vendée has been of service to progress. Catastrophes have a gloomy way of settling matters.

BOOK SECOND. — THE THREE CHILDREN.

CHAPTER I.

PLUS QUAM CIVILIA BELLA.

The summer of 1792 had been very rainy; the summer of 1793 was very hot. In consequence of the civil war, there were, so to speak, no roads in Brittany. People went about there, however, thanks to the beauty of the summer. The best route is dry ground.

At the end of a serene July day, about an hour after sunset, a man on horseback, who came from the direction of Avranches, stopped before the little inn called the Croix-Branchard, at the entrance of Pontorson, and the sign of which bore this inscription, that was still legible a few years ago: “Good cider on draught.” It had been hot all day, but the wind was beginning to blow.

This traveller was wrapped in a wide cloak, which covered the horse’s back. He wore a broad-brimmed hat with a tricolored cockade, a bold thing to do in this country of hedges and gunshots, where a cockade was a target. His cloak tied at the neck was thrown back to leave his arms free, and underneath was seen a tricolored belt and two pistols sticking out of the belt. A sabre hung down beyond the cloak.

As the horse stopped, the door of the inn opened, and the innkeeper came out with a lantern in his hand. It was just between daylight and darkness; it was light on the road and dark in the house.

The host looked at the cockade.

“Citizen,” said he, “do you stop here?”

“No.”

“Where are you going then?”

“To Dol.”

“In that case, return to Avranches or stay at Pontorson.”

“Why?”

“Because they are fighting in Dol.”

“Ah!” said the cavalier.

And he added,

“Give some oats to my horse.”

The host brought a bucket, emptied a bag of oats into it and unbridled the horse, which began to snort and to eat.

The conversation continued, —

"Citizens, is this a horse of requisition?"

"No."

"Is it yours?"

"Yes. I bought it and paid for it."

"Where do you come from?"

"From Paris."

"Not directly?"

"No."

"I knew it, the roads are closed. But the post-wagon still runs."

"As far as Alençon. I left it there."

"Ah! soon there will be no more posts in France. There are no more horses. A horse worth three hundred francs brings six hundred, and fodder is high. I have been post-master, and now I keep a cook-shop. Out of thirteen hundred and thirteen post-masters, two hundred have resigned. Citizen, have you travelled under the new tariff?"

"Of the first of May, — yes."

"Twenty sous per post in a carriage, twelve sous in a cab, five sous in a wagon. Did you buy this horse at Alençon?"

"Yes."

"You have been riding all day, to-day?"

"Since daybreak."

"And yesterday?"

"And the day before."

"I see that. You came by way of Domfront and Mortain?"

"And Avranches."

"Take my advice and rest yourself, citizen. You must be tired. Your horse is."

"Horses have a right to be tired, but men have not."

The host fixed his eyes again on the traveller. He had a solemn, calm, stern face, framed in gray hair.

The innkeeper glanced along the road, which was deserted as far as he could see, and said, —

"And you are travelling alone like this?"

"I have an escort."

"Where is it?"

"My sabre and my pistols."

The innkeeper went to get a pail of water, and watered the horse, and while the horse was drinking, the host contemplated the traveller, and said to himself, “All the same, he looks like a priest.”

The cavalier continued, —

“You say that they are fighting at Dol?”

“Yes. It ought to be beginning this very minute.”

“Who are fighting?”

“A ci-devant against a ci-devant.”

“What did you say?”

“I say that a ci-devant who is for the Republic is fighting against a ci-devant who is for the king.”

“But there is no king now.”

“There is the little one. And the strange part of it is that the two ex-nobles are two relatives.”

The cavalier listened attentively. The innkeeper went on:

“One is young, the other, old; it is a grand-nephew fighting against his great uncle. The uncle is a Royalist; the nephew, a patriot. The uncle commands the Whites, the nephew commands the Blues. Ah! they will give no quarter, be sure of that. It is war to the death.”

“To the death?”

“Yes, citizen. Wait, would you like to see the polite speeches they throw at each other’s heads? Here is a notice the old man found a way to have posted up everywhere, on all the houses and all the trees, and which he had stuck up even on my door.”

The host held his lantern near a square of paper fastened to one of the leaves of his double-door, and as the notice was in large letters, the cavalier was able to read from his horse, —

“The Marquis de Lantenac has the honor to inform his grand-nephew, Monsieur the Viscount Gauvain, that if Monsieur le Marquis has the good fortune to capture his person, he will have Monsieur le Viscount quietly shot.”

He turned around and threw the light from his lantern on another notice posted opposite the first on the other leaf of the door. The traveller read, —

“Gauvain warns Lantenac that if he takes him he will have him shot.”

“Yesterday,” said the host; “the first placard was pasted up on my door, and this morning, the second. The reply was not long coming.”

The traveller, in an undertone, as if talking to himself, uttered these few words, which the innkeeper heard without taking in their full meaning, —

"Yes, it is more than civil war, it is domestic war. It is necessary, and it is well. The great rejuvenations of peoples are at this price."

And the traveller, raising his hand to his hat and fixing his eyes on the second notice, saluted it.

The host continued, —

"You see, citizen, this is how it is. In the cities and the large towns we are for the Revolution, in the country they are against it; that is to say, in the cities they are French, in the villages they are Breton. It is a war of bourgeois against the peasants. They call us boors, we call them clowns. The nobles and the priests are with them."

"Not all," interrupted the cavalier.

"Beyond a doubt, citizen, for we have here a viscount against a marquis."

And he added in a low voice to himself, —

"And I believe that I am speaking to a priest."

"And which is winning?"

"The viscount at present. But he has a hard time. The old man is terrible. These people belong to the family of Gauvain, nobles of this country here. It is a family with two branches; there is the large branch, the chief of which is called the Marquis de Lantenac, and the small branch, the chief of which is called the Viscount Gauvain. The two branches are now fighting. Such a thing is not seen among the trees, but it is seen among men. This Marquis de Lantenac is all-powerful in Brittany; among the peasants he is a prince. The day he landed he had eight thousand men in no time; in a week, three hundred parishes were raised. If he had been able to take a corner of the coast, the English would have landed. Fortunately, this Gauvain was there, who is his grand-nephew, — a strange occurrence. He is the Republican commander, and he repulsed his great-uncle. And, then, as luck would have it, this Lantenac, on his arrival, while massacring a lot of prisoners, had caused two women to be shot, one of whom had three children who had been adopted by a battalion from Paris. That made them a terrible battalion. It was called the battalion of Bonnet-Rouge. There are not many of these Parisians left, but they are furious soldiers. They have been incorporated into Commandant Gauvain's division. Nothing withstands them. They are determined to avenge the death of the women, and have the children again. Nobody knows what the old man has done with these little things. That is what enrages the Parisian grenadiers. If these children had not been mixed up in it, I suppose this war would not be what it is. The viscount is a good, brave young man. But the old man is a terrible marquis. The peasants call it the war of Saint Michael against Beelzebub. You know, perhaps that Saint Michael is an angel of this part of the country. He has a mountain in the bay. He is said to have overthrown the devil and to have buried him under another mountain which is near here, and is called Tombelaine."

"Yes," murmured the cavalier, "Tumba Beleni, the tomb of Belus, of Bel, of Belial, of Beelzebub."

"I see that you know about it."

And the host said, aside to himself, —

"He knows Latin, and he is surely a priest."

Then he added: "Well, citizen, for the peasants, it is that war over again. It is evident that to them Saint Michael is the Royalist general, and Beelzebub is the patriot commander; but if there is a devil, it is surely Lantenac, and if there is an angel it is Gauvain. Won't you take something, citizen?"

"I have my gourd and a piece of bread. But you have not told me what is going on in Dol."

"This is it. Gauvain is commanding the exploring column of the coast. Lantenac's aim was to rouse a general insurrection, to strengthen Lower Brittany with Lower Normandy, to open the doors to Pitt, and to increase the great Vendéan army with twenty thousand English and two hundred thousand peasants. Gauvain cut short this plan. He holds the coast, and is driving Lantenac into the interior and the English into the sea. Lantenac was here and he drove him away; he has taken Pont-au-Beau away from him, he has driven him from Avranches, he has driven him from Villedieu, he has prevented him from reaching Granville. He is manœuvring to drive him back into the forest of Fougères and to surround him there. All was going well yesterday. Gauvain was here with his column. Suddenly, there is an alarm. The old man, who is shrewd, makes a point; they learn that he is marching on Dol. If he takes Dol, and if he establishes a battery on Mont-Dol, for he has cannon, there is a point of the coast where the English can land, and all is lost. That is why, as there was not a minute to lose, Gauvain, who is a level-headed man, took counsel with no one but himself; did not ask for orders, nor wait for them, sounded the signal to saddle, put to his artillery, collected his troops, drew his sabre, and that is how, while Lantenac was rushing on Dol, Gauvain was rushing on Lantenac. It is at Dol, that these two Breton heads are going to butt. It will be a proud collision. They are there now."

"How long does it take to go to Dol?"

"For a troop with wagons, at least three hours; but they are there."

The traveller put his hand behind his ear and said, —

"To be sure, it seems to me that I hear the cannon."

The host listened.

"Yes, citizen; and the musketry. The fight has begun. You will have to spend the night here. There is no good in going there."

"I cannot stop. I must continue my journey."

"You are wrong. I don't know your business, but the risk is great, and unless it concerns what you hold dearest in the world — —"

"That is just it," replied the cavalier.

"Something like your own son — —"

"Very nearly," said the cavalier.

The innkeeper raised his head and said to himself, —

"And yet this citizen seems to me like a priest."

Then, after some thought, he added, —

"After all, a priest may have children."

"Put my horse's bridle back," said the traveller. "How much do I owe you?"

And he paid him.

The host set back the trough and the bucket by the side of the wall, and then came toward the traveller.

"Since you are bound to go on, take my advice. It is clear that you are going to Saint-Malo. Well, don't go through Dol. There are two routes, the road through Dol, and the road along the sea coast. One is as short as the other. The road along by the sea goes through Saint-Georges de Brehaigne Cherrueix, and Hirelle-Vivier. You leave Dol to the south and Cancal to the north. Citizen, at the end of the street, you will find the place where the two roads meet; the one to Dol is to the left, the one to Saint-Georges de Brehaigne is to the right. Listen to me now; if you go through Dol, you will fall in the massacre. That is why you must not take the left; take the right."

"Thank you," said the traveller.

And he spurred on his horse.

It had grown quite dark, he plunged into the night.

The innkeeper lost sight of him.

When the traveller came to the end of the street where the two roads branched off, he heard the innkeepers voice cry out from the distance,

“Go to the right!”

He went to the left.

CHAPTER II.

DOL.

Dol, a Spanish town of France in Brittany, as it is termed in the old charters, is not a town but a street. A grand old gothic street, all bordered on the right and on the left by houses with pillars, standing irregularly and making angles and corners in the street, which is everywhere wide. The rest of the town is nothing but a network of lanes running into this large street from opposite directions, and ending there like brooks in a river. The town, without gates or walls, open, overshadowed by Mont-Dol, could not withstand a siege; but the street could withstand one. These promontories of houses that could still be seen there fifty years ago, and the two-pillared galleries which bordered them, formed a very solid battle-ground, capable of great resistance. There were as many fortresses as there were houses, and it was necessary to take one after another. The old market house was very nearly in the middle of the street.

The innkeeper of the Croix-Branchard had told the truth, a furious conflict filled Dol at the time he was speaking. A nocturnal duel between the Whites who had reached there in the morning, and the Blues who had unexpectedly arrived there in the evening, had suddenly burst forth in the town. The forces were unequal, the Whites numbered six thousand, the Blues fifteen hundred, but their fury was equally divided. Strange to say, the fifteen hundred attacked the six thousand.

On one side, a riotous crowd; on the other, a phalanx. On one side, six thousand peasants with sacred hearts on their leather jackets, white ribbons on their round hats, Christian devices on their brassarts, rosaries hanging from their belts, armed with more pitchforks than sabres, and carbines without bayonets, dragging cannons by means of ropes, poorly equipped, badly disciplined, meanly armed, full of frenzy; on the other side, fifteen hundred soldiers wearing three cornered hats with the tricolored cockade, coats with full skirts and wide lappels, shoulder belts crossed, copper-hilted swords, guns with long bayonets, erect, well-trained, docile, and fierce, knowing how to obey like people who know how to command, volunteers, too, but volunteers for their country, in rags, moreover, and shoeless. For the monarchy, paladin peasants; for the republic, barefooted heroes. And the soul of each of these two troops was its chief: that of the royalists, an old man; of the republicans, a young man. On one side, Lantenac; on the other, Ganvain.

Besides gigantic young figures, such as Danton, Saint-Just, and Robespierre, the Revolution had young figures which were ideal, like Hoche and Marceau. Ganvain was one of these figures.

Gauvain was thirty years old, with Herculean form, a prophetic, serious eye, and the laugh of a child. He did not smoke, he did not drink, he did not swear. He carried a toilet case throughout the war, he took great care of his nails, his teeth, and his hair which was brown and abundant; during halts he himself shook his military clock, riddled with bullets and white with dust. Although he always rushed recklessly into the midst of the battle, he had never been wounded. His very gentle voice had, when necessary, a sharp tone of command. He set the example of sleeping on the ground, in wind, in rain, in snow, rolled up in his cloak, and his graceful head resting on a stone. He was a soul both heroic and innocent. The sword in his hand transfigured him. He had that effeminate appearance which in battle is terrible.

At the same time, he was a thinker and a philosopher — a young sage; Alcibiades to look at, Socrates to listen to.

This young man had at once become a leader in this great improvisation, the French Revolution.

His division, formed by himself, like the Roman legion, was a sort of complete little army; it was composed of infantry and cavalry; it had scouts, pioneers, sappers, pontooniers; and just as the Roman legion had catapults, this had cannons. Three pieces drawn by horses strengthened the column, and at the same time left it easily handled.

Lantenac also was a warrior and still more formidable. He was both more reflective and more daring. The real old heroes have more coolness than the young men because they are farther from the sunrise, and more audacious because they are nearer death. What have they to lose? so little! Hence, Lantenac’s rash movements, which were at the same time so skillful. But in the main, in this obstinate hand-to-hand conflict, Gauvain almost always had the advantage. It was more good fortune than anything else. All good luck, even good luck which is terrible, belongs to youth. Victory is in some respects like a young girl.

Lantenac was incensed against Gauvain; first because Gauvain was opposed to him, then because he was his relative. What right had he to be a Jacobin! this Gauvain! this scamp! his heir, for the marquis had no children; a grand-nephew, almost a grandson! “Ah,” said this quasi grandfather, “if I get my hand on him, I will kill him like a dog!”

Besides the Republic had reason to be troubled about this Marquis de Lantenac. He had hardly landed when he made them tremble. His name had run through the Vendéan insurrection like a train of powder, and Lantenac became at once the centre. In a revolt of this kind, where all are jealous of each other, and each has his bush or his ravine, the coming of a superior rallies the scattered chiefs, who are equals among themselves. Almost all the captains of the woods joined Lantenac, and from far and near, they obeyed him. One alone had left him; he had been the first to join him, — Gavard. Why? Because he was a man of trust. Gavard had known all the secrets, and adopted all the plans of the old system of civil warfare, that Lantenac came to supplant and replace. One cannot follow in the steps of a man of trust; the shoe of la Rouarie did not fit Lantenac. Gavard had gone to join Bonchamp.

Lantenac, as a soldier, belonged to the school of Fredderick II.; he knew how to combine the greater war with the less. He wished to have neither a “confused mass,” like the great catholic and royal army, a multitude destined to be destroyed; nor a scattering in the thickets and copses, good for harrassing, powerless to overthrow. The guerilla does not terminate, or terminates unfortunately; it begins by attacking a Republic, and ends by robbing a stage coach. Lantenac did not intend to carry on this Breton war either wholly in the open field, as La Rochejaquelin had done, or wholly in the forest, like Jean Chouan; neither Vendée nor Chouannerie; he wanted real war; to make use of the peasant, but to support him with the soldier. He wished to have bands of men for strategy, and regiment for tactics. He found these village armies, able to disappear so suddenly, excellent for attack, ambuscade and surprise; but he felt that they were too fluid; they were like water in his hand; he wished to create a solid point in this wavering and scattered war; he wished to add to this wild forest army, regular troops, which would be the pivot of the peasants’ manœuvres. A profound and awful thought; if it had succeeded, la Vendée would have been impregnable.

But where could he find regular troops? where find soldiers? where find regiments? where find an army ready made? In England. This was Lantenac's determination: to land the English. Thus party conscience capitulates; the white cockade concealed from his sight the red coat. Lantenac had but one thought: to get possession of a point of the sea-coast, and to give it up to Pitt. That is why, seeing Dol without defence, he rushed on it, in order, through Dol, to have Mont-Dol; and through Mont-Dol, the coast.

The place was well chosen. The cannon on Mont-Dol would sweep le Fresnois on one side, and Saint-Brelade on the other; would keep the cruisers from Cancale at a distance, and would make the coast from Raz-sur-Couesnon to Saint-Mêloir-des-Ondes, open to invasion.

To make this decisive move successful, Lantenac had brought with him a little more than six thousand men, the stoutest among the bands at his disposal, and all his artillery, ten sixteen-pound culverins, one eight-pounder, and a four-pounder. He proposed to establish a strong battery on Mont-Dol, on this principle, that a thousand shots from ten cannons would accomplish more than fifteen hundred shots with five cannons.

Success seemed certain. He had six thousand men. He had nothing to fear in the direction of Avranches but Gauvain and his fifteen hundred men, and in the direction of Dinan, only Léchelle. Léchelle, it is true, had twenty-five thousand men, but he was twenty leagues away. Lantenac was confident of success with regard to Léchelle, on account of the great distance against the great number; and, with regard to Gauvain, on account of the small number against the short distance. We may add that Léchelle was an idiot, and later on he allowed his twenty-five thousand men to be destroyed on the moors of la Croix-Bataille; a defeat which he paid for with suicide.

So Lantenac felt perfectly secure. His entrance into Dol was sudden and severe. The Marquis de Lantenac had a hard reputation; he was known to be merciless. No resistance was attempted. The terrified inhabitants shut themselves up in their houses. The six thousand Vendéans took up their quarters in the town with boorish confusion; it was almost a fair ground, without quartermasters, without definite camp, bivouacking at haphazard, cooking in the open air, scattering about in the churches, leaving their guns for their rosaries. Lantenac hastened with some artillery officers to reconnoitre Mont-Dol, leaving the lieutenancy to Gouge-le-Bruant, whom he had appointed field-sergeant.

This Gouge-le-Bruant has left a faint trace in history. He had two nicknames “Brise-bleu,” on account of his slaughtering of patriots, and “l’Imânus,” because he had in him something strangely, unutterably horrible. “Imânus,” derived from immanis, is an old word of Low Norman origin, expressing the superhuman and quasidivine ugliness, in the frightful, in devils, satyrs, and ogres. An ancient manuscript said: “d’mes daeux iers j’ vis l’imanus.” The old men of the Bocage, to-day have no knowledge of Gouge-le-Bruant, nor of the meaning of Brise-bleu; but they have a confused idea of l’Imânus. L’Imânus is connected with local superstition. They still speak of l’Imânus at Trémorel and Plumaugat, two villages where Gouge-le-Bruant left the print of his ominous foot. In la Vendée, others were savage. Gouge-le-Bruant was barbarous. He was a kind of cacique, tatooed with rude letters and fleurs-de-lis; in his face shone the hideous and almost superhuman glare of a soul unlike any other human being. He was infernally brave in battle, and atrocious afterward. He had a heart full of tortuous intricacies, ready for every kind of devotion, inclined to all sorts of madness. Did he reason? Yes, but as serpents crawl: in circles. He left heroism to come to murder. It was impossible to guess whence arose his resolutions, often magnificent on account of their monstrosity. He was capable of every unexpected horror. He had an epic ferocity.

Hence this misshapen nickname, “l’Imânus.”

The Marquis de Lantenac had confidence in his cruelty.

It was a fact that l’Imânus excelled in cruelty; but in strategy and tactics he was less superior, and perhaps the marquis was wrong to make him field-sergeant. However that may be, he left l’Imânus behind him, with orders to take his place and watch everything.

Gouge-le-Bruant, more of a warrior than a soldier, was more fit to slaughter a clan than to guard a city, but yet he stationed main guards.

When evening had come, as the Marquis de Lantenac was on his way back to Dol, after having decided on the situation of the projected battery, he suddenly heard the cannon. He looked. A red smoke was rising from the great street. There was a surprise, an irruption, an attack; they were fighting in the town.

Although it was hard to astonish him, he was stupefied. He was not expecting anything of the kind. Who could be there? Evidently, it was not Gauvain. It would be foolish to attack with one against four. Was it Léchelle? But what a forced march to have made! Léchelle was improbable; Gauvain, impossible.

Lantenac spurred on his horse; on his way he met the inhabitants in flight; he questioned them, they were mad with fear. They cried: “The Blues! The Blues!” and when he reached the town, the situation was desperate.

This is what had happened.

CHAPTER III.

SMALL ARMIES AND GREAT BATTLES.

On reaching Dol, the peasants, as we have just seen, were scattered through the town, each working his own pleasure, as it happens when people “obey out of friendship,” as the Vendéans expressed it. The sort of obedience which makes heroes but not troopers. They had stowed away their artillery with the baggage under the arches of the old market house, and weary, drinking, eating, telling their beads, they lay down helter-skelter through the great street, which was rather blocked up than guarded. As night came on, most of them fell asleep, with their heads on their sacks, some with their wives beside them; for the peasent women often follow the peasants; in Vendée, pregnant women served as spies. It was a mild July night; the constellations shone brilliantly in the deep blue black of the sky. All this bivouac, which was more like the halt of a caravan than the encampment of an army, was beginning to sleep peacefully. Suddenly, in the glimmering twilight, those who had not yet closed their eyes saw three cannons pointed at the end of the great street.

It was Gauvain. He had surprised the main guards, he was in the town, and he held the head of the street with his column.

A peasant jumped up, cried “Qui vive?” and fired off his gun, a cannon shot gave answer. Then a furious discharge of musketry burst forth. The entire drowsy multitude leaped to their feet; a rude awakening. They had gone to sleep under the stars and woke under fire.

The first moment was terrible, there is nothing so tragic as the swarming of a bewildered multitude. They pounced on their arms, they screamed, they ran, many fell. The peasant boys assaulted in this way, did not know what to do and began to shoot each other. The people, astounded, rushed out of their houses, went back, came out again, and wandered about in the confusion, like maniacs. Families called out to each other. A dismal fight with women and children intermingled. Hissing bullets streaked through the darkness. There was firing from every dark corner. Everything was smoke and tumult. The entanglement of the baggage wagons and carts added to it. The horses kicked. The people trampled on the wounded. Shrieks rose from the ground. Some from horror, others from amazement. Soldiers and officers were looking for one another. In the midst of all this, there were some gloomily indifferent. A woman nursing her new-born babe, was sitting by a portion of a wall, against which leaned her husband, whose leg had been broken, and while his blood was flowing, he was calmly loading his carbine and shooting at random, killing those before him in the darkness. Men lying on their bellies shot through the wheels of the wagons. Occasionally, arose an uproarious shouting. The great voice of the cannon drowned everything else. It was frightful.

It was like the felling of trees; they all lay one above another. Gauvain, in ambush, fired with a steady shot and lost few of his men.

However, the intrepid disorder of the peasants ended in an attempt to defend themselves; they retreated under the market-house, a vast, dark redoubt, a forest of stone pillars. There they regained a footing; anything resembling a wood gave them confidence. L'Imânus did his best to make up for the absence of Lantenac. They had cannon, but, much to Gauvain's astonishment, they made no use of it; this was because the artillery officers had gone with the marquis to investigate Mont Dol, and the peasants only understood the culverines and eight-pounders; but they riddled with bullets the Blues who cannonaded them. The peasants answered the grapeshot with musketry. They were now under shelter. They had piled up the drays, the carts, the baggage, all the barrels in the old market, and improvised a high barricade with openings through which they passed their carbines. Their shooting through these holes was deadly. All this was quickly accomplished. In a quarter of an hour, the market had an impenetrable front.

This became serious for Gauvain. This market, suddenly transformed into a citadel, was unlooked for. The peasants were there in a solid mass. Gauvain had been successful in surprising them and failed in routing them. He had dismounted. Holding his sword in his hand, under his crossed arms, he stood in the flare of a torch which lighted up his battery, watching all this darkness attentively.

His tall figure in this bright light made him visible to the men behind the barricade. He was their aim, but he was not aware of it.

The discharge of bullets sent from the barricade fell all around Gauvain, who was absorbed in thought.

But against all these carbines he had the cannon. The cannon ball always gets the advantage. He who has artillery has victory. His battery, if made good use of, assured him the superiority.

Suddenly, there was a flash of lightning from the market so full of darkness, something like a peal of thunder was heard, and a cannon ball went through a house above Gauvain’s head.

The barricade answered cannon shot with cannon shot.

What had happened? Something new. The artillery was no longer on one side alone.

A second cannon ball followed the first and buried itself in the wall near Gauvain. A third knocked off his hat.

These balls were of large calibre. They came from a sixteen-pounder.

“They are aiming at you, commandant,” cried the artillery-men. And they put out the torch. Gauvain, as if in a dream, picked up his hat.

Some one indeed was aiming at Gauvain; it was Lantenac.

The marquis had just entered the barricade from the opposite side.

L’Imânus ran toward him.

“Monseigueur, we have been surprised.”

“By whom?”

“I do not know.”

“Is the road open from Dinan?”

“I think so.”

“We must begin a retreat.”

“It has begun. Many have already escaped.”

“We mustn’t escape; we must retreat. Why haven’t you used the artillery?”

“They lost their heads, and then the officers were not here.”

“I will attend to it.”

“Monseigneur, I have sent all that I could of the baggage, the women, and everything of no use, towards Fougères. What is to be done with the three little children?’

“Ah! those children?”

“Yes.”

They are our hostages. Have them taken to la Tourgue.”

Having said this, the marquis went to the barricade. The coming of the chief put a new face on the matter. The barricade was badly constructed for artillery, as there was room for but two cannon; the marquis put in position two sixteen-pounders, for which they made embrasures. As he was leaning over one of the cannons, looking at the battery of the enemy through the embrasure, he noticed Gauvain.

“It is he!” he cried out.

Then he took the sponge and rammer himself, loaded the piece, adjusted the sight, and aimed.

Three times he aimed at Gauvain, and missed him. The third shot only succeeded in knocking off his hat.

“Stupid!” muttered Lantenac. “A little lower and I should have had his head.”

Suddenly the torch went out, and he had nothing before him but darkness.

“So be it,” he said.

And turning toward the peasant gunner, he cried, —

“Fire away!”

Gauvain, on his side, was no less in earnest. The situation grew more serious. A new phase of the struggle presented itself. The barricade had begun to make use of cannon. Who knew but it might pass from the defensive to the offensive? He had before him, not counting the dead and those who had fled, at least five thousand combatants, and he himself had only twelve hundred able men left. What would become of the Republicans, if the enemy should notice their small number? The rôles would be reversed. They were attacking, they would be attacked. If the barricade were to make a sortie all would be lost.

What was to be done? attacking the barricade front was not to be dreamed of; to attempt at main force would be risky; twelve hundred men could not drive out five thousand. To hasten matters was impossible, to wait would be fatal. They must come to an end. But how?

Gauvain belonged to the country, he knew the town; he knew that back of the old market, where the Vendéans were embattled, was a maze of narrow, winding lanes.

He turned to his lieutenant who was that brave Captain Guéchamp, famous later for clearing the forest of Concise, where Jean Chouan was born, and for preventing the taking of Bourgneuf, by barring the rebels from the dyke of the pond of la Chaîne.

“Guéchamp,” he said, “1 leave you in command. Fire with all your might. Riddle the barricade with cannon balls. Keep all those people busy.”

“I understand,” said Guéchamp.

“Mass the whole column with arms loaded, and hold them ready for attack.”

He spoke a few words additional in Guéchamp’s ear.

“I understand,” said Guéchamp.

Gauvain continued, —

“Are all our drummers on hand?”

“Yes.”

“We have nine. Keep two, give me seven.”

The seven drummers ranged themselves silently before Gauvain.

Then Gauvain cried, —

“Battalion of Bonnet-Rouge!”

Twelve men, with a sergeant, left the main body of the troops.

“I ask for the whole battalion,” said Gauvain.

“Here we are!” replied the sergeant.

“Twelve of you!”

“There are twelve of us left.”

“Very good,” said Gauvain.

This sergeant was the rough, but kind-hearted, trooper Radoub, who had adopted in the name of the battalion the three children found in the woods of La Saudraie.

Only half a battalion, it will be remembered, had been exterminated at Herbe-en-Pail, and Radoub had the good luck not to form a part of it.

A forage wagon was near; Gauvain pointed it out to the sergeant.

“Sergeant, have your men make ropes of straw and twist them around their guns to prevent any sound if they knock against each other.”

In a moment’s time the order had been executed, in silence and darkness.

“It is done,” said the sergeant.

“Soldiers, take off your shoes,” added Gauvain.

“We haven’t any,” said the sergeant.

That made, with the seven drummers, nineteen men; Gauvain was the twentieth.

He cried, —

“Follow me in single file. The drummers behind me, the battalion next. Sergeant, you will command the battalion.”

He took the head of the column, and, while the cannonading continued on both sides, these twenty men, gliding along like ghosts, plunged into the deserted lanes.

They marched some time in this way, winding along by the houses. Everything seemed dead in the town; the citizens were crouching in the cellars. There was not a door which was not barred, not a blind which was not closed. No light anywhere.

The great street was making a furious din in the midst of this silence; the cannonading still continued; the Republician battery and the Royalist barricade were angrily spitting out all their volleys.

After twenty minutes of winding about, Gauvain, who led the way with certainty in the darkness, reached the end of a lane running into the principal street; only it was on the other side of the market.

The position was reversed. On this side there was no intrenchment, — such is the everlasting imprudence of those who build barricades, — the market was open and they could enter under the arches, where some baggage wagons were harnessed ready for departure. Gauvain and his nineteen men had before them the five thousand Vendéans, but they were behind the Vendéans’ backs and not in front of them.

Gauvain spoke in a low voice to the sergeant; they removed the straw from their guns; the twelve grenadiers stationed themselves in order of battle behind the corner of the lane, and the seven drummers held their drumsticks in readiness for orders.

The discharge of artillery was intermittent. Suddenly, in an interval between two reports, Gauvain raised his sword, and, in a voice which sounded like a trumpet in the silence, cried out, —

“Two hundred men to the right, two hundred men to the left, the rest in the centre!”

The twelve guns fired, the seven drums beat the charge.

And Gauvain uttered the terrible cry of the Blues, —

“Charge bayonets!”

The effect was wonderful.

This entire mass of peasants felt that they were surprised from the rear, and imagined that there was a new army behind them. At the same time, the column holding the head of the street and commanded by Guéchamp, hearing the drums, moved forward, beating the charge in return, and rushed in double-quick time on the barricade; the peasants saw that they were between two fires.

A panic exaggerates everything; in a panic, a pistol shot makes as much noise as a cannon, and sounds are magnified by the imagination, and the baying of a hound seems like the roar of a lion. We may add that the peasant takes fear as the thatch takes fire, and peasant’s fear increases to defeat, as easily as the burning thatch grows to a conflagration. Their flight was beyond description.

In a few moments, the market was empty, the terrified peasant boys scattered, in spite of the officers. L'Imânus killed two or three of the deserters to no purpose; this cry was heard above everything else: "Escape, if you can!" and this army fled through the streets of the town as though it were a sieve, out into the country, with the swiftness of clouds driven by a storm.

Some escaped in the direction of Chateauneuf, some toward Plerguer, and others toward Antrain.

The Marquis de Lantenac saw this defeat. He spiked the cannons with his own hand, then retired, the last, slowly and coolly, saying,— "The peasants are not to be depended upon, most decidedly. We must have the English."

CHAPTER IV.

IT IS THE SECOND TIME.

The victory was complete. Gauvain turned toward the men of the battalion of Bonnet-Rouge, and said, —

“There are only twelve of you, but you are worth a thousand.”

Praise from the chief meant the cross of honor at that time.

Guéchamp, sent out of the town by Gauvain, pursued the fugitives and took many of them.

They lighted the torches and ransacked the town.

All who could not escape surrendered. They lighted up the main streets with fire pots. It was strewn with dead and wounded. The end of a battle is always heartrending. A few groups of desperate men here and there still resisted; they were surrounded and they laid down their arms.

Gauvain had noticed in the lawless confusion of the rout, a bold man, a sort of nimble, hardy faun, who had aided the flight of others but had not fled himself. This peasant made masterly use of his carbine, shooting with the barrel, felling with the stock so well that he had broken it; now he had a pistol in one hand and a sword in the other. No one dared approach him. Suddenly, Gauvain saw him totter and lean against a post in the main street. The man had just been wounded. But he still held his sword and pistol. Gauvain put his sword under his arm and went to him.

“Surrender,” he said.

The man looked at him steadily. Blood was flowing from a wound under his clothing, and making a pool at his feet.

“You are my prisoner,” added Gauvain

The man remained speechless.

“What is your name?”

The man said, —

“My name is Danse-a-l’Ombre.”

“You are a brave fellow,” said Gauvain.

And he held out his hand to him.

The man replied: “Long live the king!” and collecting all the strength he had left, raising both arms at once, he fired his pistol at Gauvain’s heart, and aimed a blow at his head with his sword.

He did this with the swiftness of a tiger; but some one else was quicker still. It was a man on horseback who had just arrived, and had been there for some moments without attracting any one's attention. When this man saw the Vendéan raise his sword and pistol, he threw himself between him and Gauvain. But for this man, Gauvain would have been killed. The horse received the shot, the man received the blow from the sabre, and both fell. All this was done before there was time to cry out.

The Vendéan had dropped on the pavement.

The sabre had struck the man full in the face; he was on the ground, unconscious. The horse was killed.

Gauvain went to him.

"Who is this man?" he said.

He looked at him. The blood was pouring from the gash and formed a red mask over the wounded man's face. It was impossible to make out his features. One could see that he had gray hair.

"This man has saved my life," continued Gauvain.

"Does any one here know who he is?"

"My commandant," said a soldier, "this man has just entered the town. I saw him when he came. He came by the road Pontorson."

The surgeon of the column came running with his case. The wounded man was still unconscious. The surgeon examined him and said, —

"A mere cut. It is nothing. It will heal. In a week he will be on his feet. It is a fine sword cut."

The wounded man had a cloak, a tricolored belt, pistols, a sword. They laid him on a litter. They took off his clothes. They brought a pail of fresh water, the surgeon washed the wound, his face began to appear. Gauvain watched him with deep attention.

"Has he any papers about him?" asked Gauvain.

The surgeon felt in a side pocket and drew out a portfolio, which he handed to Gauvain.

In the meantime, the wounded man, refreshed by the cold water, came to himself. His eyelids moved slightly. Gauvain opened the portfolio; he found in it a sheet of paper folded twice, he unfolded it and read, —

"Committee of Public Welfare. Citizen Cimourdain,—"

He cried out: "Cimourdain!"

This cry made the wounded man open his eyes.

Gauvain was distracted.

“Cimourdain! It is you! This is the second time you have saved my life.”

Cimourdain looked at Gauvain. An unutterable joy lighted up his blood-stained face.

Gauvain fell on his knees before the wounded man, crying, —

“My master!” “Thy father,” said Cimourdain.

CHAPTER V.

THE DROP OF COLD WATER.

They had not seen each other for many years, but their hearts had never been separated; they recognized each other as though they had only parted the day before.

A hospital had been improvised at the Hotel de Ville in Dol. They laid Cimourdain on a bed in a little room, next to the large general hall for the wounded. The surgeon, who had sewed up the wound, put an end to the effusions between the two men, saying that Cimourdain must be left to go to sleep. Besides, Gauvain was required by the thousand cares which make the duties and anxieties of victory. Cimourdain remained alone, but he did not sleep; he had two fevers, one from his wound, one from his joy.

He did not sleep, and still it seemed to him that he was not awake. Was it possible? his dream was realized. He was one of those who do not believe in luck and he was lucky. He had found Gauvain again. He had left him a child, and found him a man; he found him great, terrible, fearless. He found him in the midst of triumph, and triumph for the people. Gauvain was the point of support to the Revolution in Vendée and it was he, Cimourdain, who had given this column to the Republic. This victorious man was his pupil. “What he saw radiating from this young form, destined perhaps for the Republican pantheon, was his own thoughts, — Cimourdain’s; his disciple, the child of his mind, was from this time forth a hero, and after a little would be a glory; it seemed to Cimourdain that he saw his own soul made into a genius; it was like Chiron seeing Achilles in battle. Mysterious relation between the priest and the centaur, for the priest is only a man to the waist.

All the dangers of this adventure, together with his sleeplessness after his wound, filled Cimourdain with a sort of mysterious intoxication. A young destiny was arising magnificently, and what added to his deep joy was the fact that he had full power over this life; another success like the one he had just seen, and Cimourdain would have to say but a word for the Republican to trust him with an army. Nothing dazzles like the astonishment at seeing everything succeed.

It was the time when each man had his own military dream, each wished to make a general: Danton wished to make a general of Westermann; Marat, of Rossignol; Hebert, of Ronsiu; Robespierre wanted to get rid of them all.

Why not Gauvain? said Cimourdain to himself; and he went on dreaming. The unbounded was before him; he passed from one hypothesis to another; all obstacles vanished; when one has once set his foot on this ladder he does not stop, it is an endless climb, one leaves man to reach the stars. A great general is only a chief of armies; a great captain is at the same time a chief of ideas; Cimourdain imagined Gauvain a great captain. It seemed to him, for dreams move swiftly, that he saw Gauvain on the ocean, repelling the English; on the Rhine, punishing the kings of the North; among the Pyrenees, repulsing the Spanish; in the Alps, making a signal for Rome to rise. There were in Cimourdain two men, a tender man and a gloomy man; both were satisfied; foras the inexorable was his ideal, he had seen Gauvain terrible as well as superb. Cimourdain thought of all that destruction must do before construction could begin, and surely, he thought, this is not the time for emotion. Gauvain will be "at the top" " — á la hauteur," — a phrase of that day. Cimourdain imagined Gauvain crushing the shades of night under his foot, having on a breastplate of light, with a meteoric gleam on his brow, spreading the great ideal wings of Justice, Reason, and Progress, and carrying a sword in his hand; an angel, but of destruction.

At the very height of this dream, which was almost an ecstasy, he heard, through the partly opened door, talking in the great hospital ward, next his room; he recognized Gauvain's voice; that voice, which in spite of years of absence was always sounding in his ear, and the voice of the child was recognizable in the voice of the man. He listened. There was a sound of steps. Some soldiers said, —

"Commander, this is the man who shot at you. While nobody was noticing him, he dragged himself to a cellar. We have found him. Here he is."

Then Cimourdain heard this conversation between Gauvain and the man, —

"Are you wounded?"

"I am well enough to be shot."

" Put this man in a bed. Dress his wounds, care for him, heal him."

"I want to die."

“You will live. You wished to kill me in the name of the king; I pardon you in the name of the Republic.”

A shadow passed over Cimourdain’s face. He woke as it were with a start, and he murmured with a sort of ominous despondency, —

“He is surely merciful.”

CHAPTER VI.

HEALED BREAST, A BLEEDING HEART.

A cut heals quickly; but there was some one elsewhere more seriously wounded than Cimourdain. It was the woman who had been shot at Herbe-en-Pail and had been picked up by the beggar Tellmarch in the great pool of blood.

Michelle Fléchard was in even greater danger than Tellmarch had supposed; there was a wound in her shoulder blade corresponding to the one above her breast; at the same time that the bullet broke her collar bone, another went through her shoulder; but as her lung had not been touched she might recover. Tellmarch was a “philosopher,” an expression among the peasants signifying something of a doctor, a little of a surgeon, a little of a sorcerer. He took care of the wounded woman in his den, on his pallet of seaweed, giving her those mysterious things called “simple remedies,” and, thanks to him, she lived.

The collar bone knit together, the wounds in her breast and shoulder closed up; after a few weeks the wounded woman was convalescent.

One morning she was able to go out of the carnichot, leaning on Tellmarch; she sat down under the trees in the sun. Tellmarch knew little about her, breast wounds require perfect quiet, and during the agony preceding her recovery, she had hardly spoken a word. “When she wished to talk, Tellmarch made her keep silent; but her delirium was persistent, and Tellmarch noticed in her eyes the gloomy coming and going of painful thoughts. This morning she was strong, she could almost walk by herself; a cure is a paternity, and Tellmarch looked at her with happiness. This good old man began to smile, He spoke to her.

“Well, we are on our feet, we have no more wounds.”

“Except in the heart,” she said.

And she added, —

“So you don’t know at all where they are?”

“ Who?” asked Tellmarch.

“My children.”

That “so” expressed a whole world of thoughts; it meant “since you never speak to me about them, since for so many days you have been by my side without opening your mouth about them, since you have made me keep silence every time I wished to break it, since you seem to fear that I should speak about them, it must be because you have nothing to tell me." Often in wandering and delirium of fever she had called her children, and had seen, for delirium takes note, that the old man did not answer her.

It was because Tellmarch really did not know what to say to her. It is not an easy matter to speak to a mother of her lost children. And, then, what did he know? Nothing. He knew that a mother had been shot, that this mother had been found on tho ground by him, that when he had picked her up she was almost a corpse, that this corpse had three children, and that the Marquis de Lantenac, after having the mother shot, had carried away the three childen. All his information ended here. What had become of these children? Were they even still living? He knew, for he had made inquiries, that there were two boys, and a little girl hardly weaned. Nothing more. He asked himself a multitude of questions about this unfortunate group, but he could answer none of them. The country people whom he questioned could do no more than shake their heads. Monsieur de Lantenac was a man whom they did not willingly talk about.

People did not like to speak of Lantenac and they did not like to speak to Tellmarch. Peasants have a kind of suspicion peculiar to themselves. They did not love Tellmarch. Tellmarch the Caimand was a disquieting man. Why was he always looking at the sky? What was he doing and what was he thinking about in his long hours of inertness? He was really a strange man. In this country full of war, full of conflagration, full of combustion; where all the men had but one business, devastation; and but one work, carnage; where whoever wished burned a house, cut the throats of a family, massacred a port, plundered a village; where people thought of nothing but laying ambushes for each other, drawing each other into snares, and killing one another; this solitary man, absorbed in nature, as it were, submerged in the vast peace of things, gathering herbs and plants, occupied solely with flowers, birds, and stars, was evidently dangerous. Plainly, he had lost his reason; he did not lie in ambush, he shot nobody. Hence there was a certain dread regarding him.

"This man is mad," said the peasants.

Tellmarch was more than an isolated man, he was a man who was avoided.

No one asked him questions, and no one gave him satisfactory answers. He had consequently not been able to get as much information as he would have wished. The war had spread beyond, they had gone to fight farther away, the Marquis de Lantenac had disappeared from sight, and in Tellmarch's state of mind, war had to put its foot on him before he would notice it.

After these words, "my children," Tellmarch no longer smiled, and the mother was lost in thought. "What was passing in her soul? It was like the depths of an abyss. Suddenly she looked up at Tellmarch and cried out again in almost an angry voice, —

"My childen!"

Tellmarch bowed his head as though he were guilty. He was thinking of the Marquis de Lantenac, who was certainly not thinking of him; and, who, probably, was no longer even aware of his existence. He was calling himself to account for it, saying to himself: "A seigneur, when he is in danger, recognizes you; when he is out of danger, he recognizes you no longer."

And he asked himself: "But, then, why did I save this seigneur?"

And he replied: "Because he is a man."

He thought it over for some time, and added to himself, —

"Am I sure of it?"

And he repeated his bitter remark: "If I had known!"

He was overwhelmed by this adventure, for what he had done puzzled him. It was painful for him to think of it. A good action may, then, be a bad action. He who saves the wolf kills the sheep. He who repairs the vulture's wing is responsible for his claw.

He really felt that he was guilty. This mother's unreasoning anger was justifiable.

However, having saved the mother consoled him for having saved this marquis.

But the children!

The mother was thinking about them, too. Their thoughts were in the same direction, and without speaking to each other, they may have met in the shadows of reverie.

However, her eyes, in whose depths was the darkness of night, fastened on Tellmarch again.

"But it cannot go on like this," she said.

"Hush!" said Tellmarch, putting his finger on his lips. She continued, —

"You did wrong to save me, and I am angry with you for it. I would rather be dead, because I am sure I should see them. I should know where they are. They would not see me, but I should be near them. One when dead may be able to protect."

He took her arm and felt her pulse.

"Calm yourself, you will bring on the fever again."

She asked him almost harshly, —

"When can I go away?"

"Go away?"

"Yes, walk,"

"Never, if you are not reasonable; to-morrow, if you are good."

"What do you call being good?"

"Having confidence in God."

"God! Where has he put my children?"

She was like one deranged. Her voice grew very gentle.

"You understand," she said to him, "I cannot stay like this. You have never had children, I have had them. That makes a difference. One cannot judge of a thing when he does not know what it is. You have never had any children, have you?"

"No," replied Tellmarch.

"As for me, I had nothing else. Without my children, what am I? I wish some one would tell me why I am without my children. I feel sure something has happened, but I do not understand. They have killed my husband, they shot me, but, all the same, I do not understand it."

"Come," said Tellmarch, "the fever is coming on again. Don't talk any more."

She looked at him and was silent.

After this day, she talked no more.

Tellmarch was obeyed more than he wished. She spent long hours crouching at the foot of the old tree, in a dull stupor. She pondered and was silent. Silence offers a strange protection to simple souls suddenly plunged into the gloomy depths of grief. She seemed to have given up understanding it. To a certain degree, despair is unintelligible to the despairing.

Tellmarch looked at her with emotion. In the presence of this suffering, this old man had a woman's thoughts. "Oh, yes," he said to himself, "her lips do not speak, but her eyes speak; I see what is the matter with her, one all-absorbing thought. To have been a mother and to be a mother no longer!

To have been a nurse, and to be so no more! She cannot be resigned to it. She thinks of the little one she nursed not long since. She thinks about it, and thinks about it, and thinks about it. It surely must be delightful to feel a little rosy mouth drawing your soul out of your body, and from your life making a life for itself!”

For his part he was silent too, feeling before such affliction, the powerlessness of words. The silence of an all-absorbing idea is terrible. And how to make this mother’s all-absorbing idea listen to reason? Maternity is illogical; one cannot reason with it. What makes a mother sublime is that she is a sort of animal. The maternal instinct is divinely animal. The mother is no longer a woman, she is a female.

Children are her young.

Hence, there is something in the mother inferior and superior to reason. A mother has a guiding scent. The vast mysterious will of creation is in her and guides her Blindness full of clear-sightedness.

Tellmarch now wanted to make this wretched woman talk; he did not succeed. Once, he said to her, —

“Unfortunately, I am old and unable to walk any longer. I come to the end of my strength before I come to the end of my journey. After a quarter of an hour, my legs refuse to go, and I am obliged to stop; otherwise, I should be able to accompany you. Perhaps in reality it is a good thing that I am not able. I should be more dangerous than useful to you; they tolerate me here; but I am suspected by the Blues as a peasant, and by the peasants as a sorcerer.”

He waited for her to reply. She did not even raise her eyes. An all-absorbing idea ends in madness or heroism. But of what heroism was a poor peasant woman capable? Of none. She could be a mother, and that was all. Each day she buried herself more deeply in her thoughts. Tellmarch watched her.

He tried to give her occupation; he brought her thread, needles, and a thimble; and she really began to sew, which pleased the poor caimand; she pondered, but she worked, a sign of health; strength was returning gradually; she mended her linen, her garments, her shoes; but her eye still looked glassy. While she sewed, she hummed unintelligible songs in a low voice. She murmured names, probably those of her children, but not distinctly enough for Tellmarch to understand. She stopped to listen to the birds, as if they had news to give her. She watched the signs of the weather.

Her lips moved. She talked to herself in a low voice. She made a bag and filled it with chestnuts. One morning, Tellmarch saw her starting away, looking at random into the depths of the forest.

“Where are you going?” he asked.

She replied, —

“I am going to look for them.”

He did not try to detain her.

CHAPTER VII.

THE TWO POLES OF TRUTH.

After a few weeks full of all the vicissitudes of civil war, there was nothing else talked of in the country of Fougères, except two men who were opposed to each other, and who, nevertheless, were doing the same work, that is to say, fighting side by side in the great Revolutionary struggle.

The savage Vendéan duel still continued, but la Vendée was losing ground. In l'Ille-et-Vilaine particularly, thanks to the young commandant who at Dol had so opportunely replied to the daring of six thousand Royalists with the daring of fifteen hundred patriots, the insurrection was, if not extinguished, at least, very much lessened and limited. Several more fortunate strokes had followed this, and, of multiplied successes, a new situation was born.

Things had changed in appearance, but a singular complication had unexpectedly arisen.

In all this part of la Vendée the Republic had the supremacy; this was beyond a doubt; but what Republic? In the triumph which was in prospect, two forms of the Republic were present, — the republic of terror, and the republic of mercy; one wishing to conquer by severity, and the other by gentleness. Which would prevail? These two forms, the conciliatory and the implacable, were represented by two men, each with his own influence and authority; one, a military commander, the other, a civil delegate; which of these two men would carry the day?

One of these two men, the delegate, had formidable support; he had come bringing the menacing watchword of the Commune of Paris to Santerre's battalions. "No mercy, no quarter!" To bring everything under his authority, he had the decree of the Convention carrying "pain of death to any one setting at liberty, or helping to escape a captive rebel chief;" he had full power emanating from the Committee of Public Welfare, and an injunction to obey him, as delegate, signed : Robespierre, Dantox, Marat. The other, the soldier, had in his behalf only this force, pity.

He had nothing to aid him but his arms, which conquered the enemy, and his heart, which gave them mercy. As a conqueror, he believed he had the right to spare the vanquished.

Hence, the latent but deep conflict between these two men. They were in different clouds, both fighting the rebellion, and each having his own thunderbolt, one, victory; the other, terror.

Throughout the Bocage, they talked of nothing but them; and what added to the anxiety of the attention everywhere fixed on them, was the fact that these two men, so absolutely opposed to each other, were, at the same time closely united. These two antagonists were two friends. Never were two hearts bound together by a deeper and more profound sympathy; the cruel one had saved the life of the merciful one, and his face bore a scar in consequence. These two were the incarnation, one of death, the other of life; one was the principle of terror; the other the principle of peace; and they loved each other. Strange problem Let one imagine Orestes compassionate, and Pylades merciless. Let one imagine Ahriman the brother of Ormuzd.

Let us add that the one called “cruel” was at the same time the most brotherly of men; he dressed the wounded, cared for the sick, spent his days and nights in the hospitals, was affected at the sight of barefooted children, had nothing of his own, gave all to the poor. When there was fighting, he was in the midst of it: he marched at the head of the columns, and in the thickest of the battle, armed, for he had a sabre and two pistols in his belt, and unarmed, for he had never been seen to draw his sabre or touch his pistols. He faced the shots, and gave none in return. They said he had been a priest.

One of these men was Gauvain, the other was Cimourdain.

There was friendship between these two men, but hatred between the two principles; it was like one soul cut in two, and divided; Gauvain really had received a half of Cimourdain’s soul, but the gentle half. It seemed as if Gauvain had received the white rays, and Cimourdain had kept for himself what might be called the black rays. This caused an intimate discord. It was impossible for this secret war not to burst forth. One morning the battle began.

Cimourdain said to Gauvain, —

“Where are we?”

Gauvain replied, —

“You know as well as I do. I have scattered Lantenac’s bands. He has only a few men with him. He is driven back into the forest of Fougères. In a week he will be surrounded.”

“And in two weeks?”

“He will be captured.”

“And then?”

“Have you seen my notice?”

“Yes. Well?”

“He will be shot.”

“Mercy again. He must be guillotined.

“For my part,” said Gauvain, “I am for military death.”

“And I,” replied Cimourdain, “am for revolutionary death.”

He looked Gauvain in the face, and said, —

“Why did you release those nuns of the convent of Saint-Marc-le-Blanc?”

“I am not making war on women,” replied Gauvain.

“These women hate the people. And for hatred a woman is equal to ten men. Why did you refuse to send all that flock of old fanatic priests taken at Louvigné, to the Revolutionary tribunal?”

“I am not making war on old men.”

“An old priest is worse than a young one. Rebellion is more dangerous when preached by white hairs. People have faith in wrinkles. No false pity, Gauvain. Regicides are liberators. Keep your eye on the tower of the temple.”

“The tower of the temple! I would release the dauphin. I am not making war on children.”

Cimourdain’s eye grew stern.

“Gauvain, know that it is necessary to make war on a woman when her name is Marie Antoinette, on an old man when his name is Pope Pius VI., and on a child, when his name is Louis Capet.”

“My master, I am not a politician.”

“Try not to be dangerous. Why, when the post of Cossé was attacked, and the rebel Jean Treton, driven back and lost, rushed alone, sword in hand, on the whole column, did you cry, ‘Open the ranks — let him pass?’”

“Because one does not set fifteen hundred men to kill a single man.”

“Why, at the Cailleterie d’Astillé, when you saw that your soldiers were going to kill the Vendéan, Joseph Bézier, who was wounded and dragging himself along, did you cry : ‘Forward, march! I will attend to him!’ and shoot your pistol into the air?”

“Because one does not shoot a man who is down.”

“And you did wrong. Both are to-day chiefs of bands; Joseph Bézier is Moustache, and Jean Treton is Jambe d’Argent. In saving these two men, you gave two enemies to the Republic.”

“Certainly, I should like to make friends for it and not give it enemies.”

“Why did you not have your three hundred peasant prisoners shot after the victory of Landéan?”

“Because as Bonchamp had pardoned the Republican prisoners, I wished to have it said that the Republic pardoned the Royalist prisoners.”

“But if you take Lantenac will you pardon him?”

“No.”

“Why not, since you pardoned three hundred prisoners?”

“The peasants are ignorant; Lantenac knows what he is doing.”

“But Lantenac is a relative of yours?”

“France is the great relative.”

“Lantenac is a foreigner. Lantenac has no age. Lantenac is summoning the English. Lantenac is invasion. Lantenac is the enemy of the country. The duel between him and me can only end in his death or mine.”

“Gauvain, remember your words.”

“My promise is given.”

There was a silence and both looked at each other.

Gauvain added, —

“This year of ‘93 in which we aie living will be a bloody date.”

“Take care!” exclaimed Cimourdain. “Terrible duties are before us. Accuse no one who is not at fault. How long has the malady been the fault of the physician? Yes, that which characterizes this tremendous year is that it is pitiless. Why? Because it is the great revolutionary year. This present year is the incarnation of the Revolution. The Revolution has an enemy, the Old World, and is pitiless to it, just as the surgeon has an enemy, gangrene, and is pitiless to it. The Revolution exterminates royalty in the king, aristocracy in the noble, despotism in the soldier, superstition in the priest, barbarity in the judge; in short, everything tyrannous in everything which tyrannies. The operation is frightful, but the Revolution works with a sure hand. As to the amount of sound flesh that it sacrifices, ask Bœrhave what he thinks about it. What tumor can be removed without involving a loss of blood? What fire can be extinguished without requiring a part of the fire? These terrible necessities are the very condition of success. A surgeon resembles a butcher; a healer may give the effect of an executioner. The Revolution devotes itself to its fatal work. It mutilates, but it saves. What! you ask mercy for the virus! you wish it to show clemency toward what is venomous! It does not listen. It holds what has passed, it will finish it. It makes a deep incision in civilization, out of which will emerge the health of the human race. You suffer? Without doubt. How long will it last? during the operation. Then you will live. The Revolution is amputating the world. Hence this hemorrhage, '93."

"The surgeon is calm," said Gauvain, "and the men I see are violent."

"The Revolution," replied Cimourdain, "needs ferocious workmen to assist it. It rejects every hand that trembles. It has faith only in the inexorable. Danton is terrible, Robespierre is inflexible, Saint-Just is immutable, Marat is implacable. Be on your guard, Gauvain. These names are necessary. They are worth whole armies to us. They will terrify Europe."

"And perhaps also the future," said Gauvain.

He stopped and then added, —

"Besides, my master, you make a mistake; I accuse nobody. In my opinion, the chief characteristic of the Revolution is its irresponsibility. No one is innocent, no one is guilty. Louis XVI. is a sheep thrown among lions; he wants to flee, he wants to escape; he tries to defend himself; he would bite if he could. But not every one can be a lion. This desire of his passes for a crime. This sheep, in anger, shows his teeth. 'The traitor!' say the lions, and they devour him. Having done this, they fight among themselves."

"The sheep is a beast."

"And the lions, what are they?"

This reply made Cimourdain thoughtful. He raised his head and said, —

"These lions are consciences, these lions are ideas, these lions are principles."

"They cause the terror."

"Some day the Revolution will be the justification of the terror."

"Fear lest the terror be the calumny of the Revolution."

And Gauvain added, —

"Liberty, Equality, Fraternity, these are dogmas of peace and harmony. Why make them appear frightful? What is it that we wish for? To subject the people to one common Republic. Well, let us not make them afraid.

What is the good of intimidation? People are no more attracted by scarecrows than birds are. It is not necessary to do evil in order to accomplish good. The throne is not overturned to leave the scaffold standing. Death to kings and life to nations! Let us knock off the crowns, let us spare the heads! The Revolution is concord and not fright. Gentle ideas are not subserved by pitiless men. Amnesty is in my opinion the most beautiful word in human speech. I will shed blood only while risking my own. Besides, I only know how to fight, and I am only a soldier. But if one cannot pardon, it is not worth while to conquer. During battle, let us be the enemies of our enemies, and after the victory, their brothers."

"Take care!" repeated Cimourdain, for the third time, "Gauvain, you are more to me than a son. Take care!"

And he added, thoughtfully, —

"In times like ours, pity may be one form of treason."

Hearing these two men talk was like hearing the conversation of the sword and the axe.

CHAPTER VIII.

DOLOROSA.

In the meantime, the mother was looking for her little ones.

She went straight ahead. How did she live? Impossible to tell. She herself did not know. She walked days and nights; she begged, she ate grass, she slept on the ground, she slept in the open air, in the thickets, under the stars, sometimes in the rain and the wind.

She roved from village to village, from farm to farm, asking for information. She stopped on the thresholds; her dress was in rags; sometimes she was welcomed, sometimes she was driven away. When she could not go into the houses, she went into the woods. She was not acquainted with the country. No region was familiar to her except Siscoignard and the parish of Azé. She had no definite route; she went back on her steps; started on a road that she had already been over; went on useless paths. Sometimes she followed the road, sometimes the tracks of a wagon, sometimes footpaths in the copses. In this life of chance, she had worn out her wretched clothing; she had walked first in shoes, then barefooted, then with bleeding feet.

She went into the midst of the war, in the midst of the firing, hearing nothing, seeing nothing, avoiding nothing, looking for her children. As everything was in revolt, there were no policemen, no mayors, no authorities. She had to do only with those whom she met. She spoke to them, she asked, —

“Have you seen three little children anywhere?”

The passers-by raised their heads.

“Two boys and a girl,” she said.

She continued, —

“René-Jean, Gros-Alain, Georgette? You have not seen them?”

She went on.

“The oldest four years and a half, the little one twenty months old.”

She added, —

“Do you know where they are? They have taken them away from me.”

The people looked at her, and that was all.

Seeing that they did not understand, she said, —

“They are mine, that is why.”

The people went on their way. Then she would stop and say no more, tearing her breast with her nails.

One day, however, a peasant listened to her. The good man began to ponder.

“Wait,” he said. “Three children?”

“Yes.”

“Two boys?”

“And a girl.”

Then he asked again, —

“Are you looking for them?”

“Yes.”

“I have heard tell of a seigneur, who took three little children, and had them with him.”

“Where is this man,” she cried. “Where are they?”

The peasant replied, —

“Go to la Tourgue.”

“Shall I find my children there?”

“Probably, you will.”

“You said?”

“La Tourgue?”

“What is la Tourgue?”

“It is a place.”

“Is it a village? a castle? a farm?”

“I have never been there.”

“Is it far?”

“It is not near.”

“In what direction?”

“In the direction of Fourgères.”

“How do you get there?”

“You are in Ventortes,” said the peasant, “you leave Ernée on the left and Coxelles on the right, you pass by Lorchamps and you cross the Leroux.”

And the peasant pointed toward the west.

“Right ahead of you all the way, in the direction of the sunset.”

Before the peasant had dropped his arm, she had started.

The peasant called out, —

“But, take care. They are fighting over there.”

She did not turn around to reply to him, but continued on her way.

CHAPTER IX.

A PROVINCIAL BASTILLE.

I. — La Tourgue.

The traveller of forty years ago, who entered the forest of Fougères from the side of Laignelet, and came out on the side of Parigné, was confronted with a forbidding object on the edge of these dark woods. As he emerged from the thicket, la Tourgue arose abruptly before him.

Not the living la Tourgue, but the dead la Tourgue. La Tourgue rent, ruined, scarred, dismantled. A ruin is to an edifice what a ghost is to a man.

There was no more gloomy sight than la Tourgue. Before one's eyes was a lofty round tower, standing alone in a corner of the wood, like a malefactor. This tower, rising from a perpendicular rock, was almost Roman in appearance, it was so regular and solid, and the idea of power was so mingled with the idea of ruin in this mighty mass. It was slightly Roman, for it was Romanesque; it was begun in the ninth century and finished in the twelfth, after the third Crusade. The impost mouldings of its archways told its age.

If the traveller approached it, climbed up the escarpment, noticed a breach, took his risk in entering, went inside, he found it empty. It was something like the inside of a stone trumpet placed upright on the ground. From top to bottom there were no partitions; there was no roof, no ceiling, no floor; there were arch stones and chimney-pieces, and embrasures for ancient cannon; at different heights, bands of granite corbels, and some cross-beams, marking the stories; the beams were covered with the lime of night birds; the colossal wall was fifteen feet thick at the base, and twelve at the summit; here and there were crevices and holes which had been doorways, through which could be seen dark staircases inside the wall. The passer-by who came in here in the evening would have heard the cries of the brown owl, herons, goat-suckers, and other birds; and would have seen under his feet brambles, stones, and reptiles; and above his head, through a black circle, which was the top of the tower and seemed like the mouth of an enormous well, the stars.

There was a tradition in the country that in the upper stories of this tower there were secret doors, like the doors in the tombs of the kings of Judah, made of a single stone turning on a pivot, opening, then closing and losing itself in the wall; a style of architecture brought back from the Crusades with the pointed arch. When these doors were closed it was impossible to find them, they were so well blended with the other stones in the wall. Such doors may be seen at the present time in the mysterious cities of Anti-Lebanon, escaped from the twelve towns which were buried by the earthquakes in the time of Tiberius.

II. — The Breach.

The breach which formed the entrance to the ruin was the opening to a mine. For a connoisseur familiar with Errard, Sardi and Pagan, this mine had been coustructed according to rule. The fire chamber, shaped like a mitre, was proportioned to the power of the keep it had to rip open. It must have held at least two hundredweight of powder. It was reached by a winding passage, which is more advantageous than a straight one; the caving in caused by the mine laid bare, where the stones were torn away, the saucission having the diameter of a hen’s egg. The explosion had made a deep hole in the wall, through which the besiegers must have been able to enter. This tower had evidently sustained regular sieges at different times; it was riddled with grapeshot; and the grapeshot did not all belong to the same period; each projectile has its own way of marking a rampart; and all had left their scar on this keep, from the stone cannon balls of the fourteenth century to the iron cannon balls of the eighteenth.

The breach opened into what must have been the ground floor. Opposite the breach in the wall of the tower, opened the door to a crypt cut out in the rock, and extending in the foundations of the tower under the entire hall of the ground floor.

This crypt, three quarters filled up, was cleared out in 1835, under the direction of Monsieur Auguste le Prévost, the Antiquary of Bernay.

III. — The Dungeon.

This crypt was the oubliette.

Every keep has its dungeon. This keep, like many torture chambers of the same period, had two stories. The first story which was reached by the door, was a large arched room on a level with the hall of the ground floor. On the wall of this room were seen two parallel, vertical grooves, extending from one side to the other across the arched ceiling, where they made a deep indentation, giving the impression of two wheel tracks. They were two wheel tracks in reality. These two grooves had been hollowed out by two wheels. Formerly, in feudal times, victims had been quartered in this room, by a less noisy process than with the four horses. They had two wheels there, so strong and so large that they touched the walls and the arched ceiling; an arm and a leg of the prisoner were fastened to each of the wheels, then the wheels were revolved in opposite directions, which tore the man asunder. It required force, and this caused the grooves hollowed out in the stone ground by the wheels. At the present time, a room of this kind may still be seen at Vianden.

Under this room there was another. This was the real dungeon. It was not entered by a door, it was penetrated through a hole; the victim, naked, was let down by a rope under the armpits, into the lower chamber, through a hole in the centre of the pavement of the room above. If he persisted in living, food was thrown to him through this hole. A hole of this kind may still be seen at Bouillon.

Air came through this hole. The lower room, dug out under the hall of the ground floor, was rather a well than a room. There was water at the bottom, and it was filled with an icy draught. This draught, which was death to the prisoner below, kept the prisoner above alive; it made it possible to breathe in the prison. The prisoner above, groping about under his arched ceiling, received no air except through this hole. Moreover, whoever went down there, or fell down there never came out again. The prisoner had to keep away from it in the darkness. One false step might make the prisoner of the upper chamber a prisoner of the lower. This was ever before him. If he clung to life this hole was his danger; if he was weary of it, this hole was his resource. The upper story was the dungeon; the lower story, the tomb. A superposition resembling the society of that time.

This was what our ancestors called a “cul-de-basse-fosse.” As such a thing has gone out of existence, the name has no meaning for us. Thanks to the Revolution, we can utter these words with indifference.

Outside the tower, above the breach which forty years ago was the only entrance, was an opening larger than the other loopholes, from which hung an iron grating, broken and loose.

IV. — The Little Castle on the Bridge.

On the opposite side of the breach, a bridge of stone with three arches very little injured, was joined to this tower. The bridge had supported a building, some fragments of which were still remaining. There was nothing left of this building, which showed evidence of a conflagration, but charred timbers, a sort of framework through which the daylight penetrated, and which rose near the tower, like a skeleton beside a ghost.

This ruin is now entirely demolished, and not a trace of it is left. One day and one peasant were enough to undo the work of many centuries and many kings.

La Tourgue is a peasant abbreviation for la Tour-Gauvain, just as la Jupelle is an abbreviation of la Jupellière, and as the name of that humpbacked chief, Pinson-le-Tort, means Pinson-le-Tortu.

La Tourgue, which was in ruins forty years ago, and to-day is only a name, in 1793 was a fortress. It was the old bastille of the Gauvain family, guarding the western entrance to the forest of Fougeres, a forest which is hardly a grove now.

This citadel was built on one of those great blocks of schist which abound between Mayenne and Dinan, and are scattered everywhere through the thickets and moors, as though the giants had been throwing stones at each other’s heads.

The tower comprised the whole fortress; under the tower was the rock, at the foot of the rock one of those streams of water which the month of January changes to a torrent, and the month of June dries up entirely.

Simplified to this extent, the fortress in the middie ages was almost impregnable. The bridge weakened it. The Gothic Gauvains had built it without a bridge. It was reached by one of those movable foot bridges, which could be destroyed by a single axe blow. While the Gauvains were viscounts, it pleased them thus, and they were satisfied with it; but when they became marquises, and when they left the cave for the court, they threw three arches across the torrent, and made themselves accessible from the plain, just as they had made themselves accessible to the king. The marquises of the seventeenth century and the marchionesses of the eighteenth, did not care to be impregnable. Imitating Versailles took the place of keeping up the ancestral traditions.

In front of the tower on the western side was a very high table-land, extending to the plains; this table-land almost touched the tower, and was only separated from it by a very deep ravine, through which flowed the watercourse which is a tributary of the Couesnon. The bridge connecting the fortress and the table-land was built high on piers; and on these piers was constructed a building like that at Chenonceaux in the Mansard style, and more habitable than the tower. But manners were still very rude; the seigneurs held to the custom of living in the rooms of the keep, which were like dungeons. As for the building on the bridge, which was a sort of chatelet, it contained a long corridor which served as an entrance and was called the guard hall; above this guard hall, which was a sort of entresol, was the library, above the library, a granary. Long windows with little panes of Bohemian glass, pilasters between the windows, medallions carved in the wall; three stories: on the lower floor were the halberds and muskets; on the next, the books; on the next, bags of oats; all this was rather savage and very princely.

The tower beside it was fierce.

It rose above this coquettish building in all its gloomy haughtiness. From the platform, the bridge could be destroyed.

The two edifices, one rude, the other elegant, clashed rather than complimented each other. The two styles were not harmonious; although it seems as if two semicircles ought to be similar, nothing resembles a Roman semicircle less than a classic archivault. This tower, suited to the forest, was a strange neighbor to this bridge worthy of Versailles. Imagine Alain Barbe-Torte giving his arm to Louis XIV. The combination was terrible. A strange ferocity resulted from the union of these two majesties.

From a military point of view, the bridge, we must insist, almost betrayed the tower. It adorned it and disarmed it; in gaining ornamentation it had lost strength. The bridge placed it on a footing with the table-land. Although still impregnable on the side of the forest, it was now vulnerable on the side of the plain. Once it commanded the table-land, now it was commanded by the table-land. An enemy established there, would quickly become master of the bridge. The library and the granary were to the advantage of the besieger, and against the fortress. A library and a granary are alike in this respect, that books and straw are both combustible. It is all the same to a besieger, making use of fire, whether he burns Homer or a bundle of hay, provided it burns. The French proved this to the Germans when they burned the library at Heidelberg, and the Germans proved it to the French when they burned the library at Strasburg. Adding this bridge to la Tourgue was strategically a mistake; but in the seventeenth century, under Colbert and Louvois, the Gauvain princes, as well as the princes of Rohan and the princes of la Trémoille, believed that they would never be besieged again.

However, the builders of the bridge had taken some precautions. First, they had taken the possibility of fire into account; under the three windows on the side next the water they had hung crosswise, to hooks which could still be seen a half century ago, a strong ladder for escape, as long as the height of the first two stories of the bridge, a height greater than three ordinary stories. Second, they had taken the possibility of assault into account; they had isolated the bridge from the tower by means of a low, heavy iron door; this door was arched; it was locked with a large key, kept in a hiding-place known to the keeper alone, and once closed, this door could defy the battering-ram, and almost withstand cannon balls.

It was necessary to pass through the bridge to reach this door, and to pass through this door to enter the tower. There was no other entrance.

V. — The Iron Door.

The second story of the chatelet on the bridge, raised on the piers, corresponded to the second story of the tower; the iron door had been placed at this height to make it more secure.

The iron door opened from the side of the bridge into the library, and from the side of the tower into a great arched hall with a pillar in the centre. This hall, as has already been said, was in the second story of the keep. It was round, like the tower; long loopholes, looking out on the plains, lighted it. The wall was quite rough and bare, and nothing concealed the stones, which were very symmetrically laid. This hall was reached by a winding staircase made inside the wall, a thing easily done when the walls are fifteen feet thick. In the Middle Ages, a town was taken street by street; a street, house by house; a house, room by room. They besieged a fortress, story by story.

La Tourgue was in this respect very ingeniously arranged, very churlish, and very unapproachable. A spiral staircase, extremely steep and inaccessible, led from one story to another; the doors were slanting and not so high as a man, and it was necessary to bow one’s head in order to pass through; but a bowed head meant a head knocked off, and at each door the besieged awaited the besiegers.

Below the round hall with the column were two similar rooms, which formed the first story and the ground floor, and above there were three; above these six rooms placed one upon another, the tower was closed over with a roof of stone, which was the platform, and reached by a narrow watch-tower.

The fifteen feet, the thickness of the wall, which they must have had to cut through in order to place the iron door in the middle, imbedded it in a long coving, so that when the door closed, it was as much on the side of the tower as on the side of the bridge, under a porch six or seven feet deep; when it was open the two porches formed one and made the entrance arch.

Under the porch on the side of the bridge, inside the wall, was a low gate with a St. Gilles's staircase, leading to the corridor on the first floor, under the library; this was still another difficulty for the besieger. The chatelet on the bridge presented nothing but a perpendicular wall on the side next the table-land, and the bridge ended there. A draw-bridge, applied to a low door, put it in communication with the table-land, and this draw-bridge, never lowered except on an inclined plane, on account of the height, gave entrance to the long corridor, called the hall of the guards. Once master of this corridor, the besieger, in order to reach the iron door, was obliged to tear away the St. Giles's staircase leading to the second story.

VI. — The Library.

The library was an oblong hall of the same width and length as the bridge, and having a single door, the iron door. A false swinging door, padded with green cloth, and opening with a push, screened the arched entrance to the tower on the inside. The wall of the library from top to bottom, and from floor to ceiling was covered with cabinets having glass doors, in the beautiful style of carpentry of the seventeenth century.

Six large windows, three on each side, one above each arch, lighted this library. From the top of the plateau outside, one could look through these windows and see the inside. Between the windows, on carved oak terminals, stood six marble busts: Hermolaüs, of Byzantium; Athenæus, the grammarian of Naukratos; Suidas; Casaubon; Clovis, king of France; and his chancellor Anachalus, who, by the way, was no more a chancellor than Clovis was a king.

There were books of every kind in this library. One has become famous. It was an old quarto with prints, bearing the title, “Saint Bartholomew,” in large letters; and the sub-title, “Gospel according to Saint Bartholomew, preceded by a dissertation by Pantœnus, a Christian philosopher, on the question whether this gospel should be considered apocryphal, and whether Saint Bartholomew be the same as Nathaniel.”

This book, thought to be the only copy, rested on a desk in the centre of the library. In the last century, people went to see it out of curiosity.

VII. — The Granary.

The granary which, like the library, had the oblong form of the bridge, was merely the space under the timber-work of the roof. It made a large hall and was filled with straw and hay, and lighted by six garret windows. It’s only adornment was a figure of Saint Barnabas, carved on the door, with this verse beneath it, —

Barnabus sanctus falcem jubet ire per herbam.

A wide, lofty tower, with six stories, penetrated by an occasional loophole, having for its only means of entrance and exit an iron door opening on a castle bridge, closed by a drawbridge; behind the tower, the forest; in front of the tower, a plateau covered with heath: under the bridge, between the tower and the plateau, a deep ravine, narrow and full of brambles; a torrent in winter, a brook in spring, a stony ditch in summer; such was the Tour-Gauvain, called la Tourgue.

CHAPTER X.

THE HOSTAGES.

July passed, August came, a blast of heroism and cruelty blew over France; two spectres had just crossed the horizon, Marat with a dagger in his side, Charlotte Corday headless; everything was becoming terrible.

As for la Vendée, beaten in great strategic measures, she took refuge in small ones, more frightful, as we have already said; this war was now an immense skirmish in the woods.

The disasters to the great army called Catholic and Royal were beginning; a decree sent the army of Mayence to la Vendée; eight thousand Vendéans were killed at Ancenis; the Vendéans were repulsed at Nates, driven out of Montaigu, expelled from Thouars, driven from Noirmoutier, thrown headlong from Cholet, Mortagne, and Saumur; they evacuated Parthenay; they abandoned Clisson; they lost ground at Châtillon; they lost a flag at Saint-Hilaire; they were defeated at Pornic, at the Sables, at Fontenay, Doué, the Château d'Eau, the Ponts-de-Cé; they were held in check at Luçon; retreated from Châtaigneraye; were routed at Roche-sur-Yon: but, on the one hand, they were threatening la Rochelle, and, on the other, in the Guernsey waters, an English fleet, commanded by General Craig, carrying several English regiments together with the best officers of the French marine, was only waiting for a signal from the Marquis de Lantenac, to disembark.

This disembarkation might give back victory to the royalist insurrection. But Pitt was a State malefactor; treason is to statesmanship what the dagger is to the panoply; Pitt stabbed our country and betrayed his own; betraying his country was dishonoring it; England under him, and through him, waged a Punic war. She spied, cheated, lied. A poacher and a forger, no means were scorned by her; she even descended to the minutiæ of hatred. She caused a monopoly of tallow, which cost five francs a pound; a letter from Prizant, Pitt's agent in Vendée, was taken from an Englishman at Lille, containing these lines, —

"I beg you not to be sparing of money. We hope that the assassinations will be done with prudence; disguised priests and women are the suitable persons for this undertaking. Send sixty thousand livres to Rouen, and fifty thousand livres to Caen.”

This letter was read by Barér to the Convention the first of August. This treachery was answered by Parrein’s cruelties, and later on by Carrier’s atrocities. The Republicans of Metz and the Republicans of the South asked permission to march against the rebels. A decree ordered the forming of twenty-four companies of pioneers to burn the hedges and fences of the Bocage. An unprecedented crisis. The war only ceased in one direction to begin again in another. “No mercy! no prisoners!” was the cry of both parties. History was full of a terrible darkness.

In this month of August, la Tourgue was besieged.

One evening, as the stars were beginning to shine, in the quiet of a dog-day twilight, when not a leaf trembled in the forest, not a blade of grass stirred on the moor, through the silence of the approaching darkness, the sound of a horn was heard. The sound of this horn came from the top of the tower.

This horn was answered by a trumpet, which sounded from below.

At the top of the tower there was an armed man; below, in the darkness, there was a camp.

A swarm of black figures could be made out in the dim light around the Tour-Gauvain. This swarm was a bivouac. Fires were beginning to be lighted under the trees in the forest and in the heather on the plateau, piercing the darkness here and there with bright points of light, as if the earth wished to shine with stars as well as the sky, Gloomy stars, — those of war! The bivouac, in the direction of the plateau, reached as far as the plains, and in the direction of the forest, it extended into the thicket. La Tourgue was blockaded.

The extent of the besieger’s bivouac indicated a numerous force.

The camp was situated close to the fortress, and on the side of the tower, reached to the rock, and on the side of the bridge, to the edge of the ravine.

There was a second blast from the horn, followed by a second blowing of the trumpet.

This horn questioned, and the trumpet gave answer.

The horn was the tower asking the camp, “Can we speak to you?” And the trumpet replied, “Yes.”

At this period, as the Vendéans were not considered warriors by the Convention, and as a decree had forbidden the exchange of flags of truce with “these brigands,” they supplied, as best they could, the means of communication which the right of nations authorizes in ordinary warfare, and forbids in civil warfare. So on occasion, there was a certain understanding arranged between the peasant’s horn and the soldier’s trumpet. The first call was only to attract attention, the second call put the question, “Will you listen?” If after this second call the trumpet was silent, it meant refusal; if the trumpet answered, it meant consent. This signified a few moments’ truce.

The trumpet having replied to the second call, the man on the top of the tower spoke, and these were his words, —

“Ye men who hear me, I am Gouge-le-Bruant, called Brisebleu, because I have put an end to so many of your men; and called also l’Imânus, because I shall kill still more than I have killed; I had my finger cut off by a sabre stroke on the barrel of my gun, during the attack at Granville, and you had my father and mother, and my sister Jacqueline eighteen years old, guillotined at Laval; — this is who I am.

“I speak to you in the name of Monseigneur the Marquis Gauvain de Lantenac, Viscount de Fontenay, Prince of Brittany, seigneur of the seven forests, my master.

“Know first, that before Monseigneur le Marquis shut himself up in this tower where you have blockaded him, he distributed the war among six chiefs, his lieutenants; he gave to Delière the country between the road to Brest and the road to Ernée; to Treton, the country between la Roë and Laval; to Jacquet, called Taillefer, the boundary of the Upper Maine; to Gaulier, called Great Peter, Château-Gontier; to Leconte, Craon; Fougères to Monsieur Dubois-Guy; and all la Mayenne to Monsieur de Rochambeau; in order that you might accomplish nothing by taking this fortress, and that even if Monseigneur le Marquis should die, la Vendée of God and the king should not die.

“Know this, that what I tell you is to warn you.

“Monseigneur is here by my side. I am the mouth through which his words pass. Ye men, who besiege us, keep silence.

“This is what it is important for you to hear, —

“Do not forget that the war that you are waging against us is unjust. We are people living in our own country, and we are fighting honestly, and we are simple and pure beneath the will of God, as the grass beneath the dew. The Republic has attacked us; it came to disturb us in our fields, it has burned our houses and our crops, and cannonaded our farms, and our women and children have been obliged to flee barefooted into the woods while the winter birds were still singing.

“You, who are present and hear what I say, have driven us into the forest, and you are surrounding us in this tower; you have killed or scattered those who were united to us; you have cannon; you have joined to your column, the garrisons and posts of Mortain, Barenton, Teilleul, Landivy, d’Evran, Tinteniac and Vitré, and the result is that you are attacking us with four thousand five hundred soldiers, and we have but nineteen men for our defence.

“We have provisions and ammunition.

“You have succeeded in contriving a mine and in blowing up a piece of our rock and a piece of our wall.

“That made a hole at the foot of the tower, and this hole is a breach, through which you can enter, although it is not open to the sky, and the tower, still strong and firm, forms an arch above it.

“Now you are preparing to attack us.

“And we, first, monseigneur le marquis, who is Prince of Brittany and secular Prior of the abbey of Saint-Marie de Lantenac, where daily mass was established by Queen Jeanne; and next, the other defenders of the tower, among whom are Monsieur l’Abbé Turmeau, in war, Grand-Francœur; my comrade Guinoiseau, captain of Camp-Vert; my comrade, Chante-en-Hiver, captain of the camp of l’Avoine; my comrade, la Musette, captain of the camp of the Fourmis; and myself, a peasant, who was born in the market-town of Daon, through which the brook Moriandre flows, — we all of us have one thing to say to you.

“We have in our hands three prisoners, three children. These children were adopted by one of your battahons, and they are yours. We offer to give up these three children to you.

“On one condition.

“That is that you will let us go free.

“If you refuse, listen attentively. You can attack us in only two ways; by means of the breach, from the side of the forest; or by means of the bridge, from the side of the plateau. The building on the bridge is three stories high; in the lower story, I, l’Imânus, I who speak to you, have had six tons of tar and one hundred fagots of dried heath placed there; in the upper story, there is straw; the middle story is full of books and papers; the iron door leading from the bridge to the tower is closed, and monseigneur has the key; and I have made an opening under the door, and through this opening passes a sulphur slow-match, one end of which is in the hogsheads of tar, and the other within my reach, inside the tower; I shall set fire to it whenever it seems good to me. If you refuse to let us out, the three children will be placed in the second story of the bridge, between the story where the sulphur match ends and where the tar is, and the story filled with straw, and the iron door will be fastened on them. If you attack by the bridge you will be the ones to set fire to the building; if you attack by the breach, we shall be the ones; if you attack by the breach and the bridge at the same time, the fire will be set by you and by us; and in any case the children will perish.

“Now, accept or refuse.

“If you accept, we leave.

“If you refuse, the children die.

“I have said my say.”

The man who spoke from the top of the tower was silent.

A voice from below cried out, —

“We refuse.”

This voice was short and stern. Another voice, less harsh, but firm, added, —

“We give you twenty-four hours to surrender at discretion.”

Silence ensued, and the same voice continued, —

“To-morrow at this hour, if you do not surrender, we shall begin the attack.”

And the first voice added, —

“And then, no quarter.”

To this savage voice, another replied from the top of the tower. Between two battlements a tall shadow bent forward, in which, by the light of the stars, could be made out the formidable face of the Marquis de Lantenac, and this face which looked into the darkness as if trying to find some one, cried, —

“Hold, it is you, priest!”

“Yes, it is I, traitor!” replied the harsh voice from below.

CHAPTER XI.

TERRIBLE AS IN ANCIENT DAYS.

The relentless voice really was Cimourdain’s; the younger and less imperious voice was Gauvain’s.

The Marquis de Lantenac had not been mistaken in recognizing the Abbé Cimourdain.

In a few weeks, Cimourdain, as we know, had become famous in this country made bloody by civil war; there was no more ominous notoriety than his; people said: “Marat, in Paris; Châlier, in Lyons; Cimourdain, in Vendée. They cursed the Abbé Cimourdain in proportion as they had once revered him; such is the effect of a priest renouncing his robes. Cimourdain was a cause of horror. The stern are unfortunate; whoever sees their deeds condemns them, but if their consciences could be seen they would, perhaps, be forgiven. A Lycurgus, who is not explained seems a Tiberius. The two men, the Marquis de Lantenac and the Abbé Cimourdain were equal in the balance of hatred; the malediction of the Royalists against Cimourdain was counterbalanced by the execration of the Republicans against Lantenac. Each of these two men was a monster in the eyes of the opposite party; to such an extent that it produced this singular fact, that while Prieur de la Marne, at Granville, was putting a price on Lantenac’s head, Charette, at Noirmoutier was setting a price on the head of Cimourdain.

We may say that these two men, the marquis and the priest, were to a certain extent the same man. The bronze mask of civil war has two profiles; one turned toward the past, the other turned toward the future; both equally tragic. Lantenac was the first of these profiles, Cimourdain was the second; only Lantenac’s bitter sneer was full of darkness and night, while Cimourdain’s fatal brow glowed with the light of morning.

In the meantime, the siege of la Tourgue had a respite.

Thanks to the intervention of Gauvain, as we have just seen, a sort of twenty-four hours’ truce had been agreed upon.

L’Imânus had indeed been well posted, and in consequence of Cimourdain’s requisition Gauvain now had under his command four thousand five hundred men, as many National Guards as troops of the line, and with these he was surrounding Lantenac in la Tourgue; and he had been able to point twelve pieces of cannon at the fortress, a masked battery of six pieces on the edge of the forest toward the tower, and an open battery of six pieces on the plateau toward the bridge. He had been able to spring the mine and make a breach at the foot of the tower.

So, at the expiration of the twenty-four hours' truce, the struggle was going to begin under the following conditions, —

There were four thousand five hundred men on the plateau and in the forest.

In the tower, nineteen.

The names of these nineteen besieged men may be found by history among the lists of outlaws. Possibly, we shall come across them.

Cimourdain would have liked to have Gauvain made adjutant-general to command these four thousand five hundred men, who made almost an army. But Gauvain had refused, saying, "When Lantenac has been taken we will see. I have not yet done anything to deserve it."

Great commands with humble rank were, moreover, customary among the Republicans. Later on, Bonaparte was both colonel of artillery and general-in-chief of the army of Italy.

The Tour-Gauvain had a strange fate; it was attacked by a Gauvain, and it was a Gauvain who defended it. This caused some restraint in the attack, but not in the defence, for Monsieur de Lantenac was one of those men who have no regard for anything, and besides he had lived chiefly at Versailles, and had no superstitious feeling for la Tourgue, which he was hardly acquainted with. He had taken refuge because it was the only place, and that was all; but he had no scruple about destroying it. Gauvain was more respectful.

The weak point of the fortress was the bridge; but the library on the bridge contained the family archives; if the attack were made there, the burning of the bridge was inevitable; it seemed to Gauvain that burning the archives was attacking his ancestors. La Tourgue was the family mansion of the Gauvains; all their fiefs of Brittany centred about this tower, just as all the fiefs of France centred about the tower of the Louvre; the family relics of the Gauvains were there; he himself had been born there; the tortuous fatalities of life had brought him as a man to attack these walls which had protected him as a child. Should he be so irreverent toward this dwelling as to reduce it to ashes? Perhaps Gauvain's own cradle was in some corner of the granary over the library. Some reflections become emotions. Gauvain felt moved before the ancient family mansion. That is why he spared the bridge. He had limited himself to rendering all egress and escape impossible by this way, and out of respect guarded the bridge with a battery, and had chosen the opposite side for attack. Hence the mine and the sap at the foot of the tower.

Cimourdain had allowed him to do this; he reproached himself for it, because his severity frowned on all this Gothic rubbish, and he did not wish to be any more indulgent toward buildings than toward men. To care for a castle was a beginning of clemency. Now, clemency was Gauvain's weak side. Cimourdain, we know, watched him with his gloomy eyes and arrested this inclination. However, he himself, and he admitted it with anger, did not look on la Tourgue again without a secret thrill; he felt moved by that studious hall where the first books were which he had taught Gauvain to read; he had been priest of the neighboring village, Parigné; he, Cimourdain, had lived in the top of the castle on the bridge; in the library was where he used to hold the little Gauvain on his knees while he learned the alphabet; between these four old walls he had seen his dearly beloved pupil, the son of his soul, grow as a man and increase as a mind. This library, this castle, these walls, full of his blessings on the child, should he overthrow them and burn them? He pitied them. Not without remorse.

He had let Gauvain begin the siege on the opposite side. La Tourgue had its savage side, the tower, and its civilized side, the library. Cimourdain had allowed Gauvain to make a breach only on the savage side.

Moreover, this old dwelling, attacked by a Gauvain, defended by a Gauvain, was returning, in the midst of the French Revolution, to its feudal customs. Wars between relatives make up the entire history of the Middle Ages; the Eteocles and Polynices are Gothic as well as Greek, and Hamlet does at Elsinore what Orestes did in Argos.

CHAPTER XII.

A SCHEME FOR ESCAPE.

The whole night was spent on both sides in making preparations.

As soon as the ominous conference just heard, was ended, Gauvain’s first care was to call his lieutenant.

Guéchamp, whom it is necessary to know somewhat, was a man of secondary abilities, honest, fearless, ordinary, a better soldier than leader, strictly intelligent to the point where it was his duty to understand no further, never compassionate, inaccessible to corruption of any sort, to venality which corrupts conscience, as well as to pity which corrupts justice. Over his soul and his heart he had these two shades, discipline and order, as a horse has blinders over his two eyes, and he walked straight before him in the space which they left free to him. His gait was unswerving, but his path was narrow.

Moreover, he was a man to be depended upon; stern in command, unflinching in obedience.

Gauvain immediately addressed Guéchamp, —

“Guéchamp, a ladder.”

“Commandant, we have none.”

“We must have one.”

“For climbing?”

“No, for rescue.”

Guéchamp reflected and replied, —

“I understand. But for what you want, it must be very high.”

“At least three stories.”

“Yes, commander, that is very nearly the height.”

“And it must exceed this to be sure of success.”

“Certainly.”

“How does it happen that you are without a ladder?”

“Commander, you did not consider the matter of besieging la Tourge from the plateau; you were satisfied to blockade it from this side; you wanted to attack it, not by the bridge, but by the tower. We have paid no attention to anything but the mine and gave up the escalade. That is why we have no ladders.”

"Have one made immediately."

"A ladder three stories high cannot be improvised."

"Fasten together several short ladders."

"It is necessary to have short ones."

"Find them."

"They are not to be found. The peasants destroy the ladders everywhere, just as they break up the wagons and cut away the bridges."

"It is true; they want to paralyze the Republic."

"They want to make it impossible for us either to transport baggage, pass a river, or scale a wall."

"I must have a ladder, nevertheless."

"Now I think about it, commander, there is a large carpenter's shop at Javené, near Fougères. They may have one there."

"There is not a moment to lose."

"When do you wish to have the ladder?"

"To-morrow at this time at the very latest."

"I will send an express to Javené post haste. He will carry the order of requisition. There is cavalry stationed at Javené, which will furnish the escort. The ladder could be here to-morrow, before sunset."

"That is good, that will do," said Gauvain. "Be quick about it. Go."

Ten minutes later, Guéchamp returned and said to Gauvain, —

"Commander, the express has left for Javené."

Gauvain went up on the plateau, and remained a long time looking steadily at the bridge castle, which was just across the ravine. The gable of the châtelet, with no opening except the low entrance closed by raising the drawbridge, faced the escarpment of the ravine. To reach the foot of the piers of the bridge from the plateau, it was necessary to descend along this steep cliff, which was not impossible through the underbrush. But, once in the ditch, the assailants would be exposed to all the projectiles that could be rained down from the three stories. Gauvain came to the conclusion that, in view of the present state of the siege, the real assault must be by the breach in the tower.

He took every precaution to prevent the possibility of escape; he completed the close investment of la Tourgue; he drew the ranks of his battalions close together in such a way that nothing could pass through them. Gauvain and Cimourdain divided the investment of the fortress; Gauvain kept the side toward the forest, and gave the side next the plateau to Cimourdain. It was agreed that while Gauvain, aided by Guéchamp, was carrying on the assault by sapping, Cimourdain, with all the linstocks of the battery ready for use, should guard the bridge and the ravine.

CHAPTER XIII.

WHAT THE MARQUIS DOES.

While everything without was making ready for the attack, everything within was making ready for resistance.

There is a real analogy in calling a tower a “douve” and a tower is sometimes pierced by a mine as a cask is by an auger. A bunghole, as it were, is bored through the wall. This is what happened at la Tourgue.

The powerful blast made by two or three hundredweight of powder had made a breach right through the enormous wall. This breach started at the foot of the tower, went through the thickest part of the wall, and ended in a rude arch in the ground floor of the fortress. In order to make this breach practicable for the assault, the besiegers had enlarged it outside and shaped it with cannon shots.

The ground floor into which this breach opened was a large round hall, quite bare, with a central column holding up the keystone of the arch. This hall, the largest in the keep, was no less than forty feet in diameter. Each story in the tower formed a similar room, but smaller, with little cells in the embrasures of tbe loopholes. The hall on the ground floor had no loopholes, no air holes, no windows; about as much daylight and fresh air as a tomb.

The door to the oubliettes, made of iron rather than wood, was in the hall of the ground floor. Another door in this hall opened on a staircase leading to the upper rooms. All the staircases were built in the thickness of the wall.

The besiegers had an opportunity to reach this low hall through the breach which they had made. This hall taken, it remained for them to take the tower.

No one had ever been able to breathe in this low hall. No one had ever spent twenty-four hours there without being asphyxiated. Now, owing to the breach, it was possible to live there.

This is why the beleaguered did not close the breach.

Moreover, what would be the advantage? The cannon would open it again.

They fixed an iron cresset into the wall, placed a torch in it, and this lighted the ground floor.

Now, how could they defend themselves there?

To wall up the breach was easy, but of no use. A retirade would be more desirable. A retirade is an intrenchment at right angles, a sort of chevronned barricade, which admits of converging the musketry on the assailants, and, while leaving the breach open outside, obstructs it on the inside. The materials were not lacking; they constructed a retirade, with embrasures through which to pass the barrels of the guns. The angle of the retirade rested on the central column; the two sides touched the wall. Having got this ready, they put fougades in suitable places.

The marquis directed everything. Inspirer, disposer, guide, and master, — appalling soul.

Lantenac belonged to that race of warriors of the eighteenth century who, when eighty years old, saved cities. He resembled the Count d'Alberg who, when he was nearly a centenarian, drove the King of Poland from Riga.

"Courage, friends!" said the marquis; "in the beginning of this century, in 1713, at Bender, Charles XII., shut up in a house, with three hundred Swedes, resisted twenty thousand Turks."

They barricaded the two lower stories, they fortified the rooms, they embattled the alcoves, they strengthened the doors with joists driven down with mallets, forming a sort of flying buttresses; but the spiral staircase which communicated with each story they had to leave open, as it was necessary to have free passage through it; to cut this off from the besieger was to cut it off from the besieged. The defence of strongholds always has some such weak side.

The marquis, indefatigable, as robust as a young man, lifted beams, carried stones, set an example, worked, commanded, helped, fraternized, laughed with this savage clan, but still he was always the seigneur, haughty, easy, elegant, cruel.

He allowed no one to reply to him.

He said: "If one half of you were to revolt, I would have that half shot by the other, and I would defend the place with the rest." Such things make a chief adored.

CHAPTER XIV.

WHAT L’IMANUS DOES.

While the marquis was engaged with the breach and the tower, l’Imânus was engaged with the bridge. At the beginning of the siege, the ladder of escape, which hung horizontally outside and underneath the windows of the second story, had been taken away by order of the marquis, and put by l’Imânus in the hall of the library. Perhaps it was this ladder which Gauvain wished to replace. The windows of the entresol of the first story, called “hall of the guards,” were protected by a triple row of iron bars fastened in the stonework, and it was impossible to get in or out through them.

There were no bars at the library windows, but they were very high.

L’Imânus had three men, who, like himself, were full of resolution, and capable of anything. These men were Iloisnard, called Branche-d’Or, and the two brothers Pique-en-Bois. L’Imânus took a dark lantern, opened tho iron door, and carefully inspected the three stories of the bridge châtelet. Hoisnard Branche-d’Or was as implacable as I’lmanus, having had a brother killed by the Republicans.

L’Imanus examined the upper story, overflowing with hay and straw, and the lower story mto which he had brought some firepots in addition to the hogsheads of tar; he had the pile of heather fagots placed close to the hogsheads of tar, and he made sure that the sulphur match, one end of which was in the bridge and the other in the tower, was in a good condition. He poured out on the floor under the hogsheads and over the fagots a pool of tar, in which he placed the end of the sulphur slowmatch; then in the hall of the library, between the ground floor where the tar was and the granary where the straw was, he had placed the three cribs in which were René-Jean, Gros-Alain, and Georgette, sound asleep. They carried the cribs very gently, in order not to waken the little ones.

They were very simple little country cribs, a sort of very low osier baskets, that stand on the floor, allowing the child to get out alone and without assistance. Near each crib, l’Imânus had placed a porringer of soup with a wooden spoon. The ladder for escape, unfastened from its hooks, had been laid on the floor against the wall; l’Irimânus had the three cribs arranged, end to end, along the other wall, opposite the ladder. Then, thinking that a draught of air might be useful, he opened wide all six of the library windows. It was a summer night, hot and sultry.

He sent the brothers Pique-en-Bois to open the windows in the upper and lower stories; he noticed on the eastern façade of the building, a large, old, dried-up ivy, the color of tinder, covering one entire side of the bridge from top to bottom, and framing the windows of the three stories. He thought that this ivy would do no harm. L'Imânus took a last look around; after this the four men went out of the châtelet and went back to the keep. L'Imânus fastened the heavy iron door with a double lock, carefully examined the enormous, formidable fastening, and, with a nod of satisfaction, looked at the sulphur slow-match, which passed through the hole he had made, and was henceforth the only communication between the tower and the bridge.

This match started from the round room, passed under the iron door, entered under the coving, went down the staircase leading to the ground floor of the bridge, meandered over the winding stairs, crept along the floor of the corridor in the entresol, and ended in the pool of tar over the pile of dry fagots, L'Imânus calculated that it would take about a quarter of an hour for this match to set fire to the pool of tar in the library, after it had been lighted in the interior of the tower. Having made all these arrangements, and finished all this inspection, he carried the key of the iron door back to the Marquis de Lantenac, who put it in his pocket.

It was important to watch all the besieger's movements. L'Imânus, with his herdsman's horn in his belt, stationed himself like a vidette in the watch tower of the platform, on the top of the tower. While watching with an eye on the forest, and an eye on the plateau, he had beside him in the embrasure of the watch-tower window, a powder flask, a linen bag filled with musket-balls, and some old newspapers, which he tore up to make into cartridges.

When the sun appeared, its rays illumined, in the forest, eight battalions, their swords by their sides, cartridge boxes on their backs, bayonets in their guns, ready for the assault; on the plateau a battery of cannons, with ammunition wagons, cartridges and boxes of grapeshot; in the fortress, nineteen men loading blunderbusses, muskets, and pistols, and in the three cribs, three sleeping children.

BOOK THIRD. — THE MASSACRE OF SAINT BARTHOLOMEW.

CHAPTER I.

THE MASSACRE OF SAINT BARTHOLOMEW (I).

The children awoke.

The little girl first.

The wakening of children is like the opening of flowers; it seems as if a perfume came from their fresh souls.

Georgette, the one twenty months old, the youngest of the three, who was still nursing in May, raised her little head, sat up, looked at her feet, and began to prattle.

A ray of morning light fell on her crib; it would have been hard to tell which was the rosier, Georgette's foot or the dawn.

The other two were still asleep; men are more dull; Georgette, happy and serene, went on prattling.

Rene-Jean was dark, Gros-Alain was sandy, Georgette was fair. These shades of hair, in harmony with the age during childhood, may change later on. René-Jean looked like a little Hercules; he was sleeping en his stomach, with his two fists doubled up over his eyes. Both of Gros-Alain's legs were hanging out of his little bed.

All three were in rags; the clothes that the battalion of Bonnet-Rouge had given them were in tatters; they hadn't even a shirt on them; the two boys were almost naked. Georgette was dressed in a rag which had once been a skirt and was now nothing but a bodice. Who took care of these children? It was impossible to tell. No mother. These savage peasants, fighting, and dragging them along with them from forest to forest, gave them their share of soup. That was all. The little ones got on as they could. They had everybody for master, and no one for a father. But children's tatters are full of light. They were charming.

Georgette went on prattling.

What a bird sings, a child prattles. It is the same hymn. An indistinct hymn, lisped, profound. The child, more than the bird, has the mysterious destiny of man before it. Hence, the melancholy feeling of those who listen, mingled with the joy of the little one who sings. The sublimest song to be heard on the earth is the lisping of the human soul on the lips of children. This confused whispering of a thought, which is as yet only an instinct, contains a strange, unconscious appeal to eternal justice; perhaps it is a protestation on the threshold, before entering; a humble but poignant protestation; this ignorance smiling at the Infinite compromises all creation in the fate which is to be given to the feeble, helpless being. Misfortune, if it comes, will be an abuse of confidence.

The murmur of a child is more and less than speech; there are no notes, and yet it is a song; there are no syllables, and yet it is a language; this murmur had its beginning in heaven, and will not have its end on earth; it is before birth, and it will continue hereafter. This babbling is composed of what the child said when he was an angel, and of what he will say when he becomes a man; the cradle has a Yesterday, as much as the tomb has a Tomorrow; this to-morrow and this yesterday blend their double mystery in this unintelligible warbling; and nothing proves God, eternity, the responsibility, the duality of fate, like this awe-inspiring shadow on these rosy souls.

What Georgette was prattling about did not make her sad, for her whole lovely face beamed with a smile. Her mouth smiled, her eyes smiled, the dimples in her cheeks smiled. This smile revealed a mysterious acceptation of the morning. The soul has faith in light. The sky was blue, the weather was warm, it was beautiful. The frail creature, without knowing anything, without understanding anything, softly bathed in reverie where no thought is, felt secure in this nature, in these honest trees, in this sincere verdure, in this pure, peaceful country, in these sounds from nests, from brooks, flies, leaves, above which the vast innocence of the sun shone resplendent.

After Georgette, René-Jean, the oldest, the largest, the one who was four years old, awoke. He rose to his feet, gave a manly jump over the side of his basket, looked at his porringer, thought it quite natural, sat down on the floor and began to eat his soup.

Georgette’s prattling had not waken Gros-Alain, but at the sound of the spoon in the porringer, he turned over with a start, and opened his eyes. Gros-Alain was the one three years old. He saw his porringer, it was within reach, he took it and without getting out of bed placed the porringer on his knees, took the spoon in his hand, and like René-Jean began to eat.

Georgette did not hear them, and the undulations of her voice seemed to modulate the rocking of a dream. Her large open eyes were looking up and were divine; whether the ceiling or the heavens be above a child’s head, it is always the sky which is reflected in its eyes.

When René-Jean had finished, he scraped the bottom of the porringer with his spoon, sighed, and said with dignity, —

“I have eaten my soup.”

This woke Georgette from her reverie.

“Poupoupe,” said she.

And seeing that René-Jean had eaten his, and that Gros-Alain was eating, she took the porringer of soup beside her, and began also to eat, carrying her spoon much oftener to her ear than to her mouth.

From time to time, she renounced civilization and ate with her fingers.

Gros-Alain after having scraped the bottom of the porringer as his brother had done, went to join him and ran behind him.

CHAPTER II.

THE MASSACRE OF SAINT BARTHOLOMEW (II).

Suddenly, there was heard from without and below, on the side of the forest, the blast of a trumpet, a sort of flourish, haughty and stern. To this trumpet blast, the sound of a horn replied from the top of the tower.

This time it was the trumpet which called, and the horn which gave answer.

There was a second trumpet call, followed by a second sounding of the horn.

Then from the edge of the forest rose a distant but clear voice, which cried distinctly these words, —

“Brigands! a summons! If at sunset, you have not surrendered at discretion, we attack you.”

A voice roared out in reply from the platform of the tower, —

“Attack us, then.”

The voice below added, —

“A cannon will be fired, as a last warning, half an hour before the assault.”

And the voice from above repeated, —

“Attack us.”

These voices did not reach the children’s ears, but the trumpet and the horn sounded higher and farther, and Georgette at the first blast of the trumpet raised her head and stopped eating; at the sound of the horn, she put her spoon in her porringer; at the second trumpet blast, she lifted the little forefinger of her right hand, and letting it fall and raising it again alternately, marked the cadences of the flourish which prolonged the second blowing of the horn; when the horn and the trumpet were silent, she remained thoughtful, her finger in the air, and murmured half aloud, “Misic.”

We think that she meant “music.”

The two oldest, René-Jean and Gros-Alain, had paid no attention to the horn and the trumpet; they were absorbed by something else; a woodlouse was crossing the library.

Gros-Alain noticed it and exclaimed, —

René-Jean ran to look at it.

Gros-Alain added, —

“It stings.”

“Don’t hurt it,” said René-Jean.

And both began to watch it moving along.

In the meantime, Georgette finished her soup; she looked at her brothers. René-Jean and Gros-Alain were in the embrasure of a window, bending intently over the woodlouse; their foreheads touched, and their hair mingled; they were holding their breath in wonder, and examining the insect which had stopped and did not move, little pleased with so much admiration.

Georgette, seeing that her brothers were looking at something, wanted to know what it was. It was not an easy matter for her to reach them, but she undertook it; the journey bristled with difficulties; there were things on the floor; overthrown stools, piles of old papers, packing cases, unnailed and empty, chests, heaps of all sorts of things, around which she had to make her way, a perfect archipelago of reefs; Georgette ventured.

She began by getting out of her basket, the first difficulty; then she penetrated the reefs, meandered through the straits, pushed aside a stool, crawled between two trunks, went over a heap of papers, climbing up one side, rolling down the other, sweetly exposing her poor little bare body, and thus reached what a sailor would call the open sea, that is to say quite a wide space of unobstructed floor, where there were no more dangers; then she started forward, crossed this space, which was the whole width of the hall, on all fours, with the agility of a cat, and reached the window; here there was a formidable obstacle; the great ladder lying against the wall just reached to this window, and the end of it passed a little beyond the embrasure; this made a sort of cape to double between Georgette and her brothers; she stopped to meditate; having finished her interior monologue, she made up her mind; she resolutely grasped with her rosy fingers one of the rounds, which were vertical and not horizontal, as the ladder lay on one side; she tried to raise herself on her feet and fell back; she tried again twice, and failed; the third time she succeeded; then standing up straight, supporting herself with the rungs one after another, she began to walk along the ladder; when she reached the end, her support failed; she tumbled over, but seizing in her little hands the end of one of the side pieces, which was enormous, she pulled herself up again, rounded the promontory, looked at René-Jean and Gros-Alain and laughed.

CHAPTER III.

THE MASSACRE OF SAINT BARTHOLOMEW (III).

At this moment, René-Jean, satisfied with his observations concerning the woodlouse, raised his head and said, —

“It is a female.”

Georgette’s laugh made René-Jean laugh, and René-Jean’s laugh made Gros-Alain laugh.

Georgette sat down beside her brothers, and they formed a sort of little club together on the floor.

But the woodlouse had disappeared.

Georgette’s laugh had given him a chance to crawl into a hole in the floor.

Other events followed that of the woodlouse.

First some swallows flew by.

Their nests were probably under the edge of the roof. Somewhat disturbed by the children they flew close to the window, describing wide circles in the air, and uttering their gentle springtime call. This made the three children raise their eyes, and the woodlouse was forgotten.

Georgette pointed her finger towards the swallows, and exclaimed, —

“Chickies!”

René-Jean reprimanded her, —

“They are not chickens, they are birds.”

“Boords,” said Georgette.

And all three looked at the swallows.

Then a bee flew in.

Nothing is so like a soul as a bee. It goes from flower to flower as a soul from star to star, and it gathers honey as a soul gathers light.

This one made a great noise as he came in buzzing at the top of his voice, and he seemed to say: “I have just seen the roses, and now I come to see the children. What is going on here?”

A bee is a housewife, and it scolds while it sings.

As long as the bee remained, the children never took their eyes from it.

The bee explored the whole library, searched the corners, darted about as though it were at home in it’s hive, and making music on the wing, roved from bookcase to bookcase, looking at the titles of the books through the glass-windows, as though it were a mind.

His visit over, he went out.

“He has gone home,” said René-Jean.

“It is a monster,” said Gros-Alain.

“No,” replied René-Jean, “It is a fly.”

“Fly,” said Georgette.

Thereupon, Gros-Alain, who had just found on the floor a string with a knot in one end of it, took the other end of it between his thumb and forefinger, made a sort of little mill with the cord, and watched it turn with deep interest.

As for Georgette, having gotten down on all fours again, and taken up her capricious roving, she had discovered a venerable arm-chair covered with moth-eaten tapestry, from which the hair was escaping through numerous holes. She stopped by this chair. She made the holes larger and pulled out the hair as if her life depended upon it.

Suddenly she raised her finger, which meant: “Listsn!”

The two brothers turned their heads.

An indistinct, distant noise was heard from without; it was probably the attacking camp executing some strategic movement in the forest; horses neighed, drums beat, caissons rolled along, chains clanked, military signals called to each other and gave answer, confusion of savage sounds which as they mingled grew into a sort of harmony; the children listened, delighted.

“The good God is doing that.” aaid René-Jean.

CHAPTER IV.

THE MASSACRE OF SAINT BARTHOLOMEW (IV).

The noise ceased.

René-Jean remained thoughtful.

How are ideas lormed and scattered in these little brains? What is the mysterious commotion in their memories so dim and as yet so short? In this sweet, pensive mind arose a mixture of the good God, prayer, folded hands, a strange tender smile that used to rest on them, and that they had no longer, and René-Jean murmured, half aloud: “Mamma.”

“Mamma,” said Gros-Alain.

“M’ma,” said Georgette,

And then René-Jean began to jump.

Seeing him jump, Gross-Alain jumped too.

Gros-Alain followed René-Jean’s example in all his movements and gestures; Georgette not so much. Three years copies four years; but twenty months keeps its independence.

Georgette remained seated, saying a word now and then. Georgette did not put words together.

She was a thinker; she spoke in apothegms. She was monosyllabic.

Nevertheless, after a time, their example affected her, and she finally tried to do as her brothers were doing, and these three little pairs of bare feet began to dance, to run and totter in the dust on the old, polished oak floor, under the serious eyes of the marble busts, toward which Georgette occasionally cast an anxious glance, murmuring, —

“The mummums!”

In Georgette’s language a mummum was anything which looked like a man without really being one. Beings seem like phantoms to young children.

Georgette, swaying rather than walking, followed her brothers, but generally she preferred to go on all fours.

Suddenly, René-Jean, as he was approaching a window, raised his head, then dropped it and ran to hide in the corner of the wall made by the window embrasure.

He had just seen some one looking at him. It was a soldier of the Blues from the encampment on the plateau who, taking advantage of the truce and perhaps infringing on it a little, had ventured to the edge of the ravine where he could look into the library. Seeing René-Jean hide, Gros-Alain ran to hide; he took refuge beside René-Jean, and Georgette hid behind them. They stayed there in silence, perfectly still, and Georgette put her finger on her lips. After a few moments René-Jean ventured to put out his head; the soldier was still there. René-Jean drew his head back quickly; and the three little ones did not dare to breathe. This lasted for some time. At last Georgette grew tired of being afraid, and was bold enough to look out. The soldier had gone. They began to run and play again.

Gros-Alain, besides imitating and admiring René-Jean, had a specialty, — that of making discoveries. His brother and sister saw him suddenly whirl wildly around, dragging after him a little wagon with four wheels, which he had brought to light from some corner.

This doll’s carriage had been in the dust for years, forgotten, — a good neighbor to the books of geniuses and the busts of wise men. It was perhaps one of the toys which Gauvain had played with when he was a child.

Gros-Alain had made a whip with the string, and was snapping it; it was very fine. Such are discoverers. When they do not discover America, they discover little carts. It is always thus.

But it must be shared. René-Jean wanted to draw the wagon, and Georgette wanted to get into it.

She tried to sit down in it. René-Jean was the horse. Gros-Alain was the driver.

But the driver did not understand his business, the horse had to teach him.

René-Jean cried to Gros-Alain, —

“Say, ‘Go along.’”

“Go ‘long!” repeated Gros-Alain.

The wagon upset. Georgette tumbled out. Angels can scream. Georgette screamed.

Then she felt half inclined to cry.

“Young lady,” said René-Jean, “you are too big.”

“I big,” said Georgette.

And her size consoled her for her fall.

The cornice of entablature under the windows was very wide, the dust of the fields blown from the heather on the plateau had collected in heaps there; the rains had made earth of this dust; the wind had brought seeds to it, so that a briar had taken advantage of this bit of earth to take root there. This briar was the perennial variety called fox mulberry. It was August, the mulberry bush was covered with berries, and a branch of the briar came in through the window. This branch hung down almost to the floor.

Gros-Alain, after discovering the string, and discovering the wagon was the one to discover this briar. He went toward it.

He picked a berry and ate it.

“I’m hungry,” said René-Jean.

And Georgette, galloping along on her knees and hands, came following after.

The three plundered the branch and ate all the berries. They were daubed and stained, and all red with the crimson juice of the berries; the three little seraphs were changed to three little fauns, which would have shocked Dante and charmed Virgil. They laughed aloud.

Occasionally, the briar pricked their fingers. No pleasure without pain.

Georgette held out her finger, from which oozed a little drop of blood, to René-Jean and said pointing to the briar, “Pricks.”

Gros-Alain, who had been scratched too, looked scornfully at the briar and said, —

“It is a beast.”

“No,” replied René-Jean, “it is a stick.”

“A naughty stick,” added Gros-Alain.

Georgette, again felt like crying, but she began to laugh.

CHAPTER V.

THE MASSACRE OF SAINT BARTHOLOMEW (V).

In the meantime, René-Jean, possibly jealous of his younger brother, Gros-Alain's discoveries, had conceived a great plan. For some time, while he was picking the berries and pricking his fingers, his eyes had been frequently turning toward the reading-desk mounted on a pivot and standing by itself like a monument in the middle of the library. On this desk was displayed the famous volume of "Saint Bartholomew."

It was really a magnificent and notable folio. This "Saint Bartholomew" had been published in Cologne by the famous publisher of the Bible in 1682, Blœuw, in Latin, Cœsius. It had been printed on movable wooden types, held in position with a band made of ox-sinew.

It was printed, not on Holland paper, but on that beautiful Arabian paper so much admired by Edrisi, made of silk and cotton, and always retaining its whiteness.

The binding was of gilded leather, and the clasps of silver; the fly leaves were of that parchment which the parchment-makers of Paris swore they would buy in the Halle Saint Mathurin and "nowhere else."

This volume was full of woodcuts and copper engravings, and geographical maps of many countries; it was prefaced with a protestation of printers, paper-makers and booksellers against the edict of 1635, placing a tax on "leather, beer, cloven-footed animals, sea-fish, and paper," and on the reverse page of the frontispiece, there was a dedication addressed to the Gryphes, who are to Lyons what the Elzévirs are to Amsterdam.

All this resulted in a famous volume, almost as rare as the Apostol at Moscow.

It was a beautiful book; that was why René-Jean looked at it; perhaps too intently. The volume was open just where there was a large engraving representing Saint Bartholomew carrying his skin over his arm. This engraving could be seen from below. When all the berries had been eaten, René-Jean looked at it with a terrible longing, and Georgette, whose eyes followed her brother's, noticed the engraving and said, "Pickshur."

This word seemed to determine René-Jean. Then, to the great amazement of Gros-Alain, he did an extraordinary thing.

A great oak chair stood in a corner of the library; René-Jean walked to this chair, seized it and dragged it all by himself to the desk. Then when the chair touched the desk, he got up on it and placed his two hands on the book.

Having reached this height, he felt that it was necessary to be, generous; he took the “pickshur” by the upper corner and carefully tore it out; Saint Bartholomew’s picture tore crosswise, but that was not René-Jean’s fault; he left all the left side, with one eye and a little of the old apocryphal evangelist’s halo, in the book, and offered the other half of the saint, and all his skin, to Georgette. Georgette took the saint and said, —

“Mummum.”

“Give me one!” cried Gros-Alain.

The first torn page is like the first drop of blood shed. It decides slaughter.

René-Jean turned the leaf; after the saint came the commentator Pantœnus; René-Jean bestowed Pantœnus on Gros-Alain.

In the meantime, Georgette tore her large piece into two small ones, then the two small ones into four; so that history might say, that after having been flayed in Armenia, Saint-Bartholomew was quartered in Brittany.

CHAPTER VI.

THE MASSACRE OF SAINT BARTHOLOMEW (VI).

Having finished the quartering, Georgette held out her hand to René-Jean, saying, “More!”

After the saint and the commentator came stern portraits of the glossarists. The earliest was Gavantus; René-Jean tore Gavantus out and placed him in Georgette’s hand.

All Saint Bartholomew’s glossarists followed. Giving is a privilege. René-Jean kept nothing for himself. Gros-Alain and Georgette were gazing at him; this was enough; he was satisfied with the admiration of his public.

René-Jean, inexhaustible and magnanimous, offered Fabricio Pignatelli to Gros-Alain, and Father Stilting to Georgette; he offered Alphonse Tostat to Gros-Alain, and Cornelius a Lapide to Georgette; Gros-Alain had Henry Hammond, and Georgette had Roberti, besides a view of the town of Douai, where he was born in 1619. Gros-Alain received the protestation of the paper-makers, and Georgette had the dedication to the Gryphes bestowed upon her. Then there were the maps. René-Jean distributed these. He gave Ethiopia to Gros-Alain, and Lycaonia to Georgette. When this was done, he threw the book on the floor.

It was a terrible moment. Gros-Alain and Georgette, with an ecstasy of delight mingled with fear, saw René-Jean frown, brace his legs, contract his hands, and push the massive folio volume off the desk. A majestic old book losing countenance is a tragic sight. The heavy volume, displaced, hung for a moment from the desk, hesitated, balanced itself, then fell down; and, torn, rumpled, lacerated, out of its binding, its clasps broken, flattened itself out lamentably on the floor. Fortunately, it did not fall on the children.

They were bewildered, not crushed. The adventures of conquerors do not always end as well. Like all glorious deeds, it made a great noise and a cloud of dust.

Having thrown down the book, René-Jean dismounted from the chair.

There was a moment of silence and awe; victory has its terrors. The children took hold of each other’s hands, and drew away, to contemplate the great dilapidated volume.

But after some consideration, Gros-Alain started towards the book with determination and gave it a kick.

This was enough. There is such a thing as an appetite for destruction. René-Jean gave it a kick, Georgette gave it a kick, which made her tumble down, but in a sitting posture; she took advantage of this to throw herself on Saint Bartholomew; the spell was broken; René-Jean rushed on it, Gros-Alain made a dash for it; joyous, wild, triumphant, pitiless, tearing the engravings, slashing the leaves, pulling out the bookmarks, scratching the binding, ripping off the gilt leather, pulling out the nails, from the silver corners, breaking the parchment, marring the noble text, working with feet, hands, nails, and teeth, rosy, laughing, cruel, these three angels of destruction swooped down on the defenceless evangelist.

They annihilated Armenia, Judea, Benevento, where there are relics of the saint; Nathaniel, who is possibly the same as Bartholomew; Pope Gelasius, who declared the Bartholomew-Nathaniel gospel to be apocryphal, all the heads, all the maps, and the inexorable destruction of the old book absorbed them to such a degree that a mouse passed by without their noticing it.

It was an extermination.

To pull to pieces history, legend, science, miracles, true or false, church Latin, superstitions, fanaticisms, mysteries, to tear up a whole religion from top to bottom, is a work for three giants, as well as three children; the hours passed quickly over this labor, but they came to an end; nothing was left of Saint Bartholomew.

When this was at an end, when the last page was torn out, when the last engraving was destroyed, when nothing was left of the book but fragments of the text and pictures, in a skeleton of a binding, René-Jean jumped to his feet, looked at the floor strewn with all these scattered leaves, and clapped his hands.

Gros-Alain clapped his hands.

Georgette took one of the leaves from the floor, got up, leaned against the window, which came just to her chin, and began to tear the large page into little pieces, and threw them out.

Seeing this, René-Jean and Gros-Alain began to do the same. They picked up the leaves and tore them in pieces, picked up and tore them again and again, throwing the pieces out of the window as Georgette had done; and page by page, reduced to scraps by these destructive little fingers, almost the entire ancient book blew away in the wind. Georgette looked thoughtfully after these swarms of bits of white paper, scattered by all the breezes of the air and said, —

“Butterflies.”

And the massacre ended with a vanishing into thin air.

CHAPTER VII.

THE MASSACRE OF SAINT BARTHOLOMEW (VII).

Such was the second putting to death of Saint Bartholomew, who had already been martyred in the year 49 of our Lord Jesus Christ.

Meanwhile, evening was approaching, the heat was increasing, the air was full of drowsiness, Georgette's eyes grew heavy, René-Jean went to his crib, drew out the bag of straw which took the place of a mattress, dragged it to the window, stretched himself out on it, and said: "Let us go to bed."

Gros-Alain put his head on René-Jean, Georgette put her head on Gros-Alain, and the three malefactors went to sleep.

Hot breezes came in through the open windows; the perfume of wild flowers, blown from the ravines and hills, floated in, mingled with the evening zephyrs; space was calm and merciful; everything beamed, everything was at peace, everything loved everything else; the sun caressed creation with light; everywhere was felt that harmony which arises from the colossal sweetness of things; there was something of maternity in the Infinite; creation is a miracle in full bloom, its immensity is perfected by its goodness; it seemed as if some invisible power could be felt taking those mysterious precautions which, in the terrible conflict of life, protect the weak against the strong; at the same time it was beautiful, the splendor breathed forth mansuetude.

The landscape, full of an ineffable drowsiness, had that magnificent wavy appearance which the alternations of light and shade give to prairies and rivers; the smoke rose toward the clouds, as a dream toward a vision; flocks of birds whirled above la Tourgue; swallows looked in at the windows, and seemed to have come to see if the children were sleeping well.

They were gracefully grouped, one on the other, still, half-naked, in loving attitudes; they were adorable and pure, all three together were not nine years old, they had dreams of Paradise, which were reflected on their mouths in vague smiles; God, perhaps, was speaking in their ears; they were those whom every human tongue calls weak and blessed, they were innocents worthy of reverence; everything kept silence, as though the breath from their sweet breasts was of consequence to the universe, and was listened to by all creation; the leaves did not rustle, the grass did not quiver. It seemed as if the wide starry world held its breath, that it might not disturb these three humble, angelic sleepers, and nothing was so sublime as the immense respect of nature toward these little creatures.

The sun was going down, and almost touched the horizon. Suddenly, in the midst of this profound peace, there shot forth a bright light, coming from the forest, then a furious noise. A cannon had just been fired. The echoes seized this noise and turned it into an uproarious din. The rumbling, prolonged from hill to hill, was monstrous. It awoke Georgette.

She raised her head a little, lifted her little finger, listened, and said, —

“Boom!”

The sound died away, and silence returned. Georgette laid her head down on Gros-Alain, and went to sleep again.

BOOK FOURTH. — THE MOTHER.

CHAPTER I.

DEATH PASSES BY.

This same evening, the mother, whom we have seen making her way almost by chance, had been walking all day long. Moreover, it was the story of all her days, to go straight on and never stop. For her sleep of exhaustion in the first corner that she came to was no more rest than what she ate here and there, as birds go picking about, wag food. She ate and slept just enough to keep her from falling down dead.

She had spent the night before in a deserted house; civil war causes such ruins. She had found, in a neglected field, four walls, an open door, a little straw under a portion of the roof, and she slept on this straw and under this roof, feeling the rats run over the straw, and seeing the stars shine through the roof. She had slept some hours, then she awoke in the middle of the night and started on her journey again, in order to travel as far as possible before the full heat of the day. For those travelling on foot in summer, midnight is more agreeable than midday.

She followed to the best of her ability the general route indicated to her by the peasant at Vautortes; she went as nearly as possible toward the west. Any one near her would have heard her say repeatedly, in a low voice, “La Tourgue.” Besides the names of her three children, she knew nothing but this word.

As she walked along, she was deep in meditation. She thought of all the adventures which she had been through; she thought of all she had suffered, of all she had received; of the encounters, the indignities, the conditions made, the bargains proposed and undergone, sometimes for a shelter, sometimes for a piece of bread, sometimes merely to get some one to show her the way. A wretched woman is more unfortunate than a wretched man, because she is an instrument of pleasure. Frightful wandering on foot. But nothing made any difference to her so long as she found her children.

Her first encounter to-day had been a village on the way; it was scarcely daybreak, everything was still bathed in the gloom of night, still some doors were already ajar in the principal street of the village, and some curious heads were looking out of the windows. The inhabitants seemed as agitated as a hive which has been disturbed. This was on account of a sound of wheels and chains which had been heard.

In the square in front of the church, an astounded group, with upturned faces, was looking at something coming down the road toward the village from the top of a hill.

It was a wagon with four wheels, drawn by five horses harnessed with chains. On the wagon could be made out a heap which looked like a pile of long joists, in the middle of which was something strange and shapeless; it was covered over with an awning, which had the appearance of a shroud.

Ten men on horseback rode in front of the wagon, and ten others, behind. These men wore three-cornered hats, and rising above their shoulders could be seen points, which were apparently bare swords. All this procession, advancing slowly, stood out in clearly defined black against the horizon. The wagon looked black, the horses looked black, the cavaliers looked black. The pale morning light gleamed behind them.

It entered the village and went towards the square. It began to grow light as the wagon came down the hill, and the procession could be seen distinctly; it seemed like a march of ghosts, for not a word escaped the men.

The riders were military men. They had, indeed, drawn swords. The awning was black.

The wretched, wandering mother entered the village and drew near the gathering of peasants just as the team and the mounted men were coming into the square. In the group of spectators, voices whispered questions and answers, —

“What is that?”

“It is the guillotine passing by.”

“Where does it come from?”

“From Fougères.”

“Where is it going?”

“I do not know. They say that it is going to a castle toward Parigné.”

“Parigné!”

“Let it go wherever it will, provided it doesn’t stop here.”

This great wagon, with its burden covered with a sort of shroud; these horses; these military men; the noise of these chains; the silence of these riders; the dim light, — all this was ghastly.

The procession crossed the square and left the village; the village was in a hollow between two hills. After a quarter of an hour, the peasants, who had remained as though petrified, saw the gloomy procession come into sight again on the top of the hill toward the west. The large wheels jolted over the road, the horses' chains clanked in the morning wind, the sabres glistened; the sun was rising, there was a turn in the road, they all disappeared.

This was at just the moment when Georgette, in the ball of the library, awoke beside her brothers, who were still asleep, and said good morning to her rosy feet.

CHAPTER II.

DEATH SPEAKS.

The mother watched this dark object pass by, but had not understood it, nor tried to understand, for she had another vision before her eyes, — her children lost in the darkness.

She also went out of the village, a little after the procession which had just filed past, and followed the same road, at some distance behind the second squad of policemen. Suddenly, the word “guillotine “ came into her mind.

“Guillotine!” she said to herself; this peasant woman Michelle Fléchard, did not know what it was, but her instinct warned her against it; she shuddered without being able to tell why; it seemed horrible to her to walk behind it, and she turned to the left, went out of the road and entered some woods, which were the forest of Fougères.

After roaming for some time, she noticed a church tower and some roofs; it was one of the villages on the borders of the wood; she entered it. She was hungry.

This village was one of those where the Republicans had established military posts.

She went as far as the square where the town hall was.

In this village, too, there was agitation and anxiety. A crowd was gathered in front of a flight of steps which were the entrance to the town hall. On these steps were seen a man escorted by soldiers, holding in his hand a large, unrolled placard. On this man’s right stood a drummer, and on his left, a bill-poster carrying a pot of paste and a brush.

On the balcony above the door stood the mayor, wearing a tricolored scarf with his peasant’s dress.

The man with the placard was a public crier.

He had on a shoulder belt from which hung a little bag, which indicated that he went from village to village, and that he had something to cry throughout the country.

He had just unrolled the placard, as Michelle Fléchard drew near, and he began to read it. He said in a loud voice, —

“The French Republic. One and indivisible.”

The drum rolled. There was a sort of undulation in the crowd. Some took off their caps; others pulled their hats down over their eyes. At this time, and in this country, a person's opinion could almost be told by the headgear; hats were Royalist, caps were Republican.

The murmur of confused voices ceased, the people listened, the crier read, —

"In virtue of the orders to us given, and the power to us delegated, by the Committee of Public Welfare — —"

There was a second rolling of the drum. The crier continued, —

"And in execution of the decree of the National Convention, which outlaws rebels taken armed, and which orders capital punishment to whoever gives them shelter or helps them to escape."

One peasant asked his neighbor in a low voice, —

"What is capital punishment?"

The neighbor replied, "I don't know."

The crier waved the placard, —

"In accordance with Article 17 of the law of the thirtieth of April, giving full power to delegates and sub-delegates against the rebels, are outlawed —"

He paused and added, —

"The individuals designated by the name and surnames which follow—"

The crowd was all attention.

The voice of the crier thundered, —

"Lantenac, brigand."

" That is monseigneur," murmured a peasant.

And this was whispered through the crowd, "That is monseigneur."

The crier added, —

"Lantenac, ci-devant marquis, brigand."

"L'Imânus, brigand."

Two peasants looked at each other askance.

"That is Gouge-le-Bruant."

"Yes, it is Brise-Bleu." The crier went on reading the list, —

"Grand-Francœur, brigand."

The crowd murmured, —

"He is a priest."

"Yes, monsieur the Abbé Turmeau."

"Yes, he is a cure somewhere near the wood of la Chapelle."

“And a brigand,” said a man in a cap.

The crier read, —

“Boisnouveau, brigand. The two brothers Pique-en-Bois, brigands. Houzard, brigand — —”

“That is Monsieur de Quelen,” said a peasant.

“Panier, brigand — —”

“That is Monsieur Sepher.”

“Place-Nette, brigand — —”

“That is Monsieur Jamois.”

The crier continued his reading without paying attention to these comments.

“Guinoiseau, brigand. Chatenay, called Robi, brigand — —”

A peasant whispered: “Guinoiseau is the same as le Blond, Chatenay is Saint-Ouen.”

“Hoisnard, brigand,” added the crier.

And in the crowd was heard, —

“He is from Ruillé.”

“Yes, that is Branche d’Or.”

“He had his brother killed at the attack at Pontorson.”

“Yes, Hoisnard-Malonnière.”

“A fine young man, nineteen years old.”

“Attention,” said the crier, “ Here is the end of the list,—”

“Belle-Vigne, brigand. La Mussette, brigand. Sabretout, brigand. Brin-d’Amour, brigand — —”

A boy nudged a girl’s elbow. The girl smiled.

The crier went on, —

“Chante-en-hiver, brigand. Le Chat, brigand — —”

A peasant said: “That is Moulard.”

“Tabouze, brigand — —”

A peasant said: “That is Gauffre.”

“There are two of the Gauffres,” added a woman.

“Both good fellows,” growled a rustic.

The crier shook the placard and the drum beat a ban. The crier began to read again, —

“The above named, in whatever place they may be taken, will be immediately put to death after their identity has been established.”

There was a stir in the crowd.

The crier added, —

“Whoever gives them shelter, or helps them to escape will be taken before a court-martial and put to death. Signed—”

There was a profound silence.

“Signed: The Delegate of the Committee of Public Welfare, Cimourdain.”

“A priest,” said a peasant.

“The former cure of Parigné.” said another.

A citizen added, —

“Turmeau and Cimourdain. A White priest, and a Blue priest.”

“Both black,” said another citizen.

The mayor standing on the balcony, raised his hat and cried, —

“Long live the Republic!”

The beating of the drum announced that the crier had finished. Indeed, he made a sign with his hand.

“Attention,” he said. “Here are the four last lines of the notice of the government. They are signed by the chief of the reconnoitring column of the coasts of the north commanded by Gauvain.”

“Listen!” cried the voices of the crowd.

And the crier read, —

“Under pain of death—”

All were silent.

“It is forbidden, in fulfilment of the above order, to aid and assist the nineteen rebels above named, who are at the present time invested and surrounded in la Tourgue.”

“Hey?” said a voice.

It was a woman’s voice. It was the voice of the mother.

CHAPTER III.

MURMURINGS OF THE PEASANTS.

Michelle Flechard was in the midst of the crowd.

She had not listened, but one can hear what one does not listen to. She had heard this word, la Tourgue. She raised her head.

"Hey!" she repeated, "la Tourgue?"

The people stared at her. She looked as though she were demented. She was in rags. Voices murmured, —

"She looks like a brigand."

A peasant woman carrying some buckwheat cakes in a basket approached her, and said in an undertone, —

"Hold your tongue."

Michelle Fléchard looked at the woman in amazement.

Again she failed to understand. This name la Tourgue had passed by like a flash of lightning, and then it grew dark again. Had she no right to ask questions? What was the matter with them, that they looked at her so?

In the meantime, the drum had beaten a last ban, the bill-poster had pasted up the placard, the mayor had gone into the town hall, the crier had departed for some other village, and the crowd had scattered.

A group remained in front of the placard. Michelle Fléchard joined this group.

They were commenting on the names of those men who were outlawed.

There were peasants and citizens in the group; that is to say, Whites and Blues.

A peasant said, —

"No matter, they do not count everybody. Nineteen is only nineteen. They do not count Riou, they do not count Benjamin Moulins, they do not count Goupil, of the parish of Andouillé."

"Nor Lorieul, of Montjean," said another.

Others added,— "Nor Brice-Denys."

"Nor François Dudonet."

"Yes, the one from Laval."

"Nor Huet, from Launey-Villiers."

"Nor Gregis."

“Nor Pilon.”

“Nor Filleul.”

“Nor Ménicent.”

“Nor Guéharrée.”

“Nor the three brothers Logerais.”

“Nor Monsieur Lechandelier de Pierreville.”

“Fools!” said a stern old man with white hair. “They have them all, if they take Lantenac.”

“They haven’t taken him yet,” muttered one of the young fellows.

The old man replied, —

“If Lantenac is taken, the soul is taken. If Lantenac is dead, la Vendée is killed.”

“Who is this Lantenac, then?” asked a citizen.

A citizen replied: “He is a ci-devant.”

And another added: “He is one of those who shoot women.”

Michelle Fléchard heard that, and said: “That is true.”

The people turned round.

And she added: “Because they shot me.”

These words had a strange effect; it was as though one thought dead was found alive. They began to examine her, somewhat askance.

She was really distressing to look at; trembling at everything, scared, shivering, having a wildly anxious look, and so frightened that she was frightful. In a woman’s despair there is a strange helplessness which is terrible. It is like seeing a being suspended at the extremity of fate. But the peasants looked at it more roughly. One of them growled: “She may be a spy.”

“Hold your tongue, and go away,” said the good woman who had already spoken to her, in a low voice.

Michelle Fléchard replied, —

“I am not doing any harm. I am looking for my children.”

The good woman looked at those who were looking at Michelle Fléchard, tapped her forehead, winked, and said, —

“She is half-witted.”

Then she took her aside, and gave her a buckwheat biscuit.

Michelle Fléchard, without thanking her, bit eagerly into the biscuit.

“Yes,” said the peasants, “she eats like a pig, she is half-witted.”

And the rest of the group scattered. They all went away one after another.

When Michelle Fléchard had finished eating, she said to the peasant woman: “It is good; I have had something to eat. Now, for la Tourgue!”

“See how she clings to that!” exclaimed the peasant woman.

“I must go to la Tourgue. Tell me the way to la Tourgue.”

“Never,” said the peasant woman. “You want to be killed, do you? Besides, I don’t know. Ah, so you are really mad? Listen, my poor woman, you look tired. Will you rest in my house?”

“I cannot rest,” said the mother.

“Her feet are all raw,” muttered the peasant woman.

Michelle Fléchard added, —

“As I tell you, they have taken my children from me. A little girl and two little boys. I come from the carnichot in the forest. You can ask Tellmarch the Caimand about me. And then the man I met in the field down there. It was the Caimand who made me well. It seems that I had something broken. All these are things that have happened. Besides, there was the sergeant Radoub. You can ask him. He will tell you. For he it was who found us in a wood. Three. I tell you three children. And the oldest is called René-Jean. I can prove all this. The other is called Gros-Alain, and the other is called Georgette. My husband is dead. They killed him. He was a farmer in Siscoignard. You look like a good woman. Show me my way. I am not mad; I am a mother. I have lost my children. I am looking for them. I do not know exactly where I have come from. Last night I slept on some straw in a barn. La Tourgue is where I am going. I am not a thief. You see that I am telling the truth. You ought to help me find my children. I do not belong to this country. I have been shot, but I do not know where.”

The peasant woman shook her head, and said, —

“Listen, traveller. In times of revolution one must not say things that will not be understood. You may be arrested for it.”

“But la Tourgue!” cried the mother. “Madame, for the love of the child Jesus, and the holy, good Virgin in Paradise, I beseech you, madame, I beg you, I implore you, tell me how to go to reach la Tourgue!”

The peasant woman grew angry.

“I do not know! and, if I knew, I would not tell you! It is a bad place there. It is not best to go there.”

“Nevertheless, I am going there,” said the mother.

And she started on.

The peasant woman saw her going away, and grumbled, —

“She ought to have something to eat.”

She ran after Michelle Fléchard, and put a buckwheat biscuit in her hand.

“There’s something for your supper.”

Michelle Fléchard took the buckwheat bread, did not reply, did not turn her head, and went on her way.

She went out of the village. As she came to the last houses she met three little ragged and barefooted children passing by. She went to them, and said, —

“These are two girls and a boy.”

And when she saw how they eyed her bread, she gave it to them.

The children seized it, but were afraid of her.

She plunged into the forest.

CHAPTER IV.

A MISTAKE.

In the meantime, the following had been taking place that same morning before daybreak, in the gloomy depths of the forest, on the section of road leading from Javené to Lécousse.

All the roads in le Bocage are sunken, but the highway from Javené to Parigné, through Lécousse, is one of the most completely embanked. Moreover, it is winding. It is a ravine rather than a road. It starts from Vitré, and once had the distinction of jolting Madame de Sevigné’s coach. It is walled in, as it were, by hedges on right and left. No better place for an ambuscade.

This very morning, an hour before Michelle Fléchard, from another part of the forest, reached the village where she had seen the sepulchral vision of the cart escorted by mounted men, the thickets through which the Javené highway runs, after crossing the bridge over the Couesnou, were full of invisible men. All were hidden by interlacing branches.

These men were all peasants, dressed in the grigo, that sheepskin jacket worn by the Breton kings in the sixth century, and the peasants in the eighteenth. These men were armed; some with guns, others with axes. Those who had the axes had just made, in a clearing, a sort of funeral pyre of dry sticks and logs, all ready for the fire. Those who had guns were grouped on both sides of the road, in expectant attitudes. Any one who could have peered through the foliage would have seen everywhere fingers on triggers, and muzzles of carbines pointed through the embrasures made by the interlacing boughs. These men were lying in wait. All their guns were focussed on the road, which began to gleam white in the morning dawn.

In the twilight, muffled voices were conversing.

“Are you sure of this?”

“Surely; that is what they say.”

“Will it pass by here?”

“They say it’s in these parts.”

“It must not leave.”

“We must burn it.”

"Here are three villages met for that,"

"Yes, but the escort?"

"The escort must be killed."

"But is it coming this way?"

"That's what they say."

"It'll come from Vitré, then?"

"Why not?"

"Why, they said it was coming from Fougéres."

"Whether from Fougéres or Yitré, it comes from the devil."

"That's so."

"And must go back to him."

"Yes."

"Was it going to Parigné?"

"So it seems."

"It won't get there."

"No."

"No, no, no."

"Attention."

Indeed, prudence was now becoming imperative, for day was breaking.

Suddenly, the men in ambush held their breath. A noise of wheels and horses was heard. They peered through the branches and could indistinctly see a long wagon, an escort on horseback, something on the wagon; it was coming toward them.

"There it is!" said the one who appeared to be the chief.

"Yes," said one of the men on the watch, "with the escort."

"How many men in the escort?"

"Twelve."

"They said there were twenty."

"Twelve or twenty, let us kill them all."

"Wait till they are in full range."

Soon after, at a turn in the road, the wagon and escort appeared.

"Long live the king!" cried the chief peasant.

A hundred guns fired at once.

When the smoke disappeared, the escort had disappeared too. Seven of the horsemen had fallen, five had fled. The peasants ran to the wagon.

"Hold on," cried the chief;" it is not the guillotine. It is a ladder."

The wagon, indeed, had for its sole burden a long ladder.

The two horses had fallen, wounded; the driver had been killed, but not purposely.

“It’s all the same,” said the chief, “a ladder with an escort is suspicious. It was going toward Parigné. It was for scaling la Tourgue, most certainly.”

“Let us burn the ladder,” cried the peasants.

As for the funereal wagon, which they were looking for, It took another road and was already two leagues away, in the village where Michelle Fléchard saw it passing along at sunrise.

CHAPTER V.

VOX OF DESSERTO.

After leaving the three children to whom she gave her bread, Michelle Fléchard began to rove at random through the wood.

Since no one would show her the way, she must find it for herself. Every few moments she would sit down, then she would get up, and then sit down again. She felt that dismal weariness, which first affects the muscles and then passes to the bones, a slavish weariness. She was a slave in reality, — a slave to her lost children. She must find them; every lost instant might be their distraction; whoever has such a duty has no rights; she was forbidden to pause, even for breath. But she was very weary. In such a state of exhaustion, the possibility of one step more is a question. Could it be done? She had been walking since morning. She had seen no village, not even a house. At first she took the right path, then the wrong one, and finally she lost her way entirely among the branches, one just like another. Was she approaching the end? Was she touching the limit of her Passion? She was in the Via Dolorosa, and felt the agony of the "last station." Was she going to fall down on the road and die there? At one particular moment, it seemed impossible for her to go any farther; the sun was sinking, the forest was dark, paths were covered up in the grass, and she did not know what to do. She had nothing left but God. She began to call, no one replied.

She looked about her, she saw an opening among the branches, she went toward it, and suddenly found herself out of the woods.

Before her was a narrow vale like a trench, at the bottom of which, over the stones, ran a clear streamlet of water. Then, for the first time she became aware how very thirsty she was. She went to the brook, knelt down, and drank.

She took advantage of being on her knees to repeat her prayers.

When she arose, she tried to get her bearings.

She crossed the brook.

Beyond the little vale there stretched away as far as the eye could reach, a wide plateau covered with low underbrush, which sloped up from the brook and filled the whole horizon. The forest was a solitude, the plateau was a desert. In the forest behind each bush, there was a chance of meeting some one; on the plateau, as far as one could see, there was nothing. A few birds, which seemed to be escaping from something, flew into the heather.

Then, before this immense deserted plain, feeling her knees give way, as though she had become insane, the desperate mother flung this strange cry into the solitude; “Is there any one here?”

And she waited for the reply.

There was an answer.

A heavy, deep voice burst forth; this voice came from the edge of the horizon; it was reverberated from echo to echo; it resembled a peal of thunder or a cannon; and it seemed as if this voice replied to the mother’s question and said: “Yes.”

Then all was silent.

The mother rose, with new life; there was some one there. It seemed to her that now she had some one to speak to; she had just relieved her thirst and prayed; her strength returned, she began to ascend the slope in the direction from which she had heard that enormous distant voice.

Suddenly, she saw rising from the extreme edge of the horizon, a tall tower. The tower stood alone in this wild landscape; a ray from the setting sun lighted it up. She was more than a league away from it. Behind this tower, a wide expanse of verdure lost itself in the haze; this was the forest of Fougères.

This tower appeared to her to he on the very point of the horizon from which had come that roaring voice that seemed to her like a call. Had this tower made the noise?

Michelle Fléchard reached the top of the pleateau; she had nothing more before her except the plain. She walked toward the tower.

CHAPTER VI.

THE SITUATION.

The moment had come.

The inexorable held the merciless.

Cimourdain had Lantenac in his grasp.

The old Royalist rebel was taken in his ancestral seat, it was evident that he could not escape; and Cimourdain intended to have the marquis beheaded at his own home, on the spot, on his own territory, and in a certain sense in his own house, in order that the feudal dwelling should see the head of the feudal master fall, and that it might be a memorable example.

This is why he had sent to Fougères for the guillotine. It has just been seen on the way.

To kill Lantenace was to kill la Vendée; to kill la Vendée was to save France. Cimourdain did not hesitate. This man was familiar with the cruelty of duty.

The marquis seemed to be lost; in regard to this, Cimourdain felt easy, but in another respect he was anxious. The struggle would certainly be a frightful one; Gauvain would direct it, and would perhaps desire to take part in it; there was something of the soldier in this young chief; he was a man to throw himself into this hand-to hand encounter; supposing he should be killed? Gauvain! his child! the sole affection that he had on earth! Gauvain had been fortunate thus far, but good fortune becomes weary. Cimourdain trembled. His destiny was strange in this respect, that he was between two Gauvains, one of whom he wished to die, the other to live.

The cannon shot which had disturbed Georgette in her basket and called the mother out of the depths of solitude had done more than that. Whether it was by chance or from the intention of the gunner, the ball, which, however was only a ball of warning, had struck, broken, and half torn away the iron bars which masked and closed the great loophole in the first story of the tower. The besieged had not had time to repair this injury.

The besieged were boastful. They had very little ammunition. Their situation, we insist, was even more critical than the besiegers supposed. If they had had enough powder they would have blown up la Tourgue, with themselves and the enemy in it; this was their dream; but all their reserves were exhausted. They had hardly thirty shots apiece. They had plenty of guns, blunderbusses and pistols, and but few cartridges. They had loaded all their arms, in order to be able to keep up a continuous fire; but how long would this fire last? It would be necessary to use it lavishly and to husband it at the same time. Here was the difficulty

Fortunately, — ominous good fortune, — the contest would be principally man to man, and with side-arms, with sabre and dagger. There would be more hand-to-hand fighting than shooting. They would cut each other to pieces; this was what they hoped for.

The interior of the tower seemed impregnable. In the lower hall where the breach penetrated was the retirade, that barricade scientifically constructed by Lantenac, which obstructed the entrance. Behind the retirade, a long table was covered with loaded arms, — blunderbusses, carbines, and muskets, and with sabres, axes, and daggers As they had no powder to blow up the tower, they were unable to make use of the crypt of the oubliette communicating with the lower hall, and the marquis had ordered the door to this vault to be closed.

Above the lower hall was the round room of the first story, which could only be reached by a very narrow Saint-Gilles’s staircase; this room, furnished like the lower hall with a table covered with arms all ready for use, was lighted by the large loophole, the grating of which had just been smashed by a cannon ball; above this room the spiral staircase led to the round room in the second story, where the iron door opened into the bridge-châtelet.

This room in the second story was called both the “room with the iron door” and the “room of mirrors,” on account of the number of little mirrors hung up on old rusty nails against the bare stone, a strange mixture of elegance and barbarism. As upper rooms cannot be defended to advantage, this room of mirrors was what Manesson-Mallet, the authority on fortified places, calls “the last post where the besieged can capitulate.”

As we have already said, it was important to prevent the besiegers from reaching this room.

This round room in the second story was lighted by loop-holes; but a torch was burning there. This torch, placed in an iron cresset like the one in the lower hall, had been lighted by l’Imânus, who had placed the end of the sulphur slow-match close beside it. Terrible foresight.

At the end of the lower hall, on a long table made of boards, there was food, as in a Homeric cavern: large plates of rice; of “fur,” which is a porridge of buckwheat; of “godnivelle,” a hash of veal; rolls of “houichepote,” a paste made of flower and fruit cooked in water; and jugs of cider. Any one who wished could eat and drink.

The firing of the cannon put them all on guard. They had only half an hour more before them. L’Imânus, from the top of the tower, was watching the approach of the besiegers. Lantenac had commanded them not to fire, and to let them draw near. He had said, —

“There are four thousand, five hundred of them. It is useless to kill them outside. Don’t kill until they are inside. Once inside, we shall be equal.”

And he added, with a laugh, “Equality, Fraternity.” It was agreed that when the enemy began to advance, L’Imânus should sound a note of warning from his horn.

All, in silence, stationed behind the retirade or on the stairs, waited, with one hand on their muskets, the other on their rosaries.

To sum up, this was the situation:

For the assailants, a breach to penetrate; a barricade to storm; three halls, one above another, to take by main force, one by one; two winding staircases to carry, step by step, under a shower of fire. For the besieged — death.

CHAPTER VII.

PRELIMINARIES.

Gauvain on his side, was arranging the attack. He gave his last instructions to Cimourdain, who, it will be remembered, without taking part in the action was to guard the plateau; and to Guéchamp, who was to wait with the main part of the army in the camp of the forest. It was understood that neither the masked battery in the woods nor the open battery on the plateau should fire, unless there was a sortie or an attempt to escape. Gauvain reserved for himself the command of the attacking column. This was what troubled Cimourdain.

The sun had just set.

A tower on an open field is like a ship on the open sea. It must be attacked in the same way. It is rather a boarding than an assault. No cannon. Nothing useless. What is the good of cannonading walls fifteen feet thick? A port-hole, some storming it, others passing it, axes, knives, pistols, fists, and teeth. This is what takes place.

Gauvain felt that there was no other means of carrying la Tourgue. An attack where the combatants see the whites of each other's eyes is most deadly. He was familiar with the formidable interior of the tower, having lived there as a child. He was deep in thought.

In the meantime, a few steps from him his lieutenant, Guéchamp, with a spyglass in his hand, was scrutinizing the horizon toward Parigné. Suddenly Guechamp exclaimed, —

"Ah! at last!"

This exclamation roused Gauvain from his reverie.

"What is it, Guéchamp?"

"Commander, there is the ladder."

"The escape ladder?"

"Yes."

"What? Hasn't it come yet?"

"No, commander. I was anxious about it. The express which I sent to Javené has returned."

"I know it."

“He announced that, in the carpenter’s shop at Javené, he had found a ladder of the required length, that he had it requisitioned, that he had the ladder put on a wagon, that he obtained an escort of twelve horsemen, and that he had seen the wagon, the escort, and the ladder start for Parigné. After which he returned post haste.”

“And gave us this report, and he added that as the wagon was drawn by strong horses, and started about two o’clock in the morning, it would be here before sunset. I know all that. Well?”

“Well, commander, the sun has just set and the wagon with the ladder has not yet come.”

“Is it possible? Nevertheless, we must begin the attack. The hour has come. If we delay, the besieged will think we are retreating.”

“Commander, you can begin the attack.”

“But we must have the escape ladder.”

“Of course.”

“But it is not here.”

“It is here.”

“How is that?”

“That is why I said, ‘Ah! at last!’ The wagon had not come; I took my spyglass and examined the road from Parigné to la Tourgue, and, commander, I am satisfied. The wagon is yonder with the escort; it is coming down the slope. You can see it.”

Gauvain took his spyglass and looked.

“To be sure. Here it is. There is not enough daylight left to make it all out. But I see the escort; that is plain enough. But the escort seems to me to be larger than you told me, Guéchamp.”

“It seems so to me, too.”

“They are about a quarter of a league away.”

“Commander, the escape ladder will be here in a quarter of an hour.”

“We can begin the attack.”

It was really a wagon which was coming, but it was not the one they thought.

Gauvain, turning around, saw behind him Sergeant Radoub, erect, his eyes downcast, in attitude of military salute.

“What is it, Sergeant Radoub?”

“Citizen commander, we, the men of the battalion of Bonnet-Rouge, have a favor to ask of you.”

“What is it?”

“To have us killed.”

“Ah!” said Gauvain.

“Will you do us this kindness?”

“But — that depends on circumstances,” said Gauvain.

“You see, commander, since the affair at Dol you have been careful of us. There are still twelve of us.”

“Well?”

“This humiliates us.”

“You are the reserve.”

“We would rather be the advance-guard.”

“But I need you to decide the final success of an action. I hold you in reserve.”

“Too much so.”

“No matter. You are in the column, you march with it.”

“In the rear. Paris has the right to march ahead.”

“I will think about it. Sergeant Radoub.”

“Think about it to-day, commander. There is going to be an engagement. There will be a rough tripping-up, on one side or the other. It will be lively. La Tourgue will burn the fingers of those who touch it. We ask the privilege of being in the fight.”

The sergeant stopped short, twisted his moustache, and added in a different tone, —

“And then you see, commander, our babies are in that tower. Our children are there, the children of the battalion, our three children. The terrible face of Gribouille-mon-cul-to-baise, of Brise-bleu, of l’Imanus, that Gouge-le-Bruand, that Bouge-le-Gruand, that Fouge-le-Truand, that thunderbolt of God, man of the devil, threatens our children. Our children, our little ones, commander. When the tower quakes and tumbles, we do not want any harm to come to them. Do you understand this, master? we do not want any harm to happen to them. Just now, I took advantage of the truce to go up on the plateau, and I saw them through a window; yes, they are really there, you can see them from the edge of the ravine and I saw them, and they were afraid of me, the darlings. Commander, if a single hair falls from the heads of those little cherubs, I swear a thousand times by all that is holy that I, Sergeant Radoub, that I will do something desperate. And this is what all the battalion say: ‘We want the children saved, or we want to be all killed. This is our right, yes, to be all killed.’ And now, good luck and reverence.”

Gauvain held out his hand to Radoub, and said, —

“You are a brave man. You shall be in the attacking column. I will divide you. I will put six of you with the vanguard, that the troops may be sure to advance, and I will put six of you in the rearguard, to keep them from retreating.”

“Shall I still command the twelve?”

“Certainly.”

“Thank you, commander. For I belong to the vanguard.” Radoub saluted his commander and went back to the ranks.

Gauvain took out his watch, spoke a few words in Guéchamp’s ear, and the attacking column began to form.

CHAPTER VIII.

THE SUMMONS AND THE REPLY.

In the meantime, Cimourdain, who had not yet taken up his position on the plateau and was still at Gauvain's side, stepped to a trumpeter.

"Blow the trumpet," he said to him.

The trumpet sounded, the horn replied.

A blast from the trumpet and an answering blast from the horn rang out again.

"What is it?" asked Gauvain of Guechamp. "What does Cimourdain want?"

Cimourdain had approached the tower with a white handkerchief in his hand.

He spoke.

"Men who are in the tower, do you know me?"

The voice of l'Imânus replied from the top of the tower, —

"Yes."

Then the two voices began to converse, and this was heard, —

"I am the envoy of the Republic."

"You are the former curé of Parigné."

"I am the delegate of the Committee of Public Welfare."

"You are a priest."

"I am the representative of the Law."

"You are a renegade."

"I am the messenger of the Revolution."

"You are an apostate."

"I am Cimourdain."

"You are the devil."

"Do you know me?"

"We hate you."

"Would you be satisfied to have me in your power?"

"There are eighteen of us here who would give our heads in exchange for yours."

"Well, I have come to give myself up to you."

From the top of the tower was heard a burst of savage laughter, and this exclamation, —

“Come on.”

There was deep silence in the camp as they awaited the result.

Cimourdain added, —

“On one condition.”

“What is it?”

“Listen.”

“Speak.”

“You hate me?”

“Yes.”

“As for me, I love you. I am your brother.”

The voice from the top of the tower replied, —

“Yes, Cain.”

Cimourdain replied with a singular inflection, both loud and gentle, —

“Insult me, but listen, I have come to parley with you. Yes, you are my brothers. You are poor misguided men. I am your friend. I am light speaking to ignorance. Light always comprises brotherly love. Besides, have we not all the same mother, our native land? Well, listen to me. You will know later, or your children will know, or your children’s children, that all that is taking place at this moment is done in fulfilment of the laws above, and that God has caused this Revolution. While waiting for the time when all minds, even yours, will understand this, and, all fanaticism, even yours will vanish, will any one pity your darkness? I have come to you to offer you my life; I do more, I extend my hand to you. I ask you the favor of destroying my life to save your own. I have full power, and what I say I am able to perform. It is a critical moment; I am making a last effort. Yes, he who speaks to you is a citizen, and in this citizen, yes, there is a priest. The citizen is fighting against you, but the priest implores you. Listen to me. Many of you have wives and children. I take the defence of your children and your wives. I take their defence against you. Oh, my brothers — —”

“Go on, preach away!” sneered l’Imânus.

“My brothers, do not let the accursed hour come. There will be bloodshed here. Many of us who are here before you will not see to-morrow’s sun; yes, many of us will perish, and you, all of you, will die.

Have mercy on yourselves. Why shed all this blood when it is useless? Why kill so many men when two would suffice?”

“Two?” said l’Imânus.

“Yes. Two.”

“Who?”

“Lantenac and myself.”

And Cimourdain raised his voice, —

“Two men are enough; Lantenac, for us, myself for you. This is what I offer you, and it will be the saving of all your lives: give us Lantenac and take me. Lantenac will be guillotined, and you will have me to dispose of as you like.”

“Priest,” howled l’Imânus, “if we had you we would burn you over a slow fire.”

“I am willing,” said Cimourdain.

And he added, —

“You, condemned, who are in this tower can all be alive and free; in an hour I bring you safety. Do you accept it?”

L’Imânus thundered, —

“You are not only a villain; you are mad. Ah, indeed, why do you come to disturb us? who asked you to come to speak to us? we, give up monseigneur! what do you mean?”

“His head, and I offer you—”

“Your hide. For we would skin you like a dog. Curé Cimourdain. Well, no, your hide is not worth his head; get you gone.”

“The struggle will be terrible; once more, for the last time, reflect.”

Night fell during the exchange of these ominous words, which were heard inside the tower as well as without. The Marquis de Lantenac kept silent and let them alone. Leaders indulge in such portentous deeds of selfishness. This is one of the rights of responsibility. L’Imânus shouted to those beyond Cimourdain, exclaiming, —

“Men who attack us, we have told you our propositions; they have been made, and we have nothing to change about them. Accept them; if not, woe be unto you! do you consent? we will give up the three children here, to you, and you shall let us all go free and unharmed.”

“All of you, yes,” replied Cimourdain, “except one.”

“Which one?”

“Lantenac.”

“Monseigneur! give up monseigneur! never!”

“We must have Lantenac.”

“Never!”

“We cannot negotiate, except on this condition.”

“Then begin.”

Silence ensued.

L’Imânus, after sounding the signal with his horn, went down again; the marquis took the sword in his hand; the nineteen men besieged gathered in silence in the lower hall, behind the retirade, and knelt down; they heard the measured tread of the attacking column advancing towards the tower in the darkness; the sound drew nearer; suddenly, they felt that they were close upon them, at the very mouth of the breach. Then all kneeling down held their guns and their blunderbusses through the cracks in the retirade, and one of them, Grand-Francœur, the priest Turneau, rose, and, a drawn sword in his right hand, a crucifix in his left, said in a solemn voice, —

“In the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost.”

All fired at once, and the struggle began.

CHAPTER IX.

TITANS AGAINST GIANTS.

It was indeed frightful.

This hand-to-hand struggle surpassed all that could have been imagined.

To find anything equal to it, one must go back to the great combats of Æschylus or to the carnage of old feudal times; or to those “attacks with short arms,” which lasted till the seventeenth century, when fortified places were penetrated by means of “fausse-brayes;” tragic assaults in which, says the old sergeant of the province of Alentijo, “when the mines have done their work, the besiegers will advance carrying planks covered with sheets of tins, armed with round shields and mantlets, and provided with plenty of grenades, causing the defenders to abandon the retrenchments or retirades, and, having taken possession, they will vigorously repulse the besieged.”

The place of attack was horrible; it was one of those breaches called technically “vaulted breaches;” that is to say, as will be remembered, an opening going through the wall from one side to the other, and not a rupture open to the sky. The powder had worked like a gimlet. The effect of the explosion had been so violent that the tower had been rent more than forty feet above the mine, but it was only a crack, and the practicable opening, serving as a breach and penetrating into the lower hall, resembled a spear-thrust which pierces, rather than an axe-blow which cleaves.

It was a puncture in the side of the tower, a long, deep fracture, something like a horizontal wall under ground, a passage winding and rising like an intestine through a wall fifteen feet thick, a peculiar, shapeless cylinder full of obstacles, snares, explosions, where a man would hit his forehead against the rocks, and would stumble over the rubbish and lose his sight in the darkness.

The assailants had before them this dark porch, like the mouth of an abyss with all the stones of the jagged wall for upper and lower jaws; the jaws of a shark have not more teeth than this terrible rent. It was necessary to enter and to come out by this hole.

Within, there was a rain of fire, outside rose the retirade. Outside, that is to say, in the lower hall on the ground floor.

Only in the encounter of sappers in covered galleries when the countermine cuts the mine, or in the carnage on the gun decks of vessels which grapple each other in naval battles, is such ferocity displayed. To fight at the bottom of a ditch is horrible to the last degree. It is frightful to have a battle under a roof.

At the moment when the first swarm of besiegers entered, the whole retirade was covered with lightning, and it was something like a thunderstorm bursting underground. The thunderbolts of the assailants replied to the thunderbolts of the ambuscade. Report answered report; Gauvain's voice shouted, —

"Break them in!"

Then Lantenac's cry: "Hold firm against the enemy!"

Then the cry of l'Imânus: "On, men of the Main!" Then the clashing of sword against sword, and blow on blow, terrible discharges, all devastating. The torch fastened against the wall lighted dimly all this horror. It was impossible to distinguish anything; it was in a reddish blackness; whoever entered there was suddenly deaf and blind, — deafened by the noise, blinded by the smoke. Disabled men were lying in the midst of the rubbish. Corpses were trodden down, the wounded were trampled upon, broken limbs were crushed, while howls of anguish arose; men had their feet bitten by the dying; now and then, there were moments of silence more hideous than the din.

They seized each other by the throat, groans were heard, then the gnashing of teeth, the death-rattle, imprecations; and the thundering began again. A stream of blood began to flow from the tower through the breach, and ran out into the darkness. This dismal pool steamed outside in the grass.

It seemed as if the tower itself were bleeding, as if a giant were wounded.

Wonderful to say, those outside heard hardly any sound. The night was very dark, and all around the fortress, on the plain and in the forest, there was a sort of funereal stillness. Inside, it was like hell; outside, it was like the grave. This conflict of men killing each other in the darkness, these volleys of musketry, this din, this madness, all this tumult died away under the walls and arches; the noise lacked air, and suffocation was added to slaughter. Outside the tower, there was scarcely a sound. The little children slept through it all.

The fury increased, the retirade held its own. Nothing is more difficult to storm than this kind of a barricade, with a re-entering angle. If the besieged had numbers against them, their position was in their favor. The attacking column lost a great many men. Stretched out in a long line outside, at the foot of the tower, it plunged slowly into the opening made by the breach and contracted, like an adder going into its hole.

Gauvain, with the imprudence of a young general, was in the lower hall, in the thickest of the fight, in the midst of all the firing. We may add that he had the confidence of a man who had never been wounded. As he turned round to give an order, a blaze of musketry lighted up a face close beside him.

“Cimourdain!” he exclaimed, “what are you doing here?”

It really was Cimourdain. Cimourdain replied, —

“I come to be near you.”

“But you will be killed!”

“Well, what are you doing here yourself?”

“But I am needed here. You are not.”

“Since you are here, I must be here also.”

“No, my master.”

“Yes, my child.”

Cimourdain stayed near Gauvain.

The dead were heaped up on the floors of the lower hall.

Although the retirade was not yet forced, the greater number would evidently conquer at last. The assailants were exposed to the enemy’s fire, and the besieged were protected. Ten besiegers fell to one besieged, but the besiegers were replaced. The besiegers increased and the besieged decreased.

The nineteen besieged were all behind the retirade, the attack being there. There were dead and wounded among them; fifteen at the outside were still fighting. One of the fiercest among them, Chante-en-Hiver, had been frightfully wounded. He was a thickset Breton, with curly hair, of the small, lively type. He had one of his eyes put out and his jawbone broken. He could still walk. He dragged himself up the winding staircase and went into the room on the first story, hoping to be able to say his prayers there and die.

He leaned back against the wall near the loophole to try to get a little air.

Below, the massacre before the retirade was growing more and more horrible. In an interval between two volleys, Cimourdain raised his voice.

“Besieged!” he cried, “why shed blood any longer? You are taken. Surrender. Remember that we are four thousand five hundred against nineteen, that is to say, more than two hundred to one. Surrender.”

“Let us put an end to this sentimentality,” replied the Marquis de Lantenac.

And twenty bullets answered Cimourdain.

The retirade did not reach as high as the arched roof; this allowed the besieged to shoot over it, but it also allowed the besiegers to scale it.

“Attack the retirade!” cried Gauvain. “Is there any one willing to scale the retirade?”

“I am,” said Sergeant Radoub.

CHAPTER X.

RADOUB.

Then the assailants were dumfounded at what took place. Radoub had entered through the breach at the head of the attacking column, with six others, and, out of these six men of the Prussian battalion, four had already fallen. After he had cried: “I am!” he was seen not to advance but to retreat, and bending down, stooping, crawling almost between the legs of the combatants, he reached the opening of the breach and went out. Was this flight? would such a man flee? what could it mean?

When outside the breach, Radoub, still blinded by the smoke, rubbed his eyes as if to put aside the horror and the darkness, and by the light of the stars looked at the wall of the tower. He gave a nod of satisfaction, as if to say, “I was not mistaken.”

Radoub had noticed that the deep cleft made by the explosion of the mine, reached above the breach to the loophole in the first story, the iron grating of which had been broken through and displaced by a cannon ball. The network of broken bars was hanging, half torn away, and a man would be able to creep through.

A man could creep through, but could he climb up there? By the cleft, yes, on condition that he was like a cat.

This was just what Radoub was. He belonged to that race which Pindar calls “agile athletes.” An old soldier may be a young man; Radoub, who had been a French Guard, was not forty years old. He was a nimble Hercules.

Radoub laid his musket on the ground, removed his shoulder belt, took off his coat and vest, and kept only his two pistols, which he put in the belt of his trousers, and his bare sword, which he took between his teeth. The handles of the two pistols protruded above his belt.

Thus freed from all encumbrances, and followed in the darkness by the eyes of all those in the attacking column who had not yet entered the breach, he began to mount the stones in the cleft of the wall, like the steps of a staircase. Being without shoes was an advantage to him; nothing clings like a bare foot; he curled his toes into the holes between the stones. He pulled himself up by main force, he braced himself with his knees. The ascent was rough. It was something like climbing over the teeth of a saw. “It is fortunate,” he thought, “that there is no one in the room of the first story, for they would not let me climb in this way.”

He had no less than forty feet to climb thus. As he mounted, hindered somewhat by the protruding handles of his pistols, the cleft grew narrower and the ascent became more and more difficult; at the same time, the risk of falling increased with the depth of the precipice.

At last he came to the edge of the loophole; he removed the twisted and broken grating so that he had room enough to pass through; by a powerful effort he raised himself up, placed his knee on the cornice of the window-sill, seized the end of a bar on the right, in one hand, and with the other a bar on the left, and rose to his waist in front of the embrasure of the loophole, his sword between his teeth, hanging by his two hands above the abyss.

He had but one more effort to make to enter the hall in the first story.

But a face appeared in the loophole.

Radoub suddenly saw before him in the dim light something frightful. An eye destroyed, a shattered jaw, a face covered with blood.

This one-eyed mask looked at him.

This mask had two hands; these two hands came out of the darkness and approached Radoub; one, with a single grasp, snatched the two pistols from his belt, the other removed his sword from between his teeth.

Radoub was disarmed. His knee was slipping on the inclined plane of the cornice, his two hands grasping the ends of the iron bars could hardly hold him, and he had beneath him forty feet of precipice.

This face and these hands belonged to Chante-en-hiver. Chante-en-hiver, suffocated by the smoke pouring up from below, had succeeded in entering the embrasure of the loophole, and here the outside air had revived him, the coolness of the night had stanched his blood, and he had regained a little strength; suddenly, he saw Radoub’s form rise up outside in front of the opening, then as Radoub, clinging to the bars with both hands, had only the choice of falling or being disarmed, Chante-en-hiver, calm and frightful, took the pistols out of his belt and his sword from between his teeth.

An extraordinary duel began. A duel between the unarmed and the wounded.

Without doubt, the dying man had the advantage. One bullet would be enough to hurl Radoub into the yawning gulf, under his feet.

Fortunately for Radoub, Chante-en-hiver, having both pistols in one hand, could shoot neither of them and was forced to make use of the sword. He thrust the point of it into Radoub's shoulder. This thrust wounded Radoub and saved him.

Radoub, without arms, but having all his strength scorned his wound, which did not reach to the bone, sprang forward, let go the bars, and leaped into the embrasure.

Then he found himself face to face with Chante-en-hiver who had thrown the sword behind him, and now held the two pistols in his two hands.

Chante-en-hiver, on his knees, aimed at Radoub who was almost close up to the muzzle; but his weakened arm trembled and he did not immediately shoot.

Radoub took advantage of this respite to burst out laughing.

"Tell me, ugly mug," he cried, "do you think I am going to be afraid of your à-la-mode beef jaws? Sapristi, how they have battered your pretty face!"

Chante-en-hiver was still aiming at him.

Radoub continued, —

"It's not a thing to talk about, but the grapeshot crimped your mouth very prettily. My poor boy, Bellona has smashed your physiognomy. Go ahead, go ahead, spit out your little pistol shot, my good fellow."

The pistol went off and the bullet passed so near Radoub's head that it tore off half of his ear. Chante-en-hiver raised his other arm with the second pistol, but Radoub did not give him time to aim.

"I have had enough of you taking my ears off," he cried. "You have wounded me twice, now it is my turn."

And he rushed at Chante-en-hiver, knocked his arm up making the pistol go off aimlessly, and seized hold of his dislocated jaw.

Chante-en-hiver shrieked and fainted away.

Rodoub stepped over him and left him in the embrasure.

"Now that I have let you know my ultimatum," said he, "don't move again. Stay there, you rascally sneak. You may rest assured that I am not going to amuse myself now with slaughtering you. Crawl about on the floor at you ease, fellow-citizen of my old shoes. Die; you can still do that. You will soon know what nonsense your curé has been telling you. Depart into the great regions of mystery, peasant."

And he sprang into the hall of the first story.

“You can’t see a thing here,” he growled.

Chante-en-hiver writhed convulsively and shrieked with agony. Radoub turned around.

“Silence! do me the kindness of keeping quiet, unworthy citizen. I will have nothing more to do with you. I scorn to put an end to you. Let me have peace.”

And he ran his hand through his hair in perplexity, as he looked at Chante-en-hiver.

“Ah, now what am I going to do? all this is very good, but here I am without arms. I had two shots to fire. You wasted them for me, you beast! and made such a smoke about it that it would blind a dog!”

And hitting his torn ear, —

“Ow!” he said. And he added, —

“It was very forward of you to confiscate one of my ears; but indeed, I would rather lose that than anything else, for it was only an ornament. You scratched my shoulder too, but that is nothing. Die, clown, I forgive you.”

He listened, the tumult in the lower hall was frightful. The fight was more furious than ever.

“They are getting on well down there. Never mind, they are howling ‘Long live the king.’ They are dying nobly,”

His feet hit against his sword on the floor. He picked it up, and said to Chante-en-hiver who no longer stirred and was perhaps dead, —

“You see, woodsman, this is what I wanted, my sword or ‘zut,’ it is the same. I will take it out of friendship. But I must have my pistols. Devil take you, savage! Now what shall I do? I am no good here.”

He groped along through the hall, trying to see and to get his bearings. Suddenly in the darkness, behind the central column, he made out a long table, and on this table something which shone indistinctly. He felt of it. They were blunderbusses, pistols, carbines, a row of firearms laid in order and seeming to be waiting for hands to lay hold of them; it was the reserve of weapons prepared by the besieged for the second phase of the assault; a perfect arsenal.

“A refreshment table!” exclaimed Radoub, and he pounced on them wildly.

Then he became terrible.

The door leading to the staircase communicating with the upper and lower stories was seen to be wide open beside the table loaded with arms. Radoub dropped his sword, seized a pistol in each hand and fired them together at random through the door into the stairway, then he seized a blunderbuss and discharged that, then he seized a musketoon loaded to the muzzle with buckshot, and discharged that. The musketoon, pouring forth fifteen bullets, seemed like a volley of grapeshot. Then Radoub, getting his breath, cried into the stairway in a thundering voice, —

“Long live Paris.”

And seizing another musketoon larger than the first, he aimed it under the archway of the Saint-Gilles’s staircase and waited.

The confusion in the lower hall was indescribable. Unexpected surpises like this demoralize resistance. Two of the bullets of Radoub’s triple discharges had hit; one had killed the elder of the two brothers, Pique-en-bois, the other had killed Houzard, who was Monsieur de Quélen.

“They are upstairs!” cried the marquis.

This cry brought about the instant abandonment of the retirade; a flock of birds could not be scattered more quickly, and they each tried to rush first into the stairway. The marquis encouraged this flight.

“Be quick,” he said. “It is courageous to escape now, let us all go up to the second story! there we will begin again.”

He was the last to leave the retirade.

This bravery saved him.

Radoub, in ambush on the first landing of the staircase, his finger on the trigger of the blunderbuss was on the watch for the rout. Those who first appreared around the corner received the discharge full in the face, and fell as if struck by lightning. If the marquis had been one of them he would have been killed.

Before Radoub had time to seize a new weapon, the rest passed by, the marquis last, and slower than the others. They believed the room on the first floor to be filled with the enemy; they did not stop there, but went on to the second story to the hall of mirrors. There was the iron door, the sulphur slow match was there, and there it would be necessary to capitulate or die.

Gauvain, as surprised as they were by the gunshots from the stairway and not being able to explain the assistance which had come to him, without trying to understand had taken advantage of it, had leaped with his men over the retirade, and drove the besieged at the point of the sword up to the first story.

There he found Radoub.

Radoub saluted him and said, —

“0ne minute, commander. It was I who did this. I remembered Dol. I did as you did. I put the enemy between two fires.”

“A good pupil,” said Gauvain, with a smile.

After being in the dark for some time one’s eyes become accustomed to it, like those of night birds; Gauvain noticed that Radoub was covered with blood.

“But you are wounded, comrade.”

“Never mind that, commander. What difference does it make, an ear more or less? I have a sword-cut too, but that is of no consequence. In breaking a pane of glass one always gets cut somewhat. But it is only a little of my blood.”

They came to a sort of halt in the halt of the first story, taken by Radoub. A lantern was brought. Cimourdain rejoined Gauvain. They stopped to consider. It was indeed time to reflect. The besiegers were not in the secret of the besieged. They were ignorant of their lack of ammunition. They did not know that the defenders of the place were short of powder; the second story was the last post of resistance; the besiegers knew that the staircase might be mined.

One thing was certain, that the enemy could not escape. Those who were not dead were as good as under lock and key. Lantenac was in a trap.

With this certainty, they could take a little time to try to find out the best possible course to pursue. They already had many dead. It was necessary to try not to lose too many men in this last assault. There would probably be a tough outburst at first to quell.

The combat was interrupted. The besiegers, masters of the ground floor and of the next story were waiting for the general’s order to go on. Gauvain and Cimourdain were holding counsel. Radoub listened in silence to their deliberation.

He ventured again to salute his general timidly, —

“Commander?”

“What is it, Radoub?”

“Have I the right to a slight reward?”

“Certainly. Ask what you like.”

“I should like to be the first to go up.”

It was impossible to refuse him. Besides, he would have done it without permission.

CHAPTER XI.

THE DESPERATE.

While they were taking counsel in the first story, they were building a barricade in the second. Success is madness, defeat is rage. The two stories were about to clash in desperate encounter. To touch victory is intoxicating. Below there was hope, which would be the greatest of all human forces if it were not for despair.

Above, there was despair.

A calm, cold, ominous despair.

On reaching this hall of refuge, beyond which there was nothing left for them, the first care of the besieged was to bar the entrance. It would be of no use to fasten the door. It would be better to block up the stairway. In a case like this, an obstacle through which it is possible to see and to fight is of more value than a fastened door.

The torch placed by l'Imânus in a cresset on the wall, near the sulphur slow match, gave them light.

In this hall on the second floor there was one of those large, heavy oak chests in which clothing and linen were kept before the invention of furniture with drawers. They dragged this chest, and stood it on end in the doorway of the staircase. It fitted in firmly and obstructed the entrance. It left only a narrow space open near the arch, large enough to let a man through, excellent for killing the assailants, one by one. It was doubtful if men would risk themselves there.

Having blocked up the entrance, they took a respite.

They counted their number.

Of the nineteen only seven were left, including l'Imânus. All were wounded except l'Imânus and the marquis.

The five who were wounded, but very active, — for in the heat of battle, all wounds not mortal allow men to come and go, — were Chatenay, called Robi, Guinoiseau, Hoisnard, Branche-d' Or, Brin-d'Amour and Grand-Francœur. All the rest were dead.

They had no ammunition. The cartridge boxes were exhausted. They counted the cartridges. How many shots for the seven had they? Four.

They had reached the moment when there was nothing left but to fall. They were driven to the very precipice, yawning and awful; it would have been difficult to be nearer the edge.

In the meantime, the attack was beginning; but slowly and all the more sure. The sound of the besiegers’ gunstocks was heard as they hit against the staircase, step by step.

No means of escape. Through the library? There were six cannons on the plateau pointed at it, with matches lighted. Through the rooms above? what would be the use? They only lead to the plateau. Then their only means of escape would be to throw themselves from the top to the bottom of the tower.

The seven survivors of this epic band saw themselves inexorably imprisoned and held by this thick wall, which protected them and betrayed them. They were not yet taken; but they were already prisoners.

The marquis addressed them, —

“My friends, it is all over.”

And after a silence he added, —

“Grand-Francœur, be the Abbé Turmeau once more.”

All knelt down, with their rosaries in their hands. The knocking of the assailants’ muskets came nearer. Grand-Francœur, covered with blood from the bullet which had grazed his skull and torn off the skin covered with hair, raised his crucifix in his right hand. The marquis, a skeptic at heart, placed one knee on the ground.

“Let each one,” said Grand-Francœur, “confess his faults aloud. Monseigneur, speak.”

The marquis replied, —

“I have killed.”

“I have killed,” said Hoisnard.

“I have killed,” said Guinoiseau.

“I have killed,” said Brin-d’Amour.

“I have killed,” said Chatenay.

“I have killed,” said l’Imânus.

And Grand-Francœur added, —

“In the name of the Most Holy Trinity, I absolve you. May your soul depart in peace.”

“Amen!” replied all the others.

The marquis arose.

“Now,” said he, “let us die.”

“And let us kill,” said l’Imânus.

The blows from the muskets began to shake the chest which barred the door.

“Think on God,” said the priest. “Earth no longer exists for us.”

“Yes,” added the marquis, “we are in the tomb.”

All bowed their heads and beat their breasts. The marquis and the priest alone remained standing. Their eyes were fixed on the floor, the priest was praying, the peasants were praying, the marquis was deep in thought; the chest, as though it were struck by hammers, gave forth a lugubrious, hollow sound.

At this moment, a quick, strong voice rang out behind them, crying, —

“I told you the truth, monseigneur.”

The heads of all turned around in amazement.

A hole had just opened in the wall.

A stone perfectly jointed with the others, but not cemented, and turning on a pivot above and below, had just revolved on itself like a turnstile, and in turning had opened the wall. The stone having turned on its axis, made a double opening and offered two passages, one to the right, the other to the left, narrow, but large enough to allow a man to pass through. Outside this unexpected door could be seen the first steps of a spiral staircase.

The face of a man appeared in the opening.

The marquis recognized Halmalo.

CHAPTER XII.

A DELIVERER.

“Is it you, Halmalo?”

“It is, monseigneur. You see now that turning stones do exist, and that it is possible to escape through here. I have come in time. But be quick. In ten minutes you will be in the midst of the forest.”

“God is great,” said the priest.

“Save yourself, monseigneur,” cried they all.

“All of you first,” said the marquis.

“You first, monseigneur,” said the Abbé Turmeau.

“I shall be the last.”

And the marquis added in a stern voice, —

“No struggle for generosity. We have no time to be magnanimous. You are wounded. I command you to live and to flee. Be quick and take advantage of this means of escape. Thank you, Halmalo.”

“Monsieur le marquis,” said the Abbé Turmeau. “Are we going to be separated?”

“Without doubt, below. We can only escape each for himself.”

“Monseigneur, will you appoint a rendezvous?”

“Yes. A clearing in the forest, the Pierre-Gauvain. Do you know the place?”

“We all know it.”

“I will be there to-morrow at noon. Let all who can walk be found there.”

“We will be there.”

“And we will begin the war over again,” said the marquis.

In the meanwhile, Halmalo pressing against the turning stone had just noticed that it no longer moved. The opening could not be closed.

“Monseigneur,” he said, “let us hurry, the stone resists now. I was able to open the passage, but I shall not be able to close it.”

Indeed, after long disuse the stone was, as it were, stiffened on its hinges. It would be impossible to stir it henceforth.

“Monseigneur,” added Halmalo, “I hoped to close the passage, and that when the Blues entered, they would find no one here, and failing to understand it would believe that you had all vanished into smoke. But here, the stone will not move. The enemy will see the place open, and will be able to pursue us. But do not lose a moment. Quick! all down the stairs."

L'Imânus placed his hand on Halmalo's shoulder, —

"Comrade, how long will it take to go through this passage and reach a place of safety in the forest?"

"No one is seriously wounded?" asked Halmalo.

They replied, —

"No one."

"In that case, a quarter of an hour will be enough."

"So," replied l'Imânus, "if the enemy should enter here in a quarter of an hour?"

"They could pursue us, but they would not reach us."

"But," said the marquis, "they will be here in five minutes, that old chest will not hinder them long. A few blows with the butt-ends of their muskets will finish it A quarter of an hour! who will keep them back for an quarter of an hour?"

"I will," said l'Imânus.

"You, Gouge-le-Bruant?"

"I, monseigneur. Listen. Out of six, five of you are wounded. As for me, I haven't a scratch."

"Neither have I," said the marquis.

"You are the chief, monseigneur; I am the soldier. The chief and the soldier are two different men."

"I know it, we have each a different duty."

"No, monseigneur, you and I have the same duty; that is to save you."

L'Imânus turned toward his comrades.

"Comrades, the enemy must be held in check and their pursuit retarded as long as possible. Listen! I have all my strength, I have not lost a drop of blood; as I am not wounded, I shall hold out longer than any of the rest of you. Go, all of you; leave me your guns, I shall make good use of them. I shall undertake to keep back the enemy a good half hour. How many loaded pistols are there?"

"Four."

"Put them on the floor."

They did as he desired.

“That is right; I will remain. They will find some one to speak to. Now, quick, go all of you.”

Critical situations make short thanks. They hardly took time to press his hand.

“I shall see you soon,” said the marquis.

“No, monseigneur, I hope not. Not soon; I am going to die.”

One after another they all entered the narrow staircase, the wounded going first. As they were descending, the marquis took the pencil from his note-book in his pocket, and wrote some words on the stone which could no longer be turned, and which loft the passage open.

“Come, monseigneur, there is no one left but you,” said Halmalo.

And Halmalo started to go down.

The marquis followed him.

L’Imânus was left alone.

CHAPTER XIII.

THE EXECUTIONER.

The four pistols had been placed on the flags, for this hall had no floor; l’Imânus picked up two of them, one in each hand.

He went cautiously toward the entrance to the staircase, which was obstructed and screened by the chest.

The assailants evidently feared some surprise. One of those final explosions which are the catastrophe of the conqueror as well as the conquered. The last attack was as slow and cautious as the first had been impetuous.

They had not been able, they had not wished perhaps, to break through the chest with violence; they had demolished the bottom by beating it in with their muskets, and had made holes in the cover with their bayonets, and through these holes they tried to see into the hall before venturing to enter it.

The light from the lanterns with which they illuminated the staircase came through these holes.

L’Imânus noticed an eye looking through one of these holes. He quickly aimed the barrel of one of his pistols at this hole and pulled the trigger. The shot went off, and l’Imânus was rejoiced to hear a horrible cry. The bullet had put out the eye and gone through the head of the soldier who was looking through the hole, and the man had just tumbled backwards down the stairs.

The assailants had broken through the lower part of the cover in two quite large places and had made two kinds of loopholes in it; l’Imânus took advantage of one of these holes to pass his arm through, and to fire his second pistol at random into the throng of besiegers. The ball probably rebounded, for several cries were heard, as if three or four had been killed or wounded, and a great tumult among the men followed in the stairway, as they lost their footing and fell back.

L’Imânus threw down the two pistols which he had discharged, and took the two others; then, with the two pistols in his two hands he looked through the holes in the chest.

He ascertained the first effect produced.

The assailants had gone back down the stairs. The dying were writhing on the steps; on account of the winding he could only see three or four stairs.

L'Imânus waited.

"So much time gained," he thought.

Just then he saw a man on his belly, crawling up the stairs, and at the same moment the head of a soldier lower down, appeared behind the central pillar of the spiral.

L'Imânus aimed at this head and fired. There was a cry, a soldier fell, and l'Imânus changed from his left hand to his right, the last loaded pistol remaining.

At the same time he felt a frightful pain, and it was his turn to shriek. A sword had entered his bowels. A hand, the hand of a man who was crawling, had just passed through the second loophole in the lower part of the chest, and this hand had plunged a sword into l'Imânus's belly.

The wound was frightful. His bowels were cut from one side to the other.

L'Imânus did not fall. He ground his teeth and said, —

"That is good!"

Then tottering and dragging himself along, he went back to the torch burning beside the iron door; he laid down his pistol and took the torch, and holding with his left hand his bowels, which were gushing out, he lowered the torch with his right, and lighted the sulphur match.

The fire caught, the match blazed. L'Imânus left the torch still burning on the floor, took his pistol again, and having fallen on the flags, but lifting himself up again, blew the match with the little breath he had left.

The flame ran along, passed under the iron door, and reached the castle bridge.

Then seeing his accursed success, more satisfied, perhaps, with his crime than with his valor, this man who had just been a hero and was now nothing but an assassin, and was about to die, smiled.

"They will remember me," he murmured; "in these little ones, I avenge our little one, the king in the Temple.

CHAPTER XIV.

L'IMANUS ALSO ESCAPES.

At this very instant a great noise was heard, the chest violently pushed, gave way, letting a man pass who rushed into the hall, sword in hand.

“It is I, Radoub, if you want to know it. I am tired of waiting; I am running a risk. No matter, I have just ripped open one. Now I will attack you all. How many are there of you?”

It was Radoub, indeed, and he was alone. After the slaughter just made by l'Imânus in the stairway, Gauvain, fearing a masked fougade, had recalled his men and consulted Cimourdain.

In this darkness through which the torch almost extinguished, faintly gleamed, Radoub, sword in hand on the threshold, repeated his question.

“I am alone. How many are you?”

Hearing nothing, he went forward. One of those jets of light occasionally given forth by a dying fire, and which might be called sobs of light, flashed from the torch and lighted up the whole hall.

Radoub caught sight of one of those little mirrors fastened to the wall, went towards it, looked at his bloodstained face and hanging ear, and said,—

“What a hideous mutilation.”

Then he turned round, astounded to see the hall empty.

“There is nobody here,” he exclaimed. “ The effective force is zero.”

He noticed the turned stone, the opening in the staircase.

“Ah! I see. The key to the fields. Come on, men, all of you! Comrades, come on! they are all gone. They have vanished, melted away, slunk away, decamped. This jug of an old tower was cracked. Here is the hole through which they escaped, the rascals! how can one expect to get the better of Pitt and Cobourg with such trickery as this! the devil himself came to their aid! There is no one here at all!”

Just then a pistol was fired, a bullet grazed his elbow and was flattened against the wall.

“But there is some one here, after all. Who was so kind as to be so polite to me?”

“I was,” said a voice.

Radoub looked around and made out something in the dim light which proved to be l’Imânus.

“Ah!” he exclaimed. “I have one of them. The others have escaped, but you will not escape.”

“Do you think so? “ replied l’Imânus.

Radoub took a step and stopped.

“Hallo, you man on the floor, who are you?”

“I am one who is down and who laughs at those who are on their feet.”

“What is that in your right hand?”

“A pistol.”

“And in your left hand?”

“My bowels.”

“I take you prisoner.”

“I defy you to do so.”

And l’Imânus, bending over the burning match, blew his last breath on the fire and died.

A few moments later, Gauvain and Cimourdain, and all the others entered the hall. All saw the opening. They explored the recesses, they examined the stairway. It led into the ravine. They assured themselves that the enemy had escaped. They shook l’Imânus. He was dead. Gauvain, with a lantern in his hand, examined the stone, which had given escape to the besieged; he had heard of this turning stone, but he, too, considered the legend as a fable. As he was looking at the stone he noticed something written with a pencil; he held the lantern near and read this, —

“Au revoir, monsieur le vicomte. — Lantenac.”

Guéchamp had rejoined Gauvain. Pursuit was evidently useless. Their escape was complete; the whole country was in favor of the fugitive; the thicket, the ravine, the copse, the natives; they were, doubtless, already far away; there was no way to find them; and the whole forest of Fougères was an immense hiding-place.

What was to be done? all would have to be begun over again. Gauvain and Guéchamp expressed their disappointment and their conjectures.

Cimourdain listened in solemn silence.

“By the way, Guéchamp,” said Gauvain, “where is the ladder?”

“Commander, it has not come.”

“But still we saw a wagon escorted by mounted men.”

Guechamp replied, —

“It did not bring the ladder.”

“What did it bring, then?”

“The guillotine,” said Cimourdain.

CHAPTER XV.

NEVER PUT A WATCH AND A KEY IN THE SAME POCKET.

The Marquis de Lantenac was not so far away as they thought.

He was, nevertheless, perfectly safe, and beyond their reach.

He had followed Halmalo.

The stairway down which he had gone with Halmalo, after the other fugitives, ended very near the ravine and the arches of the bridge, by a narrow arched passageway. This passageway terminated in a deep natural fissure in the ground, opening into the ravine on one side, and on the other into the forest.

This fissure, entirely concealed from sight, wound under impenetrable vegetation. It would be impossible to capture a man there. A fugitive, having once reached this fissure had only to crawl away like an adder, and was safe from pursuit. The entrance to the secret passage from the stairway was so obstructed by brambles that those who had made this subterranean passage considered it useless to close it in any other way.

The marquis had nothing to do now but to go on. There was no need of troubling himself about a disguise. Since his arrival in Brittany, he had not taken off his peasant’s costume, considering himself thus more of a great seigneur.

He merely took off his sword, the belt of which he unfastened and threw down.

When Halmalo and the marquis emerged from the passage into the fissure, the five others, Guinoiseau, Hoisnard Branche-d’Or, Brin-d’ Amour, Chatenay, and the Abbé Turmeau had disappeared.

“They were not long in getting away,” said Halmalo.

“Follow their example,” said the marquis.

“Does monseigneur wish me to leave him?”

“Certainly. I have already told you so. One can only escape alone. One can pass when two cannot. Together, we should attract attention. You would be the cause of their capturing me, and I should be the cause of their capturing you.”

“Does monseigneur know the country?”

“Yes.”

“Will monseigneur go to the rendezvous at the Pierre-Gauvain?”

“To-morrow, at noon.”

“I shall be there. We shall be there.”

Halmalo interrupted himself.

“Ah! monseigneur, when I think that we were together on the open sea, that we were alone, that I wanted to kill you, that you were my seigneur, that you could have told me so, and that you did not tell me! what a man you are!”

The marquis went on to say, —

“England; there is no other resource. The English must be in France in two weeks.”

“I shall have many accounts to give to monseigneur. I have fulfilled his commissions.”

“We will talk about that to-morrow.”

“Good-bye till to-morrow, monseigneur.”

“By the way, are you hungry?”

“Possibly, monseigneur. I was in such haste to reach you that I do not know that I have eaten anything today.”

The marquis took a cake of chocolate from his pocket, broke it in two, gave one half to Halmalo, and began to eat the other.

“Monseigneur,” said Halmalo, “to your right is the ravine, to your left, the forest.”

“Very good. Leave me. Go your way.”

Halmalo obeyed. He plunged into the darkness. A sound of brambles crackling was heard, then nothing more. After a few seconds it would have been impossible to retrace his footsteps. This land of the Bocage, rough and inextricable, was the fugitive’s aid. People did not disappear there; they vanished. It was this facility for swift passing out of sight which made our armies hesitate before this ever-retreating Vendée, and before its combatants — such formidable fugitives.

The marquis remained motionless. He was one of those men who tried to have no feelings; but he could not restrain the emotion of breathing free air after having breathed so much blood and carnage. To feel himself perfectly safe after having been completely lost; after seeing the tomb so near, to take possession of absolute security; to escape from death and come back to life, all this, even for a man like Lantenac, was a shock; and although he had passed through similar experience before, he could not restrain his imperturbable soul from violent emotion for some minutes. He acknowledged to himself, that he was happy. He quickly subdued this feeling which almost resembled joy.

He took out his watch and made it strike. What time was it?

To his great astonishment, it was only ten o’clock.

When one has gone through one of these sudden changes of fortune in human life, when everything has been questioned, one is always amazed to find that minutes so full are no longer than others.

The warning cannon had been fired a little before sunset, and La Tourgue had been approached by the attacking column a half-hour later, between seven and eight o’clock just at nightfall. So, this colossal struggle, begun at eight o’clock, was over at ten. This whole epopée had lasted one hundred and twenty minutes. Sometimes the rapidity of lightning is mingled with catastrophes. Events are so surprisingly short.

If we stop to reflect, it is the contrary which is really astonishing; a resistance of two hours with so small a number against a number so large was extraordinary, and surely it was not short or soon over, this battle of nineteen against four thousand.

But it was time to be on his way. Halmalo must be far distant, and the marquis decided that there was no need of staying there any longer. He put his watch back into his vest, not into the same pocket, for he had just noticed that it was in contact with the key of the iron door, which l’Imânus had brought to him, and that the crystal of his watch was liable to be broken against this key, and he prepared to reach the forest in his turn. As he was about to turn to the left, it seemed to him as if he saw a dim light.

He turned around and through the thicket, clearly defined against a red background, and suddenly made visible in its least details, he saw a great blaze in the ravine. Only a few strides separated him from the ravine. He went towards it, then changed his mind, finding that it was of no use to expose himself to this bright light; whatever it might be it did not concern him, after all; he took the direction which Halmalo had shown him, and went a few steps toward the forest.

Suddenly, deeply buried and hidden under the brambles as he was, he heard a terrible cry above his head; this cry seemed to come from the very edge of the plateau above the ravine. The marquis raised his eyes, and stopped.

BOOK FIFTH — IN DÆMONE DEUS.

CHAPTER I.

FOUND BUT LOST.

When Michelle Fléchard caught sight of the tower reddened by the setting sun, she was more than a league away from it. Although she could hardly walk a step, she never hesitated to traverse this league. Women are weak, but mothers are strong. She had walked.

The sun had set: twilight came, then thick darkness; as she walked along she heard from the distance eight o'clock, then nine, ring out from a belfry which could not be seen. This belfry was probably that of Parigné. Now and then she stopped to listen to certain strange sounds like dull blows, which were possibly some of the mysterious noises of the night.

She went on straight ahead, breaking away the furze bushes and the sharp heath under her bleeding feet. She was guided by a feeble light coming from the distant keep making it stand out, and giving a mysterious radiance to this tower. This light became brighter as the sound of blows grew more distinct, then it went out.

The vast plateau where Michelle Fléchard was passing along was nothing but grass and heather, without a house or a tree; it rose imperceptibly, and as far as one could see, rested its long, straight, hard line against the dark, starry horizon. What kept her up in this ascent was the fact that the tower was continually before her eyes.

She saw it slowly increase in size.

The muffled reports and the pale gleams of light coming from the tower, as we have just said, were intermittent; they would cease, then begin again, offering a strange, cruel enigma to the wretched mother in distress.

Suddenly they ceased; both sound and light, all disappeared; there was a moment of perfect silence, a sort of melancholy peace ensued.

At this very moment, Michelle Fléchard reached the edge of the plateau. She saw at her feet a ravine, the bottom of which was lost in the thick darkness of the night; at some distance on the top of the plateau an entanglement of wheels, taluses, and embrasures, which v/as a battery of cannons, and in front of her, dimly illumined by the lighted matches of the battery, an enormous edifice which seemed built with shadows blacker than all the other shadows which surrounded her.

This edifice was composed of a bridge, the arches of which plunged into the ravine, and of a sort of castle rising above the bridge, and the castle and the bridge were joined to a lofty, dark, round object, which was the tower towards which the mother had walked from so great a distance.

The lights were seen to come and go through the windows of the tower, and from the noise proceeding from it one would have guessed that it was filled with a crowd of men, and the shadows of some of them were cast above, even on the platform.

Near the battery there was an encampment, the mounted sentries of which Michelle Fléchard had noticed; but in the darkness among the brambles, she had not been seen by them.

She had come to the edge of the plateau, so near the bridge that it seemed to her as if she could almost touch it with her hand. The depth of the ravine separated her from it. In the darkness she could make out the three stories of the castle on the bridge.

All measure of time had been blotted out of her mind, and she remained long absorbed and dumb before this yawning chasm and this shadowy building.

What was it? what was going on there? was it la Tourgue? she was dizzy with a strange expectation, so that she could hardly tell whether she was just arriving or going away. She asked herself why she was there.

She looked, she listened.

Suddenly, she could no longer see anything. A cloud of smoke rose between her and what she was looking at. A keen smarting sensation made her shut her eyes. She had hardly closed her eyelids when they grew red and became luminous. She opened them again.

It was no longer night before her, it was light as day; but a kind of funereal daylight, the daylight which comes from a fire. The beginning of a conflagration was before her eyes.

The black smoke had grown scarlet and in it there was a great flame; this flame appeared, then disappeared, with the ferocious twisting peculiar to lightning and snakes.

This flame came out like a tongue from something resembling a mouth, and which was a window full of fire. This window grated with iron bars already red hot, was one of those in the lower story of the castle built on the bridge. This window was the only feature of the whole building which could be seen. The smoke covered everything, even the plateau, and only the edge of the ravine, black against the red flame, could be made out.

Michelle Fléchard looked on in astonishment. Smoke is a cloud; a cloud is a dream; she no longer knew what she saw. Ought she to go away? ought she to remain? she felt almost beyond reality.

A breath of wind passed by and broke through the curtain of smoke, and through the rent the tragic bastille, suddenly disclosed, rose visible in its entirety, — keep, bridge, châtelet; dazzling, terrible, magnificently gilded by the fire, illuminated by it from top to bottom. Michelle Fléchard, in the ominous distinctness of the fire, could see it all.

The lower story of the castle built on the bridge was burning.

Above it, the two other stories could be seen, still untouched, but as if borne in a basket of flames. From the edge of the plateau, where Michelle Fléchard was, the interior could be dimly seen through the rifts between the fire and the smoke. All the windows were open. Through the windows in the second story, which were very large, Michelle Fléchard could see, against the walls, the bookcases, which seemed to her to be filled with books, and, in front of one of the windows, on the floor, in the dim light, a little confused group; something which looked indistinct and huddled together, like a nest or a brood, and which looked as if it moved now and then.

She looked at it.

What was this little group of shadows?

Occasionally, it came into her mind that it resembled living forms; she was feverish, she had eaten nothing since morning, she had walked without resting, she was worn out, she felt as though she were in a sort of hallucination which she instinctively mistrusted; still, her eyes becoming more and more fixed, could not leave that dark heap of objects, probably inanimate, and apparently motionless, lying there on the floor of that hall above the fire.

Suddenly, the fire, as if it had a will power, sent forth from below, one of its jets, towards the great dead ivy covering the same front at which Michelle Fléchard was looking. It seemed as if the flame had just discovered this network of dry branches; a spark seized it eagerly, and began to mount along the shoots with the frightful swiftness of a train of powder. In a twinkling, the flame reached the second story. Then, from above, it lighted up the interior of the first. A sudden blaze brought into relief three little beings fast asleep.

It was a charming little heap, — arms and legs intertwined, eyelids closed, a smile on their fair faces.

The mother recognized her children.

She uttered a frightful cry.

This cry of inexpressible anguish is only given to mothers. Nothing is more fierce, and nothing more touching. When a woman utters it, one would think it was a she- wolf; when a she-wolf gives it, it sounds like a woman.

This cry of Michelle Fléchard's was a howl. Hecuba bayed, says Homer.

It was this cry which the Marquis de Lantenac had just heard.

We have seen that he stopped.

The marquis was between the outlet of the passage through which Halmalo had helped him to escape and the ravine. Through the brambles intertwined above him, he saw the bridge in flames, la Tourgue red from the reflection, and, through the opening between two branches, he saw above his head, on the other side, on the edge of the platform, opposite the burning castle and in the full light of the fire, a haggard, pitiful figure, a woman bending over the ravine.

This figure was no longer Michelle Fléchard; it was Medusa, The wretched are terrible. The peasant woman was transformed into one of the Eumenides. This country woman, vulgar, ignorant, unreasoning, had suddenly asumed the epic proportions of despair. Great sorrows have a gigantic power of enlarging the soul; this mother represented maternity; everything which sums up humanity is superhuman; she rose then, on the edge of this ravine, before this conflagration, before this crime, like a power from the grave; her cry was like that of a wild beast, and her gestures like those of a goddess; her face, from which proceeded imprecations, seemed like a masque of flame. Nothing could be more sovereign than the lightning of her eyes bathed in tears; her eyes flashed lightning on the fire.

The marquis listened. This fell on his ear; he heard something strangely inarticulate and heartrending, more like sobs than words.

"Ah! my God! my children! those are my children! help! fire! fire! fire! but you are bandits! is there no one there? but my children will be burned! Ah! how terrible! Georgette! my children! Gros-Alain, René-Jean! but what does it mean? who put my children there? they are asleep. I am mad! it is impossible! Help!”

Meanwhile, there was a great confusion in la Tourgue and on the plateau. The whole camp ran around the fire, which had just burst out. The besiegers, after being concerned with the firing, were now concerned with the fire, Gauvain, Cimourdain, Guéchamp, gave orders. What was to be done? there were but a few buckets of water to be drawn from the shallow brook in the ravine. Their distress increased. The whole edge of the plateau was covered with frightened faces looking on.

It was a frightful sight.

They looked on, and could do nothing.

The flames, by means of the ivy which had taken fire, Had reached the upper story. There it had found the granary full of straw and had seized upon it. The whole granary was now burning.

The flames danced; the joyfulness of flames is a doleful thing. It seemed as if some malicious breath were fanning the fire in this funereal pile. It might have been thought that the grim l’Imânus was wholly there, changed to a whirlwind of sparks, living in the murderous life of the conflagration, and as if this monster of a soul had turned to fire.

The story where the library was had not yet been reached, the height of its ceiling, and the thickness of its walls retarded the time when it would take fire, but the fatal moment was drawing near; the fire in the first story licked it, and the flames in the third story caressed it. The awful kiss of death touched it. Below, a cellar of lava, above, an arch of embers; if a hole should break through the ceiling, the children would be buried in the live coals. René-Jean, Gros-Alain, and Georgette were not yet awake, they were sleeping the deep, quiet sleep of childhood; and through the folds of flame and smoke, which alternately covered and disclosed the windows, they could be seen in this grotto of fire, behind this meteoric blaze, peaceful, graceful, motionless, like three confiding child Jesuses, asleep in a hell; and a tiger would have wept to see these roses in this furnace and these cradles in this tomb.

Meanwhile, the mother was wringing her hands.

“Fire! fire! I say. Are they all deaf that they do not come? They are burning my children! Come, you men over yonder. I have walked days and days, and and this is how I find them. Fire! help the angels! Indeed they are angels! What have those innocent little creatures done? the men shot me, and now they are burning them! Who does such things? Help! save my children! Don’t you hear me? One would take pity on a dog! My children! they are asleep! Ah! Georgette! I see her dear little stomach! René-Jean! Gros-Alain! Those are their names. You see that I am their mother. It is abominable that such a thing as this should happen. I have walked days and nights, as I told a woman this morning. Help! help! fire! You are monsters! It is horrible! the oldest is not five years old, the little one less than two. I see their little bare legs. They are asleep, good, holy Virgin! the hand of Heaven gave them to me. and the hand of hell is taking them from me. And I have walked so far! My children that I fed from my breast! And I thought I was unfortunate not to find them! Have pity on me! I want my children, I must have my children! And yet they are in the fire! See how my poor feet are all covered with blood. Help! It is not possible that there are men on the earth who would leave these poor little ones to die like this! Help! murder! The like of this was never seen before. Ah, yon brigands! What is this frightful house? You stole them away from me to kill them! Jesus have pity! I want my children. Oh, I do not know what I can do! I cannot let them die! help! help! help! Oh, if they should die like this I should hate God!”

During the mother’s awful supplication, voices were heard on the plateau and in the ravine.

“A ladder!”

“There is no ladder!”

“Water!”

“There is no water!”

“Up there in the tower, in the second story, there is a door.”

“It is of iron.”

“Burst it open!”

“It cannot be done!”

And the mother redoubled her desperate appeals, —

“Fire! help! Hurry! Oh, kill me! My children, my children! Ah! the horrible fire! Take them out of it, or throw me in, too!”

In the intervals between her cries was heard the calm crackling of the fire.

The marquis felt in his pocket and touched the key to the iron door. Then bending down under the archway through which he had made his escape, he went back into the passage from which he had just come out.

CHAPTER II.

FROM THE STONE DOOR TO THE IRON DOOR.

A whole army in despair over an impossible rescue; four thousand men unable to help three children; such was the situation.

They had no ladder; the ladder sent from Javené had not arrived; the conflagration increased like the opening of a crater; to try to put it out with water from the brook in the ravine, which was almost dry, was ridiculous; it would be like throwing a glass of water on a volcano.

Cimourdain, Guéchamp, and Radoub had gone down into the ravine; Gauvain had gone back into the hall in the second story of la Tourgue, where were the turning stone, the secret way of escape, and the iron door of the library. It was there that l'Imânus had lighted the sulphur match; it was there that the fire had started.

Gauvain had taken twenty sappers with him. The only resource was to break open the iron door. It was fatally closed.

They began by using axes. The axes broke. A sapper said, —

"Steel is like glass against this iron."

The door was made of double sheets of wrought iron, bolted together, each three fingers in thickness.

They took iron bars and tried to pry open the door. The iron bars broke.

"Like matches," said the sapper.

Gauvain, dubious, murmured, —

"Nothing but a cannon-ball could open this door. We should have to bring a cannon up here."

"But how?" said the sapper.

There was a moment of despair. All these powerless arms hung motionless. Dumb, conquered, dismayed, these men were considering the horrible immovable door.

A red reflection passed underneath. The fire was increasing behind it.

The frightful corpse of l'Imânus was there, ominously victorious.

A few minutes more, perhaps, and everything would give way.

What was to be done? there was no more hope.

Gauvain in exasperation cried, with his eye fixed on the turning stone in the wall and on the exit left open by the fugitives, —

“And yet here is where the Marquis de Lantenac made his escape!”

“And where he returns,” said a voice.

And a white head appeared in the stone framework of the secret door.

It was the marquis.

Gauvain had not seen him so near for many years. He drew back.

All who were there remained in the same position, petrified.

The marquis had a large key in his hand. He cast a haughty look at the sappers in front of him, walked to the iron door, bent under the arch and put the key into the key-hole. The lock grated, the door opened, a gulf of flame met their eyes, the marquis entered it.

He went into it with a firm step, holding his head high.

All followed him with their eyes, shuddering.

The marquis had taken but a few steps in the burning hall, when the floor, undermined by the fire and shaken by his footsteps, fell in behind him, leaving a precipice between him and the door. The marquis never turned his head but went straight on. He disappeared in the smoke.

Nothing more was seen of him.

Had he been able to go farther? Had a new pit of fire opened under him? Had he only succeeded in being lost himself? They could not tell. They had nothing before them but a wall of smoke and flames. The marquis was beyond it, dead or alive.

CHAPTER III.

THE CHILDREN AWAKEN.

In the meantime, the children had at last opened their eyes.

The fire, which had not yet reached the library, threw a rosy glow on the ceiling. The children were not familiar with this kind of a dawn. They looked at it, Georgette contemplated it.

All the splendors of the fire were displayed there; the black hydra and the scarlet dragon appeared in the shapeless smoke, superbly dark and vermilion. Long tongues of flame blew off and lighted up the darkness, and it seemed like a battle of comets running one after another.

A fire is prodigal; the live coals are full of jewels, which are scattered to the winds; it is not without reason that charcoal is identical with the diamond.

In the wall of the third story, cracks opened, through which the embers poured down into the ravine cascades of precious stones; the heaps of straw and oats burning in the granary began to stream through the windows in avalanches of gold dust, the oats became amethysts, and the straws, carbuncles.

“Pretty,” said Georgette.

All three had risen.

“Ah!” cried the mother; “they are waking up!”

René-Jean got up, then Gros-Alain got up, then Georgette got up.

René-Jean stretched out his arms, went towards the window and said, —

“I’m warm.”

“I warm,” repeated Georgette.

The mother called to them.

“My children: René! Alain! Georgette!”

The children looked around them. They tried to find out what it all meant. When men are terrified, children are only curious. It is difficult to frighten those who are easily astonished; ignorance causes fearlessness. Children have so little claim on hell, that if they should see it they would admire it.

The mother repeated, —

“René! Alain! Georgette!”

René-Jean turned his head; this voice attracted his attention; children have short memories, but their power of recollection is quick; to them the past is but yesterday.

René-Jean saw his mother, found it quite natural, and, surrounded as he was by strange objects, feeling a vague need of support, he cried, —

“Mamma!”

“Mamma!” said Gros-Alain.

“Mamma!” said Georgette.

And she held out her little arms.

And the mother shrieked, “My children!”

All three came to the window; fortunately, the fire was not on that side.

“I am too warm,” said René-Jean.

He added,— “It burns.”

And he looked at his mother.

“Come, mamma.”

“Tum, mamma,” repeated Georgette.

The mother with disordered hair, all scratched, and bleeding, had let herself roll through the brambles into the ravine. Cimourdain was there with Guéchamp, as helpless below as Gauvain was above. The soldiers, in despair at being of no use, swarmed around them. The heat was intolerable but no one felt it. They considered the escarpment of the bridge, the height of the arches, the elevation of the stories, the inaccessible windows, and the necessity for prompt action. Three stories to climb; no means of accomplishing it.

Radoub, wounded, with a sword-cut in his shoulder, and one ear torn off, dripping with sweat and blood, came running up; he saw Michelle Fléchard.

“Hold on,” said he, “you are the woman who was shot! so you have come back to life again?”

“My children,” said the mother.

“You are right,” replied Radoub; “we have no time to spend with ghosts.”

He began to scale the bridge, a futile attempt; he buried his nails in the stone, he climbed up a little way; but the courses were smooth, not a break, not a relief, the wall was as correctly pointed as though it had been new, and Radoub fell back.

The dreadful fire continued; in the window frame, now all red, could be seen the three fair heads. Then Radoub shook his fist towards heaven, as if looking for some one, and said, —

“Is this thy dealing, good God.”

The mother on her knees clasped the piers of the bridge, crying, “Mercy!”

Heavy cracking was heard above the snapping of the fire. The panes of glass in the bookcases in the library cracked, and fell with a crash. It was evident that the woodwork was yielding. No human power could avail. A moment more and all would be destroyed. They were waiting for the fatal moment. The little voices were heard calling: “Mamma! Mamma!” The people were in a paroxysm of despair. Suddenly, at the window next the one where the children were, against the crimson background of the flames, appeared a tall form.

Every head was raised, every eye became fixed. A man was up there, a man was in the library, a man was in the furnace. This form stood out black against the flames, but it had white hair. They recognized the Marquis de Lantenac.

He disappeared, then he appeared again.

The terrible old man rose before the window with an enormous ladder. It was the escape ladder which had been placed in the library, and which he had gone to look for, and had dragged from the side of the wall to the window. He seized it by one end, and with the masterly agility of an athlete he slid it out of the window, supporting it on a jutting of the wall, and let it down to the bottom of the ravine. Radoub, below, wild with delight, held out his hands, took the ladder, held it firmly in his arms, and cried: “Long live the Republic!”

The marquis replied: “Long live the King!”

And Radoub growled: “You may cry anything you like, and say all the foolish things you will, you are from the good God, all the same.”

The ladder was fixed in place; communication was established between the burning hall and the ground; twenty men ran forward, with Radoub at their head, and in a twinkling they placed themselves in a row on the rounds, like masons carrying stones. It made it a living ladder over the ladder of wood. Radoub at the top of the ladder touched the window. He was facing the fire.

The little array, scattered in the heather and on the slopes, pressed forward, distracted by every emotion at once, rushed over the plateau into the ravine, on the platform of the tower.

The marquis disappeared again, then re-appeared, bringing one of the children.

There was a tremendous clapping of hands.

The marquis happened to have seized the oldest. It was Gros-Alain.

Gros-Alain cried: “I’m afraid.”

The marquis gave Gros-Alain to Radoub, who passed him down behind him to a soldier, who passed him to another, and, while Gros-Alain, very much frightened and crying, was being taken thus from arm to arm to the bottom of the ladder, the marquis, after a moment’s absence, came back to the window with René-Jean struggling and crying. The little fellow struck Radoub just as the marquis passed him on to the sergeant.

The marquis went back into the hall full of flames. Georgette was left alone. He went to her. She smiled. This man of stone felt something moist come into his eyes. He asked: “What is your name?” “‘Orgette,” she said.

He took her in his arms; she was still smiling, and just as he gave her to Radoub this conscience so lofty and yet so dark was dazzled by her innocence, and the old man gave the child a kiss.

“It is the little girl!” said the soldiers; and Greorgette in her turn passed down from hand to hand to the ground, amidst cries of adoration.

They clapped their hands, they stamped their feet; the old grenadiers sobbed, and she smiled at them. The mother was at the foot of the ladder, panting for breath, beside herself, intoxicated with all this surprise, suddenly exalted from hell into paradise; excess of joy bruises the heart in its way. She held out her arras, she received first Gros-Alam, then René-Jean, then Georgette, she covered them with kisses, then she burst out laughing and fell down in a faint.

A great cry arose: “All are saved!”

Indeed, all were saved, except the old man.

But no one gave him a thought; perhaps, he did not even think of himself.

He remained at the edge of the window for some moments, in thought, as if he wished to give the gulf of flame time to decide upon its action. Then, slowly, deliberately, proudly, he stepped out through the window, and, without turning round, straight, erect, leaning back against the rounds, with the fire behind him, facing the precipice, he began to descend the ladder in silence, with the majesty of a phantom.

Those who were on the ladder hastened down; all present shuddered. This man coming from above filled them all with a holy horror, as though he had been a vision. But he plunged solemnly into the darkness before him; while they drew back, he was approaching them; the marble pallor of his face was without a change; his ghostly eyes had not a gleam of light; at each step that he took towards these men, whose frightened eyes were fixed on him in the darkness, he seemed taller, the ladder trembled and creaked under his solemn step, and he seemed like the statue of a commander going down into the tomb.

When the marquis was at the bottom, when he had reached the last round and had placed his foot on the ground, a hand was laid on his collar. He turned around.

“I arrest you,” said Cimourdain.

“I sanction it,” said Lantenac.

BOOK SIXTH — THE BATTLE AFTER THE VICTORY.

CHAPTER I.

LANTENAC TAKEN.

The marquis had really descended into the tomb.

They led him away.

The crypt dungeon in the ground floor of la Tourgue was immediately re-opened under Cimourdain's stern eye; a lamp, a jug of water, some hard tack, were placed in it, a bundle of straw was thrown into it, and, in less than a quarter of an hour after the moment when the priest's hand had seized the marquis, the door of the dungeon was closed on Lantenac.

Having done this, Cimourdain went to find Gauvain; just then the distant church of Parigné sounded eleven o'clock in the evening; Cimourdain said to Gauvain, —

"I am going to convoke a court-martial; you will not take part in it. You are a Gauvain, and Lantenac is a Gauvain. You are too nearly related to be a judge; and I blame Egalité for having judged Capet. The court martial will be composed of these judges: an officer, Captain Guéchamp; a sub-officer, Sergeant Radoub; and myself, who will preside. Nothing of all this will concern you. We shall conform to the decree of the Convention; we shall limit ourselves to establishing the identity of the former Marquis de Lantenac. To-morrow, the court-martial; the day after, the guillotine. La Vendée is dead."

Gauvain made no answer, and Cimourdain, preoccupied with the final duty which remained for him to perform, left him. Cimourdain bad hours to appoint and places to select. Like Lequinio at Granville, like Talien at Bordeaux, like Châlier at Lyons, and like Saint-Just at Strasbourg, he was in the habit of being present in person at executions, as it was considered a good example; the judge came to see the executioner do his work; a custom borrowed by the terror of '93 from the parliaments of France and the Inquisition of Spain.

Gauvain, too, was preoccupied.

A cold wind was blowing in the forest. Gauvain, leaving Guéchamp to give the necessary orders, went to his tent in the meadow on the border of the wood, at the foot of la Tourgue, and got his hooded cloak and wrapped himself up in it. This cloak was edged with the simple braid which, according to the Republican fashion for sober ornaments, designated the commander-in-chief. He began to walk about in this bloody meadow, where the assault had begun. He was alone there. The fire was still burning, although of no consequence now; Radoub was with the children and their mother, almost as maternal as she; the châtelet on the bridge was nearly burned to the ground, the sappers were attending to the fire, men were digging ditches, burying the dead, caring for the wounded; the retirade had been destroyed, the corpses removed from the rooms and stairways, the place made clean after the carnage, the terrible filth of victory swept away, the soldiers, with military quickness, did what might be called the house-work after the battle. Gauvain saw nothing of all this.

So deep in thought was he that he scarcely glanced at the post near the breach, doubled by Cimourdain’s orders.

He could see this breach in the darkness about two hundred feet from the corner of the meadow where he had, as it were, taken refuge. He saw the black opening. It was there that the attack had begun, three hours before; it was through this that Gauvain had entered the tower; there on the ground-floor was where the retirade had been; the door leading to the dungeon where the marquis was confined was on this ground floor. The men posted at the breach guarded the dungeon.

While he was straining his eyes to make out this breach, these words, like a knell, came back confusedly to his ear: “To-morrow, the court-martial; the day after, the guillotine.”

The fire, which had been isolated, and on which the sappers threw all the water they could obtain, did not die out without a struggle, and occasional flames still leaped forth; now and then the cracking of the ceilings and the crash of one story falling on another was heard; then eddies of sparks whirled through the air as though a torch had been shaken, a bright light illuminated the farthest horizon, and the shadow of le Tourgue, grown suddenly gigantic, stretched out as far as the forest.

Gauvain walked slowly back and forth in this shadow, in front of the breach of assault. Occasionally, he crossed his hands behind his head, covered with the hood of his war-cloak. He was lost in thought.

CHAPTER II.

FREEDOM OR DEATH — WHICH?

His thoughts were fathomless.

An unexpected change of opinion had just taken place in him.

The Marquis de Lantenac had been transfigured.

Gauvain had been a witness of this transfiguration.

He would never have believed that such things could result from any complication of events. Never, even in his dreams, had he imagined that anything of the kind could happen.

The unforeseen, that strange, haughty power which plays with man, had seized Gauvain and held him fast.

Gauvain had before him an impossibility become a reality, visible, palpable, inevitable, inexorable.

What did he, Gauvain, think of this?

It was not a matter to be evaded; it must be decided.

A question was asked him; he could not escape from it.

Asked by whom?

By events.

And not alone by events.

For when events, which are changeable, ask us a question, justice, which is immutable, calls upon us to reply.

Behind the cloud, which casts a shadow over us, there is a star, giving us a ray of light.

We can no more escape from the light than from the shadow.

Gauvain went through an examination.

He was in the presence of some one.

Before a formidable judge.

His own conscience.

Gauvain felt everything wavering within him. His firmest resolutions, his most carefully made promises, his most irrevocable decisions, everything was swaying in the depths of his will.

There are earthquakes in the soul.

The more he reflected on what he had just seen, the more he was disturbed.

Gauvain, a Republican, believed himself to be, and really was just.

A superior justice had just been revealed to him.

Above Revolutionary justice, there is human justice.

What was taking place was not to be evaded; the fact was solemn; Gauvin was a part of this fact; he was in it, and could not get out of it; and, although Cimourdain had said to him, “this no longer concerns you,” he felt something as a tree does when it is pulled up by the roots.

Every man has his base; if this base is shaken it causes a profound disturbance; Gauvain felt this disturbance.

He pressed his head between his hands, as if to press out the truth; to get at the exact bearings of such a situation was not an easy matter, nothing could be more difficult; he had formidable figures before him, of which he must get the sum total; to do the addition of destiny, how bewildering! he undertook it; he tried to give an account of himself; he endeavored to collect his ideas, to discipline the struggling forces which he felt within him, and to recapitulate the facts.

He laid them out before his mind.

Who has never taken a similar account of himself, and questioned himself, in extreme circumstances, on the course to pursue, whether to advance or retreat?

Gauvin had just seen a miraculous spectacle.

A celestial battle had taken place at the same time as the terrestrial.

The battle of good against evil.

A terrific soul had just been vanquished.

Gauvain had just seen a miracle performed in the case of a man full of all that is bad: — violence, error, blindness, unhealthy obstinacy, pride, selfishness.

The victory of humanity over man.

Humanity had conquered the inhuman.

And by what means? in what way? how had it overcome the giant of anger and hatred? What arms had it used? what engine of war? The cradle.

Gauvain had just been dazzled. In the midst of civil war, in the midst of the conflagration of all enmity and all vengeance, in the darkest and maddest moment of the tumult; just as the crime was giving forth all its fire and hatred, all its blackness; at that instant in conflict when everything becomes a projectile, when the struggle is so shrouded in darkness, that justice, honesty, and truth are lost sight of; — suddenly the Unknown, the mysterious monitor of souls, poured forth resplendently, above all human light and darkness, the great light eternal.

Above the dismal encounter, between the false and the relative, out of the depths, the face of truth had suddenly appeared.

All at once, the strength of the weak had intervened.

Three poor beings, almost newborn, unconscious, deserted, orphaned, alone, lisping, smiling, were seen face to face with civil war, retaliation, the frightful logic of reprisals, murder, carnage, fratricide, rage, malice, all the Gorgons, and yet triumphant. He had seen the failure and defeat of an infamous fire, set to commit a crime; he had seen atrocious intentions baffled and frustrated; he had seen the ancient feudal ferocity, the old inexorable disdain, the pretended experience of the necessities of war, the reason of State, all the arrogant determinations of a cruel old age, vanish before the blue eyes of those who had scarcely begun to live; and it was very natural, for one who has not yet lived can have done no harm; it was justice, it was truth, it was purity and the mighty angels of heaven are in little children.

A useful spectacle; advice; a lesson; the frantic participants in a merciless war had suddenly seen, in the face of all the crimes, of all the outrages, of all the fanaticism, of the murderer, of vengeance stirring the funeral pile, of death coming with a torch in his hand, above the enormous legion of sins, arise this all-conquering power, innocence.

And innocence had been victorious.

And one could say: “No, civil war does not exist; barbarity does not exist; hatred does not exist; crime does not exist; darkness does not exist: this aurora, childhood, is sufficient to scatter all these spectres.

Never, in any struggle, had Satan been more visible nor God.

This battle had had a human conscience for its arena.

The conscience of Lantenac.

Now, it was beginning over again, more furious and still more decisive, perhaps, in another conscience.

The conscience of Gauvain.

What a battle-field is man!

We are slaves to these gods, to these monsters, to these giants, — our thoughts.

Often, these terrible combatants trample our souls under foot.

Gauvain meditated.

The Marquis de Lantenac, surrounded, blockaded, condemned outlawed; held fast, like the wild beast in the circus, like a snail in pincers; shut up in his home, now become his prison; enclosed on all sides by a wall of iron and of fire, — had succeeded in getting away; he had performed a miracle of escape. He had made that masterstroke, the most difficult of all in such a war, flight. He had taken possession of the forest, to intrench himself there; of the country, to fight in it; of the darkness, to disappear in it. He had again become the terrible one, coming and going; the sinister wanderer; the captain of the invisible; the chief of underground men; the master of the woods. Gauvain had the victory; Lantenac had liberty. Lantenac, henceforth, had security, a boundless course before him, an inexhaustible choice of places of refuge. He was intangible, lost to sight, unapproachable. The lion had been taken in a snare, and had escaped from it.

Well, he had returned to it.

The Marquis de Lantenac had voluntarily, spontaneously, of his own free will, left the forest, darkness, security, liberty, to return undauntedly into the most frightful danger. Once, Gauvain had seen him, when he rushed into the fire at the risk of being swallowed up by it; a second time, when he came down the ladder to give himself up to his enemies — that ladder, a means of safety for others, for him a means of destruction.

And why had he done this?

To save three children.

And now, what was going to be done with him?

He would be guillotined.

Were these three children his own? No. Did they belong to his family? No. To his rank? No. For three poor little ones, foundlings, unknown, in rags, barefooted, this nobleman, this prince, this old man, saved, delivered, a conqueror, — for escape is a triumph, — had risked everything, compromised everything, put all things into doubt; and, while he was delivering the children, he proudly surrendered his life, — his life till then so terrible, now so majestic, he offered it up.

And what were they going to do with it?

Accept it.

The Marquis de Lantenac had the choice between the life of others and his own; in this superb option, he had chosen death.

And they were going to grant it to him.

They were going to kill him.

What a reward for heroism!

To respond to an act of generosity with an act of cruelty!

To give this stab to the Revolution!

What a belittling of the Republic!

While a man of prejudices and slavish ideas, suddenly transformed, was returning to humanity, they, the men of freedom and enfranchisment, clung to civil war, to the routine of blood, to fratricide.

And the lofty divine law of pardon, of abnegation, of redemption, of sacrifice, existed for the combatants of error, and did not exist for the soldiers of truth!

What! not engage in this struggle of magnanimity! Be resigned to this defeat; the stronger to become the weaker, the victors to become murderers, and to have it said that on the side of the monarchy there were those who saved children, and on the side of the Republic those who killed old men!

He would see this great soldier, this powerful octogenarian, this unarmed warrior, stolen rather than taken, captured while doing a good deed, bound ith his own permission, with the sweat of a splendid self-sacrifice still on his brow, mount the steps of the scaffold as one mounts the degrees of an apotheosis! And they would put this head, around which would soar in supplication the three souls of the little angels he had saved, under the chopping knife. And before this punishment so infamous for the executioners, a smile would be seen on the face of this man, and on the face of the Republic, a blush!

And this would take place in the presence of Grauvain, the chief!

And, although able to prevent it, he would refrain from doing so! And he could content himself with this haughty dismissal,— “this no longer concerns you! And he was not to perceive that in a deed so monstrous, between the one who accomplishes it and the one who allows it to be done; the one who allows it to be done is the worst, because he is a coward!

But the death of this man, had he not promised it? he, Gauvain, the merciful man, had he not declared that Lantenac was an exception, and that he would give Lantenac up to Cimourdain?

This head, it was his debt. Well, he was paying. That was all.

But was it the same life?

Thus far, Gauvain had only seen in Lantenac the barbarous warrior, the fanatic support of royalty and feudalism, the slaughterer of prisoners, the assassin set loose by war, the deadly man. He had not feared this man; this proscriber, he would proscribe him; this implacable one would find him implacable. Nothing could be more simple, the way was marked out, and dismally easy to follow, everything had been foreseen, they would kill him who killed others, they were in the straight line of horror. This line had been unexpectedly broken, an unforseen turning revealed a new horizon, a metamorphosis had taken place. An unknown Lantenac entered on the scene. A hero came forth from the monster; more than a hero, — a man. More than a soul, — a heart. It was no longer a murderer that Gauvain had before him, but a saviour. Gauvain was overcome by a flood of celestial light. Lantenac had just struck him with a thunderbolt of kindness.

And Lantenac transformed would not transform Gauvain! What! this blow of light would have no counterblow. The man of the past would go ahead, and the man of the future remain behind! The man of cruelty and superstition would spread sudden wings, and would soar above and see crawling under him, in the mire and in the darkness, the man of ideals! Gauvain would remain in the old cruel rut, while Lantenac would rise.

Still another thing.

The family!

This blood that he was going to shed, — for to allow it to be shed was the same as shedding it himself. Was it not his own blood, Gauvain’s? his grandfather was dead, but his great-uncle was alive; and this great-uncle was the Marquis de Lantenac. Would not the brother who was in the grave rise to prevent the other from entering it? would he not order his grandson henceforth to respect that crown of white hair, sister to his own halo? had there not passed between Gauvain and Lantenac the indignant glance of a spectre?

Was the aim of the Revolution then to pervert man’s nature? had it been brought about to destroy the family, to stifle humanity? far from it. It was to affirm these supreme realities, and not to deny them that ‘89 had arisen. Overthrowing the bastilles was delivering humanity; abolishing feudalism was founding the family. The author being the starting-point of authority, and authority being included in the author, there can be no other authority than fraternity; hence the legitimacy of the queen bee who creates her people, and, being mother, is queen; hence the absurdity of the man king who, as he is not the father, cannot be the master; hence the suppression; hence the Republic. What is all this? it is the family, it is humanity, it is the Revolution. The Revolution is the accession of the people, and at bottom the people is man.

The question was whether, when Lantenac had just returned to humanity. Gauvain would return to the family.

The question was whether the uncle and the nephew would be united in the superior light, or whether the nephew would respond to the uncle's progress by taking a backward step.

The question, in this pathetic debate between Gauvain and his conscience stood thus, and seemed to solve itself: to save Lantenac.

Yes, but France?

Here the face of the perplexing problem suddenly changed.

What! France at bay I France betrayed, opened, dismantled! She was without a moat, Germany had crossed the Rhine; she was without a wall, Italy had passed the Alps, and Spain, the Pyrenees. She had the great gulf, the ocean, left. She had that in her favor. She could depend on that, and, a giantess, supported by the mighty sea, could fight against the whole earth. An impregnable situation after all.

Well, no, this situation would fail her. This ocean was no longer hers. In this ocean there was England. England, it is true, did not know how to cross it. Well, a man was going to throw a bridge across to her, a man was going to hold out his hand to her, a man was going to say to Pitt, to Craig, to Cornwallis, to Dundas, to the pirates:

"Come!" A man was going to cry: "England, take France!"

And this man was the Marquis de Lantenac!

They held this man. After three months of chasing, of pursuit, of desperation, they had finally captured him. The hand of the Revolution had just been laid on the wretch; the clenched hand of '93 had taken the royalist murderer by the collar; through one of the effects of that mysterious premeditation from on high which mingles with human affairs, this parricide was now awaiting punishment in his own family-dungeon; the feudal man was in the feudal oubliette; the stones of his own castle rose against him and closed over him, and he who wished to betray his own country was betrayed by his own house.

God had evidently planned all this; the hour of justice had come, the Revolution had taken this public enemy prisoner; he could no longer wage war, he could no longer fight, he could no longer do any harm; in this Vendée where there were so many arms, he was the only man with brains; to put an end to him was to put an end to the civil war; they had possession of him; tragic but fortunate catastrophe; after so much massacre and carnage, he was there, the man who had killed others, and whose turn it was to die.

And if he should find some one to save him!

Cimourdain, that is to say ‘93, held Lantenac, that is to say the monarchy, and if he should find some one to snatch its prey from this claw of bronze! Lantenac, the man in whom concentrated that sheaf of scourges called the past, the Marquis de Lantenac was in the tomb, the heavy, eternal door was closed on him, and if some one should come from outside to slide the bolt! this social malefactor was dead, and with him the revolt, the fratricidal contest, the beastly war, and if some one should bring him back to life!

Oh! how this death’s head would laugh!

How this spectre would say, “Very good, here I am alive; idiots!”

How be would set himself to his hideous work again! How Lantenac would plunge again, implacable and full of delight, into the gulf of hatred and of war! The very next day how the people would again see houses burning, prisoners massacred, the wounded finished, women shot!

And, after all, did not Gauvain exaggerate this deed which fascinated him so?

Three children were lost; Lantenac had saved them.

But who was the cause of their being lost?

Was it not Lantenac?

Who had put those cradles into the fire?

Was it not l’Imânus?

Who was l’Imânus?

The lieutenant of the marquis.

The general is the one responsible.

So the incendiary and the assassin was Lantenac.

What had he done that was so admirable?

He had not carried out his purpose — nothing more.

After havng planned the crime he had retreated from it. It had seemed to him too horrible. The mother’s cry had awakened in him those inmost depths of human pity, a sort of storehouse of universal life, which exists in all souls, even the most hardened. At this cry he had retraced his steps. From the night into which he had plunged, he had gone back towards the daylight. After having done the crime, he undid it. All his merit lay in this, that he had not been a monster at the very last.

And for so little give him back everything! give him back space, the fields, the flames, the air, daylight; give him back the forest, which he would use to protect his bandits; give him back liberty, which he would use for servitude; give him back life, which he would use for death!

As for trying to come to an understanding with him, as for any desire to treat with this proud soul, as for proposing to give him his liberty conditionally, as for asking him to consent, provided his life was saved, to abstain henceforth from all hostility and all revolt, — what a mistake such an offer would be, what an advantage they would give him, what scorn they would strike against, as he would buffet the question with his reply, as he would say: “Keep your shame for yourselves! Kill me!”

There was really nothing to be done with this man but to kill him or to set him free. There was no way of access to this man.

He was always ready to take flight or to sacrifice himself; he was his own eagle and his own precipice. A strange soul.

Kill him? What an anxiety! Set him free? What a responsibility!

If Lantenac should be saved, the war with la Vendée would have to be begun all over again, as with a hydra, as long as its head is not cut off. In a twinkling, and with the swiftness of a meteor, the flame, extinguished by the disappearance of this man, would blaze forth again. Lantenac would not rest until he had realized that execrable plan of placing, like the cover of a tomb, the monarchy over the Republic, and England over France. To save Lantenac was to sacrifice France; Lantenac’s life meant the death of a multitude of innocent beings, men, women, and children, taken in the toils of domestic war; it meant the landing of the English, the retreat of the Revolution, towns plundered, the people slaughtered, Brittany bleeding, the prey given back to the lion’s claws. And Gauvain, in the midst of all sorts of uncertain glimmerings and contradictory lights, saw dimly outlined in his thoughts this problem rising before him: setting the tiger at liberty.

And then the question came back again under its first aspect; the stone of Sisyphus, which is nothing but the quarrel of man with himself, fell down again: Was Lantenac this tiger?

Perhaps he had been, but was he any longer? Gauvain went through those winding mazes of the mind coiling about itself, which make thought resemble an adder. Really, even after examination, could he deny Lantenac's devotion, his stoic abnegation, his superb disinterestedness; What! In the presence of all the open mouths of civil war to testify to humanity! What! in the conflict of inferior truths to bring in truth superior! what! to prove that above royalties, above revolutions, above earthly questions, there is the immense emotion of the human soul? the protection due to the weak from the strong; safety due to those who are lost, from those who are safe; paternity due to all children, from all old men! To prove these magnificent things, and prove them by the gift of his life! What! to be a general, and renounce strategy, battle, revenge! What! to be a royalist, to take the scales, to place on one side the king of France, a monarchy of fifteen centuries, the reestablishing of old laws, the restoration of ancient society, and on the other, three little insignificant peasants, and to find the king, the throne, the sceptre, and the fifteen centuries of monarchy tip the beam, against this weight of three innocent children! What! all that go for nothing! What! one who had done that remain a tiger and deserve to be treated like a wild beast!

No! no! no! it was not a monster of a man who had just illuminated civil war with the light of a divine action! The sword-bearer had been metamorphosed into an angel of light. Infernal Satan had returned as the celestial Lucifer. Lantenac had been redeemed from all his barbarities by an act of sacrifice; in losing himself materially, he had saved himself morally; he had become innocent; he had signed his own pardon. Does not the right to pardon one's self exist? Henceforth, he would be worthy of worship.

Lantenac had just been extraordinary, it was now Gauvain's turn.

Gauvain was called upon to respond to him.

The struggling of good and evil passions at this moment were turning the world into chaos; Lantenac, ruling over this chaos, had just freed humanity from it; it was now for Gauvain to free the family from it.

What was he going to do?

Would Gauvain disappoint trust in God?

No. And he stammered in his inmost heart: "We must save Lantenac."

Well, that is good. Go on, help the English. Be a deserter. Pass over to the enemy. Save Lantenac and betray France.

And he shuddered.

Thy solution is no solution at all, oh dreamer! Gauvain saw in the darkness the ominous smile of the sphinx.

This situation was a sort of terrible meeting of roads, where struggling truths come to an end and confront each other, and where man's three highest ideas, humanity, the family, the fatherland, look each other steadily in the face.

Each of these voices in turn began to speak, and each in turn spoke the truth. How to choose? Each in turn seemed to find the union of wisdom and justice, and said: "Do this." Was this what he ought to do? Yes. No. Reason said one thing, sentiment said another; the two counsels were contrary. Reasoning is only reason; sentiment is often conscience; one comes from man, the other from above.

That is why sentiment has less clearness and more power.

But what strength in stern reason!

Gauvain hesitated.

Fierce perplexities.

Two abysses opened in front of Gauvain. To destroy the marquis? or to save him? It would be necessary to plunge into one or the other.

Which of these two abysses was duty?

CHAPTER III.

THE GENERAL'S CLOAK.

It was indeed a question of duty.

Duty rose forbidding, before Cimourdain; terrible before Gauvain.

Plain, before one; complex, varied, tortuous, before the other.

The hour of midnight struck, then one o'clock in the morning.

Without being aware of it, Gauvain had imperceptibly approached the entrance of the breach.

The fire now only threw a diffused reflection and was dying out.

The plateau, on the other side of the tower, was lighted with the reflection, and became visible occasionally, and then was eclipsed as the smoke covered the fire. This blaze, flaring up suddenly and then cut off by sudden darkness, robbed objects of their proportions, and gave the sentinels in the camp the appearance of ghosts. Gauvain, as he meditated, vaguely watched the flames and smoke come and go. This appearance and disappearance of light before his eyes was strangely analogous to the appearance and disappearance of truth in his mind.

Suddenly, between two clouds of smoke, a flame from the dying bed of coals vividly lighted up the top of the plateau and brought out the crimson form of a wagon. Gauvain looked at this wagon; it was surrounded by horsemen wearing military caps. It seemed to him that it was the wagon which Guéchamp's spyglass had brought into sight on the horizon, some hours before, just as the sun was setting. Some men were on the wagon, and seemed busy unloading it. What they were taking from the wagon seemed heavy, and occasionally gave out a sound like iron; it would have been difficult to tell what it was; it looked like framework; two of them got down and placed a box upon the ground, which, to judge from its shape, contained some triangular object.

The flame died out, everything disappeared in the darkness; Gauvain, with his eyes still fastened on the spot, wondered what there was over there in the darkness.

The lanterns were lighted, there was coming and going off the plateau; but the forms moving about were confused, and, moreover, Gauvain, below, and on the other side of the ravine, could not see what was on the very edge of the plateau.

Voices were talking, but he could not tell what they said. Now and then, blows sounded on wood. He heard too, a strange metallic grating, like the sound of the whetting of a scythe.

Two o'clock struck.

Gauvain went slowly towards the breach, like one who would willingly take two steps forward and three back. Recognizing, in the dim light, the cloak and braided hood of the commander, the sentinels presented arms at his approach. Gauvain went into the hall on the ground floor, now transformed into a guardroom. A lantern was hanging from the arch. It gave just light enough to enable one to cross the hall without stepping on the men belonging to the post, who were lying on the straw on the floor, and for the most part asleep.

They had lain down there; a few hours before, they had been fighting there; the grapeshot, scattered under them in grains of iron and lead, which had not been entirely swept away, disturbed their rest somewhat; but they were weary, and sank to sleep again. This hall had been the place of horror; here had been the attack; here they had roared, howled, gnashed their teeth, given blows, killed, expired; many of them had fallen dead on the pavement where they were now lying asleep; this straw which served them for beds had drunk up the blood of their comrades; now, it was over, the blood was stanched, the sabres were dried, the dead were dead; they were sleeping peacefully. Such is war. And then to-morrow everybody will sleep the same sleep.

As Gauvain entered, some of these drowsy men rose, among others, the officer commanding the post. Gauvain pointed to the door of the dungeon, —

"Open for me," he said.

The bolts were drawn, the door opened.

Gaavain went into the dungeon.

The door closed behind him.

BOOK SEVENTH. — FEUDALISM AND REVOLUTION.

CHAPTER I.

THE ANCESTOR.

A lamp stood on the flagstones of the crypt, beside the square air-hole of the oubliette.

The jug filled with water, the soldier’s bread, and a bundle of straw were also on the floor. As the crypt was hewn out of the rock, the prisoner who had a fancy for setting his straw on fire would have his trouble for his pains; no risk of fire for the prison; certain asphyxiation for the prisoner.

When the door turned on its hinges, the marquis was walking about his dungeon; a mechanical going to and fro, peculiar to all caged wild beasts.

At the noise made by opening and then closing the door, he raised his head, and the lamp on the floor between Gauvain and the marquis shone full on these two men, now face to face.

They looked at each other, and this look was such that it made them both motionless.

The marquis burst out laughing, and exclaimed, —

“Good-morning, sir. It is many years since I have had the good fortune to meet you. You are very kind to come to see me. I thank you. I ask for nothing better than to have a little talk. It was beginning to be tedious. Your friends are losing time, establishing identity, court-martial, all these formalities take a long time. I should be quicker about it. I am at home here. Have the goodness to come in. Well, what do you think of all that is going on? It is original, isn’t it? Once there was a king and a queen; the king was the king; the queen was France. They cut off the king’s head, and married the queen to Robespierre; this gentleman and this lady had a daughter whom they named the guillotine, and it seems that I am to make her acquaintance to-morrow morning. I shall be charmed to do so, — as I am to see you. Have you come for that? Have you risen in rank? Shall you be the executioner? If it is merely a visit of friendship, I am touched by it. Monsieur le Vicomte, perhaps you no longer know what a nobleman is. Well, here is one; that is, myself. Look at him. It is strange. He believes in God, he believes in tradition, he believes in the family, he believes in his forefathers, he believes in the example of his father, in fidelity, in loyalty, in the duty towards his prince, in respect for old laws, in virtue, in justice; and he would have you shot with pleasure. I beg of you, have the kindness to sit down. On the floor, it is true; for there are no easy-chairs in this drawing-room; but he who lives in the mire can sit on the floor. I do not say this to offend you, for what we call mire, you call the nation. Doubtless, you will not compel me to cry ‘Liberty! Equality! Fraternity!’ This was once a room in my own house; formerly, the seigneurs put peasants here; now, the peasants put seigneurs here. This nonsense is called a Revolution. It seems that I am to have my head cut off in thirty-six hours. I see no inconvenience in that. But, if they were polite, they would have sent me my snuff-box, which is up in the room of mirrors, where you played when a child, and where I used to trot you on my knee. Sir, I am going to tell you one thing; you are called Gauvain, and, strange to say, you have noble blood in your veins, by Heaven! the same blood as mine, and that blood which makes me a man of honor, makes you a blackguard. Such are circumstances. You will tell me that it is not your fault. Nor mine. By Heaven! one may be a malefactor without being aware of it. It is in the air one breathes; in times like ours, one is not responsible for his acts; the Revolution makes a rascal of everybody; and our great criminals are great innocents. What blockheads! Beginning with yourself. Allow me to admire you. Yes, I admire a boy like you, who, a man of rank, of good position in the State, having noble blood to shed for noble causes, viscount of this Tour-Gauvain, prince of Brittany, a duke by right, and a peer by inheritance, which is nearly all that can be desired here below, by a man of good sense, — amuses himself, being what he is, by being what you are, so that he seems to his enemies like a villain, and to his friends like an idiot. By the way, give my regards to monsieur the Abbé Cimourdain.”

The marquis spoke easily, calmly, without emphasizing any of his words, in his social tone of voice, his eye clear and quiet, both hands in his pockets. He stopped speaking, drew a long breath, and went on, —

“I will not conceal from you the fact that I did what I could to kill you. Just as you see me, I have myself personally aimed a cannon at you. A discourteous proceeding, I admit; but it would be depending on a bad maxim to imagine that an enemy in war should try to be agreeable to you. For we are at war, my nephew. Everything is fire and blood. Nevertheless, it is true that the king has been killed. Fine times!”

He stopped again, then went on, —

“To think that none of these things would have happened if Voltaire had been hanged and Rousseau had been sent to the galleys! Ah! People of intelligence, what a shame! Ah, what do you reproach this monarchy with? It is true, they sent the Abbé Pucelle to his abbey in Corbigny, giving him the choice of an equipage, and all the time he wished in which to make the journey; and, as for your Monsieur Titon, who, if you please, had been a very dissipated man, and who frequented the houses of loose women before taking part in the miracles of Deacon Pâris, — he, I say, was transferred from the castle of Vincennes to the castle of Ham in Picardy, which is, I confess, a pretty detestable place. There were grievances; I remember very well; I have also protested in my time; I was as stupid as you are!”

The marquis felt in his pocket, as though searching for his snuff-box, and went on, —

“But not so bad. We talked for the sake of talking. There was also a meeting in the way of investigations and petitions; and then came these philosophers, but they burned their works instead of their bodies; and court intriguers got themselves mixed up in it. We had all those boobies, — Turgot, Quesnay, Malesherbes, the physiocrats, etc., — and the quarrel began again. It was all the fault of these scribblers and poetasters. The Encyclopædia! Diderot! d’Alembert! Ah, those rascally good-for-nothings! The idea of a man of good birth like the King of Prussia getting taken in by them. If I had been he, I should have squelched all paper scratchers. Ah! we Gauvains used to be great lovers of justice in old days! Here, on the wall, you can see the marks left by the quartering- wheels! We did not allow any nonsense, No, no; no scribblers. As long as there are men like Arouët, there will be Marats. As long as there are low fellows who use their pens, there will be knaves who use their daggers; as long as there is ink, there will be blots; as long as the paw of man holds the goose quill, frivolous stupidities will engender cruel stupidities. Books cause crimes. The word ‘chimæra’ has two meanings: it signifies ‘dream’ and it signifies ‘monster.’ How dear we have to pay for trash. What is the meaning of your song about ‘rights’? Rights of man! rights of the people! All that is empty enough, stupid enough, imaginary enough, senseless enough! Now, when I say: ‘Havaise, sister of Conan II., brought the County of Brittany to Hoël, Count de Nantes, and Cornwall, who left the throne to Alain Fergant, uncle to Bertha, who married Alain le Noir, Seigneur of la Roche-sur-Yon, and had by him Conan le Petit, grandfather of Guy or Gauvain de Thouars, our ancestor,’ I make a definite statement, and there is a right for you. But your idiots, your knaves, your miserable wretches, what do they call their rights? Deicide and regicide. Ah! how hideous it all is! Ah, the scoundrels! I am sorry for you, sir; for you are of the proudest blood of Brittany; you and I have for our grandfather Gauvain do Thouars; we have, moreover, among our ancestors that great Duc de Montbazon, who was a peer of France, and honored with the Collar of the Orders, who attacked the suburb of Tours and was wounded at the battle of Arques, and died. Master of the Hounds, in his own house of Couziéres in Touraine, at the age of eighty-six. I might name to you also the Duc de Landunois, son of the Lady of la Garnache, of Claude de Lorraine, Due de Chevreuse and of Henri de Lenoncourt, and of Françoise de Laval-Boisdauphin. But what is the use? Monsieur has the honor of being an idiot, and he claims the right of being the equal of my groom. Know this: I was an old man when you were still a brat. I have wiped your nose for you, and I could do it still. In growing to the stature of a man, you have succeeded in belittling yourself. Since we last met, we have each gone in our own way: I, in the direction of honesty; you, in the opposite direction. Ah! I do not know how ail this will end: but these gentlemen, your friends, are noble beggars! Ah! yes; it is fine; I am in perfect sympathy with all these splendid signs of progress; in the army, the punishment of giving the drunken soldier a pint of cold water for three days running has been abolished; you have your maximum, your convention, your Bishop Gobel, your Monsieur Chaumette and Monsieur Hébert, and you have wiped out all the past at one fell swoop, from the Bastille to the Almanach. You are putting vegetables in place of saints. Ail right, citizens, be our masters, rule, take your ease, do what you please, do not stand on ceremony. But it will not in the least prevent religion from being religion, or royalty from filling fifteen hundred years of our history, and the old French nobles, even after you have cut off their heads, from standing higher than you.

“As to your quibbles about the historic right of royal families, we shrug our shoulders at it. Chilpéric, in reality, was only a monk named Daniel; Rainfroi set up Chilpéric to annoy Charles Martel. We know these things as well as you do. That is not the point. This is the question: to be a great Kingdom, to be the ancient France, to be this magnificent land of system, according to which first the sacred person of the monarch, absolute lord of the state, is regarded, then the princes, then the crown officers in charge of the army on land and sea, of the artillery, and the direction and superintendence of finances. Then came the judges of the higher and lower courts, followed by the officials engaged in the revenues and receipts of custom, and lastly the police of the kingdom in its three orders. There was something fine and noble in this system. You have destroyed it. You have destroyed provinces, like the miserable ignoramuses that you are, without having an idea of what the provinces were. The genius of France is made up of the very genius of the continent, and each one of the provinces of France represented a virtue of Europe. The ingenuousness of Germany was in Picardy; the generosity of Sweden, in Champaign; the industry of Holland, in Burgundy; the activity of Poland, in Languedoc; the sobriety of Spain, in Gascony; the wisdom of Italy, in Provence; the subtility of Greece, in Normandy; the fidelity of Switzerland, in Dauphiné.

"You knew nothing of all that. You have broken, shattered, smashed, destroyed, and you have been blindly acting like brutes. Ah! you will have no more nobility. Very well, your wishes will be gratified. Mourn for them. You will have no more paladins, no more heroes. Farewell, grandeur of old! Find me an Assas now! You are all afraid for your skins! You will have no more chevaliers like Fontenoy, who saluted before dealing the deathblow. You will have no more combatants like those who fought in silk stockings at the siege of Lérida; you will have no more of those proud tournaments when plumes flashed by like meteors; you are a people which has run its course; you will indure invasion, which is a rape. If Alaric II. returned from the dead he would not find himself confronting Clovis; if Abdérame came back he would not find Charles Martel to face him. If the Saxons came back they would not find Pepin. You will have no more heroes like Agnadel, Rocroy, Lens, Staffarde, Nerwinde, Steinkirk, La Marsaille, Raucoux, Lawfeld, Mahon. You will no longer have a Marignan with François I.; no longer Bouvines, with Philippe-Auguste taking prisoner with one-hand Renaud, Count of Bologna, and with the other, Ferrand, Count of Flanders. You will have Azincourt, but you will have no Sieur de Bacqueville, grand bearer of the oriflamme, wrapping himself in his banner, to meet his death. Go! go! do your work! Be the new men! Become pigmies!"

The marquis was silent for a moment and then continued, —

"But leave us great. Kill the kings, kill the nobles, kill the priests, slaughter, destroy, massacre, trample everything under foot; grind the ancient maxims under your heels, trample on the throne, stamp down the altar, blot out God, dance on the ruins! That is your affair. You are traitors and cowards, incapable of devotion and sacrifice. I have spoken. Now have me guillotined, monsieur le vicomte. I have the honor to be your most humble servant.”

And he added,

“Ah! I tell you the truth about yourself! What difference will it make to me? I am dead.”

“You are free,” said Gauvain.

And Gauvain stepped towards the marquis, took off his commander’s cloak, threw it over Lantenac’s shoulders and pulled the hood down over his eyes. They were of the same height.

“Well, what is this that you are doing?” said the marquis.

Gauvain raised his voice and cried: “Lieutenant, open the door!”

The door opened. Gauvain said: “Take care to close the door behind me.” And he pushed the astonished marquis outside.

The lower hall changed to a guardroom, as will be remembered, was lighted only by a horn lantern making objects dimly visible, and the darkness there was more powerful than the light. In this faint glimmer, those of the soldiers who were not asleep saw walk through their midst towards the entrance a tall man wearing the braided cloak and hood of the commander-in-chief; they gave the military salute, and the man passed on.

The marquis slowly crossed the guardroom, made his way through the breach, hitting his head more than once, and went out.

The sentinel, thinking it was Gauvain, presented arms.

When he was outside, with the grass of the fields under his feet, two hundred paces from the forest, with space, night, liberty, life, before him, he stopped and stood still for a moment like a man who has offered no resistance, who has yielded to surprise, and having taken advantage of an open door, tries to find out whether he has acted well or ill, hesitates before going farther, and listens to a last thought. After a few moments of careful reflection, he raised his right hand, snapped his thumb and middle finger, and said: “Ma foi!”

And he went on his way.

The door of the dungeon had closed again. Gauvain was inside.

CHAPTER II.

THE COURT-MARTIAL.

Courts-martial at that time were endowed with very nearly discretional powers. Dumas, at the legislative Assembly, had sketched out a plan for military legislation, revised later on by Talbot, at the Council of the Five Hundred, but a final code for councils of war was not framed till the time of the empire. It is from the empire, by the way, that dates the obligation imposed upon military tribunals to begin taking votes from officers of inferior rank. This law was not in existence at the time of the Revolution.

In 1793, the presiding officer of a military tribunal was practically the whole tribunal himself; he chose the members, classed the orders of rank, regulated the mode of voting; he was master as well as judge.

Cimourdain had selected for the council-room of the court-martial, this same hall on the ground floor where the retirade had been and where the guardroom was now. He intended to make short work of everything, the way from the prison to the tribunal, and the passage from the tribunal to the scaffold.

At noon, in conformance with his orders, the court was in session with the following adjuncts, — three straw-seated chairs, a deal table, two lighted candles, a stool in front of the table.

The chairs were for the judges and the stool for the accused. At each end of the table there was another stool, one for the commissioner-auditor, who was a quartermaster, the other for the clerk, who was a corporal.

On the table was a stick of red sealing-wax, the copper seal of the Republic, two ink-stands, some sheets of white paper, and two printed placards, spread out open, one containing the declaration of outlawing, the other the decree of the Convention.

Behind the middle chair was a group of tricolored flags; in these times of rude simplicity, decorations were quickly made, and it took little time to change a guardroom into a court of justice.

The middle chair, destined for the presiding officer, faced the door of the dungeon.

The soldiers were the public.

Two gendarmes guarded the stool.

Cimourdain was seated on the middle chair, having Captain Guéchamp on his right as first judge, and on his left the Sergeant Radoub, as second judge.

He wore his hat with a tricolored plume, his sabre at his side, his two pistols in his belt. His scar, which was a vivid red, added to his ferocious appearance.

Radoub had at last allowed his wound to be dressed. Around his head he had a handkerchief on which a bloodstain was slowly increasing in size.

At noon before the court had opened, an express, whose horse could be heard pawing the ground outside, stood near the table of the tribunal. Cimourdain was writing. He wrote this, —

“Citizens, members of the Committee of Public Welfare, —

Lantenac is taken. He will be executed to-morrow.”

He dated the despatch, signed it, folded it, sealed it, and gave it to the messenger who started away.

Having done this, Cimourdain said in a loud voice, —

“Open the dungeon.”

The two gendarmes drew back the bolts, opened the dungeon and went in. Cimourdain raised his head, folded his arms, looked at the door and cried, —

“Bring in the prisoner.”

A man appeared between the two gendarmes, under the arch of the open door.

It was Gauvain.

Cimourdain shuddered.

“Gauvain!” he exclaimed.

And he added, —

“I demand the prisoner.”

“I am the prisoner,” said Gauvain.

“You?”

“I myself.”

“But where is Lantenac?”

“He is free.”

“Free!”

“Yes.”

“Escaped?”

“Escaped.”

Cimourdain trembling stammered, —

“To be sure, this castle is his, he knows all the means of exit; perhaps the oubliette communicates with some way out; I ought to have thought that he would find some way to escape; he would need no one’s aid for that.”

“He was aided,” said Gauvain.

“To escape?”

“To escape.”

“Who aided him?”

“I did.”

“You?”

“Yes.”

“You are dreaming!”

“I entered the dungeon; I was alone with the prisoner; I took off my cloak, I threw it over his shoulders, I pulled the hood down over his eyes; he went out in my place, and I remained in his. Here I am.”

“You did not do that!”

“I did do it.”

“It is impossible.”

“It is a fact!”

“Bring Lantenac here!”

“He is no longer here. The soldiers, seeing the commander’s cloak, took him for me, and let him pass. It was still night.”

“You are mad.”

“I am telling you the truth.”

There was a silence. Cimourdain stammered, —

“Then you deserve——”

“Death,” said Gauvain.

Cimourdain was as pale as a corpse. He was as motionless as a man who has been struck by lightning. It seemed as if he could no longer breathe. Great drops of sweat stood on his forehead.

He steadied his voice and said, —

“Gendarmes, seat the accused.”

Gauvain sat down on the stool.

Cimourdain added, —

“Gendarmes, draw your swords.”

This was the customary formality when the accused was under sentence of capital punishment.

The gendarmes drew their swords.

Cimourdain’s voice had regained its usual tone.

“Accused,” he said, rise.”

He no longer addressed Gauvain familiarly.

CHAPTER III.

THE VOTES.

Gauvain rose.

“What is your name?” asked Cimourdain.

Gauvain replied, “Gauvain.”

Cimourdain questioned him further.

“Who are you?”

“I am commander-in-chief of the reconnoitring column of the Coasts of the North.”

“Are you a relative or connection of the man who has escaped?”

“I am his grand-nephew.”

“Are you familiar with the decree of the Convention?”

“I see the notice of it on your table.”

“What have you to say to this decree?”

“That I countersigned it, that I ordered it to be carried out, and that it was I who had the placard printed, and that my name is at the bottom of it.”

“Choose a defender.”

“I will defend myself.”

“You may speak.”

Cimourdain had grown calm again. Only his calmness was less like the composure of a man than the tranquillity of a rock.

Gauvain remained silent for a moment, and, as it were, collecting his thoughts.

Cimourdain spoke again.

“What have you to say in your defence?”

Gauvain slowly raised his head, without looking at anybody, and replied:—

“This: one thing prevented me from seeing any other; a good action, seen too near, concealed a hundred criminal actions from my eyes; on one side an old man, on the other, children, ail this came between me and duty. I forgot the villages burned, the fields ravaged, the prisoners massacred, the wounded murdered, the women shot. I forgot France betrayed to England; I liberated the murderer of his country. I am guilty. In speaking thus, I seem to speak against myself; it is a mistake. I am speaking for myself. When the guilty person confesses his fault, he saves the only thing worth the trouble of saving — honor."

"Is this," replied Cimourdain, "all that you have to say for your defence?"

"I will add that being the chief, I owe an example, and that you, for your part, being the judge, owe one too."

"What example do you demand?"

"My death."

"Do you think it just?"

"And necessary."

"Be seated."

The quartermaster, as commissioner-auditor, rose and gave a reading; first of the sentence, which outlawed the ci-devant Marquis de Lantenac; secondly, the decree of the Convention inflicting punishment of death on any one aiding the escape of a rebel prisoner. It ended with some lines printed at the bottom of the notice of the decree, forbidding any one "to carry aid and assistance" to the above-named rebel "under pain of death," and signed, —

"The commander-in-chief of the reconnoitring column, Gauvain."

Having finished these readings, the commissioner-auditor sat down again.

Cimourdain folded his arms and said, —

"Accused, pay attention. Audience, listen, look, and be silent. You have the law before you. It will now be put to vote. The sentence will be given according to the simple majority. Each judge will give his opinion in turn, aloud, in presence of the accused, justice having nothing to conceal.

Cimourdain continued, —

"The first judge has the floor. Speak, Captain Guéchamp."

Captain Guechamp appeared to see neither Cimourdain, nor Gauvain. He dropped his eyelids, which concealed his motionless eyes fixed on the notice of the decree, and considering it as one considers an abyss. He said, —

"The law is positive. A judge is more and less than a man; he is less than a man, for he has no heart; he is more than a man, because he has the sword. In the year 414 of Rome, Manlius put his son to death for the crime of having won a victory without his order. Violated discipline demands an expiation. In this case it is the law which has been violated; and the law is still higher than discipline. In consequence of an outburst of pity, the country is again placed in danger. Pity may have the proportions of a crime. Commander Gauvain has caused the escape of the rebel Lantenac. Gauvain is guilty. I vote death.”

“Write it down, clerk,” said Cimourdain.

The clerk wrote, “Captain Guéchamp: death.”

Gauvain raised his voice, —

“Guéchamp,” he said, you have voted well, and I thank you.”

Cimourdain proceeded, —

“The second judge has the floor. Speak, Sergeant Radoub.”

“Radoub rose, turned towards Gauvain and saluted the accused. Then he cried out, —

“If it is so, then, guillotine me, for I give you here, in the sight of God, my most sacred word of honor that I should like to have done, first what the old man did, and then what my commander has done. When I saw that man, eighty years old, throw himself into the fire to save three babies, I said, “Good man, you are brave!” and when I learn that my commander had saved this old man from your beast of a guillotine, by a thousand saints I say, “My commander, you ought to be my general, and you are a true man, and as for me, by thunder! I would give you the cross of Saint Louis, if there were still crosses, and if there were still saints, and if there were still Louis!”

“Ah! are you going to be idiots now? If it was for such things as this that we won the battle of Jemmapes, the battle of Valmy, the battle of Fleurus, and the battle of Wattignies, then it must be admitted. What! Here Commander Gauvain, for four months, has been leading these jackasses of royalists to the beat of the drum, and saving the Republic by his sword, and did a thing at Dol which required a pretty amount of cleverness, and when you have this man here, you try to have him no longer! And instead of making him your general, you want to chop off his head! I say that it is enough to make one throw himself head first over the parapet of the Pont-Neuf, and that if you yourself, Citizen Gauvain, my commander, were my corporal instead of my general, I would tell you that what you said just now was infernal nonsense. The old man did well in saving the children, you did well to save the old man; and if people are to be guillotined for good deeds, then get you gone to all the devils, for I don’t know at all what it is about. There is no reason at all for stopping anywhere. All this is not true, is it? I pinch myself to know whether I am awake. I do not understand. So the old man ought to have let the babies burn alive, my commander ought to let the old man's head be cut off. Yes, and then guillotine me. I like the one idea as much as the other. I suppose if the little ones had died, the battalion of Bonnet-Rouge would have been dishonored. Is that what was wanted? Then let us eat each other. I know my politics as well as you. I belonged to the club in the section of the Piques. Sapristi! We are growing brutal at last! I sum it all up according to my way of looking at it. I do not like things which have the inconvenience of making us unable to tell at all where we are. Why the devil do we have each other killed? Why kill our chief? Not that, Lisette. I want my chief! I must have my chief. I love him better to-day than I did yesterday. But to send him to the guillotine, why, you make me laugh! We want none of this: I have listened. You may say whatever you like, but it is not possible."

And Radoub sat down. His wound had opened again. A thread of blood carae out from under the bandage and ran down his neck, from the place where his ear had been.

Cimourdain turned towards Radoub, —

"Do you vote that the accused be absolved?"

"I vote," said Radoub, "to have him made generaL"

"I ask if you vote to have him acquitted."

"I vote to have him made the first in the Republic."

"Sergeant Radoub, do you vote to have the Commandant Gauvain acquitted, — yes or no?"

"I vote to have my head cut off instead of his."

"Acquittal," said Cimourdain. "Write, clerk."

The clerk wrote, "Sergeant Radoub: acquittal."

Then the clerk said, —

"One voice for death. One voice for acquittal."

It was Cimourdain's turn to vote.

He rose. He took off his hat and laid it on the table.

He was no longer pale nor livid. His face was the color of earth.

If all present had been lying in their shrouds, the silence would not have been more profound.

Cimourdain said in a solemn voice, slowly, and with decision, —

"Accused Gauvain, the cause has been heard. In the name of the Republic, the court-martial, by the majority of two to one—"

He stopped, there was a moment of suspense; did he hesitate before death? did he hesitate before life? All held their breath. Cimourdain continued, —

“Condemn you to death.”

His face expressed the torture of an awful triumph.

When Jacob compelled the angel whom he had overthrown in the darkness to bless him, he must have worn that terrible smile.

It was only a glimmer, and it passed away. Cimourdain became again like marble, sat down, put his hat on his head, and added, —

“Gauvain, you will be executed to-morrow, at sunrise.”

Gauvain rose, saluted him, and said, —

“I thank the court.”

“Lead away the condemned,” said Cimourdain.

Cimourdain made a sign, the door of the dungeon was opened, Gauvain went in, the dungeon was closed. The two gendarmes remained on guard at each side of the door, with drawn sabres.

They carried away Radoub, who had just fallen unconscious.

CHAPTER IV.

AFTER CIMOURDAIN AS A JUDGE, CIMOURDAIN AS MASTER.

A camp is a wasp's nest. Especially in times of Revolution. The civic sting which is in the soldier acts readily and quickly, and does not hesitate to attack the chief after having driven away the enemy.

The valiant troop which had taken la Tourgue made various complaints; at first against the Commander Gauvain, when they learned of Lantenac's escape. When they saw Gauvain come out of the dungeon which they supposed held Lantenac, it was like an electric shock, and in less than a minute the whole corps was informed. A murmur burst forth from the little army; the first murmur was, —

"They are judging Gauvain. But it is only a sham. Oh, yes, have great faith in ex-nobles and in priests! We have just seen a viscount save a marquis, and we shall see a priest pardon a noble!"

When they learned of Gauvain's sentence, there was a second murmur, "That is too much! our chief, our brave chief, our young commander, a hero! He is a viscount, well it is all the more credit to him for being Republican! What! he, the liberator of Pontorson, of Villedieu, of Pont-àu-Beau! The conqueror of Dol and of La Tourgue! He through whom we are invincible; he who is the sword of the Republic in la Vendée! The man who, for five months, has held the Chouans at bay, and made up for all the folly of Léchelle and the rest! This Cimourdain dares condemn him to death! Why? Because he saved an old man who had saved three children! A priest kill a soldier!"

Thus the victorious but discontented camp grumbled. A sullen anger surrounded Cimourdain. Four thousand men against one: it seems as if this must be strength; not at all. These four thousand men were a multitude, and Cimourdain was a will.

They knew that Cimourdain frowned easily, and nothing more was needed to hold the army in respect. In these times of severity, it was enough for the shadow of the Committee of Public Welfare to be behind a man to make this man feared, and to make an imprecation end in a whisper, and the whisper end in silence. After as well as before these murmurs, Cimourdain remained the arbiter of Gauvain's fate, and the fate of all. They knew there was nothing to ask of him, and that he would obey nothing but his conscience, a superhuman voice heard by himself alone.

Everything depended on him; what he had done as judge-martial, alone, he could undo as civil delegate. He alone was able to pardon him. He had full power; by a sign he could set Gauvain free; he was the master of life and of death; he was commander of the guillotine. At this tragic time, he was the man above all others.

They could only wait.

Night came on.

CHAPTER V.

THE DUNGEON.

The hall of justice had become the guardroom again; the watch was doubled, as the day before; two sentinels guarded the door of the closed dungeon.

About midnight a man holding a lantern in his hand, crossed the guardroom, made himself known, and had the dungeon opened.

It was Cimourdain.

He went in and the door remained ajar behind him.

The dungeon was dark and silent. Cimourdain took a step into the darkness, set the lantern on the floor, and stood still. He heard the regular breathing of a man asleep. Cimourdain listened thoughtfully to this peaceful sound.

Gauvain was on the bundle of straw on the floor of the dungeon. It was his breath which was heard. He was sound asleep.

Cimourdain went forward with the least possible noise, came close to Gauvain and began to look at him; a mother looking at her sleeping babe would have no more tender and unspeakable fondness in her face. This sight was perhaps too much for Cimourdain; Cimourdain pressed both hands over his eyes, as children do some times, and remained motionless for a moment. Then he knelt down and raised Gauvain's hand gently to his lips.

Gauvain stirred. He opened his eyes, with the vague surprise of one suddenly awakened. The lantern feebly lighted the dungeon. He recognized Cimourdain.

"Ah!" he said, "it is you, my master."

And he added, —

"I was dreaming that death kissed my hand."

Cimourdain shuddered, as we sometimes do at the abrupt invasion of a surge of thoughts; sometimes this tide is so high and so stormy that it seems as if it would drown the soul. Nothing escaped from the depths of Cimourdain's heart. He could only say —

"Gauvain!"

And they looked at each other; Cimourdain with his eyes full of those flames which burn tears, Gauvain with his gentlest smile.

Gauvain rose on his elbow, and said —

“This scar which I see on your face is from the sabre cut that you received for me. Yesterday, again; you were in the struggle beside me and on account of me. If Providence had not placed you near my cradle, where should I be to-day? In darkness. If I have any idea of duty, it has come from you. I was born bound. Prejudices are ligatures; you removed these bands from me, you have given me liberty of growth, and of what was only a mummy you made a child once more. You gave a consciousness to the abortion that would otherwise have been. Had it not been for you, I should have grown up a dwarf. I exist through you. I was only a seigneur, you made me a citizen. I was only a citizen, you made me an intellect; you made me fit, as a man, for this earthly life, and, as a soul, for the life celestial. You gave me the key of truth, that I might enter the reality of human life, and the key of light, that I might go beyond. Oh! my master, I thank you. You have created me.”

Cimourdain sat down on the straw beside Gauvain, and said to him, —

“I have come to take supper with you.”

Gauvain broke up the black bread and offered it to him. Cimourdain took a piece of it; then Gauvain passed him the jug of water.

“Drink first,” said Cimourdain.

Gauvain drank and passed the jug to Cimourdain, who drank after him. Gauvain only took one swallow.

Cimourdain took a long draught.

At this supper, Gauvain ate and Cimourdain drank, a sign of calmness in one and of feverishness in the other.

A strange, terrible serenity was in this dungeon. The two men talked.

Gauvain said, —

“Great things are being planned. What the Revolution is doing at this moment is mysterious. Behind its visible work there is a work invisible. One conceals the other. The visible work is cruel, the invisible work is sublime. At this moment I can see everything very clearly. It is strangely beautiful. It was necessary to make use of the materials of the past. Hence this extraordinary ‘93. Under a scaffolding of barbarism, a temple of civilization is building.”

“Yes,” replied Cimourdain. “Out of things temporal will arise the definitive. The definitive, that is to say right and duty, in parallel lines, proportional and progressive taxes, obligatory military service, levelling without deviation, and above all and through all, that straight line, law. The Republic of the Absolute.”

“I prefer,” said Gauvain, “the Republic of the Ideal.” He hesitated, then continued, —

“Oh, my master, in all that you have just said, where do you place devotion, sacrifice, abnegation, the magnanimous intertwining of benevolence, love? Putting everything in equilibrium is good; making everything harmonious is better. Above the scales is the lyre. Your republic doses, measures, and rules man; mine carries him up into the clear sky; that is the difference between a theorem and an eagle.”

“You will be lost in the clouds.”

“And you in mathematics.”

“Harmony is a dream.”

“There are unknown quantities in Algebra.”

“I would have man made according to Euclid.”

“And I,” said Gauvain, “I would rather have him made according to Homer.”

Cimourdain’s stern smile rested on Gauvain, as if to hold back his soul.

“Poetry. Place no trust in poets.”

“Yes, I know that saying. Put no trust in breezes, sunbeams, put no trust in perfumes, put no trust in flowers, put no trust in constellations.”

“None of them will give you anything to eat.”

“How do you know. Ideas too, are food. To think is to eat.”

“No abstractions. The Republic is two and two make four. When I have given to each what belongs to him——”

“It will remain for you to give to each what does not belong to him.”

“What do you mean by that?”

“I mean the vast reciprocal concession that each owes to all, and all owe to each, and which is the whole social law.”

“There is nothing beyond strict law.”

“There is everything.”

“I see nothing but justice.”

“For my part, I see higher.”

“What is there above justice?”

“Equity.”

Occasionally, they stopped, as if to catch glimpses of light.

Cimourdain resumed, —

“I challenge you to explain.”

“I will do so. You would have military service obligatory; against whom? Against other men. But I would not have any military service at all. I want peace. You would have the wretched assisted, but I would have misery suppressed. You would have proportional taxes. I would have no taxes at all. I want the common expenses reduced to their simplest form, and paid by the overplus of society.”

“What do you mean by that?”

“This: first, to suppress every form of parasite; that represented by the priest, that represented by the judge, that represented by the soldier. Then make some use of your waste riches; you throw manure into the sewers, throw it on the fields. Three-quarters of the soil is waste land; clear up France. Put an end to useless pastures, divide the communal lands. Let every man have a piece of ground, and every piece of ground have a man. It would multiply the products of society a hundredfold. France, at the present time, only gives her peasants meat four days in the year; if well cultivated, she ought to feed three hundred millions of men, — all Europe. Utilize nature, that great auxiliary so much scorned. Make all the winds, all the waterfalls, all the magnetic effluvia work for you. The globe has a network of subterranean veins; in this network there is a prodigious circulation of water, oil, and fire; pierce the veins of the globe, and let this water gush forth for your fountains, this oil for your lamps, this fire for your hearths. Reflect on the motion of the waves, the flux and reflux, the ebb and flow of the tides. What is the ocean? An enormous force wasted. How stupid the earth is not to make use of the ocean.

“You are lost in a dream.”

“That is to say, in actual facts.”

Gauvain went on, —

“And woman — what use do you make of her?”

Cimourdain replied, —

“Let her be what she is, the servant of man.”

“Yes. On one condition.”

“What?”

“That man shall be the servant of woman.”

“Is that your belief?” exclaimed Cimourdain. “Man a servant! Never. Man is master. I admit but one royalty, that of the fireside. Man is king at home.”

“Yes. On one condition.”

“What is that?”

“That woman be queen there.”

“That is to say that you want for man and for woman——”

“Equality.”

“Equality! Are you dreaming? The two beings are different.”

“I said equality. I did not say identity.”

There was a pause again, like a sort of truce between these two minds exchanging flashes of thought. Cimourdain broke the silence.

“And the child? To whom would you give it?”

“First to the father who begets it, then to the mother who bears it, then to the master to teach it, then to the city to make a man of it, then to the country, which is the mother supreme, then to humanity, which is the great ancestor.”

“You say nothing of God.”

“Each of these steps, — father, mother, master, city, country, humanity, — is a round in the ladder which leads up to God.”

Cimourdain was silent. Gauvain went on, —

“When one is at the top of the ladder, one has reached God. God opens the door; there is nothing to do but to go in.”

Cimourdain made the gesture of a person who is calling some one back.

“Gauvain, come back to earth. We want to realize possibilities.”

“Begin by not making them impossible.”

“The possible can always be realized.”

“Not always. If Utopia is maltreated it is killed. Nothing is more defenceless than the egg.”

“But it is necessary to seize Utopia, place it under the yoke of reality, and frame it, in fact. Abstract ideas must be transformed to concrete ideas; what it loses in beauty it will gain in utility; it will be less but better. Right must enter into law; and when right has become law, it is absolute. This is what I call the possible.”

“The possible is more than that.”

“Ah! you are dreaming again.”

“The possible is a mysterious bird always hovering above man.”

“It must be caught.”

Gauvain continued, —

“My motto is: Always forward. If God had wished man to go backward, he would have put an eye in the back of his head. Let us always look towards the sunrise, development, birth. Whatever falls encourages whatever is trying to rise. The shattering of the old tree is a call to the young tree. Each century will do its work; to-day, civic; to-morrow, humane. To-day the question of right, to-morrow the question of wage. Wage and right are the same word in reality. Man does not live to receive no wage; God, in giving life, contracts a debt: right is innate wage; wage is acquired right.”

Gauvain spoke with the assurance of a prophet. Cimourdain listened. The rôles were exchanged, and now it seemed as if the pupil had become the master.

Cimourdain murmured, —

“You go too fast.”

“Perhaps it is because I am somewhat pressed for time,” said Gauvain, with a smile.

And he added, —

“O my master, this is the difference between our two Utopias. You want the barracks obligatory, while I want a school. You dream of a man as a soldier, I dream of him as a citizen. You want him to be terrible, I would have him thoughtful. You would found a republic of swords, I would found — —”

He hesitated, —

“I would found a republic of intellects.”

Cimourdain looked at the pavement of the dungeon and said, —

“And till then what would you have?”

“What now exists.”

“Then you absolve the present moment?”

“Yes.”

“Why?”

“Because it is a tempest. A tempest always knows what it is about. For one oak struck by lightning, how many forests purified! Civilization had a pestilence, this great gale is sweeping it away. It does not discriminate enough, perhaps. Can it do otherwise? It has such a rough cleansing to perform. Before the horror of miasma, I understand the fury of the blast.”

Gauvain continued, —

“Moreover, what is the tempest to me, if I have the compass? and what difference can events make to me, if I have my conscience?”

And he added in a low voice, which was solemn as well, —

“There is one who must always be allowed to do his will.”

“Who?” asked Cimourdain.

Gauvain pointed above his head. Cimourdain followed the direction of his finger, and through the ceiling of the dungeon it seemed to him as if he saw the starry heavens.

They were again silent.

Cimourdain took up the discourse.

“Society greater than nature! I tell you it is not possible, it is a dream.”

“It is its aim. Otherwise, what is the good of society? Remain in nature; be savages. Otaheite is a paradise. Only, in that paradise they do not think. Much better an intelligent hell than a stupid paradise. But no, let us have no hell. Let us have human society. Greater than nature. Yes. If you add nothing to nature, why leave nature? then, be content with work like the ant, and with honey like the bee. Remain the stupid workman rather than sovereign intelligence. If you add something to nature, you will necessarily be greater than she is. To add is to increase, and to increase is to enlarge. Society is nature made sublime. I would have everything which beehives lack, everything which ant-hills lack, monuments, arts, poetry, heroes, geniuses; to carry everlasting burdens is not the law of man. No, no, no; no more pariahs, no more slaves, no more convicts, no more condemned! I would have each attribute of man a symbol of civilization, and a pattern of progress; I want liberty in the mind, equality in the heart, fraternity in the soul. No! no more bondage! man was made, not to drag chains, but to spread his wings. No more of man as a reptile. I would have the larva transformed to a lepidopter; I would have the earthworm changed to a living flower, and fly away. I would have — —”

He stopped. His eye grew bright.

His lips moved, he ceased speaking.

The door had been left open. Noises from outside penetrated into the dungeon. Sounds of distant trumpets were heard. It was probably the réveillé; then gun stocks striking the ground as the sentinels were relieved;

then, quite near the tower, as far as could be judged in the darkness, a sound, as if they were moving boards and planks, with dull, intermittent thuds, like the blows of a hammer. Cimourdain listened, and grew pale. Gauvain did not hear it. His reverie grew more and more profound. It seemed as if he no longer breathed, he was so absorbed in what he saw in the visions that haunted his brain. His frame underwent gentle tremors. The dawn-like brightness in his eyes increased.

Some time passed thus. Cimourdain asked, —

“What are you thinking about?”

“The future,” said Gauvain.

And he relapsed into thought again. Cimourdain rose from the bed of straw where they were sitting together. Gauvain did not notice him. Cimourdain, with his eyes fixed with infinite affection on the young dreamer, stepped slowly backwards to the door, and went out. The dungeon was closed.

CHAPTER VI.

NEVERTHELESS, THE SUN RISES.

Daylight did not delay appearing on the horizon. Just as day dawned, a strange, motionless, amazing object, which the birds of heaven were not familiar with, came into sight on the plateau of la Torgue, above the forest of Fougères.

It had been placed there in the night; it was set up, rather than built. From a distance, its straightened lines stood out against the horizon, having the appearance of a Hebrew letter or one of those Egyptian hieroglyphics which formed a part of the alphabet of the ancient enigma.

At first sight, the idea that this object awakened was the idea of uselessness. It stood there among the blossoming heather. One asked what purpose it could serve. Then one felt a shudder come over.

It was a sort of trestle-work, with four posts for legs. At the end of the trestle rose two high joists, upright and straight, joined together at the top by a crossbeam, from which was suspended a triangle which looked black against the blue morning sky. At the other end of the Framework there was a ladder. Between the two joists below, under the triangle, could be seen a sort of panel composed of two movable sections which, when fitted together, showed a round hole about the size of a man’s neck. The upper section of the panel slipped into a groove in such a way that it could be raised or lowered. For the time being, the two semicircles which, when united, formed the collar, were apart. At the foot of the two posts was seen a plank, which moved on hinges and looked like a balance. Beside this plank, there was a long basket, and between the two posts, in front, and at the end of the trestle, a square basket.

It was painted red.

Everything was of wood, except the triangle, which was of iron. One felt that this had been built by men, it was so ugly, mean, petty; and that it was worthy of being set up there by genii, it was so formidable.

This misshapen structure was the guillotine.

In front, a few feet away, in the ravine, there was another monster, la Tourgue. A monster of stone offering a counterpart to the monster of wood, and, we may add, when man has touched wood and stone, the wood and stone are no longer merely wood and stone, but become a part of man.

An edifice is a dogma, a machine is an idea.

La Tourgue was that fatal result of the past which is called the Bastille in Paris, the Tower of London in England, the Spielberg in Germany, the Escurial in Spain, the Kremlin in Moscow, the castle of Saint-Angelo in Rome.

Fifteen hundred years were condensed in la Tourgue, the Middle Ages, vassalage, serfdom, feudalism; in the guillotine, one year, '93; and these twelve months counterbalanced these fifteen centuries.

La Tourgue was the monarchy; the guillotine was the Revolution.

Tragic comparison.

On one side, debt; on the other, maturity. On one side, the inextricable Gothic complication, the serf, the seigneur, the slave, the master, the commonalty, the nobility, the complex code with its ramification of customs, judge and priest in coalition, innumerable bonds, the treasury, the salt taxes, the mortmain, the capitations, the exceptions, the prerogatives, the prejudices, the fanaticisms, the royal privilege of bankruptcy, the sceptre, the throne, the regal will, divine right; on the other side, this simple thing, — a chopping-knife.

On one side, a knot; on the other, an axe.

La Tourgue had long stood alone in this wilderness. It stood there filled with enormous tragedy; with his machicolations, out of which had been poured boiling oil, burning pitch, and melted lead; with its oubliettes, paved with bones; with its quartering room; its funereal form had dominated this forest; it had had fifteen centuries of cruel repose in this shady spot; it had been the sole power, the sole object of awe, and the sole terror in this land; it had reigned; it had been the unique example of barbarism: suddenly, there arose before it and against it something, — more than something, — some one as horrible as itself — the Guillotine.

Stone sometimes seem to have strange eyes. A statue observes, a tower watches, the façade of a building contemplates.

La Tourgue seemed to examine the guillotine.

It seemed to query it?

"What is that?"

That object seemed to have come up out of the earth.

And, in reality, it had come up out of the earth.

In the fatal earth had germinated the ill-favored tree. Out of this earth, watered with so much sweat, with so many tears, with so much blood; — out of this earth, where so many trenches had been dug, so many tombs, so many caves, so many ambushes; — out of this earth, where had rotted all kinds of dead, deprived of life by all kinds of tyranny; — out of this earth, placed over so many abysses, and where had been buried so many dreadful crimes, seeds of horror; — out of this deep earth had arisen, on a notable day, this strange avenger, this cruel swordbearer, and ‘93 had said to the old world: “Here I am!”

And the guillotine had the right to say to the keep: “I am thy daughter.”

And at the same time the keep — for these fatal objects live with a mysterious vitality — felt that it was killed by her.

La Tourgue, in the face of this terrible apparition, felt strangely frightened. It seemed as if it were afraid. The huge mass of granite was majestical and infamous; this plank, with its triangle, was worse. The declining omnipotence felt all the horror of the new omnipotence.

Criminal history surveyed justiciary history. The violence of the past was compared with the violence of the present: the ancient fortress, the ancient prison, the ancient seigneurie, where victims had shrieked as they were torn limb from limb; the building of war and of murder, now useless, disabled, profaned, dismantled, laid bare, a heap of stone, worth no more than a heap of ashes, hideous, magnificent, and dead, full of the dizziness of centuries of horror, — watched the terrible living hour of the present pass by.

Yesterday frowned on to-day, the old cruelty verified and submitted to the new power, that which was a mere nothingness opened its ghastly eyes before this terror, and the phantom regarded the spectre.

Nature is pitiless; she will not consent to withdraw her flowers, her music, her perfumes and her sunbeams from before the face of human abomination; she overwhelms man with the contrast between divine beauty and the ugliness of society; she spares him neither the wing of a butterfly, nor the song of a bird; in the midst of murder, in the midst of vengeance, in the midst of barbarity he must submit to the sight of holy things; he cannot get away from the vast reproach of the universal sweetness and the implacable serenity of the blue sky. The deformity of human laws must be exposed in their nakedness, in the midst of the dazzling beauty of the eternal. Man breaks and crushes, man destroys, man kills; the summer is summer still, the lily is the lily still, the stars of heaven are the stars of heaven still.

Never had the fresh sky of early dawn been more charming than on this morning. A mild breeze stirred the heather, the mists hovered gently over the trees, the forest of Fougères, permeated with the breath of the brooks, was steaming in the dawn like a great censer filled with incense; the blue firmament, the whiteness of the clouds, the clear transparency of the waters, the verdure, that harmonious scale of color from aquamarine to emerald, the groups of brotherly trees, the carpet of grass, the far-stretching plains, — all possessed that purity which is the eternal counsel of nature to man.

In the midst of all this was exposed the frightful shame of human beings; in the midst of all this appeared the fortress and the scaffold, war and punishment, the two figures of the bloodthirsty eld and the bloody present; the night-owl of the past, and the bat of the twilight of the future.

In the presence of creation, blooming, balmy, loving and lovely, the splendid heavens deluged La Tourgue and the guillotine with the light of morning, and seemed to say to man: “See my work, and behold what you are doing.”

Such are the terrible uses that the sun makes of his rays.

This spectacle had spectators.

The four thousand men belonging to the little reconnoitring army were ranged in order of battle on the plain. They surrounded the guillotine on three sides, in such a way as to form around it, in a geometrical figure, the shape of a letter E; the battery placed in the centre of the upright line made the notch of the E. The red machine was enclosed in these three battle fronts, a sort of wall of soldiers, reaching on two sides to the very edge of the escarpment of the plateau, the fourth side, the open side, was the ravine itself, and faced la Tourgue.

This made a long square, in the midst of which was the scaffold. As the day approached, the shadow of the guillotine decreased on the grass.

The artillery-men were at their guns, the matches lighted.

A gentle blue smoke was rising from the ravine; it came from the dying fire of the burning bridge.

This smoke covered without concealing la Tourgue, the high platform of which dominated the whole horizon. Between this platform and the guillotine there was only the ravine. They could talk across it.

The table of the tribunal and the chair draped with tricolored flags had been brought to this platform. The day was drawing behind la Tourgue, and making the mass of the fortress stand out black, and above it in the chair of the tribunal, and under the drapery of flags, the form of a man sitting motionless, with folded arms.

This man was Cimourdain. As on the day before, he wore his civil delegate’s dress, the hat with tricolored cockade on his head, his sabre by his side, and his pistols in his belt.

He was silent. All were silent. The soldiers stood with their guns grounded, their eyes downcast. Their elbows touched, but they did not speak. They were thinking confusedly about this war, — so many battles, the fusillades of the hedges so bravely faced, the swarms of furious peasants driven before their breath, the citadels taken, the battles won, the victories, and it seemed to them now that all this glory turned to shame. A gloomy expectation oppressed the hearts of all.

On the platform of the guillotine they saw the executioner, walking back and forth. The increasing brightness of the morning majestically filled the sky.

Suddenly there was heard that muffled sound made by drums covered with crape. The funereal rumbling came nearer; the ranks opened, and a procession entered the square, and went towards the scaffold.

At first the black drums; then a company of grenadiers, with arms lowered; then a platoon of gendarmes, with drawn swords; then the condemned, — Gauvain.

Gauvain walked free. Neither his feet nor his hands were bound. He was in undress uniform; he carried his sword.

Behind him came another platoon of gendarmes.

Gauvain still wore that expression of thoughtful joy on his face which had lighted it up when he said to Cimourdain, “I am thinking of the future.” Nothing could be more ineffably sublime than this lasting smile.

On reaching the melancholy spot, he first looked towards the top of the tower. He disdained the guillotine.

He knew that Cimourdain would consider it his duty to be present at the execution. His eyes sought him on the platform. He found him there.

Cimourdain was pale and cold. Those near him could not hear him breathe.

When he saw Gauvain, he did not stir.

Meanwhile, Gauvain was approaching the scaffold.

As he walked along, he looked at Cimourdain, and Cimourdain looked at him. It seemed as if Cimourdain strengthened himself with that look.

Gauvain reached the foot of the scaffold. He mounted it. The officer commanding the grenadiers followed him. He unfastnened his sword and gave it to the officer, he took off his cravat and gave it to the executioner.

He was like a vision. Never had he looked so beautiful. His brown hair floated in the wind; it was not the custom to cut off the hair at that time. His white neck was like a woman's, his heroic, sovereign eye was like an archangel's. He was on the scaffold, deep in thought. This place, too, is a summit. Gauvain stood there, superbly calm. The sun wrapped him about as with a halo of glory.

It was necessary, nevertheless, to bind the criminal. The executioner came with a rope in his hand.

At this moment, when the soldiers saw their young captain so evidently destined to the knife, they could contain themselves no longer; the hearts of these warriors burst. That enormous thing, the sob of an army, was heard. A shout arose, —

"Mercy! mercy!"

Some fell on their knees; others threw down their guns and raised their arms towards the platform where Cimourdain was.

A grenadier mounted the steps to the guillotine, crying, "Will you receive a substitute? Take me." All repeated frantically, "Mercy! mercy!" and if this had been heard by lions, they would have been moved or frightened, for soldiers' tears are terrible.

The executioner stopped, not knowing what to do.

Then a short, low voice, which could be heard by all, it was so gruesome, cried from the top of the tower, —

"Enforce the law!"

They recognized that inexorable tone. Cimourdain had spoken. A shudder passed over the army.

The executioner hesitated no longer. He approached, holding his cord.

"Wait," said Gauvain.

He turned towards Cimourdain, with his right hand, which was still free, waved a farewell to him, and then let it be bound.

After it was bound, he said to the executioner, —

"Pardon. One moment more."

And he cried, —

“Long live the Republic!”

They laid him on the plank. That lovely proud head was placed in the infamous collar. The executioner laid back his hair gently, he pressed the spring, the triangle became detached and slipped down slowly at first, then quickly; a hideous sound was heard —

At the same instant another sound was heard. A pistol shot responded to the blow of the axe. Cimourdain had just seized one of the pistols which he had in his belt, and, as Gauvain’s head rolled into the basket, Cimourdain sent a bullet through his heart. The blood poured from his mouth; he fell down dead.

And these two souls, tragic sisters, departed together, the darkness of one mingling with the light of the other.

LE BOIS DE LA SAUDRAIE

Dans les derniers jours de mai 1793, un des bataillons parisiens amenés en Bretagne par Santerre fouillait le redoutable bois de la Saudraie en Astillé. On n'était pas plus de trois cents, car le bataillon était décimé par cette rude guerre. C'était l'époque où, après l'Argonne, Jemmapes et Valmy, du premier bataillon de Paris, qui était de six cents volontaires, il restait vingt-sept hommes, du deuxième trente-trois, et du troisième cinquante-sept. Temps des luttes épiques.

Les bataillons envoyés de Paris en Vendée comptaient neuf cent douze hommes. Chaque bataillon avait trois pièces de canon. Ils avaient été rapidement mis sur pied. Le 25 avril, Gohier étant ministre de la justice et Bouchotte étant ministre de la guerre, la section du Bon-Conseil avait proposé d'envoyer des bataillons de volontaires en Vendée; le membre de la commune Lubin avait fait le rapport; le 1er mai, Santerre était prêt à faire partir douze mille soldats, trente pièces de campagne et un bataillon de canonniers. Ces bataillons, faits si vite, furent si bien faits, qu'ils servent aujourd'hui de modèles; c'est d'après leur mode de composition qu'on forme les compagnies de ligne, ils ont changé l'ancienne proportion entre le nombre des soldats et le nombre des sous-officiers.

Le 28 avril, la commune de Paris avait donné aux volontaires de Santerre cette consigne: Point de grâce. Point de quartier. A la fin de mai, sur les douze mille partis de Paris, huit mille étaient morts.

Le bataillon engagé dans le bois de la Saudraie se tenait sur ses gardes. On ne se hâtait point. On regardait à la fois à droite et à gauche, devant soi et derrière soi; Kléber a dit: Le soldat a un oeil dans le dos. Il y avait longtemps qu'on marchait. Quelle heure pouvait-il être? à quel moment du jour en était-on? Il eût été difficile de le dire, car il y a toujours une sorte de soir dans de si sauvages halliers, et il ne fait jamais clair dans ce bois-là.

Le bois de la Saudraie était tragique. C'était dans ce taillis que, dès le mois de novembre 1792, la guerre civile avait commencé ses crimes; Mousqueton, le boiteux féroce, était sorti de ces épaisseurs funestes; la quantité de meurtres qui s'étaient commis là faisait dresser les cheveux. Pas de lieu plus épouvantable. Les soldats s'y enfonçaient avec précaution. Tout était plein de fleurs; on avait autour de soi une tremblante muraille de branches d’où tombait la charmante fraîcheur des feuilles; des rayons de soleil trouaient çà et là ces ténèbres vertes; à terre, le glaïeul, la flambe des marais, le narcisse des prés, la gênotte, cette petite fleur qui annonce le beau temps, le safran printanier, brodaient et passementaient un profond tapis de végétation où fourmillaient toutes les formes de la mousse, depuis celle qui ressemble à la chenille jusqu’à celle qui ressemble à l’étoile. Les soldats avançaient pas à pas, en silence, en écartant doucement les broussailles. Les oiseaux gazouillaient au-dessus des bayonnettes.

La Saudraie était un de ces halliers où jadis, dans les temps paisibles, on avait fait la Houiche-ba, qui est la chasse aux oiseaux pendant la nuit; maintenant on y faisait la chasse aux hommes.

Le taillis était tout de bouleaux, de hêtres et de chênes; le sol plat; la mousse et l’herbe épaisse amortissaient le bruit des hommes en marche; aucun sentier, ou des sentiers tout de suite perdus; des houx, des prunelliers sauvages, des fougères, des haies d’arrête-boeuf, de hautes ronces; impossibilité de voir un homme à dix pas. Par instants passait dans le branchage un héron ou une poule d’eau indiquant le voisinage des marais.

On marchait. On allait à l’aventure, avec inquiétude, et en craignant de trouver ce qu’on cherchait.

De temps en temps on rencontrait des traces de campements, des places brûlées, des herbes foulées, des bâtons en croix, des branches sanglantes. Là on avait fait la soupe, là on avait dit la messe, là ou avait pansé des blessés. Mais ceux qui avaient passé avaient disparu. Où étaient-ils? Bien loin peut-être? peut-être là tout près, cachés, l’espingole au poing? Le bois semblait désert. Le bataillon redoublait de prudence. Solitude, donc défiance. On ne voyait personne; raison de plus pour redouter quelqu’un. On avait affaire à une forêt mal famée.

Une embuscade était probable.

Trente grenadiers, détachés en éclaireurs, et commandés par un sergent, marchaient en avant à une assez grande distance du gros de la troupe. La vivandière du bataillon les accompagnait. Les vivandières se joignent volontiers aux avant-gardes. On court des dangers, mais on va voir quelque chose. La curiosité est une des formes de la bravoure féminine.

Tout à coup les soldats de cette petite troupe d’avant-garde eurent ce tressaillement connu des chasseurs qui indique qu’on touche au gîte. On avait entendu comme un souffle au centre d’un fourré, et il semblait qu’on venait de voir un mouvement dans les feuilles. Les soldats se firent signe.

Dans l’espèce de guet et de quête confiée aux éclaireurs, les officiers n’ont pas besoin de s’en mêler; ce qui doit être fait se fait de soi-même.

En moins d’une minute le point où l’on avait remué fut cerné, un cercle de fusils braqués l’entoura; le centre obscur du hallier fut couché en joue de tous les côtés à la fois, et les soldats, le doigt sur la détente, l’oeil sur le lieu suspect, n’attendirent plus pour le mitrailler que le commandement du sergent.

Cependant la vivandière s’était hasardée à regarder à travers les broussailles, et, au moment où le sergent allait crier: Feu! cette femme cria: Halte!

Et se tournant vers les soldats: — Ne tirez pas, camarades!

Et elle se précipita dans le taillis. On l’y suivit.

Il y avait quelqu’un là en effet.

Au plus épais du fourré, au bord d’une de ces petites clairières rondes que font dans les bois les fourneaux à charbon en brûlant les racines des arbres, dans une sorte de trou de branches, espèce de chambre de feuillage, entr’ouverte comme une alcôve, une femme était assise sur la mousse, ayant au sein un enfant qui tétait et sur ses genoux les deux têtes blondes de deux enfants endormis.

C’était là l’embuscade.

— Qu’est-ce que vous faites ici, vous? cria la vivandière.

La femme leva la tête.

La vivandière ajouta, furieuse:

— Etes-vous folle d’être là!

Et elle reprit:

— Un peu plus, vous étiez exterminée!

Et, s’adressant aux soldats, la vivandière ajouta:

— C’est une femme.

— Pardine, nous le voyons bien! dit un grenadier.

La vivandière poursuivit:

— Venir dans les bois se faire massacrer! a-t-on idée de faire des bêtises comme ça!

La femme stupéfaite, effarée, pétrifiée, regardait autour d’elle, comme à travers un rêve, ces fusils, ces sabres, ces bayonnettes, ces faces farouches.

Les deux enfants se réveillèrent et crièrent.

— J’ai faim, dit l’un.

— J’ai peur, dit l’autre.

Le petit continuait de téter.

La vivandière lui adressa la parole.

— C’est toi qui as raison, lui dit-elle.

La mère était muette d’effroi.

Le sergent lui cria:

— N’ayez pas peur, nous sommes le bataillon du Bonnet-Rouge.

La femme trembla de la tête aux pieds. Elle regarda le sergent, rude visage dont on ne voyait que les sourcils, les moustaches, et deux braises qui étaient les deux yeux.

— Le bataillon de la ci-devant Croix-Rouge, ajouta la vivandière.

Et le sergent continua:

— Qui es-tu, madame?

La femme le considérait, terrifiée. Elle était maigre, jeune, pâle, en haillons; elle avait le gros capuchon des paysannes bretonnes et la couverture de laine rattachée au cou avec une ficelle. Elle laissait voir son sein nu avec une indifférence de femelle. Ses pieds, sans bas ni souliers, saignaient.

— C’est une pauvre, dit le sergent.

Et la vivandière reprit de sa voix soldatesque et féminine, douce en dessous:

— Comment vous appelez-vous?

La femme murmura dans un bégaiement presque indistinct:

— Michelle Fléchard.

Cependant la vivandière caressait avec sa grosse main la petite tête du nourrisson.

— Quel âge a ce môme? demanda-t-elle.

La mère ne comprit pas. La vivandière insista.

— Je vous demande l’âge de ça.

— Ah! dit la mère. Dix-huit mois.

— C’est vieux, dit la vivandière. Ça ne doit plus téter. Il faudra me sevrer ça. Nous lui donnerons de la soupe.

La mère commençait à se rassurer. Les deux petits qui s’étaient réveillés étaient plus curieux qu’effrayés. Ils admiraient les plumets.

— Ah! dit la mère, ils ont bien faim.

Et elle ajouta:

— Je n’ai plus de lait.

— On leur donnera à manger, cria le sergent, et à toi aussi. Mais ce n’est pas tout ça. Quelles sont tes opinions politiques?

La femme regarda le sergent et ne répondit pas.

— Entends-tu ma question?

Elle balbutia:

— J’ai été mise au couvent toute jeune, mais je me suis mariée, je ne suis pas religieuse. Les soeurs m’ont appris à parler français. On a mis le feu au village. Nous nous sommes sauvés si vite que je n’ai pas eu le temps de mettre des souliers.

— Je te demande quelles sont tes opinions politiques?

— Je ne sais pas ça.

Le sergent poursuivit:

— C’est qu’il y a des espionnes. Ça se fusille, les espionnes. Voyons.

Parle. Tu n’es pas bohémienne? Quelle est ta patrie?

Elle continua de le regarder comme ne comprenant pas.

Le sergent répéta:

— Quelle est ta patrie?

— Je ne sais pas, dit-elle.

— Comment! tu ne sais pas quel est ton pays?

— Ah! mon pays. Si fait.

— Eh bien, quel est ton pays?

La femme répondit:

— C’est la métairie de Siscoignard, dans la paroisse d’Azé.

Ce fut le tour du sergent d’être stupéfait. Il demeura un moment pensif.

Puis il reprit:

— Tu dis?

— Siscoignard.

— Ce n’est pas une patrie, ça.

— C’est mon pays.

Et la femme, après un instant de réflexion, ajouta:

— Je comprends, monsieur. Vous êtes de France, moi je suis de Bretagne.

— Eh bien?

— Ce n’est pas le même pays.

— Mais c’est la même patrie! cria le sergent.

La femme se borna à répondre:

— Je suis de Siscoignard!

— Va pour Siscoignard! reprit le sergent. C'est de là qu'est ta famille?

— Oui.

— Que fait-elle?

— Elle est toute morte. Je n'ai plus personne.

Le sergent, qui était un peu beau parleur, continua l'interrogatoire.

— On a des parents, que diable! ou on en a eu. Qui es-tu? Parle.

La femme écouta, ahurie, cet — ou on en a eu — qui ressemblait plus à un cri de bête fauve qu'à une parole humaine.

La vivandière sentit le besoin d'intervenir. Elle se remit à caresser l'enfant qui tétait, et donna une tape sur la joue aux deux autres.

— Comment s'appelle la téteuse? demanda-t-elle; car c'est une fille, ça.

La mère répondit: Georgette.

— Et l'aîné? Car c'est un homme, ce polisson-là.

— René-Jean.

— Et le cadet? car lui aussi, il est un homme, et joufflu encore!

— Gros-Alain, dit la mère.

— Ils sont gentils, ces petits, dit la vivandière; ça vous a déjà des airs d'être des personnes.

Cependant le sergent insistait.

— Parle donc, madame. As-tu une maison?

— J'en avais une.

— Où ça?

— A Azé.

— Pourquoi n'es-tu pas dans ta maison?

— Parce qu'on l'a brûlée.

— Qui ça?

— Je ne sais pas. Une bataille.

— D'où viens-tu?

— De là.

— Où vas-tu?

— Je ne sais pas.

— Arrive au fait. Qui es-tu?

— Je ne sais pas.

— Tu ne sais pas qui tu es?

— Nous sommes des gens qui nous sauvons.

— De quel parti es-tu?

— Je ne sais pas.

— Es-tu des bleus? Es-tu des blancs? Avec qui es-tu?

— Je suis avec mes enfants.

Il y eut une pause. La vivandière dit:

— Moi, je n'ai pas eu d'enfants. Je n'ai pas eu le temps.

Le sergent recommença.

— Mais tes parents! Voyons, madame, mets-nous au fait de tes parents. Moi, je m'appelle Radoub, je suis sergent, je suis de la rue du Cherche-Midi, mon père et ma mère en étaient, je peux parler de mes parents. Parle-nous des tiens. Dis-nous ce que c'était que tes parents.

— C'étaient les Fléchard. Voilà tout.

Mais on a un état. Quel était l'état de tes parents? Qu'est-ce qu'ils faisaient? Qu'est-ce qu'ils font? Qu'est-ce qu'ils fléchardaient, tes Fléchard?

— C'étaient des laboureurs. Mon père était infirme et ne pouvait travailler à cause qu'il avait reçu des coups de bâton que le seigneur, son seigneur, notre seigneur, lui avait fait donner, ce qui était une bonté, parce que mon père avait pris un lapin, pour le fait de quoi on était jugé à mort; mais le seigneur avait fait grâce, et avait dit: Donnez-lui seulement cent coups de bâton; et mon père était demeuré estropié.

— Et puis?

— Mon grand-père était huguenot. Monsieur le curé l'a fait envoyer aux galères. J'étais toute petite.

— Et puis?

— Le père de mon mari était un faux-saulnier. Le roi l'a fait pendre.

— Et ton mari, qu'est-ce qu'il fait?

— Ces jours-ci, il se battait.

— Pour qui?

— Pour le roi.

— Et puis?

— Dame, pour son seigneur.

— Et puis?

— Dame, pour monsieur le curé.

— Sacré mille noms de noms de brutes! cria un grenadier.

La femme eut un soubresaut d'épouvante.

— Vous voyez, madame, nous sommes des Parisiens, dit gracieusement la vivandière.

La femme joignit les mains et cria:

— O mon Dieu seigneur Jésus!

— Pas de superstitions! reprit le sergent.

La vivandière s’assit à côté de la femme et attira entre ses genoux l’aîné des enfants, qui se laissa faire. Les enfants sont rassurés comme ils sont effarouchés, sans qu’on sache pourquoi. Ils ont on ne sait quels avertissements intérieurs.

— Ma pauvre bonne femme de ce pays-ci, vous avez de jolis mioches, c’est toujours ça. On devine leur âge. Le grand a quatre ans, son frère a trois ans. Par exemple, la momignarde qui tette est fameusement gouliafre. Ah! la monstre! Veux-tu bien ne pas manger ta mère comme ça! Voyez-vous, madame, ne craignez rien. Vous devriez entrer dans le bataillon. Vous feriez comme moi. Je m’appelle Houzarde. C’est un sobriquet. Mais j’aime mieux m’appeler Houzarde que mamzelle Bicorneau, comme ma mère. Je suis la cantinière, comme qui dirait celle qui donne à boire quand on se mitraille et qu’on s’assassine. Le diable et son train. Nous avons à peu près le même pied, je vous donnerai des souliers à moi. J’étais à Paris le l0 août. J’ai donné à boire à Westermann. Ça a marché. J’ai vu guillotiner Louis XVI. Louis Capet, qu’on appelle. Il ne voulait pas. Dame, écoutez donc. Dire que le 13 janvier il faisait cuire des marrons et qu’il riait avec sa famille! Quand on l’a couché de force sur la bascule, qu’on appelle, il n’avait plus ni habit ni souliers; il n’avait que sa chemise, une veste piquée, une culotte de drap gris et des bas de soie gris. J’ai vu ça, moi. Le fiacre où on l’a amené était peint en vert. Voyez-vous, venez avec nous. On est des bons garçons dans le bataillon, vous serez la cantinière numéro deux, je vous montrerai l’état. Oh! c’est bien simple! on a son bidon et sa clochette, on s’en va dans le vacarme, dans les feux de peloton, dans les coups de canon, dans le hourvari, en criant: Qui est-ce qui veut boire un coup, les enfants? Ce n’est pas plus malaisé que ça. Moi, je verse à boire à tout le monde. Ma foi oui. Aux blancs comme aux bleus, quoique je sois une bleue. Et même une bonne bleue. Mais je donne à boire à tous. Les blessés, ça a soif. On meurt sans distinction d’opinion. Les gens qui meurent, ca devrait se serrer la main. Comme c’est godiche de se battre! Venez avec nous. Si je suis tuée, vous aurez ma survivance. Voyez-vous, j’ai l’air comme ça, mais je suis une bonne femme et un brave homme. Ne craignez rien.

Quand la vivandière eut cessé de parler, la femme murmura:

— Notre voisine s’appelait Marie-Jeanne et notre servante s’appelait Marie-Claude.

Cependant le sergent Radoub admonestait le grenadier.

— Tais-toi. Tu as fait peur à madame. On ne jure pas devant les dames.

— C’est que c’est tout de même un véritable massacrement pour l’entendement d’un honnête homme, répliqua le grenadier, que de voir des iroquois de la Chine qui ont eu leur beau-père estropié par le seigneur, leur grand-père galérien par le curé, et leur père pendu par le roi, et qui se battent, nom d’un petit bonhomme! et qui se fichent en révolte, et qui se font écrabouiller pour le seigneur, le curé et le roi!

Le sergent cria:

— Silence dans les rangs!

— On se tait, sergent, reprit le grenadier; mais ça n’empêche pas que c’est ennuyeux qu’une jolie femme comme ça s’expose à se faire casser la gueule pour les beaux yeux d’un calotin.

— Grenadier, dit le sergent, nous ne sommes pas ici au club de la section des Piques. Pas d’éloquence.

Et il se tourna vers la femme.

— Et ton mari, madame? que fait-il? Qu’est-ce qu’il est devenu?

— Il est devenu rien, puisqu’on l’a tué.

— Où ça?

— Dans la haie.

— Quand ça?

— Il y a trois jours.

— Qui ça?

— Je ne sais pas.

— Comment! tu ne sais pas qui a tué ton mari?

— Non.

— Est-ce un bleu? Est-ce un blanc?

— C’est un coup de fusil.

— Et il y a trois jours?

— Oui.

— De quel côté?

— Du côté d’Ernée. Mon mari est tombé. Voilà.

— Et depuis que ton mari est mort, qu’est-ce que tu fais?

— J’emporte mes petits.

— Où les emportes-tu?

— Devant moi.

— Où couches-tu?

— Par terre.

— Qu’est-ce que tu manges?

— Rien.

Le sergent eut cette moue militaire qui fait toucher le nez par les moustaches.

— Rien?

— C’est-à-dire des prunelles, des mûres dans les ronces, quand il y en a de reste de l’an passé, des graines de myrtille, des pousses de fougère.

— Oui. Autant dire rien.

L’aîné des enfants, qui semblait comprendre, dit: J’ai faim.

Le sergent tira de sa poche un morceau de pain de munition et le tendit à la mère. La mère rompit le pain en deux morceaux et les donna aux enfants. Les petits mordirent avidement.

— Elle n’en a pas gardé pour elle, grommela le sergent.

— C’est qu’elle n’a pas faim, dit un soldat.

— C’est qu’elle est la mère, dit le sergent.

Les enfants s’interrompirent.

— A boire, dit l’un.

— A boire, répéta l’autre.

— Il n’y a pas de ruisseau dans ce bois du diable, dit le sergent.

La vivandière prit le gobelet de cuivre qui pendait à sa ceinture à côté de sa clochette, tourna le robinet du bidon qu’elle avait en bandoulière, versa quelques gouttes dans le gobelet et approcha le gobelet des lèvres des enfants.

Le premier but et fit la grimace.

Le second but et cracha.

— C’est pourtant bon, dit la vivandière.

— C’est du coupe-figure? demanda le sergent.

— Oui, et du meilleur. Mais ce sont des paysans.

Et elle essuya son gobelet.

Le sergent reprit:

— Et comme ça, madame, tu te sauves?

— Il faut bien.

— A travers champs, va comme je te pousse?

— Je cours de toutes mes forces, et puis je marche, et puis je tombe.

— Pauvre paroissienne! dit la vivandière.

— Les gens se battent, balbutia la femme. Je suis tout entourée de coups de fusil. Je ne sais pas ce qu'on se veut. On m'a tué mon mari. Je n'ai compris que ça.

Le sergent fit sonner à terre la crosse de son fusil, et cria:

— Quelle bête de guerre! nom d'une bourrique!

La femme continua:

— La nuit passée, nous avons couché dans une émousse.

— Tous les quatre?

— Tous les quatre.

— Couché?

— Couché.

— Alors, dit le sergent, couché debout.

Et il se tourna vers les soldats.

— Camarades, un gros vieux arbre creux et mort où un homme peut se fourrer comme dans une gaîne, ces sauvages appellent ça une émousse. Qu'est-ce que vous voulez? Ils ne sont pas forcés d'être de Paris.

— Coucher dans le creux d'un arbre! dit la vivandière, et avec trois enfants!

— Et, reprit le sergent, quand les petits gueulaient, pour les gens qui passaient et qui ne voyaient rien du tout, ça devait être drôle d'entendre un arbre crier papa, maman!

— Heureusement, c'est l'été, soupira la femme.

Elle regardait la terre, résignée, ayant dans les yeux l'étonnement des catastrophes.

Les soldats silencieux faisaient cercle autour de cette misère.

Une veuve, trois orphelins, la fuite, l'abandon, la solitude, la guerre grondant tout autour de l'horizon, la faim, la soif, pas d'autre nourriture que l'herbe, pas d'autre toit que le ciel.

Le sergent s'approcha de la femme et fixa ses yeux sur l'enfant qui tétait. La petite quitta le sein, tourna doucement la tête, regarda avec ses belles prunelles bleues l'effrayante face velue, hérissée et fauve qui se penchait sur elle, et se mit à sourire.

Le sergent se redressa, et l'on vit une grosse larme rouler sur sa joue et s'arrêter au bout de sa moustache comme une perle.

Il éleva la voix.

— Camarades, de tout ça je conclus que le bataillon va devenir père. Est-ce convenu? Nous adoptons ces trois enfants-là.

— Vive la République! crièrent les grenadiers.

— C’est dit, fit le sergent.

Et il étendit les deux mains au-dessus de la mère et des enfants.

— Voilà, dit-il, les enfants du bataillon du Bonnet-Rouge.

La vivandière sauta de joie.

— Trois têtes dans un bonnet! cria-t-elle.

Puis elle éclata en sanglots, embrassa éperdument la pauvre veuve, et lui dit:

— Comme la petite a déjà l’air gamine!

— Vive la République! répétèrent les soldats.

Et le sergent dit à la mère:

— Venez, citoyenne.

LIVRE DEUXIÈME

LA CORVETTE CLAYMORE

I. ANGLETERRE ET FRANCE MÊLÉES

Au printemps de 1793, au moment où la France, attaquée à la fois à toutes ses frontières, avait la pathétique distraction de la chute des Girondins, voici ce qui se passait dans l'archipel de la Manche.

Un soir, le 1er juin, à Jersey, dans la petite baie déserte de Bonnenuit, une heure environ avant le coucher du soleil, par un de ces temps brumeux qui sont commodes pour s'enfuir parce qu'ils sont dangereux pour naviguer, Une corvette mettait à la voile. Ce bâtiment, était monté par un équipage français, mais faisait partie de la flottille anglaise placée en station et comme en sentinelle à la pointe orientale de l'île. Le prince de La Tour-d'Auvergne, qui était de la maison de Bouillon, commandait la flottille anglaise, et c'était par ses ordres, et pour un service urgent et Spécial, que la corvette en avait été détachée.

Cette corvette, immatriculée à la Trinity-House sous le nom de The Claymore, était en apparence une corvette de charge, mais en réalité une corvette de guerre. Elle avait la lourde et pacifique allure marchande; il ne fallait pas s'y fier pourtant. Elle avait été construite à deux fins, ruse et force: tromper, s'il est possible, combattre, s'il est nécessaire. Pour le service quelle avait à faire cette nuit-là, le chargement avait été remplacé dans l'entre-pont par trente caronades de fort calibre. Ces trente caronades, soit qu'on prévit une tempête, soit plutôt, qu'on voulût donner une figure débonnaire au navire, étaient à la serre, c'est-à-dire fortement amarrées en dedans par de triples chaînes et la volée appuyée aux écoutilles lamponnées; rien ne se voyait au dehors; les sabords étaient aveuglés: les panneaux étaient fermé; c'était comme un masque mis à la corvette. Ces caronades étaient à roue de bronze à rayons, ancien modèle, dit «modèle radié». Les corvettes d'ordonnance n'ont de canons que sur le pont; celle-ci, faite pour la surprise et l'embûche, était à pont désarmé, et avait été construite de façon à pouvoir porter, comme on vient de le voir, une batterie d'entre-pont. La Claymore était d'un gabarit massif et trapu, et pourtant bonne marcheuse: c'était la coque la plus solide de toute la marine anglaise, et au combat elle valait presque une frégate, quoiqu'elle n'eût pour mât d'artimon qu'un mâtereau avec une simple brigantine. Son gouvernail, de forme rare et savante, avait une membrure courbe presque unique qui avait coûté cinquante livres sterling dans les chantiers de Southampton.

L’équipage, tout français, était composé d’officiers émigrés et de matelots déserteurs. Ces hommes étaient triés; pas un qui ne fût bon marin, bon soldat et bon royaliste. Ils avaient le triple fanatisme du navire, de l’épée et du roi.

Un demi bataillon d’infanterie de marine, pouvant au besoin être débarqué, était amalgamé à l’équipage.

La corvette Claymore avait pour capitaine un chevalier de Saint-Louis, le comte du Boisberthelot, un des meilleurs officiers de l’ancienne marine royale, pour second le chevalier de La Vieuville qui avait commandé aux gardes-françaises la compagnie où Hoche avait été sergent, et pour pilote le plus sagace patron de Jersey, Philip Gacquoit.

On devinait que ce navire avait à faire quelque chose d’extraordinaire. Un homme en effet venait de s’y embarquer, qui avait tout l’air d’entrer dans une aventure. C’était un haut vieillard, droit et robuste, à figure sévère, dont il eût été difficile de préciser l’âge, parce qu’il semblait à la fois vieux et jeune; un de ces hommes qui sont pleins d’années et pleins de force, qui ont des cheveux blancs sur le front et un éclair dans le regard; quarante ans pour la rigueur et quatre-vingts ans pour l’autorité. Au moment où il était monté sur la corvette, son manteau de mer s’était entr’ouvert, et l’on avait pu le voir vêtu, sous ce manteau, de larges braies dites bragou-bras, de bottes-jambières, et d’une veste en peau de chèvre montrant en dessus le cuir passementé de soie, et en dessous le poil hérissé et sauvage, costume complet du paysan breton. Ces anciennes vestes bretonnes étaient à deux fins, servaient aux jours de fête comme aux jours de travail, et se retournaient, offrant à volonté le côté velu ou le côté brodé; peaux de bête toute la semaine, habits de gala le dimanche. Le vêtement de paysan que portait ce vieillard était, comme pour ajouter à une vraisemblance cherchée et voulue, usé aux genoux et aux coudes, et paraissait avoir été longtemps porté, et le manteau de mer, de grosse étoffe, ressemblait à un haillon de pêcheur. Ce vieillard avait sur la tête le chapeau rond du temps, à haute forme et à large bord, qui, rabattu, a l’aspect campagnard, et, relevé d’un côté par une ganse à cocarde, a l’aspect militaire. Il portait ce chapeau rabaissé à la paysanne, sans ganse ni cocarde.

Lord Balcarras, gouverneur de l’île, et le prince de la Tour-d’Auvergne, l’avaient en personne conduit et installé à bord. L’agent secret des princes, Gélambre, ancien garde du corps de M. le comte d’Artois, avait lui-même veillé à l’aménagement de sa cabine, poussant le soin et le respect, quoique fort bon gentilhomme, jusqu'à porter derrière ce vieillard sa valise. En le quittant pour retourner à terre, M. de Gélambre avait fait à ce paysan un profond salut; lord Balcarras lui avait dit: Bonne chance, général, et le prince de la Tour-d'Auvergne lui avait dit: Au revoir, mon cousin.

«Le paysan», c'était en effet le nom sous lequel les gens de l'équipage s'étaient mis tout de suite à désigner leur passager, dans les courts dialogues que les hommes de mer ont entre eux; mais, sans en savoir plus long, ils comprenaient que ce paysan n'était pas plus un paysan que la corvette de guerre n'était une corvette de charge.

Il y avait peu de vent. La Claymore quitta Bonnenuit, passa devant Boulay-Bay, et fut quelque temps en vue, courant des bordées; puis elle décrut dans la nuit croissante, et s'effaça.

Une heure après, Gélambre, rentré chez lui à Saint-Hélier, expédia, par l'exprès de Southampton, à M. le comte d'Artois, au quartier général du duc d'York, les quatre lignes qui suivent:

«Monseigneur, le départ vient d'avoir lieu. Succès certain. Dans huit jours toute la côte sera en feu, de Granville à Saint-Malo.»

Quatre jours auparavant, par émissaire secret, le représentant Prieur de la

Marne, en mission près de l'armée des côtes de Cherbourg, et momentanément en résidence à Granville, avait reçu, écrit de la même écriture que la

Dépêche précédente, le message qu'on va lire:

«Citoyen représentant, le 1er juin, à l'heure de la marée, la corvette de guerre Claymore, à batterie masquée, appareillera pour déposer sur la côte de France un homme dont voici le signalement: haute taille, vieux, cheveux blancs, habits de paysan, mains d'aristocrate. Je vous enverrai demain plus de détails. Il débarquera le 2 au matin. Avertissez la croisière, capturez la corvette, faites guillotiner l'homme.»

II. NUIT SUR LE NAVIRE ET SUR LE PASSAGER

La corvette, au lieu de prendre par le sud et de se diriger vers Sainte-Catherine, avait mis le cap au nord, puis avait tourné à l’ouest et s’était résolument engagée entre Serk et Jersey dans le bras de mer qu’on appelle le Passage de la Déroute. Il n’y avait alors de phare sur aucun point de ces deux côtes.

Le soleil s’était bien couché; la nuit était noire, plus que ne le sont d’ordinaire les nuits d’été; c’était une nuit de lune, mais de vastes nuages, plutôt de l’équinoxe que du solstice, plafonnaient le ciel, et, selon toute apparence, la lune ne serait visible que lorsqu’elle toucherait l’horizon, au moment de son coucher. Quelques nuées pendaient jusque sur la mer et la couvraient de brume.

Toute cette obscurité était favorable.

L’intention du pilote Gacquoil était de laisser Jersey à gauche et Guernesey à droite, et de gagner, par une marche hardie entre les Hanois et les Douvres, une baie quelconque du littoral de Saint-Malo, route moins courte que par les Minquiers, mais plus sûre, la croisière française ayant pour consigne habituelle de faire surtout le guet entre Saint-Hélier et Granville.

Si le vent s’y prêtait, si rien ne survenait, et en couvrant la corvette de toile, Gacquoil espérait toucher la côte de France au point du jour.

Tout allait bien, la corvette venait de dépasser Gros-Nez; vers neuf heures, le temps fit mine de bouder, comme disent les marins, et il y eut du vent et de la mer; mais ce vent était bon, et cette mer était forte sans être violente. Pourtant, à de certains coups de lame, l’avant de la Corvette embarquait.

Le «paysan» que lord Balcarras avait appelé général, et auquel le prince de La Tour-d’Auvergne avait dit: mon cousin, avait le pied marin et se promenait avec une gravité tranquille sur le pont de la corvette. Il n’avait pas l’air de s’apercevoir qu’elle était fort secouée. De temps en temps il tirait de la poche de sa veste une tablette de chocolat dont il cassait et mâchait un morceau, ses cheveux blancs n’empêchant pas qu’il eût toutes ses dents.

Il ne parlait à personne, si ce n’est, par instants, bas et brièvement, au capitaine, qui l’écoutait avec déférence et semblait considérer ce passager comme plus commandant que lui-même.

La Claymore, habilement pilotée, côtoya, inaperçue dans le brouillard, le long escarpement nord de Jersey, serrant de près la côte, à cause du redoutable écueil Pierres-de-Leeq qui est au milieu du bras de mer entre Jersey et Serk. Gacquoil, debout à la barre, signalant tour à tour la Grève de Leeq, Gros-Nez, Plémont, faisait glisser la corvette parmi ces chaînes de récifs, en quelque sorte à tâtons, mais avec certitude, comme un homme qui est de la maison et qui connaît les êtres de l’océan. La corvette n’avait pas de feu à l’avant, de crainte de dénoncer son passage dans ces mers surveillées. On se félicitait du brouillard. On atteignit la Grande-Etape; la brume était si épaisse qu’à peine distinguait-on la haute silhouette du Pinacle. On entendit dix heures sonner au clocher de Saint-Ouen, signe que le vent se maintenait vent-arrière. Tout continuait d’aller bien; la mer devenait plus houleuse à cause du voisinage de la Corbière.

Un peu après dix heures, le comte du Boisberthelot et le chevalier de La Vieuville reconduisirent l’homme aux habits de paysan jusqu’à sa cabine, qui était la propre chambre du capitaine. An moment d’y entrer, il leur dit en baissant la voix:

— Vous le savez, messieurs, le secret importe. Silence jusqu’au moment de l’explosion. Vous seuls connaissez ici mon nom.

— Nous l’emporterons an tombeau, répondit Boisberthelot.

— Quant à moi, repartit le vieillard, fussé-je devant la mort, je ne le dirais pas.

Et il entra dans sa chambre.

III. NOBLESSE ET ROTURE MÊLÉES

Le commandant et le second remontèrent sur le pont et se mirent à marcher côte à côte en causant. Ils parlaient évidemment de leur passager, et voici à peu près le dialogue que le vent dispersait dans les ténèbres.

Boisberthelot grommela à demi-voix à l’oreille de La Vieuville:

— Nous allons voir si c’est un chef.

La Vieuville répondit:

— En attendant, c’est un prince.

— Presque.

— Gentilhomme en France, mais prince en Bretagne.

— Comme les La Trémoille, comme les Rohan.

— Dont il est l’allié.

Boisberthelot reprit:

— En France et dans les carrosses du roi, il est marquis comme je suis comte et comme vous êtes chevalier.

— Ils sont loin les carrosses! s’écria La Vieuville. Nous en sommes au tombereau.

Il y eut un silence.

Boisberthelot repartit:

— A défaut d’un prince français, on prend un prince breton.

— Faute de grives… Non, faute d’un aigle, on prend un corbeau.

— J’aimerais mieux un vautour, dit Boisberthelot. Et la Vieuville répliqua:

— Certes! un bec et des griffes.

— Nous allons voir.

— Oui, reprit La Vieuville, il est temps qu’il y ait un chef. Je suis de l’avis de Tinténiac: un chef, et de la poudre! Tenez, commandant, je connais à peu près tous les chefs possibles et impossibles; ceux d’hier, ceux d’aujourd’hui et ceux de demain; pas un n’est la caboche de guerre qu’il nous faut. Dans cette diable de Vendée, il faut un général qui soit en même temps un procureur; il faut ennuyer l’ennemi, lui disputer le moulin, le buisson, le fossé, le caillou, lui faire de mauvaises querelles, tirer parti de tout, veiller à tout, massacrer beaucoup, faire des exemples, n’avoir ni sommeil ni pitié. À cette heure, dans cette armée de paysans, il y a des héros, il n’y a pas de capitaines. D’Elbée est nul, Leseure est malade, Bonchamps fait grâce; il est bon, c'est bête. La Rochejaquelein est un magnifique sous-lieutenant; Silz est un officier de rase campagne, impropre à la guerre d'expédients; Cathelineau est un Charretier naïf, Stofflet est un garde-chasse rusé, Bérard est inepte, Boulainvilliers est ridicule, Charette est horrible. Et je ne parle pas du barbier Gaston. Car, Mordemonbleu! À quoi bon chamailler la révolution et quelle différence y a-t-il entre les républicains et nous si nous faisons commander les gentilshommes par les perruquiers?

— C'est que cette chienne de révolution nous gagne, nous aussi.

— Une gale qu'a la France?

— Gale du tiers état, reprit Boisberthelot. L'Angleterre seule peut nous tirer de là.

— Elle nous en tirera, n'en doutez pas, capitaine.

— En attendant, c'est laid.

— Certes, des manants partout; la monarchie qui a pour général en chef Stofflet, garde-chasse de M. de Maulevrier, n'a rien à envier à la république qui a pour ministre Pache, fils du portier du duc de Castries. Quel vis-à-vis que cette guerre de la Vendée: d'un côté Santerre le brasseur, de l'autre Gaston le merlan!

— Mon cher La Vieuville, je fais un certain cas de ce Gaston. Il n'a point mal agi dans son commandement de Guéménée. Il a gentiment arquebusé trois cents bleus après leur avoir fait creuser leur fosse par eux-mêmes.

— A la bonne heure, mais je l'eusse fait tout aussi bien que lui.

— Pardieu, sans doute. Et moi aussi.

— Les grands actes de guerre, reprit La Vieuville, veulent de la noblesse dans qui les accomplit. Ce sont choses de chevaliers et non de perruquiers.

— Il y a pourtant dans ce tiers état, répliqua Boisberthelot, des hommes estimables. Tenez, par exemple, cet horloger Joly. Il avait été sergent au régiment de Flandre, il se fait chef vendéen, il commande une bande de la côte; il a un fils, qui est républicain, et, pendant que le père sert dans les blancs, le fils sert dans les bleus. Rencontre. Bataille. Le père fait prisonnier son fils, et lui brûle la cervelle.

— Celui-là est bien, dit La Vieuville.

— Un Brutus royaliste, reprit Boisberthelot.

— Cela n'empêche pas qu'il est insupportable d'être commandé par un

Coquereau, un Jean-Jean, un Moulins, un Focart, un Bouju, un Chouppes!

— Mon cher chevalier, la colère est la même de l'autre côté. Nous sommes pleins de bourgeois; ils sont pleins de nobles. Croyez-vous que les sans-culottes soient contents d'être commandés par le comte de Canclaux, le vicomte de Miranda, le vicomte de Beauharnais, le comte de Valence, le marquis de Custine et le duc de Biron!

— Quel gâchis!

— Et le duc de Chartres!

— Fils d'Egalité. Ah çà, quand sera-t-il roi, celui-là?

— Jamais.

— Il monte au trône. Il est servi par ses crimes.

— Et desservi par ses vices, dit Boisberthelot.

Il y eut encore un silence, et Boisberthelot poursuivit:

— Il avait pourtant voulu se réconcilier. Il était venu voir le roi.

J'étais là, à Versailles, quand on lui a craché dans le dos.

— Du haut du grand escalier?

— Oui.

— On a bien fait.

— Nous l'appelions Bourbon le Bourbeux.

— Il est chauve, il a des pustules, il est régicide, pouah!

Et La Vieuville ajouta:

— Moi, j'étais à Ouessant avec lui.

— Sur le Saint-Esprit?

— Oui.

— S'il eût obéi au signal de tenir le vent que lui faisait l'amiral d'Orvilliers, il empêchait les anglais de passer.

— Certes.

— Est-il vrai qu'il se soit, caché à fond de cale?

— Non. Mais il faut le dire tout de même.

Et La Vieuville éclata de rire.

Boisberthelot reprit:

— Il y a des imbéciles. Tenez, ce Boulaivilliers dont vous parliez, La Vieuville, je l'ai connu, je l'ai vu de près. Au commencement, les paysans étaient armés de piques; ne s'était-il pas fourré dans la tête d'en faire des piquiers? Il voulait leur apprendre l'exercice de la pique-en-biais et de la pique-traînante-le-fer-devant. Il avait rêvé de transformer ces sauvages en soldats de ligne. Il prétendait leur enseigner à émousser les angles d'un carré et à faire des bataillons à centre vide. Il leur baragouinait la vieille langue militaire; pour dire un chef d'escouade, il disait, un cap d'escadre, ce qui était l'appellation des caporaux sous Louis XIV. Il s'obstinait à créer un régiment avec tous ces braconniers; il avait des compagnies régulières dont les sergents se rangeaient en rond tous les soirs, recevant le mot, et le contre-mot du sergent de la colonelle qui les disait tout bas au sergent de la lieutenance, lequel les disait à son voisin qui les transmettait au plus proche, et ainsi d'oreille en oreille jusqu'au dernier. Il cassa un officier qui ne s'était pas levé tête nue pour recevoir le mot d'ordre de la bouche du sergent. Vous jugez comme cela a réussi. Ce butor ne comprenait pas que les paysans veulent être menés à la paysanne, et qu'on ne fait pas des hommes de caserne avec des hommes des bois. Oui, j'ai connu ce Boulainvilliers-là.

Ils firent quelques pas, chacun songeant de son côté.

Puis la causerie continua.

— A propos, se confirme-t-il que Dampierre soit tué?

— Oui, commandant.

— Devant Condé?

— Au camp de Pamars. D'un boulet de canon.

Boisberthelot soupira.

— Le comte de Dampierre. Encore un des nôtres qui était des leurs!

— Bon voyage! dit La Vieuville.

— Et Mesdames? où sont-elles?

— A Trieste.

— Toujours?

— Toujours.

Et La Vieuville s'écria:

— Ah! cette république! que de dégâts pour peu de chose! Quand on pense que cette révolution est venue pour un déficit de quelques millions!

— Se défier des petits points de départ, dit Boisberthelot.

— Tout va mal, reprit La Vieuville.

— Oui, La Rouarie est mort, Du Dresnay est idiot. Quels tristes meneurs que tous ces évêques, ce Coucy, l'évêque de la Rochelle, ce Beaupoil Saint-Aulaire, l'évêque de Poitiers, ce Mercy, l'évêque de Luçon, amant de madame de L'Eschasserie!…

— Laquelle s'appelle Servanteau, vous savez, commandant; L'Eschasserie est un nom de terre.

— Et ce faux évêque d’Agra, qui est curé de je ne sais quoi!

— De Dol. Il s’appelle Guillot de Folleville. Il est brave, du reste, et se bat.

— Des prêtres quand il faudrait des soldats! Des évêques qui ne sont pas des évêques! des généraux qui ne sont pas des généraux!

La Vieuville interrompit Boisberthelot.

— Commandant, vous avez le Moniteur dans votre cabine?

— Oui.

— Qu’est-ce donc qu’on joue à Paris dans ce moment-ci?

— Adèle et Paulin, et la Caverne.

— Je voudrais voir ça.

— Vous le verrez. Nous serons à Paris dans un mois.

Boisberthelot réfléchit un instant et ajouta:

— Au plus tard. M. Windham l’a dit à milord Hood.

— Mais alors, commandant, tout ne va pas si mal?

— Tout irait bien, parbleu, à la condition que la guerre de Bretagne fût bien conduite.

La Vieuville hocha la tête.

— Commandant, reprit-il, débarquerons-nous l’infanterie de marine?

— Oui, si la côte est pour nous; non, si elle est hostile. Quelquefois il faut que la guerre enfonce les portes, quelquefois il faut qu’elle se lisse. La guerre civile doit toujours avoir dans sa poche une fausse clef. On fera le possible. Ce qui importe, c’est le chef.

Et Boisberthelot, pensif, ajouta:

— La Vieuville, que penseriez-vous du chevalier de Dieuzie?

— Du jeune?

— Oui.

— Pour commander?

— Oui.

— Que c’est encore un officier de plaine et de bataille rangée. La broussaille ne connaît que le paysan.

— Alors, résignez-vous au général Stofflet et au général Cathelineau.

La Vieuville rêva un moment, et dit:

— Il faudrait un prince, un prince de France, un prince du sang. Un vrai prince.

— Pourquoi? Qui dit prince…

— Dit poltron. Je le sais, commandant. Niais c’est pour l’effet sur les gros yeux bêtes des gars.

— Mon cher chevalier, les princes ne veulent pas venir.

— On s’en passera.

Boisberthelot fit ce mouvement machinal qui consiste à se presser le front avec la main, comme pour en faire sortir une idée.

Il reprit:

— Enfin, essayons de ce général-ci.

— C’est un grand gentilhomme.

— Croyez-vous qu’il suffira?

— Pourvu qu’il soit bon, dit La Vieuville.

— C’est-à-dire féroce, dit Boisberthelot.

Le comte et le chevalier se regardèrent.

— Monsieur du Boisberthelot, vous avez dit le mot. Féroce. Oui, c’est là ce qu’il nous faut. Ceci est la guerre sans miséricorde. L’heure est aux sanguinaires. Les régicides ont coupé la tête à Louis XVI, nous arracherons les quatre membres aux régicides. Oui, le général nécessaire est le général inexorable. Dans l’Anjou et dans le haut Poitou, les chefs font les magnanimes, on patauge dans la générosité, rien ne va. Dans le Marais et dans le pays de Retz, les chefs sont atroces, tout marche. C’est parce que Charette est féroce qu’il tient tête à Parrein. Hyène contre hyène.

Boisberthelot n’eut pas le temps de répondre à La Vieuville. La Vieuville eut la parole brusquement coupée par un cri désespéré, et en même temps on entendit un bruit qui ne ressemblait à aucun des bruits qu’on entend. Ce cri et ces bruits venaient du dedans du navire.

Le capitaine et le lieutenant se précipitèrent vers l’entrepont, mais ne purent y entrer. Tous les canonniers remontaient éperdus.

Une chose effrayante venait d’arriver.

IV. TORMENTUM BELLI

Une des caronades de la batterie, une pièce de vingt-quatre, s’était détachée. Ceci est le plus redoutable peut-être des évènements de mer. Rien de plus terrible ne peut arriver à un navire de guerre au large et en pleine marche.

Un canon qui casse son amarre devient brusquement on ne sait quelle bête surnaturelle. C’est une machine qui se transforme en un monstre. Cette masse court sur ses roues, a des mouvements de bille de billard, penche avec le roulis, plonge avec le tangage, va, vient, s’arrête, paraît méditer, reprend sa course, traverse comme une flèche le navire d’un bout à l’autre, pirouette, se dérobe, s’évade, se cabre, heurte, ébrèche, tue, extermine. C’est un bélier qui bat à sa fantaisie une muraille. Ajoutez ceci: le bélier est de fer, la muraille est de bois. C’est l’entrée en liberté de la matière; on dirait que cet esclave éternel se venge; il semble que la méchanceté qui est dans ce que nous appelons les objets inertes sorte et éclate tout à coup; cela a l’air de perdre patience et de prendre une étrange revanche obscure; rien de plus inexorable que la colère de l’inanimé. Ce bloc forcené a les sauts de la panthère, la lourdeur de l’éléphant, l’agilité de la souris, l’opiniâtreté de la cognée, l’inattendu de la houle, les coups de coude de l’éclair, la surdité du sépulcre. Il pèse dix mille, et il ricoche comme une balle d’enfant. Ce sont des tournoiements brusquement coupés d’angles droits. Et que faire? Comment en venir à bout? Une tempête cesse, un cyclone passe, un vent tombe, un mât brisé se remplace, une voie d’eau se bouche, un incendie s’éteint: mais que devenir avec cette énorme brute de bronze? De quelle façon s’y prendre? Vous pouvez raisonner un dogue, étonner un taureau, fasciner un boa, effrayer un tigre, attendrir un lion; aucune ressource avec ce monstre, un canon lâché. Vous ne pouvez pas le tuer, il est mort. Et en même temps, il vit. Il vit d’une vie sinistre qui lui vient de l’infini. Il a sous lui son plancher qui le balance. Il est remué par le navire qui est remué par la mer qui est remuée par le vent. Cet exterminateur est un jouet. Le navire, les flots, les souffles, tout cela le tient; de là sa vie affreuse. Que faire à cet engrenage? Comment entraver ce mécanisme monstrueux du naufrage? Comment prévoir ces allées et venues, ces retours, ces arrêts, ces chocs? Chacun de ses coups au bordage peut défoncer le navire. Comment deviner ces affreux méandres? On a affaire à un projectile qui se ravise, qui a l’air d’avoir des idées, et qui change à chaque instant de direction. Comment arrêter ce qu’il faut éviter? L’horrible canon se démène, mange, recule, frappe à droite, frappe à gauche, fuit, passe, déconcerte l’attente, broie l’obstacle, écrase les hommes comme des mouches. Toute la terreur de la situation est dans la mobilité du plancher. Comment combattre un plan incliné qui a des caprices? Le navire a, pour ainsi dire, dans le ventre la foudre prisonnière qui cherche à s’échapper; quelque chose comme un tonnerre roulant sur un tremblement de terre.

En un instant tout l’équipage fut sur pied. La faute était au chef de pièce qui avait négligé de serrer l’écrou de la chaîne d’amarrage et mal entravé les quatre roues de la caronade; ce qui donnait du jeu à la semelle et au châssis, désaccordait les deux plateaux, et avait fini par disloquer la brague. Le combleau s’était cassé, de sorte que le canon n’était plus ferme à l’affût. La brague fixe, qui empêche le recul, n’était pas encore en usage a cette époque. Un paquet de mer étant venu frapper le sabord, la caronade mal amarrée avait reculé et brisé sa chaîne, et s’était mise à errer formidablement dans l’entre-pont.

Qu’on se figure, pour avoir une idée de ce glissement étrange, une goutte d’eau courant sur une vitre.

Au moment où l’amarre cassa, les canonniers étaient dans la batterie. Les uns groupés, les autres épars, occupés aux ouvrages de mer que font les marins en prévoyance d’un branle-bas de combat. La caronade, lancée par le tangage, fit un trouée dans ce tas d’hommes et en écrasa quatre du premier coup, puis, reprise et décochée par le roulis, elle coupa en deux un cinquième misérable, et alla heurter à la muraille de bâbord une pièce de la batterie qu’elle démonta. De là le cri de détresse qu’on venait d’entendre. Tous les hommes se pressèrent à l’escalier-échelle. La batterie se vida en un clin d’oeil.

L’énorme pièce avait été laissée seule. Elle était livrée à elle-même. Elle était sa maîtresse, et la maîtresse du navire. Elle pouvait en faire ce qu’elle voulait. Tout cet équipage d’hommes accoutumés à rire dans la bataille tremblait. Dire l’épouvante est impossible.

Le capitaine Boisberthelot et le lieutenant La Vieuville, deux intrépides pourtant, s’étaient arrêtés au haut de l’escalier, et, muets, pâles, hésitants, regardaient dans l’entre-pont. Quelqu’un les écarta du coude et descendit.

C’était leur passager, le paysan, l’homme dont ils venaient de parler le moment d’auparavant.

Arrivé au bas de l’escalier-échelle, il s’arrêta.

V. VIS ET VIR

Le canon allait et venait dans l’entre-pont. On eût dit le chariot vivant de l’Apocalypse. Le falot de marine, oscillant sous l’étrave de la batterie, ajoutait à cette vision un vertigineux balancement d’ombre et de lumière. La forme du canon s’effaçait dans la violence de sa course, et il apparaissait, tantôt noir dans la clarté, tantôt reflétant de vagues blancheurs dans l’obscurité.

Il continuait l’exécution du navire. Il avait déjà fracassé quatre autres pièces et fait dans la muraille deux crevasses, heureusement au-dessus de la flottaison, mais par où l’eau entrerait, s’il survenait une bourrasque. Il se ruait frénétiquement sur la membrure; les porques très robustes résistaient, les bois courbes ont une solidité particulière; mais on entendait leurs craquements sous cette massue démesurée, frappant, avec une sorte d’ubiquité inouïe, de tous les côtés à la fois. Un grain de plomb secoué dans une bouteille n’a pas des percussions plus insensées et plus rapides. Les quatre roues passaient et repassaient sur les hommes tués, les coupaient, les dépeçaient et les déchiquetaient, et des cinq cadavres avaient fait vingt tronçons qui roulaient à travers la batterie; les têtes mortes semblaient crier; des ruisseaux de sang se tordaient sur le plancher selon les balancements du roulis. Le vaigrage, avarié en plusieurs endroits, commençait à s’entr’ouvrir. Tout le navire était plein d’un bruit monstrueux.

Le capitaine avait promptement repris son sang-froid, et sur son ordre ou avait jeté par le carré, dans l’entre-pont, tout ce qui pouvait amortir et entraver la course effrénée du canon, les matelas, les hamacs, les rechanges de voiles, les rouleaux de cordages, les sacs d’équipage, et les ballots de faux assignats dont la corvette avait tout un chargement, cette infamie anglaise étant regardée comme de bonne guerre.

Mais que pouvaient faire ces chiffons, personne n’osant descendre pour les disposer comme il eût fallu? En quelques minutes ce fut de la charpie.

Il y avait juste assez de mer pour que l’accident fût aussi complet que possible. Une tempête eût été désirable; elle eût peut-être culbuté le canon, et une fois les quatre roues en l’air, on eût pu s’en rendre maître.

Cependant le ravage s’aggravait. Il y avait des écorchures et même des fractures aux mâts, qui, emboîtés dans la charpente de la quille, traversent les étages des navires et y font comme de gros piliers ronds. Sous les frappements convulsifs du canon, le mât de misaine s'était lézardé, le grand mât lui-même était entamé. La batterie se disloquait. Dix pièces sur trente étaient hors de combat; les brèches au bordage se multipliaient, et la corvette commençait à faire eau.

Le vieux passager descendu dans l'entre-pont semblait un homme de pierre au bas de l'escalier. Il jetait sur cette dévastation un oeil sévère. Il ne bougeait point. Il paraissait impossible de faire un pas dans la batterie.

Chaque mouvement de la caronade en liberté ébauchait l'effondrement du navire. Encore quelques instants, et le naufrage était inévitable.

Il fallait périr ou couper court an désastre; prendre un parti; mais lequel?

Quelle combattante que cette caronade!

Il s'agissait d'arrêter cette épouvantable folle.

Il s'agissait de colleter cet éclair.

Il s'agissait de terrasser cette foudre.

Boisberthelot dit à La Vieuville:

— Croyez-vous en Dieu, chevalier?

La Vieuville répondit:

— Oui. Non. Quelquefois.

— Dans la tempête?

— Oui. Et dans des moments comme celui-ci.

— Il n'y a en effet que Dieu qui puisse nous tirer de là, dit Boisberthelot.

Tous se taisaient, laissant la caronade faire son fracas horrible.

Du dehors, le flot battant le navire répondait aux chocs du canon par des coups de mer. On eût dit deux marteaux alternant.

Tout à coup, dans cette espèce de cirque inabordable où bondissait le canon échappé, on vit un homme apparaître, une barre de fer à la main. C'était l'auteur de la catastrophe, le chef de pièce coupable de négligence et cause de l'accident, le maître de la caronade. Avant fait le mal, il voulait le réparer. Il avait empoigné une barre d'anspect d'une main, une drosse à nud coulant de l'autre main, et il avait sauté par le carré dans l'entre-pont.

Alors une chose farouche commença; spectacle titanique; le combat du canon contre le canonnier; la bataille de la matière et de l'intelligence, le duel de la chose contre l'homme.

L'homme s'était posté dans un angle, et, sa barre et sa corde dans ses deux poings, adossé à une porque, affermi sur ses jarrets qui semblaient deux piliers d’acier, livide, calme, tragique, comme enraciné dans le plancher, il attendait.

Il attendait que le canon passât près de lui.

Le canonnier connaissait sa pièce, et il lui semblait qu’elle devait le connaître. Il vivait depuis longtemps avec elle. Que de fois il lui avait fourré la main dans la gueule! C’était son monstre familier. Il se mit à lui parler comme à son chien. — Viens, disait-il. Il l’aimait peut-être.

Il paraissait souhaiter qu’elle vînt à lui.

Mais venir à lui, c’était venir sur lui. Et alors il était perdu. Comment éviter l’écrasement? Là était la question. Tous regardaient, terrifiés. Pas une poitrine ne respirait librement, excepté peut-être celle du vieillard qui était seul dans l’entre-pont avec les deux combattants, témoin sinistre.

Il pouvait lui-même être broyé par la pièce. Il ne bougeait pas.

Sous eux le flot, aveugle, dirigeait le combat.

Au moment où, acceptant ce corps-à-corps effroyable, le canonnier vint provoquer le canon, un hasard des balancements de la mer fit que la caronade demeura un moment immobile et comme stupéfaite. — Viens donc! lui disait l’homme. Elle semblait écouter.

Subitement elle sauta sur lui. L’homme esquiva le choc.

La lutte s’engagea. Lutte inouïe. Le fragile se colletant avec l’invulnérable. Le belluaire de chair attaquant la bête d’airain. D’un côté une force, de l’autre une âme.

Tout cela se passait dans une pénombre. C’était comme la vision indistincte d’un prodige.

Une âme, chose étrange, on eût dit que le canon en avait une, lui aussi; mais une âme de haine et de rage. Cette cécité paraissait avoir des yeux. Le monstre avait l’air de guetter l’homme. Il y avait, on l’eût pu croire du moins, de la ruse dans cette masse. Elle aussi choisissait son moment. C’était on ne sait quel gigantesque insecte de fer ayant ou semblant avoir une volonté de démon. Par moments, cette sauterelle colossale cognait le plafond bas de la batterie, puis elle retombait sur ses quatre roues comme un tigre sur ses quatre griffes, et se remettait à courir sur l’homme. Lui, souple, agile, adroit, se tordait comme une couleuvre sous tous ces mouvements de foudre. Il évitait les rencontres, mais les coups auxquels il se dérobait tombaient sur le navire et continuaient de le démolir.

Un bout de chaîne cassée était resté accroché à la caronade. Cette chaîne s’était enroulée on ne sait comment dans la vis du bouton de culasse. Une extrémité de la chaîne était fixée à l’affût. L’autre, libre, tournoyait éperdument autour du canon dont elle exagérait tous les soubresauts. La vis la tenait comme une main fermée, et cette chaîne, multipliant les coups de bélier par des coups de lanière, faisait autour du canon un tourbillon terrible, fouet de fer dans un poing d’airain. Cette chaîne compliquait le combat.

Pourtant l’homme luttait. Même, par instants, c’était l’homme qui attaquait le canon; il rampait le long du bordage, sa barre et sa corde à la main; et le canon avait l’air de comprendre, et, comme s’il devinait un piège, fuyait. L’homme, formidable, le poursuivait.

De telles choses ne peuvent durer longtemps. Le canon sembla se dire tout à coup: Allons! il faut en finir! et il s’arrêta. On sentit l’approche du dénoûment. Le canon, comme en suspens, semblait avoir ou avait, car pour tous c’était un être, une préméditation féroce. Brusquement, il se précipita sur le canonnier. Le canonnier se rangea de côté, le laissa passer, et lui cria en riant: A refaire! Le canon, comme furieux, brisa une caronade à bâbord; puis, ressaisi par la fronde invisible qui le tenait, il s’élança à tribord sur l’homme, qui échappa. Trois caronades s’effondrèrent sous la poussée du canon; alors, comme aveugle et ne sachant plus ce qu’il faisait, il tourna le dos à l’homme, roula de l’arrière à l’avant, détraqua l’étrave, et alla faire une brèche à la muraille de la proue. L’homme s’était réfugié au pied de l’escalier, à quelques pas du vieillard témoin. Le canonnier tenait sa barre d’anspect en arrêt. Le canon parut l’apercevoir, et, sans prendre la peine de se retourner, recula sur l’homme avec une promptitude de coup de hache. L’homme acculé au bordage était perdu. Tout l’équipage poussa un cri.

Mais le vieux passager jusqu’alors immobile s’était élancé, lui-même plus rapide que toutes ces rapidités farouches. Il avait saisi un ballot de faux assignats, et, au risque d’être écrasé, il avait réussi à le jeter entre les roues de la caronade. Ce mouvement décisif et périlleux n’eût pas été exécuté avec plus de justesse et de précision par un homme rompu à tous les exercices décrits dans le livre de Durosel sur la Manoeuvre du canon de mer.

Le ballot fit l’effet d’un tampon. Le caillou enraye un bloc, une branche d’arbre détourne une avalanche. La caronade trébucha. Le canonnier à son tour, saisissant ce joint redoutable, plongea sa barre de fer entre les rayons d’une des roues d’arrière. Le canon s’arrêta.

Il penchait. L’homme, d’un mouvement de levier imprimé à la barre, le fit basculer. La lourde masse se renversa, avec le bruit d’une cloche qui s’écroule, et l’homme se ruant à corps perdu, ruisselant de sueur, passa le noeud coulant de la drosse au cou de bronze du monstre terrassé.

C’était fini. L’homme avait vaincu. La fourmi avait eu raison du mastodonte; le pygmée avait fait le tonnerre prisonnier.

Les soldats et les marins battirent des mains.

Tout l’équipage se précipita avec des câbles et des chaînes, et en un instant le canon fut amarré.

Le canonnier salua le passager.

— Monsieur, lui dit-il, vous m’avez sauvé la vie.

Le vieillard avait repris son attitude impassible, et ne répondit pas.

VI. LES DEUX PLATEAUX DE LA BALANCE

L’homme avait vaincu, mais on pouvait dire que le canon avait vaincu aussi. Le naufrage immédiat était évité, mais la corvette n’était point sauvée. Le délabrement du navire paraissait irrémédiable. Le bordage avait cinq brèches, dont une fort grande à l’avant; vingt caronades sur trente gisaient dans leur cadre. La caronade ressaisie et remise à la chaîne était elle-même hors de service; la vis du bouton de culasse était forcée, et par conséquent le pointage impossible. La batterie était réduite à neuf pièces. La cale faisait eau. Il fallait tout de suite courir aux avaries et faire jouer les pompes.

L’entre-pont, maintenant qu’on le pouvait regarder, était effroyable à voir. Le dedans d’une cage d’éléphant furieux n’est pas plus démantelé.

Quelle que fût pour la corvette la nécessité de ne pas être aperçue, il y avait une nécessité plus impérieuse encore, le sauvetage immédiat. Il avait fallu éclairer le pont par quelques falots plantés çà et là dans le bordage.

Cependant, tout le temps qu’avait duré cette diversion tragique, l’équipage étant absorbé par une question de vie ou de mort, on n’avait guère su ce qui se passait hors de la corvette. Le brouillard s’était épaissi; le temps avait changé; le vent avait fait du navire ce qu’il avait voulu; on était hors de route, à découvert de Jersey et de Guernesey, plus au sud qu’on ne devait l’être; on se trouvait en présence d’une mer démontée. De grosses vagues venaient baiser les plaies béantes de la corvette, baisers redoutables. Le bercement de la mer était menaçant. La brise devenait bise. Une bourrasque, une tempête peut-être, se dessinait. On ne voyait pas à quatre lames devant soi.

Pendant que les hommes d’équipage réparaient en hâte et sommairement les ravages de l’entre-pont, aveuglaient les voies d’eau et remettaient en batterie les pièces échappées au désastre, le vieux passager était remonté sur le pont.

Il s’était adossé au grand mât.

Il n’avait point pris garde à un mouvement qui avait eu lieu dans le navire. Le chevalier de La Vieuville avait fait mettre en bataille des deux côtés du grand mât les soldats d’infanterie de marine, et, sur un coup de sifflet du maître d’équipage, les matelots occupés à la manoeuvre s’étaient rangés debout sur les vergues.

Le comte du Boisberthelot s’avança vers le passager.

Derrière le capitaine marchait un homme hagard, haletant, les habits en désordre, l’air satisfait pourtant.

C’était le canonnier qui venait de se montrer si à propos dompteur de monstres, et qui avait eu raison du canon.

Le comte fit au vieillard vêtu en paysan le salut militaire, et lui dit:

— Mon général, voilà l’homme.

Le canonnier se tenait debout, les yeux baissés, dans l’attitude d’ordonnance.

Le comte du Boisberthelot reprit:

— Mon général, en présence de ce qu’a fait cet homme, ne pensez-vous pas qu’il y a pour ses chefs quelque chose à faire?

— Je le pense, dit le vieillard.

— Veuillez donner des ordres, repartit Boisberthelot.

— C’est à vous de les donner. Vous êtes le capitaine.

— Mais vous êtes le général, reprit Boisberthelot.

Le vieillard regarda le canonnier.

— Approche, dit-il.

Le canonnier fit un pas.

Le vieillard se tourna vers le comte du Boisberthelot, détacha la croix de Saint-Louis du capitaine, et la noua à la vareuse du canonnier.

— Hurrah! crièrent les matelots.

Les soldats de marine présentèrent les armes.

Et le vieux passager, montrant du doigt le canonnier ébloui, ajouta:

— Maintenant, qu’on fusille cet homme.

La stupeur succéda à l’acclamation.

Alors, au milieu d’un silence de tombe, le vieillard éleva la voix. Il dit:

— Une négligence a compromis ce navire. A cette heure il est peut-être perdu. Etre en mer, c’est être devant l’ennemi. Un navire qui fait une traversée est une armée qui livre une bataille. La tempête se cache, mais ne s’absente pas. Toute la mer est une embuscade. Peine de mort à toute faute commise en présence de l’ennemi. Il n’y a pas de faute réparable. Le courage doit être récompensé, et la négligence doit être punie.

Ces paroles tombaient l’une après l’autre, lentement, gravement, avec une sorte de mesure inexorable, comme des coups de cognée sur un chêne.

Et le vieillard, regardant les soldats, ajouta:

— Faites.

L’homme à la veste duquel brillait la croix de Saint-Louis courba la tête.

Sur un signe du comte du Boisberthelot, deux matelots descendirent dans l’entre-pont, puis revinrent apportant le hamac-suaire; l’aumônier du bord, qui depuis le départ était en prière dans le carré des officiers, accompagnait les deux matelots; un sergent détacha de la ligne de bataille douze soldats qu’il rangea sur deux rangs, six par six; le canonnier, sans dire un mot, se plaça entre les deux files. L’aumônier, le crucifix à la main, s’avança et se mit près de lui.

— Marche, dit le sergent. Le peloton se dirigea à pas lents vers l’avant; les deux matelots, portant le suaire, suivaient.

Un morne silence se fit sur la corvette. Un ouragan lointain soufflait.

Quelques instants après, une détonation éclata dans les ténèbres, une lueur passa, puis tout se tut, et l’on entendit le bruit que fait un corps en tombant dans la mer.

Le vieux passager, toujours adossé au grand mât, avait croisé les bras, et songeait. Boisberthelot, dirigeant vers lui l’index de sa main gauche, dit bas à La Vieuville:

— La Vendée a une tête.

VII. QUI MET A LA VOILE MET A LA LOTERIE

Mais qu’allait devenir la corvette?

Les nuages, qui toute la nuit s’étaient mêlés aux vagues, avaient fini par s’abaisser tellement qu’il n’y avait plus d’horizon et que toute la mer était comme sous un manteau. Rien que le brouillard. Situation toujours périlleuse, même pour un navire bien portant.

A la brume s’ajoutait la houle.

On avait mis le temps à profit; on avait allégé la corvette en jetant à la mer tout ce qu’on avait pu déblayer du dégât. fait par la caronade, les canons démontés, les affûts brisés, les membrures tordues ou déclouées, les pièces de bois ou de fer fracassées; on avait ouvert les sabords, et l’on avait fait glisser sur des planches dans les vagues les cadavres et les débris humains enveloppés dans des prélarts.

La mer commençait à n’être plus tenable. Non que la tempête devînt précisément imminente; il semblait au contraire qu’on entendît décroître l’ouragan qui bruissait derrière l’horizon, et la rafale s’en allait au nord; mais les lames restaient très hautes, ce qui indiquait un mauvais fond de mer, et, malade comme était la corvette, elle était peu résistante aux secousses, et les grandes vagues pouvaient lui être funestes.

Gacquoil était à la barre, pensif.

Faire bonne mine à mauvais jeu, c’est l’habitude des commandants de mer.

La Vieuville, qui était une nature d’homme gai dans les désastres, accosta

Gacquoil.

— Eh bien, pilote, dit-il, l’ouragan rate. L’envie d’éternuer n’aboutit pas. Nous nous en tirerons. Nous aurons du vent. Voilà tout.

Gacquoil, sérieux, répondit:

— Qui a du vent a du flot.

Ni riant, ni triste, tel est le marin. La réponse avait un sens inquiétant. Pour un navire qui fait eau, avoir du flot c’est s’emplir vite. Gacquoil avait souligné ce pronostic d’un vague froncement de sourcil. Peut-être, après la catastrophe; du canon et du canonnier, La Vieuville avait-il dit, un peu trop tôt, des paroles presque joviales et légères. Il y a des choses qui portent malheur quand on est au large. La mer est secrète; on ne sait jamais ce qu’elle a. Il faut prendre garde.

La Vieuville, sentit le besoin de redevenir grave.

— Où sommes-nous, pilote? demanda-t-il.

Le pilote répondit:

— Nous sommes dans la volonté de Dieu.

Un pilote est un maître; il faut toujours le laisser faire et il faut souvent le laisser dire. D’ailleurs cette espèce d’homme parle peu. La Vieuville s’éloigna.

La Vieuville avait fait une question au pilote, ce fut l’horizon qui répondit.

La mer se découvrit tout à coup.

Les brumes qui traînaient sur les vagues se déchirèrent, tout l’obscur bouleversement des flots s’étala à perte de vue dans un demi-jour crépusculaire, et voici ce qu’on vit.

Le ciel avait comme un couvercle de nuages; mais les nuages ne touchaient plus la mer; à l’est apparaissait une blancheur qui était le lever du jour, à l’ouest blêmissait une autre blancheur qui était le coucher de la lune. Ce deux blancheurs faisaient sur l’horizon, vis-à-vis l’une de l’autre; deux bandes étroites de lueur pâle entre la mer sombre et le ciel ténébreux.

Sur ces deux clartés se dessinaient, droites et immobiles, des silhouettes noires.

Au couchant, sur le ciel éclairé par la lune se découpaient trois hautes roches, debout comme des peulvens celtiques.

Au levant, sur l’horizon pâle du matin se dressaient huit voiles rangées en ordre et espacées d’une façon redoutable.

Les trois roches étaient un écueil; les huit voiles étaient une escadre.

On avait derrière soi les Minquiers, un rocher qui avait mauvaise réputation, devant soi la croisière française. A l’ouest l’abîme, à l’est le carnage; on était entre un naufrage et un combat.

Pour faire face à l’écueil, la corvette avait titre coque trouée, un gréement disloqué, une mâture ébranlée dans sa racine; pour faire face à la bataille, elle avait une artillerie dont vingt et un canons sur trente étaient démontés, et dont les meilleurs canonniers étaient morts.

Le point du jour était très faible, et l’on avait un peu de nuit devant soi. Cette nuit pouvait même durer encore assez longtemps, étant surtout faite par les nuages, qui étaient hauts, épais et profonds, et avaient l'aspect solide d'une voûte.

Le vent qui avait fini par emporter les brumes d'en bas drossait la corvette sur les Minquiers.

Dans l'excès de fatigue et de délabrement où elle était, elle n'obéissait presque plus à la barre, elle roulait plutôt qu'elle ne voguait, et, souffletée par le flot, elle se laissait faire par lui.

Les Minquiers, écueil tragique, étaient plus âpres encore en ce temps-là qu'aujourd'hui. Plusieurs tours de cette citadelle de l'abîme ont été rasées par l'incessant dépècement que fait la mer; la configuration des écueils change; ce n'est pas en vain que les flots s'appellent les lames, chaque marée est un trait de scie. A cette époque, toucher les Minquiers, c'était périr.

Quant à la croisière, c'était cette escadre de Cancale, devenue depuis célèbre sous le commandement de ce capitaine Duchesne que Léquinio appelait «le Père Duchène».

La situation était critique. La corvette avait, sans le savoir, pendant le déchaînement de la caronade, dévié et marché plutôt vers Granville que vers Saint-Malo. Quand même elle eût pu naviguer et faire voile, les Minquiers lui barraient le retour vers Jersey et la croisière lui barrait l'arrivée en France.

Du reste, de tempête point. Mais, comme l'avait dit le pilote, il y avait du flot. La mer, roulant sous un vent rude et sur un fond déchirant, était sauvage.

La mer ne dit jamais tout de suite ce qu'elle veut. Il y a de tout dans le gouffre, même de la chicane. On pourrait presque dire que la mer a une procédure, elle avance et recule, elle propose et se dédit, elle ébauche une bourrasque et elle y renonce, elle promet l'abîme et ne le tient pas, elle menace le nord et frappe le sud. Toute la nuit la corvette la Claymore avait eu le brouillard et craint la tourmente; la mer venait de se démentir, mais d'une façon farouche; elle avait esquissé la tempête et réalisé l'écueil. C'était toujours, sous une autre forme, le naufrage.

Et à la perte sur les brisants s'ajoutait l'extermination par le combat. Un ennemi complétait l'autre.

La Vieuville s'écria à travers son vaillant rire:

— Naufrage ici, bataille là. Des deux côtés nous avons le quine.

VIII. 9 = 380

La corvette n’était presque plus qu’une épave.

Dans la blême clarté éparse, dans la noirceur des nuées, dans les mobilités confuses de l’horizon, dans les mystérieux froncements des vagues, il y avait une solennité sépulcrale. Excepté le vent soufflant d’un souffle hostile, tout se taisait. La catastrophe sortait du gouffre avec majesté. Elle ressemblait plutôt à une apparition qu’à une attaque. Rien ne bougeait dans les rochers, rien ne remuait dans les navires. C’était on ne sait quel colossal silence. Avait-on affaire à quelque chose de réel? On eût dit un rêve passant sur la mer. Les légendes ont de ces visions; la corvette était en quelque sorte entre l’écueil démon et la flotte fantôme.

Le comte du Boisberthelot donna à demi-voix des ordres à La Vieuville qui descendit dans la batterie, puis le capitaine saisit sa longue-vue et vint se placer à l’arrière à côté du pilote.

Tout l’effort de Gacquoil était de maintenir la corvette debout au flot; car, prise de côté par le vent et par la mer, elle eût inévitablement chaviré.

— Pilote, dit le capitaine, où sommes-nous?

— Sur les Minquiers.

— De quel côté?

— Du mauvais.

— Quel fond?

— Roche criarde.

— Peut-on s’embosser?

— On peut toujours mourir, dit le pilote.

Le capitaine dirigea sa lunette d’approche vers l’ouest et examina les Minquiers; puis il la tourna vers l’est et considéra les voiles en vue.

Le pilote continua, comme se parlant à lui-même:

— C’est les Minquiers. Cela sert de reposoir à la mouette rieuse quand elle s’en va de Hollande et au grand goëland à manteau noir.

Cependant le capitaine avait compté les voiles.

Il y avait bien en effet huit navires correctement disposés et dressant sur l’eau leur profil de guerre. On apercevait au centre la haute stature d’un vaisseau à trois ponts.

Le capitaine questionna le pilote.

— Connaissez-vous ces voiles?

— Certes! répondit Gacquoil.

— Qu’est-ce?

— C’est l’escadre.

— De France.

— Du diable.

Il y eut un silence. Le capitaine reprit:

— Toute la croisière est-elle là?

— Pas toute.

En effet, le 2 avril, Valazé avait annoncé à la Convention que dix frégates et six vaisseaux de ligne croisaient dans la Manche. Ce souvenir revint à l’esprit du capitaine.

— Au fait, dit-il, l’escadre est de seize bâtiments. Il n’y en a ici que huit.

— Le reste, dit Gacquoil, traîne par là-bas sur toute la côte, et espionne.

Le capitaine, tout en regardant à travers sa longue-vue, murmura:

— Un vaisseau à trois ponts, deux frégates de premier rang, cinq de deuxième rang.

— Mais moi aussi, grommela Gacquoil, je les ai espionnés.

— Bons bâtiments, dit le capitaine. J’ai un peu commandé tout cela.

— Moi, dit Gacquoil, je les ai vus de près. Je ne prends pas l’un pour l’autre. J’ai leur signalement dans la cervelle.

Le capitaine passa sa longue-vue au pilote.

— Pilote, distinguez-vous bien le bâtiment de haut bord?

— Oui, mon commandant, c’est, le vaisseau la Côte-d’Or.

— Qu’ils ont débaptisé, dit le capitaine. C’était autrefois Les États-de-Bourgogne. Un navire neuf. Cent vingt-huit canons.

Il tira de sa poche un carnet et un crayon, et écrivit sur le carnet le chiffre 128.

Il poursuivit:

— Pilote, quelle est la première voile à bâbord?

— C’est l’Expérimentée.

— Frégate de premier rang. Cinquante-deux canons. Elle était en armement à

Brest il y a deux mois.

Le capitaine marqua sur son carnet le chiffre 52.

— Pilote, reprit-il, quelle est la deuxième voile à bâbord?

— La Dryade.

— Frégate de premier rang. Quarante canons de dix-huit. Elle a été dans l'Inde. Elle a une belle histoire militaire.

Et il écrivit au-dessous du chiffre 52 le chiffre 40; puis, relevant la tête:

— A tribord, maintenant.

— Mon commandant, ce sont toutes des frégates de second rang. Il y en a cinq.

— Quelle est la première à partir du vaisseau?

— La Résolue.

— Trente-deux pièces de dix-huit. Et la seconde?

— Le Richemont.

— Même force. Après?

— L'Athée

[Footnote 1: Archive de la Marine. Etat de la flotte en mars 1793.]

— Drôle de nom pour aller en mer. Après?

— La Calypso.

— Après?

— La Preneuse.

— Cinq frégates de trente-deux chacune.

Le capitaine écrivit au-dessous des premiers chiffres, 160.

— Pilote, dit-il, vous les reconnaissez bien.

— Et vous, répondit Gacquoil, vous les connaissez bien, mon commandant.

Reconnaître est quelque chose, connaître est mieux.

Le capitaine avait l'oeil fixé sur son carnet et additionnait entre ses dents.

— Cent vingt-huit, cinquante-deux, quarante, cent soixante.

En ce moment, La Vieuville remontait sur le pont.

— Chevalier, lui cria le capitaine, nous sommes en présence de trois cent quatre-vingts pièces.

— Soit, dit La Vieuville.

— Vous revenez de l'inspection, La Vieuville; combien décidément avons-nous de pièces en état de faire feu?

— Neuf.

— Soit, dit à son tour Boisberthelot.

Il reprit la longue-vue des mains du pilote, et regarda l'horizon.

Les huit navires silencieux et noirs semblaient immobiles, mais ils grandissaient.

Ils se rapprochaient insensiblement.

La Vieuville fit le salut militaire.

— Commandant, dit La Vieuville, voici mon rapport. Je me défiais de cette corvette Claymore. C'est toujours ennuyeux d'être embarqué brusquement sur un navire qui ne vous connaît pas ou qui ne vous aime pas. Navire anglais, traître aux français. La chienne de caronade l'a prouvé. J'ai fait la visite. Bonnes ancres. Ce n'est pas du fer de loupe; c'est forgé avec des barres soudées au martinet. Les cigales des ancres sont solides. Câbles excellents, faciles à débiter, ayant la longueur d'ordonnance, cent vingt brasses. Force munitions. Six canonniers morts. Cent soixante-onze coups à tirer par pièce.

— Parce qu'il n'y a plus que neuf pièces, murmura le capitaine.

Boisberthelot braqua sa longue-vue sur l'horizon. La lente approche de l'escadre continuait.

Les caronades ont un avantage, trois hommes suffisent pour les manoeuvrer; mais elles ont un inconvénient, elles portent moins loin et tirent moins juste que les canons. Il fallait donc laisser arriver l'escadre à portée de caronade.

Le capitaine donna ses ordres à voix basse. Le silence se fit dans le navire. On ne sonna point le branle-bas, mais on l'exécuta. La corvette était aussi hors de combat contre les hommes que contre les flots. On tira tout le parti possible de ce reste d'un navire de guerre. On accumula près des drosses, sur le passavant, tout ce qu'il y avait d'aussières et de grelins de rechange pour raffermir au besoin la mâture. Ou mit en ordre le poste des blessés. Selon la mode navale d'alors, on bastingua le pont, ce qui est une garantie contre les balles, mais non contre les boulets. On apporta les passe-balles, bien qu'il fût un peu tard pour vérifier les calibres; mais on n'avait pas prévu tant d'incidents. Chaque matelot reçut une giberne et mit dans sa ceinture une paire de pistolets et un poignard. On plia les branles; on pointa l'artillerie; on prépara la mousqueterie; on disposa les haches et les grappins; on tint prêtes les soutes à gargousses et les soutes à boulets; ou ouvrit la soute aux poudres. Chaque homme prit son poste. Tout cela sans dire une parole et comme dans la chambre d'un mourant. Ce fut rapide et lugubre.

Puis on embossa la corvette. Elle avait six ancres comme une frégate. On les mouilla toutes les six; l'ancre de veille à l'avant, l'ancre de toue à l’arrière, l’ancre de flot du côté du large, l’ancre de jusant du côté des brisants, l’ancre d’affourche à tribord, et la maîtresse-ancre à bâbord.

Le neuf caronades qui restaient vivantes furent mises en batterie toutes les neuf d’un seul côté, du côté de l’ennemi.

L’escadre, non moins silencieuse, avait, elle aussi, complété sa manoeuvre. Les huit bâtiments formaient maintenant un demi-cercle dont les Minquiers faisaient la corde. La Claymore, enfermée dans ce demi-cercle, et d’ailleurs garrottée par ses propres ancres, était adossée à l’écueil, c’est-à-dire au naufrage.

C’était comme une meute autour d’un sanglier, ne donnant pas de voix, mais montrant les dents.

Il semblait de part et d’autre qu’on s’attendait.

Les canonniers de la Claymore étaient à leurs pièces.

Boisberthelot dit à La Vieuville:

— Je tiendrais à commencer le feu.

— Plaisir de coquette, dit La Vieuville.

IX. QUELQU’UN ÉCHAPPE

Le passager n’avait pas quitté le pont, il observait tout, impassible. Boisberthelot s’approcha de lui.

— Monsieur, lui dit-il, les préparatifs sont faits. Nous voilà maintenant cramponnés à notre tombeau, nous ne lâcherons pas prise. Nous sommes prisonniers de l’escadre ou de l’écueil. Nous rendre à l’ennemi ou sombrer dans les brisants, nous n’avons pas d’autre choix. Il nous reste une ressource, mourir. Combattre vaut mieux que naufrager. J’aime mieux être mitraillé que noyé; en fait de mort, je préfère le feu à l’eau. Mais mourir, c’est notre affaire à nous autres, ce n’est pas la vôtre, à vous. Vous êtes l’homme choisi par les princes, vous avez une grande mission, diriger la guerre de Vendée. Vous de moins, c’est peut-être la monarchie perdue; vous devez donc vivre. Notre honneur à nous est de rester ici, le vôtre est d’en sortir. Vous allez, mon général, quitter le navire. Je vais vous donner un homme et un canot. Gagner la côte par un détour n’est pas impossible. Il n’est pas encore jour. Les lames sont hautes, la mer est obscure, vous échapperez. Il y a des cas où fuir, c’est vaincre.

Le vieillard fit, de sa tète sévère, un grave signe d’acquiescement.

Le comte du Boisberthelot éleva la voix.

— Soldats et matelots! cria-t-il.

Tous les mouvements s’arrêtèrent, et, de tous les points du navire, les visages se tournèrent vers le capitaine.

Il poursuivit:

— L’homme qui est parmi nous représente le roi. Il nous est confié, nous devons le conserver. Il est nécessaire au trône de France; à défaut d’un prince, il sera, c’est du moins notre attente, le chef de la Vendée. C’est un grand officier de guerre. Il devait aborder en France avec nous, il faut qu’il y aborde sans nous. Sauver la tète, c’est tout sauver.

— Oui! oui! oui! crièrent toutes les voix de l’équipage.

Le capitaine continua:

— Il va courir, lui aussi, de sérieux dangers. Atteindre la côte n’est pas aisé. Il faudrait que le canot fût grand pour affronter la haute mer, et il faut qu’il soit petit pour échapper à la croisière. Il s’agit d’aller atterrir à un point quelconque, qui soit sûr, et plutôt du côté de Fougères que du côté de Coutances. Il faut un matelot solide, bon rameur et, bon nageur; qui soit du pays et qui connaisse les passes. Il y a encore assez de nuit pour que le canot puisse s'éloigner de la corvette sans être aperçu. Et puis, il va avoir de la fumée qui achèvera de le cacher. Sa petitesse l'aidera à se tirer des bas-fonds. Où la panthère est prise, la belette échappe. Il n'y a pas d'issue pour nous, il y en a pour lui. Le canot s'éloignera à force de rames, les navires ennemis ne le verront pas; et d'ailleurs, pendant ce temps-là, nous ici, nous allons les amuser. Est-ce dit?

— Oui! oui! oui! cria l'équipage.

— Il n'y a pas une minute à perdre, reprit le capitaine. Y a-t-il un homme de bonne volonté?

Un matelot dans l'obscurité sortit des rangs, et dit:

— Moi.

X. ÉCHAPPE-T-IL?

Quelques instants après, un de ces petits canots qu'on appelle you-you et qui sont spécialement affectés au service des capitaines s'éloignait du navire. Dans ce canot il y avait deux hommes, le vieux passager qui était à l'arrière, et le matelot «de bonne volonté» qui était à l'avant. La nuit était encore très obscure. Le matelot, conformément aux indications du capitaine, ramait vigoureusement dans la direction des Minquiers. Aucune autre issue n'était d'ailleurs possible.

On avait jeté au fond du canot quelques provisions, un sac de biscuit, une longe de boeuf fumé et un baril d'eau.

Au moment où le you-you prit la mer, La Vieuville, goguenard devant le gouffre, se pencha par-dessus l'étambot du gouvernail de la corvette, et ricana cet adieu au canot:

— C'est bon pour s'échapper, et excellent pour se noyer.

— Monsieur, dit le pilote, ne rions plus.

L'écart se fit vite et il y eut promptement bonne distance entre la corvette et le canot. Le vent et le flot étaient d'accord avec le rameur, et la petite barque fuyait rapidement, ondulant dans le crépuscule et cachée par les grands plis des vagues.

Il y avait sur la mer on ne sait quelle sombre attente.

Tout à coup, dans ce vaste et tumultueux silence de l'océan, il s'éleva une voix qui, grossie par le porte-voix comme par le masque d'airain de la tragédie antique, semblait presque surhumaine.

C'était le capitaine Boisberthelot qui prenait la parole.

— Marins du roi, cria-t-il, clouez le pavillon blanc au grand mât. Nous allons voir se lever notre dernier soleil.

Et un coup de canon partit de la corvette.

— Vive le roi! cria l'équipage.

Alors on entendit au fond de l'horizon un autre cri, immense, lointain, confus, distinct pourtant:

— Vive la République!

Et un bruit pareil au bruit de trois cents foudres éclata dans les profondeurs de l'océan.

La lutte commençait.

La mer se couvrit de fumée et de feu.

Les jets d’écume que font les boulets en tombant dans l’eau piquèrent les vagues de tous les côtés.

La Claymore se mit à cracher de la flamme sur les huit navires. En même temps toute l’escadre groupée en demi-lune autour de la Claymore faisait feu de toutes ses batteries. L’horizon s’incendia. On eût dit un volcan qui sort de la mer. Le vent tordait cette immense pourpre de la bataille où les navires apparaissaient et disparaissaient comme des spectres. Au premier plan, le squelette noir de la corvette se dessinait sur ce fond rouge.

On distinguait à la pointe du grand mât le pavillon fleurdelysé.

Les deux hommes qui étaient dans le canot se taisaient.

La bas-fond triangulaire des Minquiers, sorte de trinacrie sous-marine, est plus vaste que l’île entière de Jersey: la mer le couvre; il a pour point culminant un plateau qui émerge des plus hautes marées et duquel se détachent au nord-est six puissants rochers rangés en droite ligne, qui font l’effet d’une grande muraille écroulée çà et là. Le détroit entre le plateau et les six écueils n’est praticable qu’aux barques d’un très faible tirant d’eau. Au delà de ce détroit on trouve le large.

Le matelot qui s’était chargé du sauvetage du canot engagea l’embarcation dans le détroit. De cette façon il mettait les Minquiers entre la bataille et le canot. Il nagea avec adresse dans l’étroit chenal, évitant les récifs à bâbord comme à tribord; les rochers maintenant masquaient la bataille. La lueur de l’horizon et le fracas furieux de la canonnade commençaient à décroître, à cause de la distance qui augmentait; mais, à la continuité des détonations, on pouvait comprendre que la corvette tenait bon et qu’elle voulait épuiser, jusqu’à la dernière, ses cent quatrevingt-onze bordées.

Bientôt le canot se trouva dans une eau libre, hors de l’écueil, hors de la bataille, hors de la portée des projectiles.

Peu à peu le modelé de la mer devenait moins sombre, les luisants brusquement noyés de noirceurs s’élargissaient, les écumes compliquées se brisaient en jets de lumière, des blancheurs flottaient sur les méplats des vagues. Le jour parut.

Le canot était hors de l’atteinte de l’ennemi; mais le plus difficile restait à faire. Le canot était sauvé de la mitraille, mais non du naufrage. Il était en haute mer, coque imperceptible, sans pont, sans voile, sans mât, sans boussole, n’ayant de ressource que la rame, en présence de l’océan et de l’ouragan, atome à la merci des colosses.

Alors, dans cette immensité, dans cette solitude, levant sa face que blêmissait le matin, l’homme qui était à l’avant du canot regarda fixement l’homme qui était à l’arrière, et lui dit:

— Je suis le frère de celui que vous avez fait fusiller.

LIVRE TROISIÈME

HALMALO

I. LA PAROLE, C’EST LE VERBE

Le vieillard redressa lentement la tête.

L’homme qui lui parlait avait environ trente ans. Il avait sur le front le hâle de la mer; ses yeux étaient étranges; c’était le regard sagace du matelot dans la prunelle candide du paysan. Il tenait puissamment les rames dans ses deux poings. Il avait l’air doux.

On voyait à sa ceinture un poignard, deux pistolets et un rosaire.

— Qui êtes-vous? dit le vieillard.

— Je viens de vous le dire.

— Qu’est-ce que vous me voulez?

L’homme quitta les avirons, croisa les bras et répondit:

— Vous tuer.

— Comme vous voudrez, dit le vieillard.

L’homme haussa la voix.

— Préparez-vous.

— A quoi?

— A mourir.

— Pourquoi? demanda le vieillard.

Il y eut un silence. L’homme sembla un moment comme interdit de la question. Il reprit:

— Je dis que je veux vous tuer.

— Et je vous demande pourquoi.

Un éclair passa dans les yeux du matelot.

— Parce que vous avez tué mon frère.

Le vieillard repartit avec calme:

— J’ai commencé par lui sauver la vie.

— C’est vrai. Vous l’avez sauvé d’abord et tué ensuite.

— Ce n’est pas moi qui l’ai tué.

— Qui donc l’a tué?

— Sa faute.

Le matelot, béant, regarda le vieillard; puis ses sourcils reprirent leur froncement farouche.

— Comment vous appelez-vous? dit le vieillard.

— Je m’appelle Halmalo, mais vous n’avez pas besoin de savoir mon nom pour être tué par moi.

En ce moment le soleil se leva. Un rayon frappa le matelot en plein visage et éclaira vivement cette figure sauvage. Le vieillard le considérait attentivement.

La canonnade, qui se prolongeait toujours, avait maintenant des interruptions et des saccades d'agonie. Une vaste fumée s'affaissait sur l'horizon. Le canot, que ne maniait plus le rameur, allait à la dérive.

Le matelot saisit de sa main droite un des pistolets de sa ceinture et de sa main gauche son chapelet.

Le vieillard se dressa debout.

— Tu crois en Dieu? dit-il.

— Notre Père qui est au ciel, répondit le matelot. Et il fit le signe de la croix.

— As-tu ta mère?

— Oui.

Il fit un deuxième signe de croix. Puis il reprit:

— C'est dit. Je vous donne une minute, monseigneur. Et il arma le pistolet.

— Pourquoi m'appelles-tu monseigneur?

— Parce que vous êtes un seigneur. Cela se voit.

— As-tu un seigneur, toi?

— Oui. Et un grand. Est-ce qu'on vit sans seigneur?

— Où est-il?

— Je ne sais pas. Il a quitté le pays. Il s'appelle monsieur le marquis de Lantenac, vicomte de Fontenay, prince en Bretagne; il est le seigneur des Sept-Forêts. Je ne l'ai jamais vu, ce qui ne l'empêche pas d'être mon maître.

— Et si tu le voyais, lui obéirais-tu?

— Certes. Je serais donc un païen, si je ne lui obéissais pas! on doit obéissance à Dieu, et puis au roi qui est comme Dieu, et puis au seigneur qui est comme le roi. Mais ce n'est pas tout ça, vous avez tué mon frère, il faut que je vous tue.

Le vieillard répondit:

— D'abord, j'ai tué ton frère, j'ai bien fait.

Le matelot crispa son poing sur son pistolet.

— Allons, dit-il.

— Soit, dit le vieillard.

Et, tranquille, il ajouta:

— Où est le prêtre?

Le matelot le regarda.

— Le prêtre?

— Oui, le prêtre. J’ai donné un prêtre à ton frère. Tu me dois un prêtre.

— Je n’en ai pas, dit le matelot.

Et il continua:

— Est-ce qu’on a des prêtres en pleine mer?

On entendait les détonations convulsives du combat de plus en plus lointain.

— Ceux qui meurent là-bas ont le leur, dit le vieillard.

— C’est vrai, murmura le matelot. Ils ont monsieur l’aumônier.

Le vieillard poursuivit:

— Tu perds mon âme, ce qui est grave.

Le matelot baissa la tête, pensif.

— Et en perdant mon âme, reprit le vieillard, tu perds la tienne. Écoute. J’ai pitié de toi. Tu feras ce que tu voudras. Moi, j’ai fait mon devoir tout à l’heure, d’abord en sauvant la vie à ton frère et ensuite en la lui ôtant, et je fais mon devoir à présent en tâchant de sauver ton âme. Réfléchis. Cela te regarde. Entends-tu les coups de canon dans ce moment-ci? Il y a là des hommes qui périssent, il y a là des désespérés qui agonisent, il y a là des maris qui ne reverront plus leur femme, des pères qui ne reverront plus leur enfant, des frères qui, comme toi, ne reverront plus leur frère. Et par la faute de qui? par la faute de ton frère à toi. Tu crois en Dieu, n’est-ce pas? Eh bien, tu sais que Dieu souffre en ce moment; Dieu souffre dans son fils très chrétien le roi de France qui est enfant comme l’enfant Jésus et qui est en prison dans la tour du Temple; Dieu souffre dans son église de Bretagne; Dieu souffre dans ses cathédrales insultées, dans ses évangiles déchirés, dans ses maisons de prière violées; Dieu souffre dans ses prêtres assassinés. Qu’est-ce que nous venions faire, nous, dans ce navire qui périt en ce moment? Nous venions secourir Dieu. Si ton frère avait été un bon serviteur, s’il avait fidèlement fait son office d’homme sage et utile, le malheur de la canonnade ne serait pas arrivé, la corvette n’eût pas été désemparée, elle n’eût pas manqué sa route, elle ne fût pas tombée dans cette flotte de perdition, et nous débarquerions à cette heure en France, tous, en vaillants hommes de guerre et de mer que nous sommes, sabre au poing, drapeau blanc déployé, nombreux, contents, joyeux, et nous viendrions aider les braves paysans de Vendée à sauver la France, à sauver le roi, à sauver Dieu. Voilà ce que nous venions faire, voilà ce que nous ferions. Voilà ce que, moi, le seul qui reste, je viens faire. Mais tu t’y opposes. Dans cette lutte des impies contre les prêtres, dans cette lutte des régicides contre le roi, dans cette lutte de Satan contre Dieu, tu es pour Satan. Ton frère a été le premier auxiliaire du démon, tu es le second. Il a commencé, tu achèves. Tu es pour les régicides contre le trône, tu es pour les impies contre l’église. Tu ôtes à Dieu sa dernière ressource. Parce que je ne serai point là, moi qui représente le roi, les hameaux vont continuer de brûler, les familles de pleurer, les prêtres de saigner, la Bretagne de souffrir, et le roi d’être en prison, et Jésus-Christ d’être en détresse. Et qui aura fait cela? Toi. Va, c’est ton affaire. Je comptais sur toi pour tout le contraire. Je me suis trompé. Ah oui, c’est vrai, tu as raison, j’ai tué ton frère. Ton frère avait été courageux, je l’ai récompensé; il avait été coupable, je l’ai puni. Il avait manqué à son devoir, je n’ai pas manqué au mien. Ce que j’ai fait, je le ferais encore. Et, je le jure par la grande sainte Anne d’Auray qui nous regarde, en pareil cas, de même que j’ai fait fusiller ton frère, je ferais fusiller mon fils. Maintenant, tu es le maître. Oui, je te plains. Tu as menti à ton capitaine. Toi, chrétien, tu es sans foi; toi, breton, tu es sans honneur; j’ai été confié à ta loyauté et accepté par ta trahison; tu donnes ma mort à ceux à qui tu as promis ma vie. Sais-tu qui tu perds ici? C’est toi. Tu prends ma vie au roi et tu donnes ton éternité au démon. Va, commets ton crime, c’est bien. Tu fais bon marché de ta part de paradis. Grâce à toi, le diable vaincra, grâce à toi, les églises tomberont, grâce à toi, les païens continueront de fondre les cloches et d’en faire des canons; on mitraillera les hommes avec ce qui sauvait les âmes. En ce moment où je parle, la cloche qui a sonné ton baptême tue peut-être ta mère. Va, aide le démon. Ne t’arrête pas. Oui, j’ai condamné ton frère, mais, sache cela, je suis un instrument de Dieu. Ah! tu juges les moyens de Dieu! tu vas donc te mettre à juger la foudre qui est dans le ciel? Malheureux, tu seras jugé par elle. Prends garde à ce que tu vas faire. Sais-tu seulement si je suis en état de grâce! Non. Va tout de même. Fais ce que tu voudras. Tu es libre de me jeter en enfer et de t’y jeter avec moi. Nos deux damnations sont dans ta main. Le responsable devant Dieu, ce sera toi. Nous sommes seuls et face à face dans l’abîme. Continue, termine, achève. Je suis vieux et tu es jeune, je suis sans armes et tu es armé; tue-moi.

Pendant que le vieillard, debout, d’une voix plus haute que le bruit de la mer, disait ces paroles, les ondulations de la vague le faisaient apparaître tantôt dans l’ombre, tantôt dans la lumière; le matelot était devenu livide; de grosses gouttes de sueur lui tombaient du front; il tremblait comme la feuille; par moments il baisait son rosaire; quand le vieillard eut fini, il jeta son pistolet et tomba à genoux.

— Grâce, monseigneur! pardonnez-moi! cria-t-il; vous parlez comme le bon Dieu. J’ai tort. Mon frère a eu tort. Je ferai tout pour réparer son crime. Disposez de moi Ordonnez. J’obéirai.

— Je te fais grâce, dit le vieillard.

II. MÉMOIRE DE PAYSAN VAUT SCIENCE DE CAPITAINE

Les provisions qui étaient dans le canot ne furent pas inutiles.

Les deux fugitifs, obligés à de longs détours, mirent trente-six heures a atteindre la côte. Ils passèrent une nuit en mer; mais la nuit fut belle, avec trop de lune cependant pour des gens qui cherchaient à se dérober.

Ils durent d’abord s’éloigner de France et gagner le large vers Jersey.

Ils entendirent la suprême canonnade de la corvette foudroyée, comme on entend le dernier rugissement du lion que les chasseurs tuent dans les bois. Puis le silence se fit sur la mer.

Cette corvette la Claymore mourut de la même façon que le

Vengeur: mais la gloire l’a ignoré. On n’est pas héros contre son pays.

Halmalo était un marin surprenant. Il fit des miracles de dextérité et d’intelligence; cette improvisation d’un itinéraire à travers les écueils, les vagues et le guet de l’ennemi fut un chef-d’oeuvre. Le vent avait décru et la mer était devenue maniable.

Halmalo évita les Caux des Minquiers, contourna la Chaussée-aux-Boeufs, s’y abrita, afin de prendre quelques heures de repos dans la petite crique qui s’y fait au nord à mer basse, et, redescendant au sud, trouva moyen de passer entre Granville et les îles Chausey sans être aperçu ni de la vigie de Chausey ni de la vigie de Granville. Il s’engagea dans la baie de Saint-Michel, ce qui était hardi à cause du voisinage de Cancale, lieu d’ancrage de la croisière.

Le soir du second jour, environ une heure avant le coucher du soleil, il laissa derrière lui le mont Saint-Michel, et vint atterrir à une grève qui est toujours déserte, parce qu’elle est dangereuse; on s’y enlise.

Heureusement la marée était haute.

Halmalo poussa l’embarcation le plus avant qu’il put, tâta le sable, le trouva solide, y échoua le canot et sauta à terre.

Le vieillard après lui enjamba le bord et examina l’horizon.

— Monseigneur, dit Halmalo, nous sommes ici à l’embouchure du Couesnon.

Voilà Beauvoir à tribord et Huisnes à bâbord. Le clocher devant nous, c’est

Ardevon.

Le vieillard se pencha dans le canot, y prit un biscuit qu’il mit dans sa poche, et dit à Halmalo:

— Prends le reste.

Halmalo mit dans le sac ce qui restait de viande avec ce qui restait de biscuit, et chargea le sac sur son épaule. Cela fait, il dit:

— Monseigneur, faut-il vous conduire ou vous suivre?

— Ni l’un ni l’autre.

Halmalo stupéfait regarda le vieillard.

Le vieillard continua:

— Halmalo, nous allons nous séparer. Être deux ne vaut rien. Il faut être mille, ou seul.

Il s’interrompit et tira d’une de ses poches un noeud de soie verte, assez pareil à une cocarde, au centre duquel était brodée une fleur de lys en or. Il reprit:

— Sais-tu lire?

— Non.

— C’est bien. Un homme qui lit, ça gêne. As-tu bonne mémoire?

— Oui.

— C’est bien. Écoute, Halmalo. Tu vas prendre à droite et moi à gauche. J’irai du côté de Fougères, toi du côté de Bazouges. Garde ton sac qui te donne l’air d’un paysan. Cache tes armes. Coupe-toi un bâton dans les haies. Rampe dans les seigles qui sont hauts. Glisse-toi derrière les clôtures. Enjambe les échaliers pour aller à travers champs. Laisse à distance les passants. Evite les chemins et les ponts. N’entre pas à Pontorson. Ah! tu auras à traverser le Couesnon. Comment le passeras-tu?

— A la nage.

— C’est bien. Et puis il y a un gué. Sais-tu où il est?

— Entre Ancey et Vieux-Viel.

— C’est bien. Tu es vraiment du pays.

— Mais la nuit vient. Où monseigneur couchera-t-il?

— Je me charge de moi. Et toi, où coucheras-tu?

— Il y a des émousses. Avant d’être matelot, j’ai été paysan.

— Jette ton chapeau de marin qui te trahirait. Tu trouveras bien quelque part une carapousse.

— Oh! un tapabor, cela se trouve partout. Le premier pêcheur venu me vendra le sien.

— C’est bien. Maintenant, écoute. Tu connais les bois?

— Tous.

— De tout le pays?

— Depuis Noirmoutier jusqu’à Laval.

— Connais-tu aussi les noms?

— Je connais les bois, je connais les noms, je connais tout.

— Tu n’oublieras rien?

— Rien.

— C’est bien. A présent, attention. Combien peux-tu faire de lieues par jour?

— Dix, quinze, dix-huit. Vingt, s’il le faut.

— Il le faudra. Ne perds pas un mot de ce que je vais te dire. Tu iras au bois de saint-Aubin.

— Près de Lamballe?

— Oui. Sur la lisière du ravin qui est entre Saint-Rieul et Plédéliac il a un gros châtaignier. Tu t’arrêteras là. Tu ne verras personne.

— Ce qui n’empêche pas qu’il y aura quelqu’un. Je sais.

— Tu feras l’appel. Sais-tu faire l’appel?

Halmalo enfla ses joues, se tourna du côté de la mer, et l’on entendit le hou-hou de la chouette.

On eût dit que cela venait des profondeurs nocturnes. C’était ressemblant et sinistre.

— Bien, dit le vieillard. Tu en es.

Il tendit à Halmalo le noeud de soie verte.

— Voici mon noeud de commandement. Prends-le. Il importe que personne encore ne sache mon nom. Mais ce noeud suffit. La fleur de lys a été brodée par Madame Royale dans la prison du Temple.

Halmalo mit un genou en terre. Il reçu avec un tremblement le noeud fleurdelysé, et en approcha ses lèvres puis s’arrêtant, comme effrayé de ce baiser:

— Le puis-je? demanda-t-il.

— Oui, puisque tu baises le crucifix.

Halmalo baisa la fleur de lys.

— Relève-toi, dit le vieillard.

Halmalo se releva et mit le noeud dans sa poitrine. Le vieillard poursuivit:

— Écoute bien ceci. Voici l’ordre: Insurgez-vous. Pas de quartier. Donc, sur la lisière du bois de Saint-Aubin tu feras l’appel. Tu le feras trois fois. A la troisième fois tu verras un homme sortir de terre.

— D’un trou sous les arbres. Je sais.

— Cet homme, c’est Planchenault, qu’on appelle aussi Coeur-de-Roi. Tu lui montreras ce noeud. Il comprendra. Tu iras ensuite, par des chemins que tu inventeras, au bois d’Astillé; tu y trouveras un homme cagneux qui est surnommé Mousqueton, et qui ne fait miséricorde à personne. Tu lui diras que je l’aime, et qu’il mette en branle ses paroisses. Tu iras ensuite au bois de Couesbon qui est à une lieue de Ploërmel. Tu feras l’appel de la chouette; un homme sortira d’un trou; c’est M. Thuault, sénéchal de Ploërmel, qui a été de ce qu’on appelle l’assemblée constituante, mais du bon côté. Tu lui diras d’armer le château de Couesbon, qui est au marquis de Guer, émigré. Ravins, petits bois, terrain inégal, bon endroit. M. Thuault est un homme droit et d’esprit. Tu iras ensuite à Saint-Ouen-les-Toits, et tu parleras à Jean Chouan, qui est à mes yeux le vrai chef. Tu iras ensuite an bois de Ville-Anglose, tu y verras Guitter, qu’on appelle Saint-Martin, tu lui diras d’avoir l’oeil sur un certain Courmesnil, qui est gendre du vieux Goupil de Préfeln et qui mène la jacobinière d’Argentan. Retiens bien tout. Je n’écris rien parce qu’il ne faut rien écrire. La Rouarie a écrit une liste; cela a tout perdu. Tu iras ensuite au bois de Rougefeu où est Miélette qui saute par-dessus les ravins en s’arc-boutant sur une longue perche.

— Cela s’appelle une ferte.

— Sais-tu t’en servir?

— Je ne serais donc pas breton et je ne serais donc pas paysan? La ferte, c’est notre amie. Elle agrandit nos bras et allonge nos jambes.

— C’est-à-dire qu’elle rapetisse l’ennemi et raccourcit le chemin. Bon engin.

— Une fois, avec ma ferte, j’ai tenu tète à trois gabelous qui avaient des sabres.

— Quand ca?

— Il y a dix ans.

— Sous le roi?

— Mais oui.

— Tu t’es donc battu sous le roi?

— Mais oui.

— Contre qui?

— Ma foi, je ne sais pas. J’étais faux-saulnier.

— C’est bien.

— On appelait cela se battre contre les gabelles. Les gabelles, est-ce que c’est la même chose que le roi?

— Oui. Non. Mais il n’est pas nécessaire que tu comprennes cela.

— Je demande pardon â monseigneur d’avoir fait une question à monseigneur.

— Continuons. Connais-tu la Tourgue?

— Si je connais la Tourgue? j’en suis.

— Comment?

— Oui, puisque je suis de Parigué.

— En effet, la Tourgue est voisine de Parigué.

Si je connais la Tourgue? le gros château rond qui est le château de famille de mes seigneurs! Il y a une grosse porte de fer qui sépare le bâtiment neuf du bâtiment vieux et qu’on n’enfoncerait pas avec du canon. C’est dans le bâtiment neuf qu’est le fameux livre sur saint Barthélemy qu’on venait voir par curiosité. Il y a des grenouilles dans l’herbe. J’ai joué tout petit avec ces grenouilles-là. Et la passe souterraine! je la connais. Il n’y a peut-être plus que moi qui la connaisse.

— Quelle passe souterraine? Je ne sais pas ce que tu veux dire.

— C’était pour autrefois, dans les temps, quand la Tourgue était assiégée. Les gens du dedans pouvaient se sauver dehors en passant par un passage sous terre qui va aboutir à la forêt.

— En effet, il y a un passage souterrain de ce genre au château de la Jupellière, et au château de la Hunaudaye, et à la tour de Campéon; mais il n’y a rien de pareil à la Tourgue.

— Si fait, monseigneur. Je ne connais pas ces passages-là dont monseigneur parle. Je ne connais que celui de la Tourgue, parce que je suis du pays. Et encore, il n’y a guère que moi qui sache cette passe-là. On n’en parlait pas. C’était défendu, parce que ce passage avait servi du temps des guerres de M. de Rohan. Mon père savait le secret et il me l’a montré. Je connais le secret pour entrer et le secret pour sortir. Si je suis dans la forêt, je puis aller dans la tour, et si je suis dans la tour, je puis aller dans la forêt. Sans qu’on me voie. Et quand les ennemis entrent, il n’y a plus personne. Voilà ce que c’est que la Tourgue. Ah! je la connais.

Le vieillard demeura un moment silencieux.

— Tu te trompes évidemment; s’il y avait un tel secret, je le saurais.

— Monseigneur, j’en suis sûr. Il y a une pierre qui tourne.

— Ah bon! Vous autres paysans, vous croyez aux pierres qui tournent, aux pierres qui chantent, aux pierres qui vont boire la nuit au ruisseau d’à côté. Tas de contes.

— Mais puisque je l’ai fait tourner, la pierre…

— Comme d’autres l’ont entendue chanter. Camarade, la Tourgue est une bastille sûre et forte, facile à défendre; mais celui qui compterait sur une issue souterraine pour s’en tirer serait naïf.

— Mais, monseigneur…

Le vieillard haussa les épaules.

— Ne perdons pas de temps. Parlons de nos affaires.

Ce ton péremptoire coupa court à l’insistance de Halmalo.

Le vieillard reprit:

— Poursuivons. Ecoute. De Rougefeu tu iras au bois de Montchevrier, où est Bénédicité, qui est le chef des Douze. C’est encore un bon. Il dit son Benedicite pendant qu’il fait arquebuser les gens. En guerre, pas de sensiblerie. De Montchevrier, tu iras…

Il s’interrompit.

— J’oubliais l’argent.

Il prit dans sa poche et mit dans la main de Halmalo une bourse et un portefeuille.

— Voilà dans ce portefeuille trente mille francs en assignats, quelque chose comme trois livres dix sous; il faut dire que les assignats sont faux, mais les vrais valent juste autant; et voici dans cette bourse, attention, cent louis en or. Je te donne tout ce que j’ai. Je n’ai plus besoin de rien ici. D’ailleurs, il vaut mieux qu’on ne puisse pas trouver d’argent sur moi. Je reprends. De Montchevrier, tu iras à Antrain, où tu verras M. de Frotté; d’Antrain, à la Jupellière, où tu verras M. de Rochecotte; de la Jupellière, à Noirieux, où tu verras l’abbé Baudouin. Te rappelleras-tu tout cela?

— Comme mon Pater.

— Tu verras M. Dubois-Guy à Saint-Brice-en-Cogle, M. de Turpin à Morannes, qui est un bourg fortifié, et le prince de Talmont à Château-Gonthier.

— Est-ce qu’un prince me parlera?

— Puisque je te parle.

Halmalo ôta son chapeau.

— Tout le monde te recevra bien en voyant cette fleur de lys de Madame. N'oublie pas qu'il faut que tu ailles dans des endroits où il y a des montagnards et des patauds. Tu te déguiseras. C'est facile. Ces républicains sont si bêtes, qu'avec un habit bleu, un chapeau à trois cornes et une cocarde tricolore on passe partout. Il n'y a plus de régiments, il n'y a plus d'uniformes, les corps n'ont pas de numéros; chacun met la guenille qu'il veut. Tu iras à Saint-Mhervé. Tu y verras Gaulier, dit Grand-Pierre. Tu iras au cantonnement de Parné où sont les hommes aux visages noircis. Ils mettent du gravier dans leurs fusils et double charge de poudre pour faire plus de bruit; ils font bien. Mais surtout dis-leur de tuer, de tuer, de tuer. Tu iras au camp de la Vache-Noire qui est sur une hauteur au milieu du bois de la Charnie, puis au camp de l'Avoine, puis au camp Vert, puis au camp des Fourmis. Tu iras au Grand-Bordage, qu'on appelle aussi le Haut-des-Prés, et qui est habité par une veuve dont Treton, dit l'Anglais, a épousé la fille. Le Grand-Bordage est dans la paroisse de Quélaines. Tu visiteras Epineux-le-Chevreuil, Sillé-le-Guillaume, Parannes, et tous les hommes qui sont dans tous les bois. Tu auras des amis, et tu les enverras sur la lisière du Haut et du Bas Maine; tu verras Jean Treton dans la paroisse de Vaisges, Sans-Regret au Bignon, Chambord à Bonchamps, les frères Corbin à Maisoncelles, et le Petit-Sans-Peur à Saint-Jean-sur-Erve. C'est le même qui s'appelle Bourdoiseau. Tout cela fait, et le mot d'ordre, Insurgez-vous, Pas de quartier, donné partout, tu joindras la grande armée, l'armée catholique et royale, où elle sera. Tu verras MM. d'Elbée, de Lescure, de La Rochejaquelein, ceux des chefs qui vivront alors. Tu leur montreras mon noeud de commandement. Ils savent ce que c'est. Tu n'es qu'un matelot, mais Cathelineau n'est qu'un charretier. Tu leur diras de ma part ceci: Il est temps de faire les deux guerres ensemble; la grande et la petite. La grande fait plus de tapage, la petite plus de besogne. La Vendée est bonne, la Chouannerie est pire; et en guerre civile, c'est la pire qui est la meilleure. La bonté d'une guerre se juge à la quantité de mal qu'elle fait.

Il s'interrompit.

— Halmalo, je te dis tout cela. Tu ne comprends pas les mots, mais tu comprends les choses. J'ai pris confiance en toi en te voyant manuvrer le canot; tu ne sais pas la géométrie et tu fais des mouvements de mer surprenants; qui sait mener une barque peut piloter une insurrection; à la façon dont tu as manié l'intrigue de la mer, j'affirme que tu te tireras bien de toutes mes commissions. Je reprends. Tu diras donc ceci aux chefs, à peu près, comme tu pourras, mais ce sera bien; J’aime mieux la guerre des forêts que la guerre des plaines; je ne tiens pas à aligner cent mille paysans sous la mitraille des soldats bleus et sous l’artillerie de monsieur Carnot; avant un mois je veux avoir cinq cent mille tueurs embusqués dans les bois. L’armée républicaine est mon gibier. Braconner, c’est guerroyer. Je suis le stratège des broussailles. Bon, voilà encore un mot que tu ne saisiras pas, c’est égal, tu saisiras ceci: Pas de quartier! et des embuscades partout! Je veux faire plus de Chouannerie que de Vendée. Tu ajouteras que les anglais sont avec nous. Prenons la république entre deux feux. L’Europe nous aide. Finissons-en avec la révolution. Les rois lui font la guerre des royaumes, faisons-lui la guerre des paroisses. Tu diras cela. As-tu compris?

— Oui. Il faut tout mettre à feu et à sang.

— C’est ça.

— Pas de quartier.

— A personne. C’est ça.

— J’irai partout.

— Et prends garde. Car dans ce pays-ci on est facilement un homme mort.

— La mort, cela ne me regarde point. Qui fait son premier pas use peut-être ses derniers souliers.

— Tu es un brave.

— Et si l’on me demande le nom de monseigneur?

— On ne doit pas le savoir encore. Tu diras que tu ne le sais pas, et ce sera la vérité.

— Où reverrai-je monseigneur?

— Où je serai.

— Comment le saurai-je?

— Parce que tout le monde le saura. Avant huit jours on parlera de moi, je ferai des exemples, je vengerai le roi et la religion, et tu reconnaîtras bien que c’est de moi qu’on parle.

— J’entends.

— N’oublie rien.

— Soyez tranquille.

— Pars maintenant. Que Dieu te conduise. Va.

— Je ferai tout ce que vous m’avez dit. J’irai. Je parlerai. J’obéirai. Je commanderai.

— Bien.

— Et si je réussis….

— Je te ferai chevalier de Saint-Louis.

— Comme mon frère. Et si je ne réussis pas, vous me ferez fusiller.

— Comme ton frère.

— C’est dit, monseigneur.

Le vieillard baissa la tête et sembla tomber dans une sévère rêverie. Quand il releva les yeux, il était seul. Halmalo n’était plus qu’un point noir s’enfonçant dans l’horizon.

Le soleil venait de se coucher.

Les goëlands et les mouettes à capuchon rentraient; la mer, c’est dehors.

On sentait dans l’espace cette espèce d’inquiétude qui précède la nuit; les rainettes coassaient les jaquets s’envolaient des flaques d’eau en sifflant, les mauves, les freux, les carabins, les grolles, faisaient leur vacarme du soir; les oiseaux de rivage s’appelaient; mais pas un bruit humain. La solitude était profonde. Pas une voile dans la baie, pas un paysan dans la campagne. A perte de vue l’étendue déserte. Les grands chardons des sables frissonnaient. Le ciel blanc du crépuscule jetait sur la grève une vaste clarté livide. Au loin les étangs dans la plaine sombre ressemblaient à des plaques d’étain posées à plat sur le sol. Le vent soufflait du large.

LIVRE QUATRIÈME

TELLMARCH

I. LE HAUT DE LA DUNE

Le vieillard laissa disparaître Halmalo, puis serra son manteau de mer autour de lui, et se mit en marche. Il cheminait à pas lents, pensif. Il se dirigeait vers Huisnes, pendant que Halmalo s'en allait vers Beauvoir.

Derrière lui se dressait, énorme triangle noir, avec sa tiare de cathédrale et sa cuirasse de forteresse, avec ses deux grosses tours du levant, l'une ronde, l'autre carrée, qui aident la montagne à porter le poids de l'église et du village, le mont Saint-Michel, qui est à l'océan ce que Chéops est au désert.

Les sables mouvants de la baie du mont Saint-Michel déplacent insensiblement leurs dunes. Il y avait à cette époque entre Huisnes et Ardevon une dune très haute, effacée aujourd'hui. Cette dune, qu'un coup d'équinoxe a nivelée, avait cette rareté d'être ancienne et de porter à son Sommet une pierre milliaire érigée au XIIe siècle en commémoration du concile tenu à Avranches contre les assassins de saint Thomas de Cantorbéry. Du haut de cette dune on découvrait tout le pays, et l'on pouvait s'orienter.

Le vieillard marcha vers cette dune et y monta.

Quand il fut sur le sommet, il s'adossa à la pierre milliaire, s'assit sur une des quatre bornes qui en marquaient les angles, et se mit à examiner l'espèce de carte de géographie qu'il avait sous les pieds. Il semblait chercher une route dans un pays d'ailleurs connu. Dans ce vaste paysage, trouble à cause du crépuscule, il n'y avait de précis que l'horizon, noir sur le ciel blanc.

On y apercevait les groupes de toits de onze bourgs et villages; on distinguait à plusieurs lieues de distance tous les clochers de la côte, qui sont très hauts, afin de servir au besoin de points de repère aux gens qui sont en mer.

Au bout de quelques instants, le vieillard sembla avoir trouvé dans ce clair-obscur ce qu'il cherchait; son regard s'arrêta sur un enclos d'arbres, de murs et de toitures, à peu près visible au milieu de la plaine et des bois, et qui était une métairie; il eut ce hochement de tête satisfait d'un homme qui se dit mentalement: C'est là; et il se mit à tracer avec son doigt dans l'espace l'ébauche d'un itinéraire à travers les haies et les cultures. De temps en temps il examinait un objet informe et peu distinct, qui s'agitait au-dessus du toit principal de la métairie, et il semblait se demander: Qu'est-ce que c'est? Cela était incolore et confus à cause de l'heure; ce n'était pas une girouette puisque cela flottait, et il n'y avait aucune raison pour que ce fût un drapeau.

Il était las, il restait volontiers assis sur cette borne où il était, et il se laissait aller à cette sorte de vague oubli que donne aux hommes fatigués la première minute de repos.

Il y a une heure du jour qu'on pourrait appeler l'absence de bruit, c'est l'heure sereine, l'heure du soir. On était dans cette heure-là. Il en jouissait; il regardait, il écoutait, quoi? la tranquillité. Les farouches eux-mêmes ont leur instant de mélancolie. Subitement, cette tranquillité fut, non troublée, mais accentuée par des voix qui passaient; c'étaient des voix de femmes et d'enfants. Il y a parfois dans l'ombre de ces carillons de joie inattendus. On ne voyait point, à cause des broussailles, le groupe d'où sortaient les voix, mais ce groupe cheminait au pied de la dune et s'en allait vers la plaine et la forêt. Ces voix montaient claires et fraîches jusqu'au vieillard pensif; elles étaient si près qu'il n'en perdait rien.

Une voix de femme disait:

— Dépêchons-nous, la Flécharde. Est-ce par ici?

— Non, c'est par là.

Et le dialogue continuait entre les deux voix, l'une haute, l'autre timide.

— Comment appelez-vous cette métairie que nous habitons en ce moment?

— L'Herbe-en-Pail.

— En sommes-nous encore loin?

— A un bon quart d'heure.

— Dépêchons-nous d'aller manger la soupe.

— C'est vrai que nous sommes en retard.

— Il faudrait courir. Mais vos mômes sont fatigués. Nous ne sommes que deux femmes, nous ne pouvons pas porter trois mioches. Et puis, vous en portez déjà un, vous, la Flécharde. Un vrai plomb. Vous l'avez sevrée, cette goinfre, mais vous la portez toujours. Mauvaise habitude. Faites-moi donc marcher ça. Ah! tant pis, la soupe sera froide.

— Ah! les bons souliers que vous m'avez donnés là! On dirait qu'ils sont faits pour moi.

— Ça vaut mieux que d'aller nu-pattes.

— Dépêche-toi donc, René-Jean.

— C’est pourtant lui qui nous a retardées. Il faut qu’il parle à toutes les petites paysannes qu’on rencontre. Ça fait son homme.

— Dame, il va sur cinq ans.

— Dis-donc, René-Jean, pourquoi as-tu parlé à cette petite dans le village?

Une voix d’enfant, qui était une voix de garçon, répondit:

— Parce que c’est une que je connais.

La femme reprit.

— Comment! tu la connais?

— Oui, répondit le petit garçon, puisqu’elle m’a donné des bêtes ce matin.

— Voilà qui est fort! s’écria la femme, nous ne sommes dans le pays que depuis trois jours, c’est gros comme le poing, et ça vous a déjà une amoureuse!

Les voix s’éloignèrent. Tout bruit cessa.

II. AURES HABET. ET NON AUDIET

Le vieillard restait immobile. Il ne pensait pas: à peine songeait-il. Autour de lui tout était sérénité, assoupissement, confiance, solitude. Il faisait grand jour encore sur la dune, mais presque nuit dans la plaine et tout à fait nuit dans les bois. La lune montait à l'orient. Quelques étoiles piquaient le bleu pâle du zénith. Cet homme, bien que plein de préoccupations violentes, s'abîmait dans l'inexprimable mansuétude de l'infini. Il sentait monter en lui cette aube obscure, l'espérance, si le mot espérance peut s'appliquer aux attentes de la guerre civile. Pour l'instant, il lui semblait qu'en sortant de cette mer qui venait d'être si inexorable, et en touchant la terre, tout danger s'était évanoui. Personne ne savait son nom, il était seul, perdu pour l'ennemi, sans trace derrière lui, car la surface de la mer ne garde rien, caché, ignoré, pas même soupçonné. Il sentait on ne sait quel apaisement suprême. Un peu plus il se serait endormi.

Ce qui, pour cet homme en proie, au dedans comme au dehors, à tant de tumultes, donnait un charme étrange à cette heure calme qu'il traversait, c'était, sur la terre comme au ciel, un profond silence.

On n'entendait que le vent qui venait de la mer; mais le vent est une basse continue, et cesse presque d'être un bruit, tant il devient une habitude.

Tout à coup il se dressa debout.

Son attention venait d'être brusquement réveillée; il considéra l'horizon.

Quelque chose donnait à son regard une fixité particulière.

Ce qu'il regardait, c'était le clocher de Cormeray qu'il avait devant lui au fond de la plaine. On ne sait quoi d'extraordinaire se passait en effet dans ce clocher.

La silhouette de ce clocher se découpait nettement; on voyait la tour surmontée de sa pyramide, et, entre la tour et la pyramide, la cage de la cloche, carrée, à jour, sans abat-vent, et ouverte aux regards des quatre côtés, ce qui est la mode des clochers bretons.

Or, cette cage apparaissait alternativement ouverte et fermée; à intervalles égaux, sa haute fenêtre se dessinait toute blanche, puis toute noire; on voyait le ciel à travers, puis on ne le voyait plus; il y avait clarté, puis occultation; et l'ouverture et la fermeture se succédaient d'une seconde à l'autre avec la régularité du marteau sur l'enclume.

Le vieillard avait ce clocher de Cormeray devant lui, à une distance d’environ deux lieues; il regarda à sa droite le clocher de Baguer-Pican, également droit sur l’horizon; la cage de ce clocher s’ouvrait et se fermait comme celle de Cormeray.

Il regarda à sa gauche le clocher de Tanis; la cage du clocher de Tanis s’ouvrait et se fermait comme celle de Baguer-Pican.

Il regarda tous les clochers de l’horizon l’un après l’autre, à sa gauche les clochers de Courtils, de Précey, de Crollon et de la Croix-Avranchin; à sa droite les clochers de Raz-sur-Couesnon, de Mordrey et des Pas; en face de lui, le clocher de Pontorson. La cage de tous ces clochers était alternativement noire et blanche.

Qu’est-ce que cela voulait dire?

Cela signifiait que toutes les cloches étaient en branle.

Il fallait, pour apparaître ainsi, qu’elles fussent furieusement secouées.

Qu’était-ce donc? Évidemment le tocsin.

On sonnait le tocsin, on le sonnait frénétiquement, on le sonnait partout, dans tous les clochers, dans tous les villages, et l’on n’entendait rien.

Cela tenait à la distance qui empêchait les sons d’arriver et au vent de mer qui soufflait du côté opposé et qui emportait tous les bruits de la terre hors de l’horizon.

Toutes ces cloches forcenées appelant de toutes parts, et en même temps ce silence, rien de plus sinistre.

Le vieillard regardait et écoutait.

Il n’entendait pas le tocsin, et il le voyait. Voir le tocsin, sensation étrange.

A qui en voulaient ces cloches?

Contre qui ce tocsin?

III. UTILITÉ DES GROS CARACTÈRES

Certainement, quelqu'un était traqué.

Qui?

Cet homme d'acier eut un frémissement.

Ce ne pouvait être lui. On n'avait pu deviner son arrivée. Il était impossible que les représentants en mission fussent déjà informés; il venait à peine de débarquer. La corvette avait évidemment sombré sans qu'un homme échappât. Et dans la corvette même, excepté Boisberthelot et La Vieuville, personne ne savait son nom.

Les clochers continuaient leur jeu farouche. Il les examinait et les comptait machinalement, et sa rêverie, poussée d'une conjecture à l'autre, avait cette fluctuation que donne le passage d'une sécurité profonde à une incertitude terrible. Pourtant, après tout, ce tocsin pouvait s'expliquer de bien des façons, et il finissait par se rassurer en se répétant: En somme, personne ne sait mon arrivée et personne ne sait mon nom.

Depuis quelques instants il se faisait un léger bruit au-dessus de lui et derrière lui. Ce bruit ressemblait au froissement d'une feuille d'arbre agitée. Il n'y prit d'abord pas garde; puis, comme le bruit persistait, on pourrait dire insistait, il finit par se retourner. C'était une feuille en effet, mais une feuille de papier. Le vent était en train de décoller au-dessus de sa tête une large affiche appliquée sur la pierre milliaire. Cette affiche était placardée depuis peu de temps, par elle était encore humide et donnait prise au vent qui s'était mis à jouer avec elle et qui la détachait.

Le vieillard avait gravi la dune du côté opposé et n'avait pas vu cette affiche en arrivant.

Il monta sur la borne où il était assis, et posa sa main sur le coin du placard que le vent soulevait; le ciel était serein, les crépuscules sont longs en juin; le bas de la dune était ténébreux, mais le haut était éclairé; une partie de l'affiche était imprimée en grosses lettres, et il faisait encore assez de jour pour qu'on pût les lire. Il lut ceci:

RÉPUBLIQUE FRANÇAISE, UNE ET INDIVISIBLE.

«Nous, Prieur de la Marne, représentant du peuple en mission près de l’armée des Côtes-de-Cherbourg, — ordonnons: — Le ci-devant marquis de Lantenac, vicomte de Fontenay, soi-disant prince breton, furtivement débarqué sur la côte de Granville, est mis hors la loi. — Sa tête est mise à prix. — Il sera payé à qui le livrera, mort ou vivant, la somme de soixante mille livres. — Cette somme ne sera point payée en assignats, mais en or. — Un bataillon de l’armée des Côtes-de-Cherbourg sera immédiatement envoyé à la rencontre et à la recherche du ci-devant marquis de Lantenac. — Les communes sont requises de prêter main-forte. — Fait en la maison commune de Granville, le 2 juin 1793. — Signé:

PRIEUR DE LA MARNE.»

Au-dessous de ce nom il y avait une autre signature, qui était en beaucoup plus petit caractère, et qu'on ne pouvait lire à cause du peu de jour qui restait.

Le vieillard rabaissa son chapeau sur ses yeux, croisa sa cape de mer jusque sous son menton, et descendit rapidement la dune. Il était évidemment inutile de s'attarder sur ce sommet éclairé.

Il y avait été peut-être trop longtemps déjà; le haut de la dune était le seul point du paysage qui fût resté visible.

Quand il fut en bas et dans l'obscurité, il ralentit le pas.

Il se dirigeait dans le sens de l'itinéraire qu'il s'était tracé vers la métairie, ayant probablement des raisons de sécurité de ce côté-là.

Tout était désert. C'était l'heure où il n'y a plus de passants.

Derrière une broussaille, il s'arrêta, défit son manteau, retourna sa veste du côté velu, rattacha à sou cou son manteau qui était une guenille nouée d'une corde, et se remit en route.

Il faisait clair de lune.

Il arriva à un embranchement de deux chemins où se dressait une vieille croix de pierre. Sur le piédestal de la croix on distinguait un carré blanc qui était vraisemblablement une affiche pareille à celle qu'il venait de lire. Il s'en approcha.

— Où allez-vous? lui dit une voix.

Il se retourna.

Un homme était là dans les haies, de haute taille comme lui, vieux comme lui, comme lui en cheveux blancs, et plus en haillons encore que lui-même. Presque son pareil. Cet homme s'appuyait sur un long bâton.

L'homme reprit:

— Je vous demande où vous allez.

— D'abord où suis-je? dit-il avec un calme presque hautain.

L'homme répondit:

— Vous êtes dans la seigneurie de Tanis, et j'en suis le mendiant, et vous en êtes le seigneur.

— Moi?

— Oui, vous, monsieur le marquis de Lantenac.

IV. LE CAIMAND

Le marquis de Lantenac, nous le nommerons par son nom désormais, répondit gravement:

— Soit. Livrez-moi.

L’homme poursuivit:

— Nous sommes tous deux chez nous ici, vous dans le château, moi dans le buisson.

— Finissons. Faites. Livrez-moi, dit le marquis. L’homme continua:

— Vous alliez à la métairie d’herbe-en-Pail, n’est-ce pas?

— Oui.

— N’y allez point.

— Pourquoi?

— Parce que les bleus y sont.

— Depuis quand?

— Depuis trois jours.

— Les habitants de la ferme et du hameau ont-ils résisté?

— Non. Ils ont ouvert toutes les portes.

— Ah! dit le marquis.

L’homme montra du doigt le toit de la métairie qu’on apercevait à quelque distance par-dessus les arbres.

— Voyez-vous le toit, monsieur le marquis?

— Oui.

— Voyez-vous ce qu’il y a dessus?

— Qui flotte?

— Oui.

— C’est un drapeau.

— Tricolore, dit l’homme.

C’était l’objet qui avait déjà attiré l’attention du marquis quand il était au haut de la dune.

— Ne sonne-t-on pas le tocsin? demanda le marquis.

— Oui.

— À cause de quoi?

— Évidemment à cause de vous.

— Mais on ne l’entend pas?

— C’est le vent qui empêche.

L’homme continua:

— Vous avez vu votre affiche?

— Oui.

— On vous cherche.

Et, jetant un regard du côté de la métairie, il ajouta:

— Il y a là un demi-bataillon.

— De républicains?

— Parisiens.

— Eh bien, dit le marquis, marchons

Et il fit un pas vers la métairie.

L’homme lui saisit le bras.

— N’y allez pas.

— Et où voulez-vous que j’aille?

— Chez moi.

Le marquis regarda le mendiant.

— Écoutez, monsieur le marquis, ce n’est pas beau chez moi, mais c’est sûr. Une cabane plus basse qu’une cave. Pour plancher un lit de varech, pour plafond un toit de branches et d’herbes. Venez. A la métairie vous seriez fusillé. Chez moi vous dormirez. Vous devez être las; et demain matin les bleus se seront remis en marche, et vous irez où vous voudrez.

Le marquis considérait cet homme.

— De quel côté êtes-vous donc? demanda le marquis; êtes-vous républicain? êtes-vous royaliste?

— Je suis un pauvre.

— Ni royaliste, ni républicain?

— Je ne crois pas.

— Etes-vous pour ou contre le roi?

— Je n’ai pas le temps de ça.

— Qu’est-ce que vous pensez de ce qui se passe?

— Je n’ai pas de quoi vivre.

— Pourtant vous venez à mon secours.

— J’ai vu que vous étiez hors la loi. Qu’est-ce que cela la loi? On peut donc être dehors. Je ne comprends pas. Quant à moi, suis-je dans la loi? suis-je hors la loi? Je n’en sais rien. Mourir de faim, est-ce être dans la loi?

— Depuis quand mourez-sous de faim?

— Depuis toute ma vie.

— Et vous me sauvez?

— Oui.

— Pourquoi?

— Parce que j’ai dit: Voilà encore un plus pauvre que moi. J’ai le droit de respirer, lui, il ne l’a pas.

— C’est vrai. Et vous me sauvez!

— Sans doute. Nous voilà frères, monseigneur. Je demande du pain, vous demandez la vie. Nous sommes deux mendiants.

— Mais savez-vous que ma tête est mise à prix?

— Oui.

— Comment le savez-sous?

— J’ai lu l’affiche.

— Vous savez lire?

— Oui. Et écrire aussi. Pourquoi serais-je une brute?

— Alors, puisque vous savez lire, et puisque vous, avez lu l’affiche, vous savez qu’un homme qui me livrerait gagnerait soixante mille francs?

— Je le sais.

— Pas en assignats.

— Oui, je sais, en or.

— Vous savez que soixante mille francs, c’est une fortune?

— Oui.

— Et que quelqu’un qui me livrerait ferait sa fortune?

— Eh bien, après?

— Sa fortune.

— C’est justement ce que j’ai pensé. En vous voyant, je me suis dit: Quand je pense que quelqu’un qui livrerait cet homme-ci gagnerait soixante mille francs et ferait sa fortune! Dépêchons-nous de le cacher.

Le marquis suivit le pauvre.

Ils entrèrent dans un fourré. La tanière du mendiant était là. C’était une sorte de chambre qu’un grand vieux chêne avait laissé prendre chez lui à cet homme; elle était creusée sous ses racines et couverte de ses branches. C’était obscur, bas, caché, invisible. Il y avait place pour deux.

— J’ai prévu que je pouvais avoir un hôte, dit le mendiant.

Cette espèce de logis sous terre, moins rare en Bretagne qu’on ne croit, s’appelle en langue paysanne carnichot. Ce nom s’applique aussi à des cachettes pratiquées dans l’épaisseur des murs.

C’est meublé de quelques pots, d’un grabat de paille ou de goëmon lavé et séché, d’une grosse couverture de créseau, et de quelques mèches de suif avec un briquet et des tiges creuses de brane-ursine pour allumettes.

Ils se courbèrent, rampèrent un peu, pénétrèrent dans la chambre où les gosses racines de l'arbre découpaient des compartiments bizarres; et s'assirent sur un tas de varech sec qui était le lit. L'intervalle de deux racines par où l'on entrait et qui servait de porte donnait quelque clarté. La nuit était venue, mais le regard se proportionne à la lumière, et l'on finit par trouver toujours un peu de jour dans l'ombre. Un reflet du clair de lune blanchissait vaguement l'entrée. Il y avait dans un coin une cruche d'eau, une galette de sarrasin et des châtaignes.

— Soupons, dit le pauvre.

Ils se partagèrent les châtaignes, le marquis donna son morceau de biscuit, ils mordirent à la même miche de blé noir et burent à la cruche l'un après l'autre.

Ils causèrent.

Le marquis se mit à interroger cet homme.

— Ainsi, tout ce qui arrive ou rien, c'est pour vous la même chose?

— A peu près. Vous êtes des seigneurs, vous autres. Ce sont vos affaires.

— Mais enfin, ce qui se passe…

— Ça se passe là-haut.

Le mendiant ajouta:

— Et puis il y a des choses qui se passent encore plus haut, le soleil qui se lève, la lune qui augmente ou diminue, c'est de celles-là que je m'occupe.

Il but une gorgée à la cruche, et dit:

— La bonne eau fraîche!

Et il reprit:

— Comment trouvez-vous cette eau, monseigneur?

— Comment vous appelez-vous? dit le marquis.

— Je m'appelle Tellmarch, et l'on m'appelle le Caimand.

— Je sais. Caimand est un mot du pays.

— Qui veut dire mendiant. On me surnomme aussi le Vieux.

Il poursuivit:

— Voilà quarante ans qu'on m'appelle le Vieux.

— Quarante ans! mais vous étiez jeune.

— Je n'ai jamais été jeune. Vous l'êtes toujours, vous, monsieur le marquis. Vous avez des jambes de vingt ans, vous escaladez la grande dune; moi, je commence à ne plus marcher, au bout d’un quart de lieue je suis las. Nous sommes pourtant du même âge; mais les riches, ça a sur nous un avantage, c’est que ça mange tous les jours. Manger conserve.

Le mendiant, après un silence, continua:

— Les pauvres, les riches, c’est une terrible affaire. C’est ce qui produit les catastrophes. Du moins, ça me fait cet effet-là. Les pauvres veulent être riches, les riches ne veulent pas être pauvres. Je crois que c’est un peu là le fond. Je ne m’en mêle pas. Les évènements sont les évènements. Je ne suis ni pour le créancier, ni pour le débiteur. Je sais qu’il y a une dette et qu’on la paye. Voilà tout. J’aurais mieux aimé qu’on ne tuât pas le roi, mais il me serait difficile de dire pourquoi. Après ça, on me répond: Mais, autrefois, comme on vous accrochait les gens aux arbres pour rien du tout! Tenez, moi, pour un méchant coup de fusil tiré à un chevreuil du roi, j’ai vu pendre un homme qui avait une femme et sept enfants. Il y a à dire des deux côtés.

Il se tut encore, puis ajouta:

— Vous comprenez, je ne sais pas au juste, on va, on vient, il se passe des choses: moi, je suis là sous les étoiles.

Tellmarch eut encore une interruption de rêverie, puis continua:

— Je suis un peu rebouteux, un peu médecin, je connais les herbes, je tire parti des plantes, les paysans me voient attentif devant rien, et cela me fait passer pour sorcier. Parce que je songe, on croit que je sais.

— Vous êtes du pays? dit le marquis.

— Je n’en suis jamais sorti.

— Vous me connaissez?

— Sans doute. La dernière fois que je vous ai vu, c’est à votre dernier passage, il y a deux ans. Vous êtes allé d’ici en Angleterre. Tout à l’heure j’ai aperçu un homme au haut de la dune. Un homme de grande taille. Les hommes grands sont rares; c’est un pays d’hommes petits, la Bretagne. J’ai bien regardé, j’avais lu l’affiche. J’ai dit: Tiens! Et quand vous êtes descendu, il y avait de la lune, je vous ai reconnu.

— Pourtant, moi, je ne vous connais pas.

— Vous m’avez vu, mais vous ne m’avez pas vu.

Et Tellmarch le Caimand ajouta:

— Je vous voyais, moi. De mendiant à passant, le regard n’est pas le même.

— Est-ce que je vous avais rencontré autrefois?

— Souvent, puisque je suis votre mendiant. J’étais le pauvre du bas du chemin de votre château. Vous m’avez dans l’occasion fait l’aumône; mais celui qui donne ne regarde pas, celui qui reçoit examine et observe. Qui dit mendiant, dit espion. Mais moi, quoique souvent triste, je tâche de ne pas être un mauvais espion. Je tendais la main, vous ne voyiez que la main, et vous y jetiez l’aumône dont j’avais besoin le matin pour ne pas mourir de faim le soir. On est des fois des vingt-quatre heures sans manger. Quelquefois un sou c’est la vie. Je vous dois la vie, je vous la rends.

— C’est vrai, vous me sauvez.

— Oui, je vous sauve, monseigneur.

Et la voix de Tellmarch devint grave.

— À une condition.

— Laquelle?

— C’est que vous ne venez pas ici pour faire le mal.

— Je viens ici pour faire le bien, dit le marquis.

— Dormons, dit le mendiant.

Ils se couchèrent côte à côte sur le lit de varech. Le mendiant fut tout De suite endormi. Le marquis, bien que très las, resta un moment rêveur, puis, dans cette ombre, il regarda le pauvre et se coucha. Se coucher sur ce lit, c’était se coucher sur le sol; il en profita pour coller son oreille à terre, et il écouta. Il y avait sous la terre un sombre bourdonnement: on sait que le son se propage dans les profondeurs du sol; on entendait le bruit des cloches.

Le tocsin continuait.

Le marquis s’endormit.

V. SIGNÉ GAUVAIN

Quand il se réveilla, il faisait jour.

Le mendiant était debout, non dans la tanière, car on ne pouvait s'y tenir droit, mais dehors et sur le seuil. Il était appuyé sur son bâton. Il avait du soleil sur son visage.

Monseigneur, dit Tellmarch, quatre heures du matin viennent de sonner an clocher de Tanis. J'ai entendu les quatre coups; donc le vent a changé, c'est le vent de terre. Je n'entends aucun autre bruit; donc le tocsin a cessé. Tout est tranquille dans la métairie et dans le hameau d'Herbe-en-Pail. Les bleus dorment ou sont partis. Le plus fort du danger est passé; il est sage de nous séparer. C'est mon heure de m'en aller.

Il désigna un point de l'horizon.

— Je m'en vais par là.

Et il désigna le point opposé.

— Vous, allez-vous-en par ici.

Le mendiant fit au marquis un grave salut de la main. Il ajouta en montrant ce qui restait, du souper:

— Emportez des châtaignes, si vous avez faim.

Un moment après, il avait disparu sous les arbres.

Le marquis se leva, et s'en alla du côté que lui avait indiqué Tellmarch.

C'était l'heure charmante que la vieille langue paysanne normande appelle la «piperette du jour». On entendait jaser les cardrounettes et les moineaux de haie. Le marquis suivit le sentier par où ils étaient venus la veille. Il sortit du fourré et se retrouva à l'embranchement de routes marqué par la crois de pierre. L'affiche y était, blanche et comme gaie au soleil levant. Il se rappela qu'il y avait au bas de l'affiche quelque chose qu'il n'avait pu lire la veille à cause de la finesse des lettres et du peu de jour qu'il faisait. Il alla au piédestal de la croix. L'affiche se terminait en effet, au-dessous de la signature PRIEUR DE LA MARNE, par ces deux lignes en petits caractères:

«L'identité du ci-devant marquis de Lantenac constatée, il sera immédiatement passé par les armes. — Signé: Le chef de bataillon, commandant la colonne d'expédition, GAUVAIN.»

— Gauvain! dit le marquis.

Il s'arrêta profondément pensif, l'oeil fixé sur l'affiche.

— Gauvain! répéta-t-il.

Il se remit en marche, se retourna, regarda la croix, revint sur ses pas, et lut l’affiche encore une fois.

Puis il s’éloigna à pas lents. Quelqu’un qui eût été près de lui l’eût entendu murmurer à demi-voix: «Gauvain!»

Du fond des chemins creux où il se glissait, on ne voyait pas les toits de la métairie qu’il avait laissée à sa gauche. Il côtoyait une éminence abrupte, toute couverte d’ajoncs en fleur, de l’espèce dite longue-épine. Cette éminence avait pour sommet une de ces pointes de terre qu’on appelle dans le pays une «hure». Au pied de l’éminence, le regard se perdait tout de suite sous les arbres. Les feuillages étaient comme trempés de lumière. Toute la nature avait la joie profonde du matin.

Tout à coup ce paysage fut terrible. Ce fut comme une embuscade qui éclate. On ne sait quelle trombe faite de cris sauvages et de coups de fusil s’abattit sur ces champs et ces bois pleins de rayons, et l’on vit s’élever, du côté où était la métairie, une grande fumée coupée de flammes claires, comme si le hameau et la ferme n’étaient plus qu’une botte de paille qui brûlait. Ce fut subit et lugubre, le passage brusque du calme à la furie, une explosion de l’enfer en pleine aurore, l’horreur sans transition. On se battait du côté d’Herbe-en-Pail. Le marquis s’arrêta.

Il n’est personne qui, en pareil cas, ne l’ait éprouvé, la curiosité est plus forte que le danger; on veut savoir, dût-on périr. Il monta sur l’éminence au bas de laquelle passait le chemin creux. De là on était vu, mais on voyait. Il fut sur la hure en quelques minutes. Il regarda.

En effet, il y avait une fusillade et un incendie. On entendait des clameurs, on voyait du feu. La métairie était comme le centre d’on ne sait quelle catastrophe. Qu’était-ce? La métairie d’Herbe-en-Pail était-elle attaquée? Mais par qui? Etait-ce un combat? N’était-ce pas plutôt une exécution militaire? Les bleus, et cela leur était ordonné par un décret révolutionnaire, punissaient très souvent, en y mettant le feu, les fermes et les villages réfractaires; on brillait, pour l’exemple, toute métairie et tout hameau qui n’avaient point fait les abattis d’arbres prescrits par la loi et qui n’avaient pas ouvert et taillé dans les fourrés des passages pour la cavalerie républicaine. On avait notamment exécuté ainsi tout récemment la paroisse de Bourgon, près d’Ernée. Herbe-en-Pail était-il dans le même cas? Il était visible qu’aucune des percées stratégiques commandées par le décret n’avait été faite dans les halliers et dans les enclos de Tanis et l’Herbe-en-

Pail. Etait-ce le châtiment? Etait-il arrivé un ordre à l’avant-garde qui occupait la métairie? Cette avant-garde ne faisait-elle pas partie d’une de ces colonnes d’expédition surnommées colonnes Infernales?

Un fourré très hérissé et très fauve entourait de toutes part l’éminence au sommet de laquelle le marquis s’était placé en observation. Ce fourré, qu’on appelait le bocage d’Herbe-en-Pail, mais qui avait les proportions d’un bois s’étendait jusqu’à la métairie, et cachait, comme tous les halliers bretons, un réseau de ravins, de sentiers et de chemins creux, labyrinthes où les armées républicaines se perdaient.

L’exécution, si c’était une exécution, avait dû être féroce, car elle fut courte. Ce fut, comme toutes les choses brutales, tout de suite fait. L’atrocité des guerres civiles comporte ces sauvageries. Pendant que le marquis, multipliant les conjonctures, hésitant à descendre, hésitant à rester, écoutait et épiait, ce fracas d’extermination cessa, ou pour mieux dire se dispersa. Le marquis constata dans le hallier comme l’éparpillement d’une troupe furieuse et joyeuse. Un effrayant fourmillement se fit sous les arbres. De la métairie on se jetait dans le bois. Il y avait des tambours qui battaient la charge. On ne tirait plus de coup de fusil; cela ressemblait maintenant à une battue; on semblait fouiller, poursuivre, traquer; il était évident qu’on cherchait quelqu’un; le bruit était diffus et profond; c’était une confusion de paroles de colère et de triomphe, une rumeur composée de clameurs; on n’y distinguait rien. Brusquement, comme un linéament se dessine dans une fumée, quelque chose devint articulé et précis dans ce tumulte, c’était un nom, un nom répété par mille voix, et le marquis entendit nettement ce cri:

— Lantenac! Lantenac! le marquis de Lantenac!

C’était lui qu’on cherchait.

VI. LES PÉRIPÉTIES DE LA GUERRE CIVILE

Et subitement, autour de lui, et de tous les côtés à la fois, le fourré se remplit de fusils, de bayonnettes et de sabres, un drapeau tricolore se dressa dans la pénombre, le cri Lantenac! éclata à son oreille, et à ses pieds, à travers les ronces et les branches, des faces violentes apparurent.

Le marquis était seul, debout sur un sommet, visible de tous les points du bois. Il voyait à peine ceux qui criaient son nom, mais il était vu de tous. S'il y avait mille fusils dans le bois, il était là comme une cible. Il ne distinguait rien dans le taillis que des prunelles ardentes fixées sur lui.

Il ôta son chapeau, en retroussa le bord, arracha une longue épine sèche à un ajonc, tira de sa poche une cocarde blanche, fixa avec l'épine le bord retroussé et la cocarde à la forme du chapeau, et, remettant sur la tête le chapeau dont le bord relevé laissait voir son front et sa cocarde, il dit d'une voix haute, parlant à toute la forêt à la fois:

— Je suis l'homme que vous cherchez. Je suis le marquis de Lantenac, vicomte de Fontenay, prince breton, lieutenant-général des armées du roi. Finissons-en. En joue! Feu!

Et, écartant de ses deux mains sa veste de peau de chèvre, il montra sa poitrine nue.

Il baissa les yeux, cherchant du regard les fusils braqués, et se vit entouré d'hommes à genoux.

Un immense cri s'éleva: — Vive Lantenac! Vive monseigneur! Vive le général!

En même temps des chapeaux sautaient en l'air, des sabres tournoyaient joyeusement, et l'on voyait dans tout le taillis se dresser des bâtons au bout desquels s'agitaient des bonnets de laine brune.

Ce qu'il avait autour de lui, c'était une bande vendéenne.

Cette bande s'était agenouillée en le voyant.

La légende raconte qu'il y avait dans les vieilles forêts thuringiennes des, êtres étranges, race des géants, plus et moins qu'hommes, qui étaient considérés par les romains comme des animaux horribles, et par les germains comme des incarnations divines, et qui, selon la rencontre, couraient la chance d'être exterminés ou adorés.

Le marquis éprouva quelque chose de pareil à ce que devait ressentir un de ces êtres quand, s'attendant à être traité comme un monstre, il était brusquement traité comme un dieu.

Tous ces yeux pleins d'éclairs redoutables se fixaient sur le marquis avec une sorte de sauvage amour.

Cette cohue était armée de fusils, de sabres, de faulx, de pioches, de bêtons; tous avaient de grands feutres ou des bonnets bruns, avec des cocardes blanche, une profusion de rosaires et d'amulettes, de larges culottes ouvertes au genou, des casaques de poil, des guêtres de cuir, le jarret nu, les cheveux longs, quelques-uns l'air féroce, tous l'oeil naïf.

Un homme, jeune et de belle mine, traversa ces gens agenouillés et monta à grands pas vers le marquis. Cet homme était, comme les paysans, coiffé d'un feutre à bord relevé et à cocarde blanche, et vêtu d'une casaque de poil, mais il avait les mains blanches et une chemise fine, et il portait par-dessus sa veste une écharpe de soie blanche à laquelle pendait une épée à poignée dorée.

Parvenu sur la hure, il jeta son chapeau, détacha son écharpe, mit un genou en terre, présenta au marquis l'écharpe et l'épée, et dit:

— Nous vous cherchions en effet, nous vous avons trouvé. Voici l'épée de commandement. Ces hommes sont maintenait à vous. J'étais leur commandant, je monte en grade, je suis votre soldat. Acceptez notre hommage, monseigneur. Donnez vos ordres, mon général.

Puis il fit un signe, et des hommes qui portaient un drapeau tricolore sortirent du bois. Ces hommes montèrent jusqu'au marquis et déposèrent le drapeau à ses pieds. C'était le drapeau qu'il venait d'entrevoir à travers les arbres.

— Mon général, dit le jeune homme qui lui avait présenté l'épée et l'écharpe, ceci est le drapeau que nous venons de prendre aux bleus qui étaient dans la ferme d'Herbe-en-pail. Monseigneur, je m'appelle Gavard. J'ai été au marquis de La Rouarie.

— C'est bien, dit le marquis.

Et, calme et grave, il ceignit l'écharpe.

Puis il tira l'épée, et, l'agitant nue au-dessus de sa tète: — Debout! dit-il, et vive le roi!

Tous se levèrent.

Et l'on entendit dans les profondeurs du bois une clameur éperdue et triomphante: Vive le roi! Vive notre marquis! Vive Lantenac!

Le marquis se tourna vers Gavard.

— Combien donc êtes-vous?

— Sept mille.

Et tout en descendant de l'éminence, pendant que les paysans écartaient les ajoncs devant les pas du marquis de Lantenac, Gavard continua:

— Monseigneur, rien de plus simple. Tout cela s'explique d'un mot. On n'attendait qu'une étincelle. L'affiche de la République, en révélant votre présence, a insurgé le pays pour le roi. Nous avions en outre été avertis sous main par le maire de Granville qui est un homme à nous; le même qui a sauvé l'abbé Olivier. Cette nuit, on a sonné le tocsin.

— Pour qui?

— Pour vous.

— Ah! dit le marquis.

— Et nous voilà, reprit Gavard.

— Et vous êtes sept mille?

— Aujourd'hui. Nous serons quinze mille demain. C'est le rendement du pays. quand M. Henri de La Rochejaquelein est parti pour l'armée catholique, ou a sonné le tocsin, et en une nuit six paroisses, Isernay, Corqueux, les Echaubroigues, les Aubiers, Saint-Aubin et Nueil, lui ont amené dix mille hommes. Ou n'avait pas de munitions, on a trouvé chez un maçon soixante livres de poudre de mine, et M. de La Rochejaquelein est parti avec cela. Nous pensions bien que vous deviez être quelque part dans cette forêt, et nous vous cherchions.

— Et vous avez attaqué les bleus dans la ferme d'Herbe-en-Pail?

— Le vent les avait empêchés d'entendre le tocsin. Ils ne se défiaient pas; les gens du hameau, qui sont patauds, les avaient bien reçus. Ce matin, nous avons investi la ferme, les bleus dormaient, et en un tour de main la chose a été faite. J'ai un cheval. Daignez-vous l'accepter, mon général?

— Oui.

Un paysan amena un cheval blanc militairement harnaché. Le marquis, sans user de l'aide que lui offrait Gavard, monta à cheval.

— Hurrah! crièrent les paysans. Car les cris anglais sont fort usités sur la côte bretonne-normande, en commerce perpétuel avec les îles de la Manche.

Gavard fit le salut militaire et demanda:

— Quel sera votre quartier général, monseigneur?

— D'abord la forêt de Fougères.

— C'est une de vos sept forêts, monsieur le marquis.

— Il faut un prêtre.

— Nous en avons un.

— Qui?

— Le vicaire de la Chapelle-Erbrée.

— Je le connais. Il a fait le voyage de Jersey.

Un prêtre sortit des rangs, et dit:

— Trois fois.

Le marquis tourna la tête.

— Bonjour, monsieur le vicaire. Vous allez avoir de la besogne.

— Tant mieux, monsieur le marquis.

— Vous aurez du monde à confesser. Ceux qui voudront. On ne force personne.

— Monsieur le marquis, dit le prêtre, Gaston, à Guéménée, force les républicains à se confesser.

— C’est un perruquier, dit le marquis. Mais la mort doit être libre.

Gavard, qui était allé donner quelques consignes, revint.

— Mon général, j’attends vos commandements.

— D’abord, le rendez-vous est à la forêt de Fougères. Qu’on se disperse et qu’on y aille.

— L’ordre est donné.

— Ne m’avez-vous pas dit que les gens d’Herbe-en-Pail avaient bien reçu les bleus?

— Oui, mon général.

— Vous avez brûlé la ferme?

— Oui.

— Avez-vous brûlé le hameau?

— Non.

— Brûlez-le.

— Les bleus ont essayé de se défendre; mais ils étaient cent cinquante et nous étions sept mille.

— Qu’est-ce que c’est que ces bleus-là?

— Des bleus de Santerre.

— Qui a commandé le roulement de tambours pendant qu’on coupait la tête au roi. Alors c’est un bataillon de Paris?

— Un demi-bataillon.

— Comment s’appelle ce bataillon?

— Mon général, il y a sur le drapeau: Bataillon du Bonnet-Rouge.

— Des bêtes féroces.

— Que faut-il faire des blessés?

— Achevez-les.

— Que faut-il faire des prisonniers?

— Fusillez-les.

— Il y en a environ quatre-vingts.

— Fusillez-les tous.

— Il y a deux femmes.

— Aussi.

— Il y a trois enfants.

— Emmenez-les. On verra ce qu'on en fera. Et le marquis poussa son cheval.

VII. PAS DE GRACE (MOT D'ORDRE DE LA COMMUNE) PAS DE QUARTIER (MOT D'ORDRE DES PRINCES)

Pendant que ceci se passait près de Tanis, le mendiant s'en était allé vers Grollon. Il s'était enfoncé dans les ravins, sous les vastes feuillées sourdes, inattentif à tout et attentif à rien, comme il l'avait dit lui-même, rêveur plutôt que pensif, car le pensif a un but et le rêveur n'en a pas, errant, rôdant, s'arrêtant, mangeant çà et là une pousse d'oseille sauvage, buvant aux sources, dressant la tête par moments à des fracas lointains, puis rentrant dans l'éblouissante fascination de la nature, offrant ses haillons au soleil, entendant peut-être le bruit des hommes, mais écoutant le chant des oiseaux.

Il était vieux et lent; il ne pouvait aller loin; comme il l'avait dit au marquis de Lantenac, un quart de lieue le fatiguait; il fit un court circuit vers la Croix-Avranchin, et le soir était venu quand il s'en retourna.

Un peu au delà de Macey, le sentier qu'il suivait le conduisit sur une sorte de point culminant dégagé d'arbres, d'où l'on voit de très loin et d'où l'on découvre tout l'horizon de l'ouest jusqu'à la mer.

Une fumée appela son attention.

Rien de plus doux qu'une fumée, rien de plus effrayant. Il y a les fumées paisibles et il y a les fumées scélérates. Une fumée, l'épaisseur et la couleur d'une fumée, c'est toute la différence entre la paix et la guerre, entre la fraternité et la haine, entre l'hospitalité et le sépulcre, entre la vie et la mort. Une fumée qui monte dans les arbres peut signifier ce qu'il y a de plus charmant au monde, le foyer, ou ce qu'il y a de plus affreux, l'incendie; et tout le bonheur comme tout le malheur de l'homme sont parfois dans cette chose éparse au vent.

La fumée que regardait Tellmarch était inquiétante.

Elle était noire avec des rougeurs subtiles, comme si le brasier d'où elle sortait avait des intermittences et achevait de s'éteindre, et elle s'élevait au-dessus d'Herbe-en-Pail.

Tellmarch hâta le pas et se dirigea vers cette fumée. Il était bien las, mais il voulait savoir ce que c'était.

Il arriva au sommet d’un coteau auquel étaient adossés le hameau et la métairie.

Il n’y avait plus ni métairie ni hameau.

Un tas de masures brûlait, et c’était là Herbe-en-Pail.

Il y a quelque chose de plus poignant à voir brûler qu’un palais, c’est une chaumière. Une chaumière en feu est lamentable. La dévastation s’abattant sur la misère, le vautour s’acharnant sur le ver de terre, il y a là on ne sait quel contre-sens qui serre le coeur.

A en croire la légende biblique, un incendie regardé change une créature humaine eu statue; Tellmarch fut un moment cette statue. Le spectacle qu’il avait sous les yeux le fit immobile. Cette destruction s’accomplissait en silence. Pas un cri ne s’élevait; pas un soupir humain ne se mêlait à cette fumée; cette fournaise travaillait, et achevait de dévorer ce village sans qu’on entendit d’autre bruit que le craquement des charpentes et le pétillement des chaumes. Par moments la fumée se déchirait, les toits effondrés laissaient voir les chambres béantes, le brasier montrait tous ses rubis, des guenilles écarlates et de pauvres vieux meubles couleur de pourpre se dressait dans des intérieurs vermeils, et Tellmarch avait le sinistre éblouissement du désastre.

Quelques arbres d’une châtaigneraie contiguë aux maisons avaient pris feu et flambaient.

Il écoutait, tâchant d’entendre une voix, un appel, une clameur; rien ne remuait, excepté les flammes; tout se taisait, excepté l’incendie. Est-ce donc que tous avaient fui?

Où était ce groupe vivant et travaillant d’Herbe-en-Pail? Qu’était devenu tout ce petit peuple?

Tellmarch descendit du coteau.

Une énigme funèbre était devant lui. Il s’en approchait sans hâte et l’il fixe. Il avançait vers cette ruine avec une lenteur d’ombre; il se sentait fantôme dans cette tombe.

Il arriva à ce qui avait été la porte de la métairie, et il regarda dans la cour qui, maintenant, n’avait plus de murailles et se confondait avec le hameau groupé autour d’elle.

Ce qu’il avait, vu n’était rien. Il n’avait encore aperçu que le terrible.

L’horrible lui apparut.

Au milieu de la cour il y avait un monceau noir, vaguement modelé d’un côté par la flamme, de l’autre par la lune; ce monceau était un tas d’hommes, ces hommes étaient morts.

Il y avait autour de ce tas une grande mare qui fumait un peu; l’incendie se reflétait dans cette mare, mais elle n’avait pas besoin du feu pour être rouge; c’était du sang.

Tellmarch s’approcha. Il se mit à examiner, l’un après l’autre, ces corps gisants: tous étaient des cadavres.

La lune éclairait, l’incendie aussi.

Ces cadavres étaient des soldats. Tous étaient pieds nus; on leur avait pris leurs souliers; ou leur avait aussi pris leurs armes; ils avaient encore leurs uniformes qui étaient bleus; çà et là on distinguait, dans l’amoncellement des membres et des têtes, du chapeaux troués avec des cocardes tricolores. C’étaient des républicains. C’étaient ces Parisiens qui, la veille encore, étaient là tous vivants, et tenaient garnison dans la ferme d’Herbe-en-Pail. Ces hommes avaient été suppliciés, ce qu’indiquait la chute symétrique des corps; ils avaient été foudroyés sur place, et avec soin. Ils étaient tous morts. Pas un râle ne sortait du tas.

Tellmarch passa cette revue des cadavres, sans en omettre un seul; tous étaient criblés de balles.

Ceux qui les avaient mitraillés, pressés probablement d’aller ailleurs, n’avaient pas pris le temps de les enterrer.

Comme il allait se retirer, ses yeux tombèrent sur un mur bas qui était dans la cour, et il vit quatre pieds qui passaient derrière l’angle de ce mur.

Ces pieds avaient des souliers; ils étaient plus petits que les autres;

Tellmarch approcha. C’étaient des pieds de femmes.

Deux femmes étaient gisantes côte à côte derrière le mur, fusillées aussi.

Tellmarch se pencha sur elles. L’une de ces femmes avait une sorte d’uniforme; à côté d’elle était un bidon brisé et vidé; c’était une vivandière. Elle avait quatre balles dans la tête. Elle était morte.

Tellmarch examina l’autre. C’était une paysanne. Elle était blême et béante. Ses yeux étaient fermés. Elle n’avait aucune plaie à la tête. Ses vêtements, dont les fatigues sans doute avaient fait des haillons, s’étaient ouverts dans sa chute, et laissaient voir son torse à demi nu. Tellmarch acheva de les écarter, et vit à une épaule la plaie ronde que fait une balle; la clavicule était cassée. Il regarda ce sein livide.

— Mère et nourrice, murmura-t-il.

Il la toucha. Elle n’était pas froide.

Elle n’avait pas d’autre blessure que la clavicule cassée et la plaie à l’épaule.

Il posa la main sur le coeur et sentit un faible battement. Elle n’était pas morte.

Tellmarch se redressa debout et cria d’une voix terrible:

— Il n’y a donc personne ici?

— C’est toi, le caimand! répondit une voix, si basse qu’on l’entendait à peine.

Et en même temps une tête sortit d’un trou de ruine.

Puis une autre face apparut dans une autre masure. C’étaient deux paysans qui s’étaient cachés; les seuls qui survécussent.

La voix connue du caimand les avait rassurés et les avait fait sortir des recoins où ils se blottissaient.

Ils avancèrent vers Tellmarch, fort tremblants encore.

Tellmarch avait pu crier, mais ne pouvait parler: les émotions profondes sont ainsi.

Il leur montra du doigt la femme étendue à ses pieds.

— Est-ce qu’elle est encore en vie? dit l’un des paysans.

Tellmarch fit de la tête signe que oui.

— L’autre femme est-elle vivante? demanda l’autre paysan.

Tellmarch fit signe que non.

Le paysan qui s’était montré le premier reprit:

— Tous les autres sont morts, n’est-ce pas? J’ai vu cela. J’étais dans ma cave. Comme on remercie Dieu dans ces moments-là de n’avoir pas de famille! Ma maison brûlait. Seigneur Jésus! on a tout tué. Cette femme-ci avait des enfants. Trois enfants. Tout petits! Les enfants criaient: Mère! La mère criait: Mes enfants! On a tué la mère et on a emmené les enfants. J’ai vu cela, mon Dieu! mon Dieu! mon Dieu! Ceux qui ont tout massacré sont partis. Ils étaient contents. Ils out emmené les petits et tué la mère. Mais elle n’est pas morte, n’est-ce pas, elle n’est pas morte? Dis donc, le caimand, est-ce que tu crois que tu pourrais la sauver? Veux-tu que nous t’aidions à la porter dans ton carnichot?

Tellmarch fit signe que oui.

Le bois touchait à la ferme. Ils eurent vite fait un brancard avec des feuillages et des fougères. Ils placèrent sur le brancard la femme toujours immobile, et se mirent en marche dans le hallier, les deux paysans portant le brancard l’un à la tète, l’autre aux pieds, Tellmarch soutenant le bras de la femme, et lui tâtant le pouls.

Tout en cheminant, les deux paysans causaient, et, par-dessus la femme sanglante dont la lune éclairait la face pâle, ils échangeaient des exclamations effarées.

— Tout tuer!

— Tout brûler!

— Ah! monseigneur Dieu! est-ce qu’on va être comme ça à présent?

— C’est ce grand homme vieux qui l’a voulu.

— Oui, c’est lui qui commandait.

— Je ne l’ai pas vu quand on a fusillé. Est-ce qu’il était là?

— Non. Il était parti. Mais c’est égal, tout s’est fait par son commandement.

— Alors, c’est lui qui a tout fait.

— Il avait dit: Tuez! brûlez! pas de quartier!

— C’est un marquis.

— Oui, puisque c’est notre marquis.

— Comment s’appelle-t-il donc déjà?

— C’est monsieur de Lantenac.

Tellmarch leva les yeux au ciel et murmura entre ses dents:

— Si j’avais su!

CIMOURDAIN

I. LES RUES DE PARIS DANS CE TEMPS-LA

On vivait en public; on mangeait sur des tables dressées devant les portes; les femmes assises sur les perrons des églises faisaient de la charpie en chantant la Marseillaise; le parc Monceaux et le Luxembourg étaient des champs de manoeuvre; il y avait dans tous les carrefours des armureries en plein travail, on fabriquait des fusils sous les yeux des passants qui battaient des mains; on n'entendait que ce mot dans toutes les bouches: Patience. Nous sommes en révolution. On souriait héroïquement. On allait au spectacle comme à Athènes pendant la guerre du Péloponnèse; on voyait affichés au coin des rues: Le Siège de Thionville. — La Mère de famille sauvée des flammes. — Le Club des Sans-Soucis. — L'Aînée des papesses Jeanne. — Les Philosophes soldats. — L'Art d'aimer au village. — Les allemands étaient aux portes; le bruit courait que le roi de Prusse avait fait retenir des loges à l'Opéra. Tout était effrayant et personne n'était effrayé. La ténébreuse loi des suspects, qui est le crime de Merlin de Douai, faisait la guillotine visible au-dessus de toutes les têtes. Un procureur nommé Séran, dénoncé, attendait qu'on vint l'arrêter, en robe de chambre et en pantoufles, et en jouant de la flûte à sa fenêtre. Personne ne semblait avoir le temps. Tout le monde se hâtait. Pas un chapeau qui n'eût une cocarde. Les femmes disaient: Nous sommes jolies sous le bonnet rouge. Paris semblait plein d'un déménagement. Les marchands de bric-à-brac étaient encombrés de couronnes, de mitres, de sceptres en bois doré et de fleurs de lys, défroques des maisons royales. C'était la démolition de la monarchie qui passait. On voyait chez les fripiers des chapes et des rochets à vendre au décrochez-moi-ça. Aux Porcherons et chez Ramponneau, des hommes affublés de surplis et d'étoles, montés sur des ânes caparaçonnés de chasubles, se faisaient verser le vin du cabaret dans les ciboires des cathédrales. Rue Saint-Jacques, des paveurs, pieds nus, arrêtaient la brouette d'un colporteur qui offrait des chaussures à vendre, se cotisaient, et achetaient quinze paires de souliers qu'ils envoyaient à la Convention pour nos soldats. Les bustes de Franklin, de Rousseau, de Brutus, et il faut ajouter de Marat, abondaient; au-dessous d'un de ces bustes de Marat, rue Cloche-Perce, était accroché sous verre, dans un cadre de bois noir, un réquisitoire contre Malouet, avec faits à l'appui, et ces deux lignes en marge: «Ces détails m'ont été donnés par la maîtresse de Sylvain Bailly, bonne patriote qui a des bontés pour moi. — Signé: MARAT.» Sur la place du Palais-Royal, l'inscription de la fontaine: Quantos effundit in usus! était cachée par deux grandes toiles peintes à la détrempe, représentant l'une, Cahier de Gerville dénonçant à l'Assemblée nationale le signe de ralliement des «chiffonnistes» d'Arles, l'autre Louis XVI ramené de Varennes dans son carrosse royal, et sous ce carrosse une planche liée par des cordes portant à ses deux bouts deux grenadiers, la bayonnette au fusil. Peu de grandes boutiques étaient ouvertes; des merceries et des bimbeloteries roulantes circulaient traînées par des femmes, éclairées par des chandelles, les suifs fondant sur les marchandises; des boutiques en plein vent étaient tenues par des ex-religieuses en perruque blonde; telle ravaudeuse, raccommodant des bas dans une échoppe, était une comtesse; telle couturière était une marquise; madame de Boufflers habitait un grenier d'où elle voyait son hôtel. Des crieurs couraient, offrant les «papiers-nouvelles». On appelait écrouelleux ceux qui cachaient leur menton dans leur cravate. Les chanteurs ambulants pullulaient. La foule huait Pitou, le chansonnier royaliste, vaillant d'ailleurs, car il fut emprisonné vingt-deux fois, et fut traduit devant le tribunal révolutionnaire pour s'être frappé le bas des reins en prononçant le mot civisme; voyant sa tête en danger, il s'écria: Mais c'est le contraire de ma tête qui est coupable! ce qui fit rire les juges et le sauva. Ce Pitou raillait la mode des noms grecs et latins; sa chanson favorite était sur un savetier qu'il appelait Cujus, et dont il appelait la femme Cujusdam. On faisait des rondes de carmagnole; on ne disait pas le cavalier et la dame, on disait «le citoyen et la citoyenne». On dansait dans les cloîtres en ruine, avec des lampions sur l'autel, à la voûte deux bâtons en croix portant quatre chandelles, et des tombes sous la danse. On portait des vestes bleu de tyran. On avait des épingles de chemise «au bonnet de la Liberté» faites de pierres blanches, bleues et rouges. La rue de Richelieu se nommait rue de la Loi; le faubourg Saint-Antoine se nommait le faubourg de Gloire; il y avait sur la place de la Bastille une statue de la Nature. On se montrait certains passants connus, Chatelet, Didier, Nicolas, et Garnier-Delaunay, qui veillaient à la porte du menuisier Duplay; Voullant, qui ne manquait pas un jour de guillotine et suivait les charretées de condamnés, et qui appelait cela «aller à la messe rouge»; Montflabert, juré révolutionnaire et marquis, lequel se faisait appeler Dix-Août. On regardait défiler les élèves de l'Ecole militaire, qualifiés par les décrets de la Convention «aspirants à l'école de Mars», et par le peuple «pages de Robespierre». On lisait les proclamations de Fréron, dénonçant les suspects du crime de «négociantisme». Les «muscadins», ameutés aux portes des mairies, raillaient les mariages civils, s'attroupaient au passage de l'épousée et de l'époux, et disaient: «mariés municipaliter». Aux Invalides, les statues des rois et des saints étaient coiffées du bonnet phrygien. On jouait aux cartes sur la borne des carrefours; les jeux de cartes étaient, eux aussi, en pleine révolution, les rois étaient remplacés par les génies, les dames par les libertés, les valets par les égalités, et les as par les lois. On labourait les jardins publics; la charrue travaillait aux Tuileries. A tout cela était mêlée, surtout dans les partis vaincus, on ne sait quelle hautaine lassitude de vivre; un homme écrivait à Fouquier-Tinville; «Ayez la bonté de me délivrer de la vie. Voici mon adresse.» Champrenetz était arrêté pour s'être écrié en plein Palais-Royal: A quand la révolution de Turquie? Je voudrais voir la république à la Porte.» Partout des journaux. Des garçons perruquiers crêpaient en public des perruques de femmes, pendant que le patron lisait à haute voix le Moniteur; d'autres commentaient au milieu des groupes, avec force gestes, le journal Entendons-nous, de Dubois-Crancé, ou la Trompette du Père Bellerose. Quelquefois les barbiers étaient en même temps charcutiers, et l'on voyait des jambons et des andouilles pendre à côté d'une poupée coiffée de cheveux d'or. Des marchands vendaient sur la voie publique «des vins d'émigrés»; un marchand affichait des vins de cinquante- deux espèces; d'autres brocantaient des pendules en lyre et des sophas à la duchesse; un perruquier avait pour enseigne ceci; «Je rase le clergé, je peigne la noblesse, j'accommode le tiers-état.» On allait se faire tirer les cartes par Martin, au no. 175 de la rue d'Anjou, ci-devant Dauphine. Le pain manquait, le charbon manquait, le savon manquait; on voyait passer des bandes de vaches laitières arrivant des provinces. A la Vallée, l'agneau se vendait quinze francs la livre. Une affiche de la Commune assignait à chaque bouche une livre de viande par décade. On faisait queue aux portes des marchands; une de ces queues est restée légendaire, elle allait de la porte d'un épicier de la rue du Petit-Carreau jusqu'au milieu de la rue Montorgueil Faire queue, cela s'appelait «tenir la ficelle», à pause d'une longue corde que prenaient dans leur main, l'un derrière l'autre, ceux qui étaient à la file. Les femmes dans cette misère étaient vaillantes et douces. Elles passaient les nuits à attendre leur tour d'entrer chez le boulanger. Les expédients réussissaient à la révolution; elle soulevait cette détresse avec deux moyens périlleux, l'assignat et le maximum; l'assignat était le levier, le maximum était le point d’appui. Cet empirisme sauva la France. L’ennemi, aussi bien l’ennemi de Coblentz que l’ennemi de Londres, agiotait sur l’assignat. Des filles allaient et venaient, offrant de l’eau de lavande, des jarretières et des cadenettes, et faisant l’agio; il y avait les agioteurs du Perron de la rue Vivienne, en souliers crottés, en cheveux gras, en bonnet à poil à queue de renard, et les mayolets de la rue de Valois en bottes cirées, le cure-dents à la bouche, le chapeau velu sur la tête, tutoyés par les filles. Le peuple leur faisait la chasse, ainsi qu’aux voleurs, que les royalistes appelaient «citoyens actifs». Du reste, très peu de vols. Un dénûment farouche, une probité stoïque. Les va-nu-pieds et les meurt-de-faim passaient, les yeux gravement baissés, devant les devantures des bijoutiers du Palais-Égalité. Dans une visite domiciliaire que fit la section Antoine chez Beaumarchais, une femme cueillit dans le jardin une fleur; le peuple la souffleta. Le bois coûtait quatre cents francs, argent, la corde; on voyait dans les rues des gens scier leur bois de lit; l’hiver, les fontaines étaient gelées; l’eau coûtait vingt sous la voie; tout le monde se faisait porteur d’eau. Le louis d’or valait trois mille neuf cent cinquante francs. Une course en fiacre coûtait six cents francs. Après une journée de fiacre on entendait ce dialogue: — Cocher, combien vous dois-je? — Six mille livres. Une marchande d’herbe vendait pour vingt mille francs par jour. Un mendiant disait: Par charité, secourez-moi! il me manque deux cent trente livres pour payer mes souliers. A l’entrée des ponts, on voyait des colosses sculptés et peints par David que Mercier insultait: Énormes polichinelles de bois, disait-il. Ces colosses figuraient le fédéralisme et la coalition terrassés. Aucune défaillance dans ce peuple. La sombre joie d’en avoir fini avec les trônes. Les volontaires affluaient, offrant leurs poitrines. Chaque rue donnait un bataillon. Les drapeaux des districts allaient et venaient, chacun avec sa devise. Sur le drapeau du district des Capucins on lisait: Nul ne nous fera la barbe. Sur un autre: Plus de noblesse que dans le cur. Sur tous les murs, des affiches, grandes, petites, blanches, jaunes, vertes, rouges, imprimées, manuscrites, où on lisait ce cri: Vive la République! Les petits enfants bégayaient Ça ira!

Ces petits enfants, c’était l’immense avenir.

Plus tard, à la ville tragique succéda la ville cynique; les rues de Paris ont eu deux aspects révolutionnaires très distincts, avant et après le 9 thermidor; le Paris de Saint-Just fit place au Paris de Tallien; et, ce sont là les continuelles antithèses de Dieu, immédiatement après le Sinaï, la Courtille apparut.

Un accès de folie publique, cela se voit. Cela s'était déjà vu quatrevingts ans auparavant. On sort de Louis XIV comme on sort de Robespierre, avec un grand besoin de respirer; de là la Régence qui ouvre le siècle et le Directoire qui le termine. Deux saturnales après deux terrorismes. La France prend la clef des champs, hors du cloître puritain comme hors du cloître monarchique, avec une joie de nation échappée.

Après le 9 thermidor, Paris fut gai, d'une gaîté égarée. Une joie malsaine déborda. A la frénésie de mourir succéda la frénésie de vivre, et la grandeur s'éclipsa. On eut un Trimalcion qui s'appela Grimod de La Reynière: on eut l'Almanach des Gourmands. On dîna au bruit des fanfares dans les entresols du Palais-Royal, avec des orchestres de femmes battant du tambour et sonnant de la trompette; «le rigaudinier», l'archet au poing, régna; on soupa «à l'orientale» chez Méot, au milieu des cassolettes pleines de parfums. Le peintre Boze peignait ses filles, innocentes et charmantes têtes de seize ans, «en guillotinées», c'est-à-dire décolletées avec des chemises rouges. Aux danses violentes dans les églises en ruine succédèrent les bals de Ruggieri, de Luquet, de Wenzel, de Mauduit, de la Montansier; aux graves citoyennes qui faisaient de la charpie succédèrent les sultanes, les sauvages, les nymphes; aux pieds nus des soldats couverts de sang, de boue et de poussière succédèrent les pieds nus des femmes ornés de diamants; en même temps que l'impudeur, l'improbité reparut; il y eut en haut les fournisseurs et en bas «la petite pègre»; un fourmillement du filous emplit Paris, et chacun dut veiller sur son «luc», c'est-à-dire sur son portefeuille; un des passe-temps était d'aller voir, place du Palais-de-Justice, les voleuses au tabouret, on était obligé de leur lier les jupes; à la sortie des théâtres, des gamins offraient des cabriolets en disant: Citoyen et citoyenne, il y a place pour deux; on ne criait plus le Vieux Cordelier et l'Ami du Peuple, on criait la Lettre de Polichinelle et la Pétition des Galopins: le marquis de Sade présidait la section des Piques, place Vendôme. La réaction était joviale et féroce; les Dragons de la Liberté de 92 renaissaient sous le nom de Chevaliers du Poignard. En même temps surgit sur les tréteaux ce type, Jocrisse. On eut les «merveilleuses», et au delà des merveilleuses les «inconcevables»; on jura par sa paole victimée et par sa paole vele; on recula de Mirabeau jusqu'à Bobèche. C'est ainsi que Paris va et vient: il est l'énorme pendule de la civilisation; il touche tour à tour un pôle et l'autre, les Thermopyles et Gomorrhe. Après 93 la révolution traversa une occultation singulière, le siècle sembla oublier de finir ce qu'il avait commencé, on ne sait quelle orgie s'interposa, prit le premier plan, fit reculer au second l'effrayante apocalypse, voila la vision démesurée, et éclata de rire après l'épouvante; la tragédie disparut dans la parodie, et au fond de l'horizon une fumée de carnaval effaça vaguement Méduse.

Mais en 93, où nous sommes, les rues de Paris avaient encore tout l'aspect grandiose et farouche des commencements. Elles avaient leurs orateurs, Varlet qui promenait une baraque roulante du haut de laquelle il haranguait les passants; leurs héros, dont un s'appelait, «le capitaine des bâtons ferrés»; leurs favoris, Guffroy, l'auteur du pamphlet Rougiff. Quelques-unes de ces popularités étaient malfaisantes; d'autres étaient saines. Une entre toutes était honnête et fatale; c'était celle de Cimourdain.

II. CIMOURDAIN

Cimourdain était une conscience pure, mais sombre. Il avait en lui l'absolu. Il avait été prêtre, ce qui est grave. L'homme peut, comme le ciel, avoir une sérénité noire; il suffit que quelque chose fasse eu lui la nuit. La prêtrise avait fait la nuit dans Cimourdain. Qui a été prêtre l'est.

Ce qui fait la nuit en nous peut laisser en nous les étoiles. Cimourdain était plein de vertus et de vérités, mais qui brillaient dans le ténèbres.

Son histoire était courte à faire. Il avait été curé de village et précepteur dans une grande maison; puis un petit héritage lui était venu, et il s'était fait libre.

C'était par-dessus tout un opiniâtre. Il se servait de la méditation comme on se sert d'une tenaille; il ne se croyait le droit de quitter une idée que lorsqu'il était arrivé au bout; il pensait avec acharnement. Il savait toutes les langues de l'Europe et un peu les autres; cet homme étudiait sans cesse, ce qui l'aidait à porter sa chasteté; mais rien de plus dangereux qu'un tel refoulement.

Prêtre, il avait, par orgueil, hasard ou hauteur d'âme, observé ses voeux; mais il n'avait pu garder sa croyance. La science avait démoli sa foi; le dogme s'était évanoui en lui. Alors, s'examinant, il s'était senti comme mutilé, et ne pouvant se défaire prêtre, il avait travaillé à se refaire homme; mais d'une façon austère; on lui avait ôté la famille, il avait adopté la patrie; on lui avait refusé une femme, il avait épousé l'humanité. Cette plénitude énorme, au fond, c'est le vide.

Ses parents, paysans, en le faisant prêtre, avaient voulu le faire sortir du peuple; il était rentré dans le peuple.

Et il y était rentré passionnément. Il regardait les souffrants avec une tendresse redoutable. De prêtre il était devenu philosophe, et de philosophe athlète. Louis XV vivait encore que déjà Cimourdain se sentait vaguement républicain. De quelle république? De la république de Platon peut-être, et peut-être aussi de la république de Dracon.

Défense lui était faite d'aimer, il s'était mis à haïr. Il haïssait les mensonges, la monarchie, la théocratie, son habit de prêtre; il haïssait le présent; et il appelait à grands cris l'avenir; il le pressentait, il l'entrevoyait d'avance, il le devinait effrayant et magnifique; il comprenait, pour le dénoûment de la lamentable misère humaine, quelque chose comme un vengeur qui serait un libérateur. Il adorait de loin la catastrophe.

En 1789, cette catastrophe était arrivée, et l'avait trouvé prêt. Cimourdain s'était jeté dans ce vaste renouvellement humain avec logique, c'est-à-dire, pour un esprit de sa trempe, inexorablement. La logique ne s'attendrit pas. Il avait vécu les grandes années révolutionnaires, et avait eu le tressaillement de tous ces souffles, 89, la chute de la Bastille, la fin du supplice des peuples; 90, le 19 juin, la fin de la féodalité; 91, Varennes, la fin de la royauté; 92, l'avènement de la république. Il avait vu se lever la révolution; il n'était pas homme à avoir peur de cette géante; loin de là, cette croissance de tout l'avait vivifié; et, quoique déjà presque vieux, il avait cinquante ans et un prêtre est plus vite vieux qu'un autre homme, — il s'était mis à croître, lui aussi. D'année en année, il avait regardé les évènements grandir, et il avait grandi comme eux. Il avait craint d'abord que la révolution n'avortât, il l'observait, elle avait la raison et le droit, il exigeait qu'elle eût le succès et, à mesure qu'elle effrayait, il se sentait rassuré. Il voulait que cette Minerve, couronnée des étoiles de l'avenir, fût aussi Pallas, et eût pour bouclier le masque aux serpents. Il voulait que son oeil divin pût au besoin jeter aux démons la lueur infernale, et leur rendre terreur pour terreur.

Il était arrivé ainsi à 93.

93 est la guerre de l'Europe contre la France et de la France contre Paris. Et qu'est-ce la révolution? C'est la victoire de la France sur l'Europe et de Paris sur la France. De là l'immensité de cette minute épouvantable, 93, plus grande que tout le reste du siècle.

Rien de plus tragique. L'Europe attaquant la France et la France attaquant

Paris. Drame qui a la stature de l'épopée.

93 est une année intense. L'orage est là dans toute sa colère et dans toute sa grandeur. Cimourdain s'y sentait à l'aise. Ce milieu éperdu, sauvage et splendide convenait à son envergure. Cet homme avait, comme l'aigle de mer, un profond calme intérieur, avec le goût du risque au dehors. Certaines natures ailées, farouches et tranquilles sont faites pour les grands vents. Les âmes de tempête, cela existe.

Il avait une pitié à part, réservée seulement aux misérables. Devant l'espèce de souffrance qui fait horreur, il se dévouait. Rien ne lui répugnait. C'était là son genre de bonté. Il était hideusement secourable, et divinement. Il cherchait les ulcères pour les baiser. Les belles actions laides à voir sont les plus difficiles à faire: il préférait celles-là. Un jour à l'Hôtel-Dieu, un homme allait mourir, étouffé par une tumeur à la gorge, abcès fétide, affreux, contagieux peut-être, et qu'il fallait vider sur-le-champ. Cimourdain était là; il appliqua sa bouche à la tumeur, la pompa, recrachant à mesure que sa bouche était pleine, vida l'abcès, et sauva l'homme. Comme il portait encore à cette époque son habit de prêtre, quelqu'un lui dit: — Si vous faisiez cela au roi, vous seriez évêque. — Je ne le ferais pas au roi, répondit Cimourdain. L'acte et la réponse le firent populaire dans les quartiers sombres de Paris.

Si bien qu'il faisait de ceux qui souffrent, qui pleurent et qui menacent ce qu'il voulait. A l'époque des colères contre les accapareurs, colères si fécondes en méprises, ce fut Cimourdain qui, d'un mot, empêcha le pillage d'un bateau chargé de savon sur le port Saint-Nicolas, et qui dissipa les attroupements furieux arrêtant les voitures à la barrière Saint-Lazare.

Ce fut lui qui, dix jours après le 10 août, mena le peuple jeter bas les statues des rois. En tombant elles tuèrent. Place Vendòme, une femme, Reine Violet, fut écrasée par Louis XIV au cou duquel elle avait mis une corde qu'elle tirait. Cette statue de Louis XIV avait été cent ans debout; elle avait été érigée le 12 août 1692; elle fut reversée le 12 août 1792. Place de la Concorde, un nommé Guinguerlot ayant appelé les démolisseurs: canailles! fut assommé sur le piédestal de Louis XV. La statue fut mise en pièces. Plus tard on en fit des sous. Le bras seul échappa; c'était le bras droit que Louis XV étendait avec un geste d'empereur romain. Ce fut sur la demande de Cimourdain que le peuple donna et qu'une députation porta ce bras à Latude, l'homme enterré trente-sept ans à la Bastille. Quand Latude, le carcan an cou, la chaîne au ventre, pourrissait vivant au fond de cette prison par ordre de ce roi dont la statue dominait Paris, qui lui eût dit que cette prison tomberait, que cette statue tomberait, qu'il sortirait du sépulcre et que la monarchie y entrerait, que lui, le prisonnier, il serait le maître de cette main de bronze qui avait signé son écrou, et que de ce roi de boue il ne resterait que ce bras d'airain?

Cimourdain était de ces hommes qui ont en eux une voix, et qui l'écoutent.

Ces hommes-là semblent distraits; point; ils sont attentifs.

Cimourdain savait tout et ignorait tout. Il savait tout de la science et ignorait tout de la vie. De là sa rigidité. Il avait les yeux bandés comme la Thémis d’Homère. Il avait la certitude aveugle de la flèche qui ne voit que le but et qui y va. En révolution rien de redoutable comme la ligne droite. Cimourdain allait devant lui, fatal.

Cimourdain croyait que, dans les genèses sociales, le point extrême est le terrain solide; erreur propre aux esprits qui remplacent la raison par la logique. Il dépassait la Convention; il dépassait la Commune; il était de l’Evêché.

La réunion, dite l’Evêché, parce qu’elle tenait ses séances dans une salle du vieux palais épiscopal, était plutôt une complication d’hommes qu’une réunion. Là assistaient, comme à la Commune, ces spectateurs silencieux et significatifs qui avaient sur eux, comme dit Garat, «autant de pistolets que de poches». L’Evêché était un pêle-mêle étrange; pêle-mêle cosmopolite et parisien, ce qui ne s’exclut point, Paris étant le lieu où bat le coeur des peuples. Là était la grande incandescence plébéienne. Près de l’Evêché la Convention était froide et la Commune était tiède. L’Evêché était une de ces formations révolutionnaires, pareilles aux formations volcaniques; l’Evêché contenait de tout, de l’ignorance, de la bêtise, de la probité, de l’héroïsme, de la colère, et de la police. Brunswick y avait des agents. Il y avait là des hommes dignes de Sparte et des hommes dignes du bagne. La plupart étaient forcenés et honnêtes. La Gironde, par la bouche d’Isnard, président momentané de la Convention, avait dit un mot monstrueux: — Prenez garde, Parisiens. Il ne restera pas pierre sur pierre de notre ville, et l’on cherchera un jour la place où fut Paris. — Ce mot avait créé l’Evêché. Des hommes, et, nous venons de le dire, des hommes de toutes nations, avaient senti la nécessité de se serrer autour de Paris. Cimourdain s’était rallié à ce groupe.

Ce groupe réagissait contre les réacteurs. Il était né de ce besoin public de violence qui est le côté redoutable et mystérieux des révolutions. Fort de cette force, l’Evêché s’était tout de suite fait sa part. Dans les commotions de Paris, c’était la Commune qui tirait le canon, c’était l’Evêché qui sonnait le tocsin.

Cimourdain croyait, dans son ingénuité implacable, que tout est équité au service du vrai; ce qui le rendait propre à dominer les partis extrêmes. Les coquins le sentaient honnête, et étaient contents. Des crimes sont flattés d’être présidés par une vertu. Cela les gène, et leur plaît. Palloy, l’architecte qui avait exploité la démolition de la Bastille, vendant ces pierres à son profit, et qui chargé de badigeonner le cachot de Louis XVI, avait, par zèle, couvert le mur de barreaux, de chaînes et de carcans; Gonchon, l'orateur suspect du faubourg Saint-Antoine, dont on a retrouvé plus tard les quittances; Fournier, l'Américain qui, le 17 juillet, avait tiré sur Lafayette un coup de pistolet payé, disait-on, par Lafayette; Henriot, qui sortait de Bicètre, et qui avait été valet, saltimbanque, voleur et espion avant d'être général et de pointer des canons sur la Convention, La Reynie, l'ancien grand vicaire de Chartres, qui avait remplacé son bréviaire par le Père Duchêne, tous ces hommes étaient tenus en respect par Cimourdain, et, à de certains moments, pour empêcher les pires de broncher, il suffisait qu'ils sentissent en arrêt devant eux cette redoutable candeur convaincue. C'est ainsi que Saint-Just terrifiait Schneider. En même temps, la majorité de l'Evêché, composée surtout de pauvres et d'hommes violents, qui étaient bons, croyaient en Cimourdain et le suivait. I1 avait pour vicaire, ou pour aide de camp, comme on voudra, cet autre prêtre républicain, Danjou, que le peuple aimait pour sa haute taille et avait baptisé l'abbé Six-Pieds. Cimourdain eût mené où il eût voulu cet intrépide chef qu'on appelait le général la Pique, et ce hardi Trunchon, dit le Grand-Nicolas, qui avait voulu sauver madame Lamballe, et lui avait donné le bras et fait enjamber les cadavres; ce qui eût réussi sans la féroce plaisanterie du barbier Charlot.

La Commune surveillait la Convention, l'Evêché surveillait la Commune. Cimourdain, esprit droit et répugnant à l'intrigue, avait cassé plus d'un lit mystérieux, dans la main de Pache, que Beurnonville appelait «l'homme noir». Cimourdain, à l'Evêché, était de plain-pied avec tous. Il était consulté par Dobsent et Momoro. Il parlait espagnol à Gusman, italien à Pio, anglais à Arthur, flamand à Pereyra, allemand à l'Autrichien Proly, bâtard d'un prince. Il créait l'entente entre ces discordances. De là une situation obscure et forte, Hébert le craignait.

Cimourdain avait, dans ces temps et dans ces groupes tragiques, la puissance des inexorables. C'était un impeccable qui se croit infaillible. Personne ne l'avait vu pleurer. Vertu inaccessible et glaciale. Il était l'effrayant homme juste.

Pas de milieu pour un prêtre dans la révolution. Un prêtre ne pouvait se donner à la prodigieuse aventure flagrante que pour les motifs les plus bas ou les plus hauts; il fallait qu'il fût infâme ou qu'il fût sublime. Cimourdain était sublime, mais sublime dans l'isolement, dans l'escarpement, dans la lividité inhospitalière; sublime dans un entourage de précipices. Les hautes montagnes ont cette virginité sinistre.

Cimourdain avait l’apparence d’un homme ordinaire, vêtu de vêtements quelconques, d’aspect pauvre. Jeune, il avait été tonsuré; vieux, il était chauve. Le peu de cheveux qu’il avait étaient gris. Son front était large, et sur ce front il y avait pour l’observateur un signe. Cimourdain avait une façon de parler brusque, passionnée et solennelle, la voix brève, l’accent péremptoire, la bouche triste et amère, l’oeil clair et profond, et sur tout le visage on ne sait quel air indigné.

Tel était Cimourdain.

Personne aujourd’hui ne sait son nom. L’histoire a de ces inconnus terribles.

III. UN COIN NON TREMPÉ DANS LE STYX

Un tel homme était-il un homme? Le serviteur du genre humain pouvait-il avoir une affection? N'était-il pas trop une âme pour être un coeur? Cet embrassement énorme qui admettait tout et tous, pouvait-il se réserver à quelqu'un? Cimourdain pouvait-il aimer? Disons-le. Oui.

Etant jeune, et précepteur dans une maison presque princière, il avait eu un élève, fils et héritier de la maison, et il l'aimait. Aimer un enfant est si facile. Que ne pardonne-t-on pas à un enfant? On lui pardonne d'être seigneur, d'être prince, d'être roi. L'innocence de l'âge fait oublier les crimes de la race; la faiblesse de l'être fait oublier l'exagération du rang. Il est si petit qu'on lui pardonne d'être grand. L'esclave lui pardonne d'être le maître. Le vieillard nègre idolâtre le marmot blanc. Cimourdain avait pris en passion son élève. L'enfance a cela d'ineffable qu'on peut épuiser sur elle tous les amours. Tout ce qui pouvait aimer dans Cimourdain s'était abattu, pour ainsi dire, sur cet enfant; ce doux être innocent était devenu une sorte de proie pour ce cur condamné à la solitude. Il l'aimait de toutes les tendresses à la fois, comme père, comme frère, comme ami, comme créateur. C'était son fils; le fils, non de sa chair, mais de son esprit. Il n'était pas le père, et ce n'était pas son uvre; mais il était le maître, et c'était son chef-d'oeuvre. De ce petit seigneur, il avait fait un homme. Qui sait? un grand homme peut-être. Car tels sont les rêves. A l'insu de la famille, — a-t-on besoin de permission pour créer une intelligence, une volonté et une droiture? — il avait communiqué au jeune vicomte, son élève, tout le progrès qu'il avait en lui; il lui avait inoculé le virus redoutable de sa vertu; il lui avait infusé dans les veines sa conviction, sa conscience, son idéal; dans ce cerveau d'aristocrate, il avait versé l'âme du peuple.

L'esprit allaite, l'intelligence est une mamelle. Il y a analogie entre la nourrice qui donne son lait et le précepteur qui donne sa pensée. Quelquefois le précepteur est plus père que le père, de même que souvent la nourrice est plus mère que la mère.

Cette profonde paternité spirituelle liait Cimourdain à son élève. La seule vue de cet enfant l'attendrissait.

Ajoutons ceci: remplacer le père était facile, l'enfant n'en avait plus; il était orphelin; son père était mort, sa mère était morte; il n'avait pour veiller sur lui qu'une grand-mère aveugle et un grand-oncle absent. La grand-mère mourut; le grand-oncle, chef de la famille, homme d'épée et de grande seigneurie, pourvu de charges à la cour, fuyait le vieux donjon de famille, vivait à Versailles, allait aux armés, et laissait l'orphelin seul dans le château solitaire. Le précepteur était donc le maître, dans toute l'acception du mot.

Ajoutons ceci encore: Cimourdain avait vu naître l'enfant qui avait été son élève. L'enfant, orphelin tout petit, avait eu une maladie grave. Cimourdain, en ce danger de mort, l'avait veillé jour et nuit; c'est le médecin qui soigne, c'est le garde-malade qui sauve, et Cimourdain avait sauvé l'enfant. Non seulement son élève lui avait dû l'éducation, l'instruction, la science; mais il lui avait dû la convalescence et la santé; non seulement son élève lui devait de penser, mais il lui devait de vivre. Ceux qui nous doivent tout on les adore; Cimourdain adorait cet enfant.

L'écart naturel de la vie s'était fait. L'éducation finie, Cimourdain avait, du quitter l'enfant devenu jeune homme. Avec quelle froide et inconsciente cruauté; ces séparations-là se font! Comme les familles congédient tranquillement le précepteur qui laisse sa pensée dans un enfant et la nourrice qui y laisse ses entrailles! Cimourdain, payé et mis dehors, était sorti du monde d'en haut et rentré dans le monde d'en bas; la cloison entre les grands et les petit s'était renfermée jeune seigneur, officier de naissance et fait d'emblée capitaine, était parti pour une garnison quelconque; l'humble précepteur, déjà au fond de son coeur prêtre insoumis, s'était hâté de redescendre dans cet obscur rez-de-chaussée de l'église qu'on appelait le bas clergé: et Cimourdain avait perdu de vue son élève.

La révolution était venue; le souvenir de cet être dont il avait fait un homme avait continué de couver en lui, caché, mais non éteint, par l'immensité des choses publiques.

Modeler une statue et lui donner la vie, c'est beau; modeler une intelligence et lui donner la vérité, c'est plus beau encore. Cimourdain était le Pygmalion d'une âme.

Un esprit peut avoir un enfant.

Cet élève, cet enfant, cet orphelin, était le seul être qu'il aimât sur la terre.

Mais, même dans une telle affection, un tel homme était-il vulnérable?

On va le voir.

LIVRE DEUXIÈME

LE CABARET DE LA RUE DE PAON

I. MINOS, ÉAQUE ET RADAMANTE

Il y avait rue du Paon un cabaret qu’on appelait café. Ce café avait une arrière-chambre, aujourd’hui historique. C’était là que se rencontraient parfois à peu près secrètement, des hommes tellement puissants et tellement surveillés qu’ils hésitaient à se parler en public. C’était là qu’avait été échangé, le 25 octobre 1792, un baiser fameux entre la Montagne et la Gironde. C’était là que Garat, bien qu’il n’en convienne pas dans ses Mémoires, était venu aux renseignements dans cette nuit lugubre où, après avoir mis Clavière en sûreté rue de Beaune, il arrêta sa voiture sur le Pont-Royal pour écouter le tocsin.

Le 28 juin 1793, trois hommes étaient réunis autour d’une table dans cette arrière-chambre. Leurs chaises ne se touchaient pas: ils étaient assis chacun à un des côtés de la table, laissant vide le quatrième. Il était environ huit heures du soir; il faisait jour encore dans la rue, mais il faisait nuit dans l’arrière-chambre, et un quinquet accroché au plafond, luxe d’alors, éclairait la table.

Le premier de ces trois hommes était pâle, jeune, grave, avec les lèvres minces et le regard froid. Il avait dans la joue un tic nerveux qui devait le gêner pour sourire. Il était poudré, ganté, brossé, boutonné. Son habit bleu clair ne faisait pas un pli. Il avait une culotte de nankin, des bas blancs, une haute cravate, un jabot plissé, des souliers à boucles d’argent. Les deux autres hommes étaient, l’un une espèce de géant, l’autre une espèce de nain. Le grand, débraillé dans un vaste habit de drap écarlate, le col nu dans une cravate dénouée tombant plus bas que le jabot, la veste ouverte avec des boutons arrachés, était botté de bottes à revers et avait les cheveux tout hérissés, quoiqu’on y vit un reste de coiffure et d’apprêt: il y avait de la crinière dans sa perruque. Il avait la petite vérole sur la face, une ride de colère entre les sourcils, le pli de la bonté au coin de la bouche, les lèvres épaisses, les dents grandes, un poing de portefaix, l’oeil éclatant. Le petit était un homme jaune qui, assis, semblait difforme: il avait la tête renversée en arrière, les yeux injectés de sang, des plaques livides sur le visage, un mouchoir noué sur ses cheveux gras et plats, pas de front, une bouche énorme et terrible. Il avait un pantalon à pied, de larges souliers, un gilet qui semblait avoir été de satin blanc, et par-dessus ce gilet une rouppe dans les plis de laquelle une ligne dure et droite laissait deviner un poignard.

Le premier de ces hommes s'appelait Robespierre, le second Danton, le troisième Marat.

Ils étaient seuls dans cette salle. Il y avait devant Danton un verre et une bouteille de vin couverte de poussière, rappelant la choppe de bière de Luther, devant Marat une tasse de café, devant Robespierre des papiers.

Auprès des papiers on voyait un de ces lourds encriers de plomb, ronds et striés, que se rappellent ceux qui étaient écoliers au commencement de ce siècle. Une plume était jetée à côté de l'écritoire. Sur les papiers était posé un gros cachet de cuivre sur lequel on lisait Palloy fecil, et qui figurait un petit modèle exact de la Bastille.

Une carte de France était étalée au milieu de la table.

A la porte et dehors se tenait le chien de garde de Marat, ce Laurent Basse, commissionnaire du numéro 18 de la rue des Cordeliers, qui, le 15 juillet, environ quinze jours après ce 28 juin, devait asséner un coup de chaise sur la tête d'une femme nommée Charlotte Corday, laquelle en ce moment-là était à Caen, songeant vaguement. Laurent Basse était le porteur d'épreuves de l'Ami du peuple. Ce soir-là, amené par son maître au café de la rue du Paon, il avait la consigne de tenir fermée la salle où étaient Marat, Danton et Robespierre, et de n'y laisser pénétrer personne, à moins que ce ne fût quelqu'un du comité de salut public, de la Commune ou de l'Evêché.

Robespierre ne voulait pas fermer la porte à Saint-Just, Danton ne voulait pas la fermer à Pache, Marat ne voulait pas la fermer à Gusman.

La conférence durait depuis longtemps déjà. Elle avait pour sujet les papiers étalés sur la table et dont Robespierre avait donné lecture. Les voix commençaient à s'élever. Quelque chose comme de la colère grondait entre ces trois hommes. Du dehors ou entendait par moments des éclats de parole. A cette époque l'habitude des tribunes publiques semblait avoir créé le droit d'écouter. C'était le temps où l'expéditionnaire Fabricius Pâris regardait par le trou de la serrure ce que faisait le comité de salut public. Ce qui, soit dit en passant, ne fut pas inutile, car ce fut ce Pâris qui avertit Danton la nuit du 30 au 31 mars 1794. Laurent Basse avait appliqué son oreille contre la porte de l'arrière-salle où étaient Danton, Marat et Robespierre. Laurent Basse servait Marat, mais il était de l'Evêché.

II. MAGNA TESTANTUR VOCE PER UMBRAS

Danton venait de se lever; il avait vivement reculé sa chaise.

— Ecoutez, cria-t-il. Il n'y a qu'une urgence, la république en danger. Je ne connais qu'une chose, délivrer la France de l'ennemi. Pour cela tous les moyens sont bons. Tous! Tous! tous! Quand j'ai affaire à tous les périls, j'ai recours à toutes les ressources, et quand je crains tout, je brave tout. Ma pensée est une lionne. Pas de demi-mesures, pas de pruderie en révolution. Némésis n'est pas une bégueule. Soyons épouvantables, et utiles. Est-ce que l'éléphant regarde où il met sa patte? Ecrasons l'ennemi.

Robespierre répondit avec douceur:

— Je veux bien.

Et il ajouta:

— La question est de savoir où est l'ennemi.

— Il est dehors et je l'ai chassé, dit Danton.

— Il est dedans, et je le surveille, dit Robespierre.

— Et je le chasserai encore, reprit Danton.

— On ne chasse pas l'ennemi du dedans.

— Qu'est-ce donc qu'on fait?

— On l'extermine.

— J'y consens, dit à son tour Danton.

Et il reprit:

— Je vous dis qu'il est dehors, Robespierre.

— Danton, je vous dis qu'il est dedans.

— Robespierre, il est à la frontière.

— Danton, il est en Vendée.

— Calmez-vous, dit une troisième voix, il est partout; et vous êtes perdus.

C'était Marat qui parlait.

Robespierre regarda Marat et repartit tranquillement:

— Trêve aux généralités. Je précise. Voici des faits.

— Pédant! grommela Marat.

Robespierre posa la main sur les papiers étalés devant lui et continua:

— Je viens de vous lire les dépêches de Prieur de la Marne. Je viens de vous communiquer les renseignements donnés par ce Gélambre. Danton, écoutez, la guerre étrangère n'est rien, la guerre civile est tout. La guerre étrangère, c’est une écorchure qu’on a au coude; la guerre civile, C’est l’ulcère qui vous mange le foie. De tout ce que je viens de vous lire, il résulte ceci: la Vendée, jusqu’à ce jour éparse entre plusieurs chefs, est au moment de se concentrer. Elle va désormais avoir un capitaine unique…

— Un brigand central, murmura Danton.

— C’est, poursuivit Robespierre, l’homme débarqué près de Pontorson le 2 juin. Vous avez vu ce qu’il est. Remarquez que ce débarquement coïncide avec l’arrestation des représentants en mission, Prieur de la Côte-d’Or et Romme à Bayeux, par ce district traître du Calvados, le 2 juin, le même jour.

— Et leur translation au château de Caen, dit Danton. Robespierre reprit:

— Je continue de résumer les dépêches. La guerre de forêt s’organise sur une vaste échelle. En même temps une descente anglaise se prépare; vendéens et anglais, c’est Bretagne avec Bretagne. Les hurons du Finistère parlent la même langue que les topinambous de Cornouailles. J’ai mis sous vos yeux une lettre interceptée de Puisaye où il est dit que «vingt mille habits rouges distribués aux insurgés en feront lever cent mille». Quand l’insurrection paysanne sera complète, la descente anglaise se fera. Voici le plan. Suivez-le sur la carte.

Robespierre posa le doigt sur la carte, et poursuivi:

— Les anglais ont le choix du point de descente, de Cancale à Paimpol. Craig préférerait la baie de Saint-Brieuc, Cornwallis la baie de Saint-Cast. C’est un détail. La rive gauche de la Loire est gardée par l’armée vendéenne royale, et, quant aux vingt-huit lieues à découvert entre Ancenis et Pontorson, quarante paroisses normandes ont promis leur concours. La descente se fera sur trois points, Plérin, Iffiniac et Pléneuf; de Plérin on ira à Saint-Brieuc, et de Pléneuf à Lamballe; le deuxième jour on gagnera Dinan où il y a neuf cents prisonniers anglais, et l’on occupera en même temps Saint-Jouan et Saint-Méen; on y laissera de la cavalerie; le troisième jour, deux colonnes se dirigeront l’une de Jouan sur Bédée, l’autre de Dinan sur Becherel qui est une forteresse naturelle, et où l’on établira deux batteries; le quatrième jour, on est à Rennes. Rennes, c’est la clef de la Bretagne. Qui a Rennes a tout. Rennes prise, Châteanneuf et Saint-Malo tombent. Il y a à Rennes un million de cartouches et cinquante pièces d’artillerie de campagne…

— Qu’ils rafleraient, murmura Danton.

Robespierre continua:

— Je termine. De Rennes, trois colonnes se jetteront l’une sur Fougères, l’autre sur Vitré, l’autre sur Redon. Comme les ponts sont coupés, les ennemis se muniront, vous avez vu ce fait précisé, de pontons et de madriers, et ils auront des guides pour les points guéables à la cavalerie. De Fougères on rayonnera sur Avranches, de Bedon Sur Ancenis, de Vitré sur Laval. Nantes se rendra, Brest se rendra. Redon donne tout le cours de la Vilaine, Fougères donne la route de Normandie, Vitré donne la route de Paris. Dans quinze jours, on aura une armée de brigands de trois cent mille hommes, et toute la Bretagne sera au roi de France.

— C’est-à-dire au roi d’Angleterre, dit Danton.

— Non. Au roi de France.

Et Robespierre ajouta:

— Le roi de France est pire. Il faut quinze jours pour chasser l’étranger, et dix-huit cents ans pour éliminer la monarchie.

Danton, qui s’était rassis, mit ses coudes sur la table et sa tête dans ses mains, rêveur.

— Vous voyez le péril, dit Robespierre. Vitré donne la route de Paris aux

Anglais.

Danton redressa le front et abattit ses deux grosses mains crispés sur la carte, comme sur une enclume.

— Robespierre, est-ce que Verdun ne donnait pas la route de Paris aux prussiens?

Eh bien?

— Eh bien, on chassera les anglais comme on a chassé les prussiens.

Et Danton se leva de nouveau.

Robespierre posa sa main froide sur le poing fièvreux de Danton.

— Danton, la Champagne n’était pas pour les prussiens, et la Bretagne est pour les anglais. Reprendre Verdun, c’est de la guerre étrangère; reprendre Vitré, c’est de la guerre civile.

— Et Robespierre murmura avec un accent froid et profond:

— Sérieuse différence.

Il reprit:

— Rasseyez-vous, Danton, et regardez la carte au lieu de lui donner des coups de poing.

Mais Danton était tout à sa pensée.

— Voilà qui est fort! s'écria-t-il, de voir la catastrophe à l'ouest quand elle est à l'est. Robespierre, je vous accorde que l'Angleterre se dresse sur l'Océan; mais l'Espagne se dresse aux Pyrénées, mais l'Italie se dresse aux Alpes, mais l'Allemagne se dresse sur le Rhin. Et le grand ours russe est au fond. Robespierre, le danger est un cercle et nous sommes dedans. A l'extérieur la coalition, à l'intérieur la trahison. Au midi Servant entre-bâille la porte de la France au roi d'Espagne, an nord Dumouriez passe à l'ennemi. Au reste il avait toujours moins menacé la Hollande que Paris. Nerwinde efface Jemmapes et Valmy. Le philosophe Rabaut Saint-Etienne, traître comme un protestant qu'il est, correspond avec le courtisan Montesquieu. L'armée est décimée. Pas un bataillon qui ait maintenant plus de quatre cents hommes; le vaillant régiment de Deux-Ponts est réduit à cent cinquante hommes; le camp de Pamars est livré; il ne reste plus à Givet que cinq cents sacs de farine; nous rétrogradons sur Landau; Wurmser presse Kléber; Mayence succombe vaillamment, Condé lâchement. Valenciennes aussi. Ce qui n'empêche pas Chancel qui défend Valenciennes et le vieux Férand qui défend Condé d'être deux héros, aussi bien que Meunier qui défendait Mayence. Mais tous les autres trahissent. Dharville trahit à Aix-la-Chapelle, Manton trahit à Bruxelles, Valence trahit à Bréda, Neuilly trahit à Limbourg, Miranda trahit à Maëstrich: Stengel, traître, Lanoue, traître, Ligonier, traître, Menon traître, Dillon, traître; monnaie hideuse de Dumouriez. Il faut des exemples. Les contre-marches de Custine me sont suspectes; je soupçonne Custine de préférer la prise lucrative de Francfort à la prise utile de Coblentz. Francfort peut payer quatre millions de contributions de guerre, soit. Qu'est-ce que cela à côté du nid des émigrés écrasé? Trahison, dis-je. Meunier est mort le 13 juin. Voilà Kléber seul. En attendant, Brunswick grossit et avance. Il arbore le drapeau allemand sur toutes les places françaises qu'il prend. Le margrave de Brandebourg est aujourd'hui l'arbitre de l'Europe; empoche nos provinces; il s'adjugera la Belgique, vous verrez; on dirait que c'est pour Berlin que nous travaillons; si cela continue, et si nous n'y mettons ordre, la révolution française se sera faite au profit de Potsdam, elle aura eu pour unique résultat d'agrandir le petit état de Frédéric II, et nous aurons tué le roi de France pour le roi de Prusse.

Et Danton, terrible, éclata de rire.

Le rire de Danton fit sourire Marat.

— Vous avez chacun votre dada; vous, Danton, la Prusse; vous, Robespierre, la Vendée. Je vais préciser, moi aussi. Vous ne voyez pas le vrai péril; le voici: les cafés et les tripots. Le café de Choiseul est jacobin, le café Patin est royaliste, le café du Rendez-vous attaque la garde nationale, le café de la Porte-Saint-Martin la défend, le café de la Régence est contre Brissot, le café Corazza est pour, le café Procope jure par Diderot, le café du Théâtre-Français jure par Voltaire, à la Rotonde on déchire les assignats, les cafés Saint-Marceau sont en fureur, le café Manouri agite la question des farines, au café de Foy tapages et gourmades, au Perron bourdonnement des frelons de finances. Voilà ce qui est sérieux.

Danton ne riait plus. Marat souriait toujours. Sourire de nain pire qu’un rire de colosse.

— Vous moquez-vous, Marat? gronda Danton.

Marat eut ce mouvement de hanche convulsif, qui était célèbre. Son sourire s’était effacé.

— Ah! je vous retrouve, citoyen Danton. C’est bien vous qui en pleine Convention m’avez appelé «l’individu Marat». Ecoutez. Je vous pardonne. Nous traversons un moment imbécile. Ah! je me moque! En effet, quel homme suis-je? J’ai dénoncé Chazot, j’ai dénoncé Pétion, j’ai dénoncé Kersaint, j’ai dénoncé Moreton, j’ai dénoncé Dufriche-Valazé, j’ai dénoncé Ligonnier, j’ai dénoncé Menou, j’ai dénoncé Banneville, j’ai dénoncé Gensonné, j’ai dénoncé Biron, j’ai dénoncé Lidon et Chambon; ai-je eu tort? je flaire la trahison dans le traître, et je trouve utile de dénoncer le criminel avant le crime. J’ai l’habitude de dire la veille ce que vous autres vous dites le lendemain. Je suis l’homme qui a proposé à l’assemblée un plan complet de législation criminelle. Qu’ai-je fait jusqu’à présent? J’ai demandé qu’on instruise les sections afin de les discipliner à la révolution, j’ai fait lever les scellés des trente-deux cartons, j’ai réclamé les diamants déposés dans les mains de Boland, j’ai prouvé que les brissotins avaient donné au comité de sûreté générale des mandats d’arrêt en blanc, j’ai signalé les omissions du rapport de Lindet sur les crimes de Capet, j’ai voté le supplice du tyran dans les vingt-quatre heures, j’ai défendu les bataillons le Manconseil et le Républicain, j’ai empêché la lecture de la lettre de Narbonne et de Malhouet, j’ai fait une motion pour les soldats blessés, j’ai fait supprimer la commission des six, j’ai pressenti dans l’affaire de Mons la trahison de Dumouriez, j’ai demandé qu’on prit cent mille parents d’émigrés comme otages pour les commissaires livrés à l’ennemi, j’ai proposé de déclarer traître tout représentant qui passerait les barrières, j'ai démasqué la faction rolandine dans les troubles de Marseille, j'ai insisté pour qu'on mit à prix la tête d'Egalité fils, j'ai défendu Bouchotte, j'ai voulu l'appel nominal pour chasser Isnard du fauteuil, j'ai fait déclarer que les parisiens ont bien mérité de la patrie; c'est pourquoi je suis traité de pantin par Louvet, le Ministère demande qu'on m'expulse, la ville de Loudun souhaite qu'on m'exile, la ville d'Amiens désire qu'on me mette une muselière, Cobourg veut qu'on m'arrête, et Lecointe-Puyraveau propose à la Convention de me décréter fou. Ah ça! citoyen Danton, pourquoi m'avez-vous fait venir à votre conciliabule, si ce n'est pour avoir mon avis? Est-ce que je vous demandais d'en être? loin de là. Je n'ai aucun goût pour les tête-à-tête avec des contre-révolutionnaires tels que Robespierre et vous. Du reste, je devais m'y attendre, vous ne m'avez pas compris; pas plus vous que Robespierre, pas plus Robespierre que vous. Il n'y a donc pas d'homme, d'état ici? Il faut donc vous faire épeler la politique, il faut donc vous mettre les points sur les i? Ce que je vous ai dit voulait dire ceci: Vous vous trompez tous les deux. Le danger n'est ni à Londres, comme le croit Robespierre, ni à Berlin comme le croit Danton; il est à Paris. Il est dans l'absence d'unité, dans le droit qu'a chacun de tirer de son côté, à commencer par vous deux, dans la mise en poussière des esprits, dans l'anarchie des volontés…

— L'anarchie! interrompit Danton, qui la fait, si ce n'est vous?

Marat ne s'arrêta pas.

— Robespierre, Danton, le danger est dans ce tas de cafés, dans ce tas de brelans, dans ce tas de clubs, club des Noirs, club des Fédérés, club des Dames, club des Impartiaux, qui date de Clermont-Tonnerre et qui a été le club monarchique de 1790, cercle social imaginé par le prêtre Claude Fauchet, club des Bonnets de laine fondé par le gazetier Prudhomme, et Coetera; sans compter votre club des Cordeliers, Danton. Le danger est, dans la famine, qui fait que le porte-sacs Blin a accroché à la lanterne de l'Hôtel-de-ville le boulanger du marché Palu, François Denis, et dans la justice, qui a pendu le porte-sacs Blin pour avoir pendu le boulanger Denis. Le danger est dans le papier-monnaie qu'on déprécie. Rue du Temple, un assignat de cent francs est tombé à terre, et un passant, un homme du peuple, a dit: Il ne vaut pas la peine d'être ramassé. Les agioteurs et les accapareurs, voilà le danger. Arborer le drapeau noir à l'Hôtel-de-Ville, la belle avance! Vous arrêtez le baron de Trenck, cela ne suffit pas. Tordez-moi le cou à ce vieil intrigant de prison. Vous croyez vous tirer d'affaire parce que le président de la Convention pose une couronne civique sur la tête de Labertèche, qui a reçu quarante et un coups de sabre à Jemmapes, et dont Chénier se fait le cornac? Comédies et batelages. Ah! vous ne regardez pas Paris! Ah! Vous cherchez le danger loin, quand il est près! A quoi vous sert votre police, Robespierre? Car vous avez vos espions, Payan, à la Commune, Coffinhal, au tribunal révolutionnaire, David, au comité de sûreté générale, Couthon, au comité de salut public. Vous voyez que je suis bien informé. Eh bien, sachez ceci: le danger est sur vos têtes, le danger est sous vos pieds; on conspire, on conspire, on conspire; les passants dans les rues s'entre-lisent les journaux et se font des signes de tête; six mille hommes, sans cartes de civisme, émigrés rentrés, muscadins et mathevons, sont cachés dans les caves et dans les greniers, et dans les galeries de bois du Palais-Royal; on fait queue chez les boulangers; les bonnes femmes, sur le pas des portes, joignent les mains et disent: Quand aura-t-on la paix? Vous avez beau aller vous enfermer, pour être entre vous, dans la salle du conseil exécutif, on sait tout ce que vous y dites; et la preuve, Robespierre, c'est que voici les paroles que vous avez dites hier soir à Saint-Just: «Barbaroux commence à prendre du ventre, cela va le gêner dans sa fuite.» Oui, le danger est partout, et surtout au centre, à Paris. Les ci-devant complotent, les patriotes vont pieds nus, les aristocrates arrêtés le 9 mars sont déjà relâchés, les chevaux de luxe qui devraient être attelés aux canons sur la frontière nous éclaboussent dans les rues, le pain de quatre livres vaut trois francs douze sous, les théâtres jouent des pièces impures, et Robespierre fera guillotiner Danton.

— Ouiche! dit Danton.

Robespierre regardait attentivement la carte.

— Ce qu'il faut, cria brusquement Marat, c'est un dictateur. Robespierre, vous savez que je veux un dictateur.

Robespierre releva la tête.

— Je sais, Marat, vous ou moi.

— Moi ou vous, dit Marat.

Danton grommela entre ses dents:

— La dictature, touchez-y!

Marat vit le froncement de sourcil de Danton.

— Tenez, reprit-il. Un dernier effort. Mettons-nous d'accord. La situation en vaut la peine. Ne nous sommes-nous déjà pas mis d'accord pour la journée du 31 mai? La question d'ensemble est plus grave encore que le girondinisme qui est une question de détail. Il y a du vrai dans ce que vous dites; mais le vrai, tout le vrai, le vrai vrai, c'est ce que je dis. Au midi, le fédéralisme; à l'ouest, le royalisme; à Paris, le duel de la Convention et de la Commune; aux frontières, la reculade de Custine et la trahison de Dumouriez. Qu'est-ce que tout cela? Le démembrement. Que nous faut-il? L'unité. Là est le salut. Mais hâtons-nous. Il faut que Paris prenne le gouvernement de la révolution. Si nous perdons une heure demain les vendéens peuvent être à Orléans les prussiens à Paris. Je vous accorde ceci, Danton, je vous concède cela, Robespierre. Soit. Eh bien, la conclusion, c'est la dictature. A nous trois nous représentons la révolution. Nous sommes les trois têtes de Cerbère. De ces trois tètes, l'une parle, c'est vous, Robespierre; l'autre rugit, vous, Danton….

— L'autre mord, dit Danton, c'est vous, Marat.

— Toutes trois mordent, dit Robespierre.

Il y eut un silence. Puis le dialogue, plein de secousses sombres, recommença.

— Ecoutez, Marat, avant de s'épouser, il faut se connaître. Comment avez-vous su le mot que j'ai dit hier à Saint-Just?

— Ceci me regarde, Robespierre.

— Marat!

— C'est mon devoir de m'éclairer, et c'est mon affaire de me renseigner.

— Marat!

— J'aime à savoir.

— Marat!

— Robespierre, je sais ce que vous dites à Saint-Just, comme je sais ce que Danton dit à Lacroix; comme je sais ce qui se passe quai des Théatins, à l'hôtel de Labriffe, repaire où se rendent les nymphes de l'émigration; comme je sais ce qui se passe dans la maison des Thilles, près Gonesse, qui est à Valmerange, l'ancien administrateur des postes, où allaient jadis Maury et Cazales, où sont allés depuis Sieyès et Vergniaud, et où, maintenant, on va une fois par semaine.

En prononçant cet on, Marat regarda Danton.

Danton s'écria:

— Si j'avais deux liards de pouvoir, ce serait terrible.

Marat poursuivit:

— Je sais ce que vous dites, Robespierre, comme je sais ce qui se passait à la tour du Temple quand on y engraissait Louis XVI, si bien que, seulement dans le mois de septembre, le loup, la louve et les louveteaux ont mangé quatre-vingt-six paniers de pêches. Pendant ce temps-là le peuple est affamé. Je sais cela, comme je sais que Roland a été caché dans un logis donnant sur une arrière-cour, rue de la Harpe; comme je sais que six cents des piques du 14 juillet avaient eté fabriquées par Faure, serrurier du duc d'Orléans; comme je sais ce qu'on fait chez la Saint-Hilaire, maîtresse de Sillery; les jours de bal, c'est le vieux Sillery qui frotte lui-même, avec de la craie, les parquets du salon jaune de la rue Neuve-des-Mathurins; Buzot et Kersaint y dînaient. Saladin y a dîné le 27, et avec qui, Robespierre? Avec votre ami, Lasource.

— Verbiage, murmura Robespierre. Lasource n'est pas mon ami.

Et il ajouta, pensif:

— En attendant il y a à Londres dix-huit fabriques de faux assignats.

Marat continua d'une voix tranquille, mais avec un léger tremblement, qui était effrayant:

— Vous êtes la faction des importants. Oui, je sais tout, malgré ce que

Saint-Just appelle le silence d'état…

Marat souligna ce mot par l'accent, regarda Robespierre, et poursuivit:

— Je sais ce qu'on dit à votre table les jours où Lebas invite David à venir manger la cuisine faite par sa promise, Elisabeth Duplay, votre future belle-soeur, Robespierre. Je suis l'oeil énorme du peuple, et, du fond de ma cave, je regarde. Oui, je vois, oui, j'entends, oui, je sais. Les petites choses vous suffisent. Vous vous admirez. Robespierre se fait contempler par sa madame de Chalabre, la fille de ce marquis de Chalabre qui fit le whist avec Louis XV le soir de l'exécution de Damiens. Oui, on porte haut la tète. Saint-Just habite une cravate. Legendre est correct, lévite neuve et gilet blanc, et un jabot, pour faire oublier son tablier. Robespierre s'imagine que l'histoire voudra savoir qu'il avait une redingote olive à la Constituante et un habit bleu-ciel à la Convention. Il a son portrait sur tous les murs de sa chambre…

Robespierre interrompit d'une voix plus calme encore que celle de Marat.

— Et vous, Marat, vous avez le vôtre dans tous les égouts.

Ils continuèrent sur un ton de causerie dont la lenteur accentuait la violence des répliques et des ripostes, et ajoutait on ne sait quelle ironie à la menace.

— Robespierre, vous avez qualifié ceux qui veulent le renversement des trônes, les Don Quichottes du genre humain.

— Et vous, Marat, après le 4 août, dans votre numéro 559 de l'Ami du Peuple, ah! j'ai retenu le chiffre, c'est utile, vous avez demandé qu'on rendît aux nobles leurs titres. Vous avez dit: Un duc est toujours un duc.

— Robespierre, dans la séance du 7 décembre, vous avez défendu la femme Roland contre Viard.

— De même que mon frère vous a défendu, Marat, quand on vous a attaqué aux Jacobins. Qu'est-ce que cela prouve? rien.

— Robespierre, on connaît le cabinet des Tuileries où vous avez dit à Garat: Je suis las de la Révolution.

— Marat, c'est ici, dans ce cabaret, que, le 29 octobre, vous avez embrassé Barbaroux.

— Robespierre, vous avez dit à Buzot: La république, qu'est-ce que Cela?

— Marat, c'est dans ce cabaret que vous avez invité à déjeuner trois Marseillais par compagnie.

— Robespierre, vous vous faites escorter d'un fort de la halle armé d'un bâton.

— Et vous, Marat, la veille du 10 août, vous avez demandé à Buzot de vous aider à fuir à Marseille déguisé en jockey.

— Pendant les justices de septembre, vous vous êtes caché, Robespierre.

— Et vous, Marat, vous vous êtes montré.

— Robespierre, vous avez jeté à terre le bonnet rouge.

— Oui, quand un traître l'arborait. Ce qui pare Dumouriez souille Robespierre.

— Robespierre, vous avez refusé, pendant le passage des soldats de Chateauvieux, de couvrir d'un voile la tête de Louis XVI.

— J'ai fait mieux que lui voiler la tête, je la lui ai coupée.

Danton intervint, mais comme l'huile intervient dans le feu.

— Robespierre, Marat, dit-il, calmez-vous.

Marat n'aimait pas à être nommé le second. Il se retourna.

— De quoi se mêle Danton? dit-il.

Danton bondit.

— De quoi je me mêle? De ceci. Qu’il ne faut pas de fratricide; qu’il ne faut pas de lutte entre deux hommes qui servent le peuple; que c’est assez de la guerre étrangère, que c’est assez de la guerre civile, et que ce serait trop de la guerre domestique; que c’est moi qui ai fait la révolution, et que je ne veux pas qu’on la défasse. Voilà de quoi je me mêle.

Marat répondit sans élever la voix.

— Mêlez-vous de rendre vos comptes.

— Mes comptes! cria Danton. Allez les demander aux défilés de l’Argonne, à la Champagne délivrée, à la Belgique conquise, aux armées où j’ai été quatre fois déjà offrir ma poitrine à la mitraille! allez les demander à la place de la Révolution, à l’échafaud du 21 janvier, au trône jeté à terre, à la guillotine, cette veuve…

Marat interrompit Danton.

— La guillotine est une vierge; on se couche sur elle, on ne la féconde pas.

— Qu’en savez-vous? répliqua Danton, je la féconderais, moi!

— Nous verrons, dit Marat.

Et il sourit.

Danton vit ce sourire.

— Marat, cria-t-il, vous êtes l’homme caché, moi je suis l’homme du grand air et du grand jour. Je hais la vie reptile. Etre cloporte ne me va pas. Vous habitez une cave; moi j’habite la rue. Vous ne communiquez avec personne; moi, quiconque passe peut me voir et me parler.

— Joli garçon, voulez-vous monter chez moi? Grommela Marat.

Et cessant de sourire, il reprit d’un accent péremptoire:

— Danton, rendez compte des trente-trois mille écus, argent sonnant, que Montmorin vous a payés au nom du roi, sous prétexte de vous indemniser de votre charge de procureur au Châtelet.

— J’étais du 14 juillet, dit Danton avec hauteur.

— Et le garde-meuble? et les diamants de la couronne?

— J’étais du 6 octobre.

— Et les vols de votre alter ego Lacroix en Belgique?

— J’étais du 20 juin.

— Et les prêts faits à la Montansier?

— Je poussais le peuple au retour de Varennes.

— Et la salle de l’Opéra qu’on bâtit avec l’argent fourni par vous?

— J’ai armé les sections de Paris.

— Et les cent mille livres de fonds secrets du ministère de la justice?

— J’ai fait le 10 août.

— Et les deux millions de dépenses secrètes de l’Assemblée, dont vous avez pris le quart?

— J’ai arrêté l’ennemi en marche et barré le passage aux rois coalisés.

— Prostitué! dit Marat.

Danton se dressa, effrayant.

— Oui, cria-t-il, je suis une fille publique, j’ai vendu mon ventre, mais j’ai sauvé le monde.

Robespierre s’était remis à se ronger les ongles. Il ne pouvait, lui, ni rire, ni sourire. Le rire, éclair de Danton, et le sourire, piqûre de Marat, lui manquaient.

Danton reprit:

— Je suis comme l’océan; j’ai mon flux et mon reflux; à mer basse on voit ses bas-fonds, à mer haute on voit mes flots.

— Votre écume, dit Marat.

— Ma tempête, dit Danton.

En même temps que Danton, Marat s’était levé. Lui aussi éclate. Le couleuvre devint subitement dragon.

— Ah! cria-t-il, ah! Robespierre! ah! Danton! vous ne voulez pas m’écouter! Eh bien, je vous le dis, vous êtes perdus. Votre politique aboutit à des impossibilités d’aller plus loin; vous n’avez plus d’issue; et vous faites des choses qui ferment devant vous toutes les portes, excepté celle du tombeau.

— C’est notre grandeur, dit Danton.

Et il haussa les épaules.

Marat continua:

— Danton, prends garde. Vergniaud aussi a la bouche large et les lèvres épaisses et les sourcils en colère, Vergniaud aussi est grêlé comme Mirabeau et comme toi, cela n’a pas empêché le 31 mai. Ah! tu hausses les épaules. Quelquefois hausser les épaules fait tomber la tête. Danton, je te le dis, ta grosse voix, ta cravate lâche, tes bottes molles, tes petits soupers, tes grandes poches, cela regarde Louisette.

Louisette était le nom d’amitié que Marat donnait à guillotine.

Il poursuivit:

— Et quant à toi, Robespierre, tu es un modéré, mais cela ne te servira de rien. Va, poudre-toi, coiffe-toi, brosse-toi, fais le faraud, aie du linge, sois pincé, frisé, calamistré, tu n’en iras pas moins en place de Grève, lis la déclaration de Brunstwick, tu n’en sera pas moins traité comme le régicide Damiens, et tu es tiré à quatre épingles en attendant que tu sois tiré à quatre chevaux.

— Echo de Coblentz! dit Robespierre entre ses dents.

— Robespierre, je ne suis l’écho de rien, je suis le cri de tout. Ah! vous êtes jeunes, vous. Quel âge as-tu, Danton? trente-quatre ans. Quel âge as-tu, Robespierre? trente-trois ans. Eh bien, moi, j’ai toujours vécu, je suis la vieille souffrance humaine, j’ai six mille ans.

— C’est vrai, répliqua Danton, depuis six mille ans, Caïn s’est conservé dans la haine comme le crapaud dans la pierre, le bloc se casse, Caïn saute parmi les hommes, et c’est Marat.

— Danton! cria Marat. Et une lueur livide apparut dans ses yeux.

— Eh bien quoi? dit Danton.

Ainsi parlaient ces trois hommes formidables. Querelle de tonnerres.

III. TRESSAILLEMENT DES FIBRES PROFONDES

Le dialogue eut un répit; ces titans rentrèrent un moment chacun dans sa pensée.

Les lions s'inquiètent des hydres. Robespierre était devenu très pâle et Danton très rouge. Tous deux avaient un frémissement. La prunelle fauve de Marat s'était éteinte; le calme, un calme impérieux, s'était refait sur la face de cet homme, redouté des redoutables.

Danton se sentait vaincu, mais ne voulait pas se rendre. Il reprit:

— Marat parle très haut de dictature et d'unité, mais il n'a qu'une puissance, dissoudre.

Robespierre, desserrant ses lèvres étroites, ajouta:

— Moi, je suis de l'avis d'Anacharsis Cloots; je dis: Ni Roland, ni Marat.

— Et moi, répondit Marat, je dis: Ni Danton, ni Robespierre.

Il les regarda tous deux fixement et ajouta:

— Laissez-moi vous donner un conseil, Danton. Vous êtes amoureux, vous songez à vous remarier, ne vous mêlez plus de politique, soyez sage.

Et, reculant d'un pas vers la porte pour sortir, il leur fit ce salut sinistre:

— Adieu, messieurs.

Danton et Robespierre eurent un frisson.

En ce moment une voix s'éleva au fond de la salle, et dit:

— Tu as tort, Marat.

Tous se retournèrent. Pendant l'explosion de Marat, et sans qu'ils s'en fussent aperçus, quelqu'un était entré par la porte du fond.

— C'est toi, citoyen Cimourdain, dit Marat. Bonjour.

C'était Cimourdain en effet.

— Je dis que tu as tort, Marat, reprit-il.

Marat verdit, ce qui était sa façon de pâlir.

Cimourdain ajouta:

— Tu es utile, mais Robespierre et Danton sont nécessaires. Pourquoi les menacer? Union, union, citoyens! Le peuple veut qu'on soit uni.

Cette entrée fit un effet d’eau froide, et, comme l’arrivée d’un étranger dans une querelle de ménage, apaisa, sinon le fond, du moins la surface.

Cimourdain s’avança vers la table.

Danton et Robespierre le connaissaient. Ils avaient souvent remarqué dans les tribunes publiques de la Convention ce puissant homme obscur que le peuple saluait. Robespierre pourtant, formaliste, demanda:

— Citoyen, comment êtes-vous entré?

— Il est de l’Evêché, répondit Marat d’une voix où l’on sentait on ne sait quelle soumission.

Marat bravait la Convention, menait la Commune et craignait l’Evêché.

Ceci est une loi.

Mirabeau sent remuer à une profondeur inconnue Robespierre, Robespierre sent remuer Marat, Marat sent remuer Hébert, Hébert sent remuer Babeuf. Tant que les couches souterraines sont tranquilles, l’homme politique peut marcher; mais sous le plus révolutionnaire il y a un sous-sol, et les plus hardis s’arrêtent inquiets quand ils sentent sous leurs pieds le mouvement qu’ils ont créé sur leur tête.

Savoir distinguer le mouvement qui vient des convoitises du mouvement qui vient des principes, combattre l’un et seconder l’autre, c’est là le génie et la vertu des grands révolutionnaires.

Danton vit plier Marat.

— Oh! le citoyen Cimourdain n’est pas de trop, dit-il.

Et il tendit la main à Cimourdain.

Puis:

— Parbleu, dit-il, expliquons la situation au citoyen Cimourdain. Il vient à propos. Je représente la Montagne, Robespierre représente le comité de salut public, Marat représente la Commune, Cimourdain représente l’Evêché. Il va nous départager.

— Soit, dit Cimourdain, grave et simple. De quoi s’agit-il?

— De la Vendée, répondit Robespierre.

— La Vendée! dit Cimourdain.

Et il reprit:

— C’est la grande menace. Si la Révolution meurt, elle mourra par la Vendée. Une Vendée est plus redoutable que dix Allemagnes. Pour que la France vive, il faut tuer la Vendée.

Ces quelques mots lui gagnèrent Robespierre.

Robespierre pourtant fit cette question:

— N’êtes-vous pas un ancien prêtre?

L’air prêtre n’échappait pas à Robespierre. Il reconnaissait hors de lui ce qu’il avait au dedans de lui.

Cimourdain répondit:

— Oui, citoyen.

— Qu’est-ce que cela fait? s’écria Danton. Quand les prêtres sont bons, ils valent mieux que les autres. En temps de révolution, les prêtres se fondent en citoyens comme les cloches en sous et en canons. Danjou est prêtre, Daunou est prêtre. Thomas Lindet est évêque d’Evreux. Robespierre, vous vous asseyez à la Convention coude à coude avec Massieu, évêque de Beauvais. Le grand-vicaire Vaugeois était du comité d’insurrection du 10 août. Chabot est capucin. C’est dom Gerle qui a fait le serment du Jeu de paume; c’est l’abbé Audran qui a fait déclarer l’Assemblée nationale supérieure au roi; c’est l’abbé Goutte qui a demandé à la Législative qu’on ôtât le dais du fauteuil de Louis XVI; c’est l’abbé Grégoire qui a provoqué l’abolition de la royauté.

— Appuyé, ricana Marat, par l’histrion Collot-d’Herbois. A eux deux, il ont fait la besogne; le prêtre a renversé le trône, le comédien a jeté bas le roi.

— Revenons à la Vendée, dit Robespierre.

— Eh bien, demanda Cimourdain, qu’y a-t-il? qu’est-ce qu’elle fait, cette Vendée?

Robespierre répondit:

— Ceci: elle a un chef. Elle va devenir épouvantable.

— Qui est ce chef, citoyen Robespierre?

— C’est un ci-devant marquis de Lantenac, qui s’intitule prince breton.

Cimourdain fit un mouvement.

— Je le connais, dit-il. J’ai été prêtre chez lui.

Il songea un moment, et reprit:

— C’était un homme à femmes avant d’être un homme de guerre.

— Comme Biron qui a été Lauzun, dit Danton.

Et Cimourdain, pensif, ajouta:

— Oui, c’est un ancien homme de plaisir. Il doit être terrible.

— Affreux, dit Robespierre. Il brûle les villages, achève les blessés, massacre les prisonniers, fusille les femmes.

— Les femmes?

— Oui. Il a fait fusiller entre autres une mère de trois enfants. On ne sait ce que les enfants sont devenus. En outre, c’est un capitaine. Il sait la guerre.

— En effet, répondit Cimourdain. Il a fait la guerre de Hanovre, et les soldats disaient: Richelieu en dessus, Lantenac en dessous; c’est Lantenac qui a été le vrai général. Parlez-en à Dussaulx, votre collègue.

Robespierre resta un moment pensif, puis le dialogue reprit entre lui et Cimourdain.

— Eh bien, citoyen Cimourdain, cet homme-là est en Vendée.

— Depuis quand?

— Depuis trois semaines.

— Il faut le mettre hors la loi.

— C’est fait.

— Il faut mettre sa tête à prix.

— C’est fait.

— Il faut offrir, à qui le prendra, beaucoup d’argent.

— C’est fait.

— Pas en assignats.

— C’est fait.

— En or.

— C’est fait.

— Et il faut le guillotiner.

— Ce sera fait.

— Par qui?

— Par vous.

— Par moi?

— Oui, vous serez délégué du Comité de salut public, avec pleins pouvoirs.

— J’accepte, dit Cimourdain.

Robespierre était rapide dans ses choix; qualité d’homme d’état. Il prit dans le dossier qui était devant lui une feuille de papier blanc sur laquelle on lisait cet en-tête imprimé: RÉPUBLIQUE FRANÇAISE, UNE ET INDIVISIBLE. COMITÉ DE SALUT PUBLIC.

Cimourdain continua:

— Oui, j’accepte. Terrible contre terrible. Lantenac est féroce, je le serai. Guerre à mort avec cet homme. J’en délivrerai la République, s’il plaît à Dieu.

Il s’arrêta, puis reprit:

— Je suis prêtre; c’est égal, je crois en Dieu.

— Dieu a vieilli, dit Danton.

— Je crois en Dieu, dit Cimourdain impassible.

D’un signe de tête, Robespierre, sinistre, approuva.

Cimourdain reprit:

— Près de qui serai-je délégué?

Robespierre répondit:

— Près du commandant de la colonne expéditionnaire envoyée contre Lantenac.

Seulement, je vous en préviens, c’est un noble.

Danton s’écria:

— Voilà encore de quoi je me moque. Un noble? Eh bien, après? Il en est du noble comme du prêtre. Quand il est bon, il est excellent. La noblesse est un préjugé; mais il ne faut pas plus l’avoir dans un sens que dans l’autre, pas plus contre que pour. Robespierre, est-ce que Saint-Just n’est pas un noble? Florelle de Saint-Just, parbleu! Anacharsis Cloots est baron. Notre ami Charles Hesse, qui ne manque pas une séance des Cordeliers, est prince et frère du landgrave régnant de Hesse-Rothenbourg. Montaut, l’intime de Marat, est marquis de Montaut. Il y a dans le tribunal révolutionnaire un juré qui est prêtre, Vilate, et un juré qui est noble, Leroy, marquis de Montflabert. Tous deux sont sûrs.

— Et vous oubliez, ajouta Robespierre, le chef du jury révolutionnaire….

— Antonelle?

— Qui est le marquis Antonelle, dit Robespierre.

Danton reprit:

— C’est un noble, Dampierre, qui vient de se faire tuer devant Condé pour la République, et c’est un noble, Beaurepaire, qui s’est brûlé la cervelle plutôt que d’ouvrir les portes de Verdun aux Prussiens.

— Ce qui n’empêche pas, grommela Marat, que, le jour où Condorcet a dit: Les Gracques étaient des nobles, Danton n’ait crié à Condorcet: Tous les nobles sont des traîtres, à commencer par Mirabeau et à finir par toi.

La voix grave de Cimourdain s’éleva.

— Citoyen Danton, citoyen Robespierre, vous avez raison peut-être de vous confier, mais le peuple se défie, et il n’a pas tort de se défier. Quand c’est un prêtre qui est chargé de surveiller un noble, la responsabilité est double, et il faut que le prêtre soit inflexible.

— Certes, dit Robespierre.

Cimourdain ajouta:

— Et inexorable.

Robespierre reprit:

— C’est bien dit, citoyen Cimourdain. Vous aurez affaire à un jeune homme. Vous aurez de l’ascendant sur lui, ayant le double de son âge. Il faut le diriger, mais le ménager. Il paraît qu’il a des talents militaires, tous les rapports sont unanimes là-dessus. Il fait partie d’un corps qu’on a détaché de l’armée du Rhin pour aller en Vendée. Il arrive de la frontière où il a été admirable d’intelligence et de bravoure. Il mène supérieurement la colonne expéditionnaire. Depuis quinze jours, il tient en échec ce vieux marquis de Lantenac. Il le réprime et le chasse devant lui. Il finira par l’acculer à la mer, et par l’y culbuter. Lantenac a la ruse d’un vieux général, et lui a l’audace d’un jeune capitaine. Ce jeune homme a déjà des ennemis et des envieux. L’adjudant-général Léchelle est jaloux de lui.

— Ce Léchelle, interrompit Danton, il veut être général en chef, il n’a pour lui qu’un calembour: Il faut Léchelle pour monter sur Charette. En attendant, Charette le bat.

— Et il ne veut pas, poursuivit Robespierre, qu’un autre que lui batte Lantenac. Le malheur de la guerre de Vendée est dans ces rivalités-là. Des héros mal commandés, voilà nos soldats. Un simple capitaine de hussards, Chambon, entre dans Saumur avec un trompette en sonnant Ça ira; il pourrait continuer et prendre Cholet, mais il n’a pas d’ordres, et il s’arrête. Il faut remanier tous les commandements de la Vendée. On éparpille les corps de garde, on disperse les forces; une armée éparse est une armée paralysée; c’est un bloc dont on fait de la poussière. Au camp de Paramé il n’y a plus que des lentes. Il y a entre Tréguier et Dinan cent petits postes inutiles avec lesquels on pourrait faire une division et couvrir tout le littoral. Léchelle, appuyé par Parrein, dégarnit la côte nord sous prétexte de protéger la côte sud, et ouvre ainsi la France aux anglais. Un demi-million de paysans soulevés, et une descente de l’Angleterre en France, tel est le plan de Lantenac. Le jeune commandant de la colonne expéditionnaire met l’épée aux reins à ce Lantenac et le presse et le bat, sans la permission de Léchelle; or Léchelle est son chef; aussi Léchelle le dénonce. Les avis sont partagés sur ce jeune homme. Léchelle veut le faire fusiller. Prieur de la Marne veut le faire adjudant-général.

— Ce jeune homme, dit Cimourdain, me semble avoir de grandes qualités.

— Mais il a un défaut!

L’interruption était de Marat.

— Lequel? demanda Cimourdain.

— La clémence, dit Marat.

Et Marat poursuivit:

— C’est ferme au combat, et mou après. Ça donne dans l’indulgence, ça pardonne, ça fait grâce, ça protège les religieuses et les nonnes, ça sauve les femmes et les filles des aristocrates, ça relâche les prisonniers, ça met en liberté les prêtres.

— Grave faute, murmura Cimourdain.

— Crime, dit Marat.

— Quelquefois, dit Danton.

— Souvent, dit Robespierre.

— Presque toujours, reprit Marat.

— Quand ou a affaire aux ennemis de la patrie, toujours, dit Cimourdain.

Marat se tourna vers Cimourdain.

— Et que ferais-tu donc d’un chef républicain qui mettrait en liberté un chef royaliste?

— Je serais de l’avis de Léchelle, je le ferais fusiller.

— Ou guillotiner, dit Marat.

— Au choix, dit Cimourdain.

Danton se mit à rire.

— J’aime autant l’un que l’autre.

— Tu es sûr d’avoir l’un ou l’autre, grommela Marat. Et son regard, quittant Danton, revint sur Cimourdain.

— Ainsi, citoyen Cimourdain, si un chef républicain bronchait, tu lui ferais couper la tête?

— Dans les vingt-quatre heures.

— Et bien, repartit Marat, je suis de l’avis de Robespierre, il faut envoyer le citoyen Cimourdain comme commissaire délégué du comité de salut public près du commandant de la colonne expéditionnaire de l’armée des côtes. Comment s’appelle-t-il déjà, ce commandant?

Robespierre répondit:

— C’est un ci-devant, un noble.

Et il se mit à feuilleter le dossier.

— Donnons au prêtre le noble à garder, dit Danton. Je me défie d’un prêtre qui est seul; je me défie d’un noble qui est seul; quand ils sont ensemble, je ne les crains pas: l’un surveille l’autre, et ils vont.

L’indignation propre au sourcil de Cimourdain s’accentua: mais trouvant sans doute l’observation juste au fond, il ne se tourna point vers Danton, et il éleva sa voix sévère.

— Si le commandant républicain qui m’est confié fait un faux pas, peine de mort.

Robespierre, les yeux sur le dossier, dit:

— Voici le nom, Citoyen Cimourdain, le commandant sur qui vous aurez pleins pouvoirs est un ci-devant vicomte. Il s’appelle Gauvain.

Cimourdain pâlit.

— Gauvain! s’écria-t-il.

Marat vit la pâleur de Cimourdain.

— Le vicomte Gauvain! répéta Cimourdain.

— Oui, dit Robespierre.

— Eh bien? dit Marat, l’oeil fixé sur Cimourdain.

Il y eut un temps d’arrêt. Marat reprit:

— Citoyen Cimourdain, aux conditions indiquées par vous-mêmes, acceptez-vous la commission de commissaire délégué près le commandant Gauvain? Est-ce dit?

— C’est dit, répondit Cimourdain.

Il était de plus en plus pâle.

Robespierre prit la plume qui était près de lui, écrivit de son écriture lente et correcte quatre lignes sur la feuille de papier portant en tête:

COMITÉ DE SALUT PUBLIC, signa, et passa la feuille et la plume à Danton;

Danton signa, et Marat, qui ne quittait pas des yeux la face livide de
Cimourdain, signa après Danton.

Robespierre, reprenant la feuille, la data, et la remit à Cimourdain, qui lut:

A*N II DE LA RÉPUBLIQUE*

«Pleins pouvoirs sont donnés an citoyen Cimourdain, commissaire délégué du comité de salut public près le citoyen Gauvain, commandant la colonne expéditionnaire de l’armée des côtes.

ROBESPIERRE. — DANTON. — MARAT.»

Et au-dessous des signatures:
«28 juin 1793.»
Le calendrier révolutionnaire, dit calendrier civil, n’existait pas encore légalement à cette époque, et ne devait être adopté par la Convention, sur la proposition de Romme, que le 5 octobre 1793.

Pendant que Cimourdain lisait, Marat le regardait.

Marat dit à demi-voix, comme se parlant à lui-même:

— Il faudra faire préciser tout cela par un décret de la Convention ou par un arrêté spécial du comité de salut public. Il reste quelque chose à faire.

— Citoyen Cimourdain, demanda Robespierre, où demeurez-vous?

— Cour du Commerce.

— Tiens, moi aussi, dit Danton, vous êtes mon voisin.

Robespierre reprit:

— Il n’y a pas un moment à perdre. Demain vous recevrez votre commission en règle, signée de tous les membres du comité de salut public. Ceci est une confirmation de la commission, qui vous accréditera spécialement près des représentants en mission, Philippeaux, Prieur de la Marne, Lecointre, Alquier et les autres. Nous savons qui vous êtes. Vous pouvez faire Gauvain général ou l’envoyer à l’échafaud. Vous aurez votre commission demain à trois heures. Quand partirez-vous?

— A quatre heures, dit Cimourdain.

Et ils se séparèrent.

En rentrant chez lui, Marat prévint Simonne Evrard qu’il irait le lendemain à la Convention.

LIVRE TROISIÈME

LA CONVENTION

I. LA CONVENTION

i.

Nous approchons de la grande cime.

Voici la Convention.

Le regard devient fixe en présence de ce sommet.

Jamais rien de plus haut n’est apparu sur l’horizon des hommes.

Il y a l’Himalaya et il y a la Convention.

La Convention est peut-ètre le point culminant de l’histoire.

Du vivant de la Convention, car cela vit, une assemblée, on ne se rendait pas compte de ce qu’elle était. Ce qui échappait aux contemporains, c’était précisément sa grandeur; on était trop effrayé pour être ébloui. Tout ce qui est grand a une horreur sacrée. Admirer les médiocres et les collines, c’est aisé; mais ce qui est trop haut, un génie aussi bien qu’une montagne, une assemblée aussi bien qu’un chef-d’uvre, vus de trop près, épouvantent. Toute cime semble une exagération. Gravir fatigue. On s’essouffle aux escarpements, ou glisse sur les pentes, on se blesse à des aspérités qui sont des beautés; les torrents, en écumant, dénoncent les précipices, les nuages cachent les sommets; l’ascension terrifie autant que la chute. De là plus d’effroi que d’admiration. On éprouve ce sentiment bizarre, l’aversion du grand. On voit les abîmes, on ne voit pas les sublimités; on voit le monstre, on ne voit pas le prodige. Ainsi fut d’abord jugée La Convention. La Convention fut toisée par les myopes, elle, faite pour être contemplée par les aigles.

Aujourd’hui elle est en perspective, et elle dessine sur le ciel profond, dans un lointain serein et tragique, l’immense profil de la révolution française.

ii

Le 14 juillet avait délivré.

Le 10 août avait foudroyé.

Le 21 septembre fonda.

Le 21 septembre, l’équinoxe, l’équilibre. Libra. La balance. Ce fut, suivant la remarque de Romme, sous ce signe de l’Égalité et de la Justice que la république fut proclamée. Une constellation fit l’annonce.

La Convention est le premier avatar du peuple. C’est par la Convention que s’ouvrit la grande page nouvelle et que l’avenir d’aujourd’hui commença.

A toute idée il faut une enveloppe visible, à tout principe il faut une habitation; une église, c'est Dieu entre quatre murs, à tout dogme il faut un temple. Quand la Convention fut, il y eut un dernier problème à résoudre, loger la Convention.

On prit d'abord le Manège, puis les Tuileries. On y dressa un châssis, un décor, une grande grisaille peinte par David, des bancs symétriques, une tribune carrée, des pilastres parallèles, des socles pareils à des billots, de longues étraves rectilignes, des alvéoles rectangulaire où se pressait la multitude et qu'on appelait les tribunes publiques, un velarium romain, des draperies grecques, et dans ces angles droits et dans ces lignes droites on installa la Convention: dans cette géométrie on mit la tempête. Sur la tribune le bonnet rouge était peint en gris. Les royalistes commencèrent par rire de ce bonnet rouge gris, de cette salle postiche, de ce monument de carton, de ce sanctuaire de papier mâché, de ce panthéon de boue et de crachat. Comme cela devait, disparaître vite! Les colonnes étaient en douves de tonneau, les voûtes étaient en volige, les bas-reliefs étaient en mastic, les entablements étaient en sapin, les statues étaient en plâtre, les marbres étaient en peinture, les murailles étaient en toile; et dans ce provisoire la France a fait de l'éternel.

Les murailles de la salle du Manège, quand la Convention vint y tenir séance, étaient toutes couvertes des affiches qui avaient pullulé dans Paris à l'époque du retour de Varennes. On lisait sur l'une: — Le roi rentre. Bâtonner qui l'applaudira, pendre qui l'insultera. — Sur une autre: — Paix là. Chapeaux sur la tête. Il va passer devant ses juges. — Sur une autre: — Le roi a couché la nation en joue. Il a fait long feu. À la nation de tirer maintenant. — Sur une autre: — La Loi! La Loi! Ce fut entre ces murs-là que la Convention jugea Louis XVI.

Aux Tuileries, où la Convention vint siéger le 10 mai 1793, et qui s'appelèrent le Palais-National, la salle des séances occupait tout l'intervalle entre le pavillon de l'horloge appelé pavillon-Unité et le pavillon Marsan appelé pavillon-Liberté. Le pavillon de Flore s'appelait pavillon-Égalité. C'est par le grand-escalier de Jean Bullant qu'on montait à la salle des séances. Sous le premier étage occupé par l'assemblée, tout le rez-de-chaussée du palais était une sorte de longue salle des gardes, encombrée des faisceaux et des lits de camp des troupes de toutes armes qui veillaient autour de la Convention. L’assemblée avait une garde d’honneur qu’on appelait «les grenadiers de la Convention».

Un ruban tricolore séparait le château où était l’assemblée du jardin où le peuple allait et venait.

Ce qu’était la salle des séances, achevons de le dire. Tout intéresse de ce lieu terrible.

Ce qui, en entrant, frappait d’abord le regard, c’était, entre deux larges fenêtres, une haute statue de la Liberté.

Quarante-deux mètres de longueur, dix mètres de largeur, onze mètres de hauteur, telles étaient les dimensions de ce qui avait été le théâtre du roi et de ce qui devint le théâtre de la révolution. L’élégante et magnifique salle bâtie par Vigarani pour les courtisans disparut sous la sauvage charpente qui en 93 dut subir le poids du peuple. Cette charpente, sur laquelle s’échafaudaient les tribunes publiques, avait, détail qui vaut la peine d’être noté, pour point d’appui unique un poteau. Ce poteau était d’un seul morceau, et avait dix mètres de portée. Peu de cariatides ont travaillé comme ce poteau: il a soutenu pendant des années la rude poussée de la révolution. Il a porté l’acclamation, l’enthousiasme, l’injure, le bruit, le tumulte, l’immense chaos des colères, l’émeute. Il n’a pas fléchi. Après la Convention, il a vu le conseil des Anciens. Le 18 brumaire l’a relayé.

Percier alors remplaça le pilier de bois par des colonnes de marbre, qui ont moins duré.

L’idéal des architectes est parfois singulier; l’architecte de la rue de Rivoli a eu pour idéal la trajectoire d’un boulet de canon, l’architecte de Carlsruhe a eu pour idéal un éventail; un gigantesque tiroir de commode, tel semble avoir été l’idéal dr l’architecte qui construisit la salle où la Convention vint siéger le 10 mai 1793; c’était long, haut et plat. À l’un des grands côtés du parallélogramme était adossé un vaste demi-cirque; c’était l’amphithéâtre des bancs des représentants, sans tables ni pupitres: Garan-Coulon, qui écrivait beaucoup, écrivait sur son genou: en face des bancs, la tribune; devant la tribune, le buste de Lepelletier-Saint-Fargeau; derrière la tribune, le fauteuil du président.

La tête du buste dépassait un peu le rebord de la tribune; ce qui fit que, plus tard, on l’ôta de là.

L’amphithéâtre se composait de dix-neuf bancs demi-circulaires, étagés les uns derrière les autres; des tronçons de bancs prolongeaient cet amphithéâtre dans les deux encoignures.

En bas, dans le fer à cheval au pied de la tribune, se tenaient les huissiers.

D’un côté de la tribune, dans un cadre de bois noir, était appliqué au mur une pancarte de neuf pieds de haut, portant, sur deux pages séparées par une sorte de sceptre, la Déclaration des droits de l’homme; de l’autre côté, il y avait une place vide qui plus tard fut occupée par un cadre pareil contenant la Constitution de l’an II, dont les deux pages étaient séparées par un glaive. Au-dessus de la tribune, au-dessus de la tête de l’orateur, frissonnaient, sortant d’une profonde loge à deux compartiments pleine de peuple, trois immenses drapeaux tricolores, presque horizontaux, appuyés à un autel sur lequel on lisait: LA LOI. Derrière cet autel, se dressait, comme la sentinelle de la parole libre, un énorme faisceau romain, haut comme une colonne. Des statues colossales, droites contre le mur, faisaient face aux représentants. Le président avait à sa droite Lycurgue et à sa gauche Solon; au-dessus de la Montagne il y avait Platon.

Ces statues avaient pour piédestaux de simples dés, posés sur une longue corniche saillante qui faisait le tour de la salle et séparait le peuple de l’assemblée. Les spectateurs s’accoudaient à cette corniche.

Le cadre de bois noir du placard des Droits de l’Homme montait jusqu’à la corniche et entamait le dessin de l’entablement, effraction de la ligne droite qui faisait murmurer Chabot. — C’est laid, disait-il à Vadier.

Sur les têtes des statues, alternaient des couronnes de chêne et de laurier.

Une draperie verte, où étaient peintes en vert plus foncé les mêmes couronnes, descendait à gros plis droits de la corniche de pourtour et tapissait tout le rez-de-chaussée de la salle occupée par l’assemblée. Au-dessus de cette draperie la muraille était blanche et froide. Dans cette muraille se creusaient, coupés comme à l’emporte-pièce, sans moulure ni rinceau, deux étages de tribunes publiques, les carrées en bas, les rondes en haut; selon la règle, car Vitruve n’était pas détrôné, les archivoltes étaient superposées aux architraves. Il y avait dix tribunes sur chacun des grands côtés de la salle, et à chacune des deux extrémités deux loges démesurées: en tout vingt-quatre. Là s’entassaient les foules.

Les spectateurs des tribunes inférieures débordaient sur tous les plats-bords et se groupaient sur tous les reliefs de l’architecture. Une longue barre de fer, solidement scellée à hauteur d’appui servait de garde-fou aux tribunes hautes, et garantissait les spectateurs contre la pression des cohues montant les escaliers. Une fois pourtant, un homme fut précipité dans l’assemblée, il tomba un peu sur Massieu, évêque de Beauvais, ne se tua pas, et dit: Tiens! C’est donc bon à quelque chose un évêque!

La salle de la Convention pouvait contenir deux mille personnes, et, les jours d’insurrection, trois mille.

La Convention avait deux séances, une du jour, une du soir.

Le dossier du président était rond, à clous dorés. Sa table était contrebutée par quatre monstres ailés à un seul pied, qu’on eût dit sortis de l’apocalypse pour assister à la révolution. Ils semblaient avoir été dételés du char d’Ézéchiel pour venir traîner le tombereau de Sanson.

Sur la table du président il y avait une grosse sonnette, presque une cloche, un large encrier de cuivre, et un in-folio relié en parchemin qui était le livre des procès-verbaux.

Des têtes coupées, portées au bout d’une pique, se sont égouttées sur cette table.

On montait à la tribune par un degré de neuf marches. Ces marches étaient hautes, roides, et assez difficiles; elles firent un jour trébucher Gensonné qui les gravissait. C’est un escalier d’échafaud!dit-il. — Fais ton apprentissage, lui cria Carrier.

Là où le mur avait paru trop nu, dans les angles de la salle, l’architecte avait appliqué pour ornements des faisceaux, la hache en dehors.

À droite et à gauche de la tribune, des socles portaient deux candélabres de douze pieds de haut, ayant à leur sommet quatre paires de quinquets. Il y avait dans chaque loge publique un candélabre pareil. Sur les socles de ces candélabres étaient sculptés des ronds que le peuple appelait «colliers de guillotine».

Les bancs de l’assemblée montaient presque jusqu’à la corniche des tribunes; les représentants et le peuple pouvaient dialoguer.

Les vomitoires des tribunes se dégorgeaient dans un labyrinthe de corridors, plein parfois d’un bruit farouche.

La Convention encombrait le palais et refluait jusque dans les hôtels voisins, l’hôtel de Longueville, l’hôtel de Coigny. C’est à l’hôtel de Coigny qu’après le 10 août, si l’on en croit une lettre de lord Bradford, on transporta le mobilier royal. Il fallut deux mois pour vider les Tuileries.

Les comités étaient logés aux environs de la salle; au pavillon-Egalité, la législation, l’agriculture et le commerce; au pavillon-Liberté, la marine, les colonies, les finances, les assignats, le salut public; au pavillon-Unité, la guerre.

Le comité de sûreté générale communiquait directement avec le comité de salut public par un couloir obscur, éclairé nuit et jour d'un réverbère, où allaient et venaient les espions de tous les partis. On y parlait bas.

La barre de la Convention a été plusieurs fois déplacée. Habituellement elle était à la droite du président.

Aux deux extrémités se la salle, les deux cloisons verticales qui fermaient du côté droit et du coté gauche les demi-cercles concentriques de l'amphithéâtre laissaient entre elles et le mur deux couloirs étroits et profonds sur lesquels s'ouvraient deux sombres portes carrées. On entrait et on sortait par là.

Les représentants entraient directement dans la salle par une porte donnant sur la terrasse des Feuillants.

Cette salle, peu éclairée le jour par de pâles fenêtres, mal éclairée quand venait le crépuscule par des flambeaux livides, avait on ne sait quoi de nocturne. Ce demi-éclairage s'ajoutait aux ténèbres du soir; les séances aux lampes étaient lugubres. On ne se voyait pas; d'un bout de la salle à l'autre, de la droite à la gauche, des groupes de faces vagues s'insultaient. On se rencontrait sans se reconnaître. Un jour Laignelot, courant à la tribune, se heurte, dans le couloir de descente, à quelqu'un. — Pardon, Robespierre, dit-il. — Pour qui me prends-tu? répond une voix rauque. — Pardon, Marat, dit Laignelot.

En bas, à droite et à gauche du président, deux tribunes étaient réservées; car, chose étrange, il y avait à la Convention des spectateurs privilégiés. Ces tribunes étaient, les seules qui eussent une draperie. Au milieu de l'architrave, deux glands d'or relevaient cette draperie. Les tribunes du peuple étaient nues.

Tout cet ensemble était violent, sauvage, régulier. Le correct dans le farouche; c'est un peu toute la révolution. La salle de la Convention offrait le plus complet spécimen de ce que les artistes ont appelé depuis «l'architecture messidor». C'était massif et grêle. Les bâtisseurs de ce temps-là prenaient le symétrique pour le beau. Le dernier mot de la renaissance avait été dit sous Louis XV, et une réaction s'était faite. On avait poussé le noble jusqu'au fade, et la pureté jusqu'à l'ennui. La pruderie existe en architecture. Après les éblouissantes orgies de forme et de couleur du dix-huitième siècle, l'art s'était mis à la diète, et ne se permettait plus que la ligne droite. Ce genre de progrès aboutit à la laideur. L'art réduit au squelette, tel est le phénomène. C’est l’inconvénient de ces sortes de sagesses et d’abstinences; le style est si sobre qu’il devient maigre.

Eu dehors de toute émotion politique, et à ne voir que l’architecture, un certain frisson se dégageait de cette salle. On se rappelait confusément l’ancien théâtre, les loges enguirlandées, le plafond d’azur et de pourpre, le lustre à facettes, les girandoles à reflets de diamants, les tentures gorge de pigeon, la profusion d’amours et de nymphes sur le rideau et sur les draperies, toute l’idylle royale et galante, peinte, sculptée et dorée, qui avait empli de son sourire ce lieu sévère, et l’on regardait partout autour de soi ces durs angles rectilignes, froids et tranchants comme l’acier; c’était quelque chose comme Boucher guillotiné par David.

iv

Qui voyait l’assemblée ne songeait plus à la salle. Qui voyait le drame ne pensait plus au théâtre. Rien de plus difforme et de plus sublime. Un tas de héros, un troupeau de lâches. Des faunes sur une montagne, des reptiles dans un marais. Là fourmillaient, se coudoyaient, se provoquaient, se menaçaient, luttaient et vivaient tous ces combattants qui sont aujourd’hui des fantômes.

Dénombrement titanique.

À droite, la Gironde, légion de penseurs; à gauche, la Montagne, troupe d’athlètes. D’un côté, Brissot, qui avait reçu les clefs de la Bastille; Barbaroux, auquel obéissaient les Marseillais; Kervélégan, qui avait sous la main le bataillon de Brest, caserné au faubourg Saint-Marceau; Gensonné, qui avait établi la suprématie des représentants sur les généraux; le fatal Guadet, auquel une nuit, aux Tuileries, la reine avait montré le dauphin endormi; Guadet baisa le front de l’enfant et fit tomber la tête du père; Salles, le dénonciateur chimérique des intimités de la Montagne avec l’Autriche; Sillery, le boiteux de la droite, comme Couthon était le cul-de-jatte de la gauche; Lause-Duperret, qui, traité de scélérat par un journaliste, l’invita à dîner en disant: «Je sais que «scélérat veut simplement dire l’homme qui ne pense pas comme nous.» Banant-Saint-Étienne, qui avait commencé son almanach de 1790 par ce mot: La révolution est finie; Quinette, un de ceux qui précipitèrent Louis XVI; le janséniste Camus, qui rédigeait la constitution civile du clergé, croyait aux miracles du diacre Paris, et se prosternait toutes les nuits devant un christ de sept pieds de haut cloué au mur de sa chambre; Fauchet, un prêtre qui, avec Camille Desmoulins, avait fait le 14 juillet; Isnard, qui commit le crime de dire:

Paris sera détruit, au moment même où Brunswick disait: Paris sera brûlé; Jacob Dupont, le premier qui cria: Je suis athée, et à qui Robespierre répondit:L'athéisme est aristocratique; Lanjuinais, dure, sagace et vaillante tête bretonne, Ducos, l'Euryale de Boyer-Fonfrède; Rebecqui, le Pylade de Barbaroux, Rebecqui donnait sa démission parce qu'on n'avait pas encore guillotiné Robespierre; Richaud, qui combattait la permanence des sections; Lasource, qui avait émis cet apophtegme meurtrier: Malheur aux nations Reconnaissantes! et qui, au pied de l'échafaud, devait se contredire par cette fière parole jetée aux montagnards: Nous mourons parce que le peuple dort, et vous mourrez parce que le peuple se réveillera; Birotteau, qui fit décréter l'abolition de l'inviolabilité, fut ainsi, sans le savoir, le forgeron du couperet, et dressa l'échafaud pour lui-même; Charles Villette, qui abrita sa conscience sous cette protestation: Je ne veux pas voter sous les couteaux; Louvet, l'auteur de Faublas, qui devait finir libraire au Palais-Royal avec Lodoïska au comptoir; Mercier, l'auteur du Tableau de Paris, qui s'écriait: Tous les rois ont senti sur leur nuque le 21 janvier; Marec, qui avait pour souci «la faction des anciennes limites»; le journaliste Carra qui, au pied de l'échafaud, dit au bourreau: Ça m'ennuie de mourir. J'aurais voulu voir la suite; Vigée, qui s'intitulait grenadier dans le deuxième bataillon de Loire, et qui, menacé par les tribunes publiques, s'écriait: Je demande qu'au premier murmure des tribunes, nous nous retirions tous, et marchions à Versailles le sabre à la main! Buzot, réservé à la mort de faim; Valazé, promis à son propre poignard; Condorcet, qui devait mourir à Bourg-la-Reine devenu Bourg-Egalité, dénoncé par l'Horace qu'il avait dans sa poche; Pétion, dont la destinée était d'être adoré par la foule en 1792 et dévoré par les loups en 1794; vingt autres encore, Pontécoulant, Marboz, Lidon, Saint-Martin, Dussaulx, traducteur de Juvénal, qui avait fait la campagne du Hanovre; Boilleau, Bertrand, Lesterp-Beauvais, Lesage, Gomaire, Gardien, Minvielle, Duplantier, Lacaze, Antiboul, et en tête un Barnave qu'on appelait Vergniaud.

De l'autre côté, Antoine-Louis-Léon Florelle de Saint-Just, pâle, front bas, profil correct, oeil mystérieux, tristesse profonde, vingt-trois ans; Merlin de Thionville, que les allemands appelaient Feuer-Teufel, «le diable de feu»; Merlin de Douai, le coupable auteur de la loi des suspects; Soubrany, que le peuple de Paris, au premier prairial demanda pour général; l'ancien curé Lebon, tenant un sabre de la main qui avait jeté de l'eau bénite; Billaud-Varenne, qui entrevoyait la magistrature de l'avenir: pas de juges, des arbitres; Fabre d'Eglantine, qui eut une trouvaille charmante, le calendrier républicain, comme Rouget de Lisle eut une inspiration sublime, la Marseillaise, mais l'un et l'autre sans récidive; Manuel, le procureur de la Commune, qui avait dit: Un roi mort n'est pas un homme de moins; Gonjon, qui était entré dans Tripstadt, dans Newtadt et dans Spire, et avait vu fuir l'armée prussienne; Lacroix, avocat changé en général, fait chevalier de Saint-Louis six jours avant le 10 août; Fréron-Thersite, fils de Fréron-Zoile; Ruhl, l'inexorable fouilleur de l'armoire de fer, prédestiné au grand suicide républicain, devant se tuer le jour où mourrait la république; Fouché, âme de démon, face de cadavre; Camboulas, l'ami du père Duchêne, lequel disait à Guillotin: Tu es du club des Feuillants, mais ta fille est du club des Jacobins; Jagot, qui à ceux qui plaignaient la nudité des prisonniers répondait: Une prison est un habit de pierre; Javogues, l'effrayant déterreur des tombeaux de Saint-Denis; Osselin; proscripteur qui cachait chez lui une proscrite, madame Charry; Bentabole, qui, lorsqu'il présidait, faisait signe aux tribunes d'applaudir et de huer; le journaliste Robert, mari de mademoiselle de Kéralio, laquelle écrivait: Ni Robespierre ni Marat ne viennent chez moi; Robespierre y viendra quand il voudra, Marat, Jamais; Garan-Coulon, qui avait fièrement demandé, quand l'Espagne était intervenue dans le procès de Louis XVI, que l'assemblée ne daignât pas lire la lettre d'un roi pour un roi; Grégoire, évêque digne d'abord de la primitive église, mais qui plus tard sous l'empire effaça le républicain Grégoire par le comte Grégoire; Amar, qui disait:Toute la terre condamne Louis XVI. A qui donc appeler du jugement? Aux planètes; Rouyer, qui s'était opposé, le 21 janvier, à ce qu'on tirât le canon du Pont-Neuf, disant: Une tête de roi ne doit pas faire en tombant plus de bruit que la tête d'un autre homme; Chénier, frère d'André; Vadier, un de ceux qui posaient un pistolet sur la tribune; Tanis, qui disait à Momoro: Je veux que Marat et Robespierre s'embrassent à ma table chez moi. — Où demeures-tu? — A Charenton. — Ailleurs, m'eût étonné, disait Momoro; Legendre, qui fut le boucher de la révolution de France comme Pride avait été le boucher de la révolution d'Angleterre: — Viens, que je T'assomme! criait-il à Lanjuinais. Et Lanjuinais répondait: Fais d'abord décréter que je suis un buf; Collot d'Herbois, ce lugubre comédien, ayant sur la face l'antique masque aux deux bouches qui disent Oui et Non, approuvant par l'une ce qu'il blâmait par l'autre, flétrissant Carrier à Nantes et déifiant Châlier à Lyon, envoyant Robespierre à l'échafaud et Marat au Panthéon; Génissieux, qui demandait la peine de mort contre quiconque aurait sur lui la médaille Louis XVI martyrisé; Léonard Bourdon, le maître d'école, qui avait offert sa maison au vieillard du Mont-Jura; Topsent, marin, Goupilleau, avocat, Laurent Lecointre, marchand, Duhem, médecin, Sergent, statuaire, David, peintre, Joseph Egalité, prince. D'autres encore; Lecointe-Puiraveau, qui demandait que Marat fût déclaré par décret «en état de démence»; Robert Lindet, l'inquiétant créateur de cette pieuvre dont la tête était le comité de sûreté générale et qui couvrait la France de vingt et un mille bras qu'on appelait les comités révolutionnaires; Leboeuf, sur qui Girey-Dupré, dans son Noël des faux patriotes, avait fait ce vers:

Leboeuf vit Legendre et beugla.

Thomas Paine, américain, et clément; Anacharsis Cloots, allemand, baron millionnaire, athée, hébertiste, candide; l'intègre Lebas, l'ami des Duplay; Rovère, un des rares hommes qui sont méchants pour la méchanceté, car l'art pour l'art existe plus qu'on ne croit; Charlier, qui voulait qu'on dît vous aux aristocrates; Tallien, élégiaque et féroce, qui fera le 9 thermidor par amour; Cambacérès, procureur qui sera prince, Carrier, procureur qui sera tigre; Laplanche, qui s'écria un jour: Je demande la priorité pour le canon d'alarme; Thuriot, qui voulait le vote à haute voix des jurés du tribunal révolutionnaire; Bourdon de l'Oise, qui provoquait en duel Chambon, dénonçait Paine, et était dénoncé par Hébert; Fayau, qui proposait «l'envoi d'une armée incendiaire» dans la Vendée; Travot, qui le 15 avril fut presque un médiateur entre la Gironde et la Montagne; Vernier, qui demandait que les chefs girondins et les chefs montagnards allassent servir comme simples soldats; Rewbell, qui s'enferma dans Mayence; Bourbotte, qui eut son cheval tué sous lui à la prise de Saumur; Guimberteau, qui dirigea l'armée des Côtes de Cherbourg; Jard-Panvillier, qui dirigea l'armée des Côtes de la Rochelle; Lecarpentier, qui dirigea l'escadre de Cancale; Roberjot, qu'attendait le guet-apens de Rastadt; Prieur de la Marne, qui portait dans les camps sa vieille contre-épaulette de chef d'escadron; Levasseur de la Sarthe, qui, d'un mot, décidait Serrent, commandant du bataillon de Saint-Amand, à se faire tuer; Reverchon, Maure, Bernard de Saintes, Charles Richard, Lequinio, et au sommet de ce groupe un Mirabeau qu'on appelait Danton.

En dehors de ces deux camps, et les tenant tous deux en respect, se dressait un homme, Robespierre.

Au-dessous se courbaient l’épouvante, qui peut être noble, et la peur, qui est basse. Sous les passions, sous les héroïsmes, sous les dévouements, sous les rages, la morne cohue des anonymes. Les bas-fonds de l’assemblée s’appelaient la Plaine. Il y avait là tout ce qui flotte; les hommes qui doutent, qui hésitent, qui reculent, qui ajournent, qui épient, chacun craignant quelqu’un. La Montagne, c’était une élite, la Gironde, c’était une élite: la Plaine, c’était la foule. La Plaine se résumait et se condensait en Sieyès.

Sieyès, homme profond qui était devenu creux. Il s’était arrêté au tiers-état, et n’avait pu monter jusqu’au peuple. De certains esprits sont faits pour rester à mi-côte. Sieyès appelait tigre Robespierre qui l’appelait taupe. Ce métaphysicien avait abouti, non à la sagesse, mais à la prudence. Il était courtisan et non serviteur de la révolution. Il prenait une pelle et allait, avec le peuple, travailler au Champ de Mars, attelé à la même charrette qu’Alexandre de Beauharnais. Il conseillait l’énergie dont il n’usait point. Il disait aux Girondins: Mettez le canon de votre parti. Il y a les penseurs qui sont les lutteurs; ceux-là étaient, comme Condorcet, avec Vergniaud, ou, comme Camille Desmoulins, avec Danton. Il y a les penseurs qui veulent vivre, ceux-ci étaient avec Sieyès.

Les cuves les plus généreuses ont leur lie. Au-dessous même de la Plaine, il y avait le marais. Stagnation hideuse laissant voir les transparences de l’égoïsme. Là grelottait l’attente muette des trembleurs. Rien de plus misérable. Tous les opprobres, et aucune honte; la colère latente; la révolte sous la servitude. Ils étaient cyniquement effrayés; ils avaient tous les courages de la lâcheté; ils préféraient la Gironde et choisissaient la Montagne; le dénoûment dépendait d’eux; ils versaient du côté qui réussissait; ils livraient Louis XVI à Vergniaud, Vergniaud à Danton, Danton à Robespierre, Robespierre à Tallien. Ils piloriaient Marat vivant et divinisaient Marat mort. Ils soutenaient tout jusqu’au jour où ils renversaient tout. Ils avaient l’instinct de la poussée décisive à donner à tout ce qui chancelle. À leurs yeux, comme ils s’étaient mis en service à la condition qu’on fût solide, chanceler, c’était les trahir. Ils étaient le nombre, ils étaient la force, ils étaient la peur. De là l’audace des turpitudes.

De là le 31 mai, le 11 germinal, le 9 thermidor; tragédies nouées par les géants et dénouées par les nains.

vi

À ces hommes pleins de passions étaient mêlés les hommes pleins de songes. L'utopie était là sous toutes ses formes, sous sa forme belliqueuse qui admettait l'échafaud, et sous sa forme innocente qui abolissait la peine de mort; spectre du côté des trônes, ange du côté des peuples. En regard des esprits qui combattaient, il y avait les esprits qui couvaient. Les uns avaient dans la tête la guerre, les autres la paix; un cerveau, Carnot, enfantait quatorze armées; un autre cerveau, Jean Debry, méditait une fédération démocratique universelle. Parmi ces éloquences furieuses, parmi ces voix hurlantes et grondantes, il y avait des silences féconds. Lakanal se taisait, et combinait dans sa pensée l'éducation publique nationale; Lanthenas se taisait, et créait les écoles primaires; La Revellière-Lepeaux se taisait, et rêvait l'élévation de la philosophie à la dignité de religion. D'autres s'occupaient de questions de détail, plus petites et plus pratiques Guyton de Morveau étudiait l'assainissement des hôpitaux, Maire l'abolition des servitudes réelles, Jean-Bon-Saint-André la suppression de la prison pour dettes et de la contrainte par corps, Romme la proposition de Chappe, Duboë la mise en ordre des archives, Coren-Fustier la création du cabinet d'anatomie et du muséum d'histoire naturelle, Guyomard la navigation fluviale et le barrage de l'Escaut. L'art avait ses fanatiques et même ses monomanes; le 21 janvier, pendant que la tête de la monarchie tombait sur la place de la Révolution, Bézard, représentant de l'Oise, allait voir un tableau de Rubens trouvé dans un galetas de la rue Saint-Lazare. Artistes, orateurs, prophètes, hommes-colosses comme Danton, hommes-enfants, comme Cloots, gladiateurs et philosophes,tous allaient au même but, le progrès. Rien ne les déconcertait. La grandeur de la Convention fut de chercher la quantité de réel qui est dans ce que les hommes appellent l'impossible. A l'une de ses extrémités, Robespierre avait l'il fixé sur le droit; à l'autre extrémité, Condorcet avait l'il fixé sur le devoir.

Condorcet était un homme de rêverie et de clarté; Robespierre était un homme d'exécution; et quelquefois, dans les crises finales des sociétés vieillies, exécution signifie extermination. Les révolutions ont deux versants, montée et descente, et portent étagées sur ces versants toutes les saisons, depuis la glace jusqu'aux fleurs. Chaque zone de ces versants produit les hommes qui conviennent à son climat, depuis ceux qui vivent dans le soleil jusqu'à ceux qui vivent dans la foudre.

On se montrait le repli du couloir de gauche où Robespierre avait dit bas à l'oreille de Garat, l'ami de Clavière, ce mot redoutable: Clavière a conspiré partout où il a respiré. Dans ce même recoin, commode aux apartés et aux colères à demi-voix, Fabre d'Eglantine avait querellé Romme et lui avait reproché de défigurer son calendrier par le changement de Fervidor en Thermidor. On se montrait l'angle où siégeaient, se touchant le coude, les sept représentants de la Haute-Garonne qui, appelés les premiers à prononcer leur verdict sur Louis XVI, avaient ainsi répondu l'un après l'autre: Mailhe: la mort. — Delmas: la mort. — Projean: la mort. — Calès: la mort: — Ayral: la mort. — Julien: la mort. — Desasey: la mort. Éternelle répercussion qui emplit toute l'histoire, et qui, depuis que la justice humaine existe, a toujours mis l'écho du sépulcre sur le mur du tribunal. On désignait du doigt, dans la tumultueuse mêlée des visages, tous ces hommes d'où était sorti le brouhaha des votes tragiques; Paganel, qui avait dit: La mort. Un roi n'est utile que par sa mort; Millaud, qui avait dit: Aujourd'hui, si la mort n'existait pas, il faudrait L'inventer; le vieux Raffron du Trouillet, qui avait dit: La mort Vite! Goupilleau, qui avait crié: L'échafaud tout de suite. La lenteur aggrave la mort; Sieyès, qui avait eu cette concision funèbre: La mort; Thuriot, qui avait rejeté l'appel au peuple proposé par Buzot: Quoi! les assemblées primaires! quoi! quarante mille tribunaux! Procès sans terme. La tête de Louis XVI aurait le temps de blanchir avant de tomber; Augustin-Bon Robespierre, qui, après son frère, s'était écrié: Je ne connais point l'humanité qui égorge les peuples et qui pardonne aux despotes. La mort! Demander un sursis, c'est substituer à l'appel au peuple un appel aux tyrans; Foussedoire, le remplaçant de Bernardin de Saint-Pierre, qui avait dit: J'ai en horreur l'effusion du sang humain, mais le sang d'un roi n'est pas le sang d'un homme. La Mort; Jean-Bon-Saint-André, qui avait dit: Pas de peuple libre sans le tyran mort; Lavicomterie, qui avait proclamé cette formule: Tant que le tyran respire, la liberté étouffe. La mort; Chateauneuf-Randon, qui avait jeté ce cri: La mort de Louis le Dernier! Guyardin, qui avait émis ce vu: Qu'on l'exécute Barrière Renversée! la Barrière Renversée c'était la barrière du Trône; Tellier, qui avait dit: Qu'on forge, pour tirer contre l'ennemi, un canon du calibre de la tête de Louis XVI. Et les indulgents: Gentil, qui avait dit: Je vote la réclusion. Faire un Charles Ier, c'est faire un Cromwell; Bancal, qui avait dit: L'exil. Je veux voir le premier roi de l'univers condamné à faire un métier pour gagner sa vie; Albouys, qui avait dit: Le bannissement. Que ce spectre vivant aille errer autour des trônes; Zangiacomi, qui avait dit: La détention. Gardons Capet vivant comme épouvantail; Chaillon, qui avait dit: Qu'il vive. Je ne veux pas faire un mort dont Rome fera un saint. Pendant que ces sentences tombaient de ces lèvres sévères et, l'une après l'autre, se dispersaient dans l'histoire, dans les tribunes des femmes décolletées et parées comptaient les voix, une liste à la main, et piquaient des épingles sous chaque vote.

Où est entrée la tragédie, l'horreur et la pitié restent.

Voir la Convention, à quelque époque de son règne que ce fût, c'était revoir le jugement du dernier Capet; la légende du 21 janvier semblait mêlée à tous ses actes; la redoutable assemblée était pleine de ces haleines fatales qui avaient passé sur le vieux flambeau monarchique allumé depuis dix-huit siècles, et l'avaient éteint; le décisif procès de tous les rois dans un roi était comme le point de départ de la grande guerre qu'elle faisait au passé; quelle que fût la séance de la Convention à laquelle on assistât, on voyait s'y projeter l'ombre portée de l'échafaud de Louis XVI; les spectateurs se racontaient les uns aux autres la démission de Kersaint, la démission de Roland, Duchâtel le député des Deux-Sèvres, qui se fit apporter malade sur son lit, et, mourant, vota la vie, ce qui fit rire Marat; et l'on cherchait des yeux le représentant, oublié par l'histoire aujourd'hui, qui, après cette séance de trente-sept heures, tombé de lassitude et de sommeil sur son banc, et réveillé par l'huissier quand ce fut son tour de voter, entr'ouvrit les yeux, dit: La Mort! et se rendormit.

Au moment où ils condamnèrent à mort Louis XVI, Robespierre avait encore dix-huit mois à vivre, Danton quinze mois, Vergniaud neuf mois, Marat cinq mois et trois semaines, Lepelletier-Saint-Fargeau un jour. Court et terrible souffle des bouches humaines!

viii

Le peuple avait sur la Convention une fenêtre ouverte, les tribunes publiques, et, quand la fenêtre ne suffisait pas, il ouvrait la porte, et la rue entrait dans l'assemblée. Ces invasions de la foule dans ce sénat sont une des plus surprenantes visions de l'histoire. Habituellement, ces irruptions étaient cordiales. Le carrefour fraternisait avec la chaise curule. Mais c'est une cordialité redoutable que celle d'un peuple qui, un jour, en trois heures, avait pris les canons des Invalides et quarante mille fusils. A chaque instant, un défilé interrompait la séance; c'étaient des députations admises à la barre, des pétitions, des hommages, des offrandes. La pique d'honneur du faubourg Saint-Autoine entrait, portée par des femmes. Des anglais offraient vingt mille souliers aux pieds nus de nos soldats. «Le citoyen Arnoux, disait le Moniteur, curé d'Aubignan, commandant du bataillon de la Drôme, demande à marcher aux frontières, et que sa cure lui soit conservée.» Les délégués des sections arrivaient apportant sur des brancards des plats, des patènes, des calices, des ostensoirs, des monceaux d'or, d'argent et de vermeil, offerts à la patrie par cette multitude en haillons, et demandaient pour récompense la permission de danser la carmagnole devant la Convention. Chenard, Narbonne et Vallière venaient chanter des couplets en l'honneur de la Montagne. La section du Mont-Blanc apportait le buste de Lepelletier, et une femme posait un bonnet rouge sur la tête du président qui l'embrassait; «les citoyennes de la section du Mail» jetaient des fleurs «aux législateurs»; les «élèves de la patrie» venaient, musique en tête, remercier la Convention d'avoir «préparé la prospérité du siècle»; les femmes de la section des Gardes-Françaises offraient des roses; les femmes de la section des Champs-Élysées offraient une couronne de chêne; les femmes de la section du Temple venaient à la barre jurer de ne s'unir qu'à de vrais Républicains; la section de Molière présentait une médaille de Franklin qu'on suspendait, par décret, à la couronne de la statue de la Liberté; les enfants-trouvés, déclarés enfants de la république, défilaient, revêtus de l'uniforme national; les jeunes filles de la section de Quatre-vingt-douze arrivaient en longues robes blanches, et le lendemain le Moniteur contenait cette ligne: «Le président reçoit un bouquet des mains innocentes d'une jeune beauté.» Les orateurs saluaient les foules; parfois ils les flattaient; ils disaient à la multitude: — Tu es infaillible, tu es irréprochable, tu es sublime; — le peuple a un côté enfant, il aime ces sucreries. Quelquefois l'émeute traversait l'assemblée, y entrait furieuse et sortait apaisée comme le Rhône qui traverse le lac Léman, et qui est de fange en y entrant et d'azur en en sortant.

Parfois c'était moins pacifique, et Henriot faisait apporter devant la porte des Tuileries des grils à rougir les boulets.

En même temps qu'elle dégageait de la révolution, cette assemblée produisait de la civilisation. Fournaise, mais forge. Dans cette cuve où bouillonnait la terreur, le progrès fermentait. De ce chaos d'ombre et de cette tumultueuse fuite de nuages, sortaient d'immenses rayons de lumière parallèles aux lois éternelles. Rayons restés sur l'horizon, visibles à jamais dans le ciel des peuples, et qui sont l'un la justice, l'autre la tolérance, l'autre la bonté, l'autre la raison, l'autre la vérité, l'autre l'amour. La Convention promulguait ce grand axiome: La liberté du citoyen finit où la liberté d'un autre citoyen commence; ce qui résume en deux lignes toute la sociabilité humaine. Elle déclarait l'indigence sacrée; elle déclarait l'infirmité sacrée dans l'aveugle et dans le sourd-muet devenus pupilles de l'état, la maternité sacrée dans la fille-mère qu'elle consolait et relevait, l'enfance sacrée dans l'orphelin qu'elle faisait adopter par la patrie, l'innocence sacrée dans l'accusé acquitté qu'elle indemnisait. Elle flétrissait la traite des noirs, elle abolissait l'esclavage. Elle proclamait la solidarité civique. Elle décrétait l'instruction gratuite. Elle organisait l'éducation nationale par l'école normale à Paris, l'école centrale au chef-lieu, et l'école primaire dans la commune. Elle créait les conservatoires et les musées. Elle décrétait l'unité de code, l'unité de poids et de mesures, et l'unité de calcul par le système décimal. Elle fondait les finances de la France, et à la longue banqueroute monarchique elle faisait succéder le crédit public. Elle donnait à la circulation le télégraphe, à la vieillesse les hospices dotés, à la maladie les hôpitaux purifiés, à l'enseignement l'école polytechnique, à la science le bureau des longitudes, à l'esprit humain l'institut. En même temps que nationale, elle était cosmopolite. Des onze mille deux cent dix décrets qui sont sortis de la Convention, un tiers a un but politique, les deux tiers ont un but humain. Elle déclarait la morale universelle base de la société et la conscience universelle base de la loi. Et tout cela, servitude abolie, fraternité proclamée, humanité protégée, conscience humaine rectifiée, loi du travail transformée en droit et d'onéreuse devenue secourable, richesse nationale consolidée, enfance éclairée et assistée, lettres et sciences propagées, lumière allumée sur tous les sommets, aide à toutes les misères, promulgation de tous les principes, la Convention le faisait, ayant dans les entrailles cette hydre, la Vendée, et sur les épaules ce tas de tigres, les rois.

x

Lieu immense. Tous les types humains, inhumains et surhumains étaient là. Amas épique d'antagonismes. Guillotin évitant David, Bazire insultant Chabot, Guadet raillant Saint-Just, Vergniaud dédaignant Danton, Louvet attaquant Robespierre, Buzot dénonçant Egalité, Chambon flétrissant Pache, tous exécrant Marat. Et que de noms encore il faudrait enregistrer! Arnonville dit Bonnet-Rouge, parce qu'il ne siégeait qu'en bonnet phrygien, ami de Robespierre, et voulant «après Louis XVI, guillotiner

Robespierre» par goût de l’équilibre; Massieu, collègue et ménechme de ce bon Lamourette, évêque fait pour laisser son nom à un baiser: Lehardy du Morbihan stigmatisant les prêtres de Bretagne; Barère, l’homme des majorités, qui présidait quand Louis XVI parut à la barre, et qui était à Paméla ce que Louvet était à Lodoïska; l’oratorien Daunou qui disait: Gagnons du temps; Dubois-Crancé, à l’oreille de qui se penchait Marat; le marquis de Chateauneuf, Laclos, Hérault de Séchelles qui reculait devant Henriot criant: Canonniers, à vos pièces! Julien, qui comparait la Montagne aux Thermopyles; Gamon, qui voulait une tribune publique réservée uniquement aux femmes; Laloy qui décerna les honneurs de la séance à l’évêque Gobel venant à la Convention déposer la mitre et coiffer le bonnet rouge; Lecomte, qui s’écriait: C’est donc à qui se déprêtrisera! Féraud, dont Boissy-d’Anglas saluera la tête, laissant. à l’histoire cette question: — Boissy-d’Anglas a-t-il salué la tête, c’est-à-dire la victime, ou la pique, c’est-à-dire les assassins? — Les deux frères Duprat, l’un montagnard, l’autre girondin, qui se haïssaient comme les deux frères Chénier.

Il s’est dit à cette tribune de ces vertigineuses paroles qui ont quelquefois à l’insu même de celui qui les prononce, l’accent fatidique des révolutions, et à la suite desquelles les faits matériels paraissent avoir brusquement on ne sait quoi de mécontent et de passionné, comme s’ils avaient mal pris les choses qu’on vient d’entendre. Ce qui se passe semble courroucé de ce qui se dit; les catastrophes surviennent furieuses et comme exaspérées par les paroles des hommes. Ainsi une voix dans la montagne suffit pour détacher l’avalanche. Un mot de trop peut être suivi d’un écroulement. Si l’on n’avait pas parlé, cela ne serait pas arrivé. On dirait parfois que les évènements sont irascibles.

C’est de cette façon, c’est par le hasard d’un mot d’orateur mal compris qu’est tombée la tête de madame Elisabeth.

A la Convention, l’intempérance de langage était de droit.

Les menaces volaient et se croisaient dans la discussion comme les flammèches dans l’incendie. — PETION: Robespierre, venez au fait. — ROBESPIERRE: Le fait, c’est vous, Pétion, J’y viendrai, et vous le verrez. — UNE VOIX: Mort à Marat! — MARAT: Le jour où Marat mourra, il n’y aura plus de Paris, et le jour où Paris périra, il n’y aura plus de république. — Billaud-Varenne se lève et dit: Nous voulons… — Barère l’interrompt: Tu parles comme un roi. — Un autre jour, PHILIPPEAUX: Un membre a tiré l’épée contre moi. — AUDOIN: Président, rappelez à l’ordre l’assassin.

Le Président: Attendez. — PANIS: Président, je vous rappelle à l'ordre moi. — On riait aussi, rudement. — LECOINTRE: Le curé de Chant-de-Bout se plaint de Fauchet son évêque, qui lui défend de se marier. — UNE VOIX: Je ne vois pas pourquoi Fauchet, qui a des maîtresses, veut empêcher les autres d'avoir des épouses. — UNE AUTRE VOIX: Prêtre, prends femme! — Les tribunes se mêlaient à la conversation. Elles tutoyaient l'assemblée. Un jour le représentant Ruamps monte à la tribune. Il avait une «hanche» beaucoup plus grosse que l'autre. Un des spectateurs lui cria: — Tourne ça du côté de la droite, puisque tu as une «joue» à la David! — Telles étaient les libertés que le peuple prenait avec la Convention. Une fois pourtant, dans le tumulte du 11 avril 1795, le président fit arrêter un interrupteur des tribunes.

Un jour, cette séance a eu pour témoin le vieux Buonarotti, Robespierre prend la parole et parle deux heures. Regardant Danton tantôt fixement, ce qui était grave, tantôt obliquement, ce qui était pire. Il foudroie à bout portant. Il termine par une explosion indignée, pleine de mots funèbres: — On connaît les intrigants, on connaît les corrupteurs et les corrompus, on connaît les traîtres; ils sont dans cette assemblée. Ils nous entendent, nous les voyons et nous ne les quittons pas des yeux. Qu'ils regardent au-dessus de leur tête, et ils y verront le glaive de la loi. Qu'ils regardent dans leur conscience, et ils y verront leur infamie. Qu'ils prennent garde à eux. — Et, quand Robespierre a fini, Danton, la face au plafond, les yeux à demi fermés, un bras pendant par-dessus le dossier de son banc, se renverse en arrière, et on l'entend fredonner:

Cadet Roussel fait des discours
Qui ne sont pas longs quand ils sont courts.

Les imprécations se donnaient la réplique. — Conspirateur! — Assassin! — Scélérat! — Factieux! — Modéré! — On se dénonçait au buste de Brutus qui était là. Apostrophes, injures, défis. Regards furieux d'un côté à l'autre. Poings montrés, pistolets entrevus, poignards à demi tirés. Enorme flamboiement de la tribune. Quelques-uns parlaient comme s'ils étaient adossés à la guillotine. Les têtes ondulaient, épouvantées et terribles. Montagnards, girondins, feuillants, modérantistes, terroristes, jacobins, cordeliers; dix-huit prêtres régicides.

Tous ces hommes! tas de fumées poussées dans tous les sens.

xi

Esprits en proie au vent.

Mais ce vent était un vent de prodige.

Etre un membre de la Convention, c'était être une vague de l'océan. Et ceci était vrai des plus grands. La force d'impulsion venait d'en haut. Il y avait dans la Convention une volonté qui était celle de tous et n'était celle de personne. Cette volonté était une idée, idée indomptable et démesurée qui soufflait dans l'ombre du haut du ciel. Nous appelons cela la Révolution. Quand cette idée passait, elle abattait l'un et soulevait l'autre; elle emportait celui-ci en écume et brisait celui-là aux écueils. Cette idée savait où elle allait, et poussait le gouffre devant elle. Imputer la révolution aux hommes, c'est imputer la marée aux flots.

La révolution est une action de l'Inconnu. Appelez-la bonne action ou mauvaise action, selon que vous aspirez à l'avenir ou au passé, mais laissez-la à celui qui l'a faite. Elle semble l'uvre en commun des grands évènements et des grands individus mêlés, mais elle est en réalité la résultante des évènements. Les évènements dépensent, les hommes payent. Les évènements dictent, les hommes signent. Le 14 juillet est signé Camille Desmoulins, le 10 août est signé Danton, le 2 septembre est signé Marat, le 21 septembre est signé Grégoire, le 21 janvier est signé Robespierre; mais Desmoulins, Danton, Marat, Grégoire et Robespierre ne sont que des greffiers. Le rédacteur énorme et sinistre de ces grandes pages a un nom, Dieu, et un masque, Destin. Robespierre croyait en Dieu. Certes!

La révolution est une forme du phénomène immanent qui nous presse de toutes parts et que nous appelons la Nécessité.

Devant cette mystérieuse complication de bienfaits et de souffrances se dresse le Pourquoi? de l'histoire.

Parce que. Cette réponse de celui qui ne sait rien est aussi la réponse de celui qui sait tout.

En présence de ces catastrophes climatériques qui dévastent et vivifient la civilisation, on hésite à juger le détail. Blâmer ou louer les hommes à cause du résultat, c'est presque comme si on louait ou blâmait les chiffres à cause du total. Ce qui doit passer passe, ce qui doit souffler souffle. La sérénité éternelle ne souffre pas de ces aquilons. Au-dessus des révolutions la vérité et la justice demeurent comme le ciel étoilé au-dessus des tempêtes.

xii

Telle était cette Convention démesurée; camp retranché du genre humain attaqué par toutes les ténèbres à la fois, feux nocturnes d'une armée d'idées assiégées, immense bivouac d’esprits sur un versant d’abîme. Rien dans l’histoire n’est comparable à ce groupe, à la fois sénat et populace, conclave et carrefour, aéropage et place publique, tribunal et accusé.

La Convention a toujours ployé au vent: mais ce vent sortait de la bouche du peuple et était le souffle de Dieu.

Et aujourd’hui, après quatre-vingts ans écoulés, chaque fois que devant la pensée d’un homme, quel qu’il soit, historien ou philosophe, la Convention apparaît, cet homme s’arrête et médite. Impossible de ne pas être attentif à ce grand passage d’ombres.

II. MARAT DANS LA COULISSE

Comme il l'avait annoncé à Simonne Evrard, Marat, le lendemain de la rencontre de la rue du Paon, alla à la Convention.

Il y avait à la Convention un marquis maratiste, Louis de Montaut, celui qui plus tard offrit à la Convention une pendule décimale surmontée du buste de Marat.

Au moment où Marat entrait, Chabot venait de s'approcher de Montaut.

— Ci-devant…, dit-il.

Montaut leva les yeux.

— Pourquoi m'appelles-tu ci-devant?

— Parce que tu l'es.

— Moi?

— Puisque tu étais marquis.

— Jamais.

— Bah!

— Mon père était soldat, mon grand-père était tisserand.

— Qu'est-ce que tu nous chantes là, Montaut?

— Je ne m'appelle pas Montaut.

— Comment donc t'appelles-tu?

— Je m'appelle Maribon.

— Au fait, dit Chabot, cela m'est égal.

Et il ajouta entre ses dents:

— C'est à qui ne sera pas marquis.

Marat s'était arrêté dans le couloir de gauche et regardait Montaut et Chabot.

Toutes les fois que Marat entrait, il y avait une rumeur; mais loin de lui. Autour de lui on se taisait. Marat n'y prenait pas garde. Il dédaignait le «coassement du marais».

Dans la pénombre des bancs obscurs d'en bas. Coupé de l'Oise, Prunelle,

Villars, évêque, qui plus tard fut membre de l'Académie française,

Boutroue, Petit, Plaichard, Bonet, Thibaudeau, Valdruche, se le montraient du doigt.

— Tiens! Marat!

— Il n’est donc pas malade?

— Si, puisqu’il est en robe de chambre.

— En robe de chambre?

— Pardieu oui!

— Il se permet tout!

— Il ose venir ainsi à la Convention!

— Puisqu’un jour il y est venu coiffé de lauriers, il peut bien y venir en robe de chambre!

— Face de cuivre et dents de vert-de-gris.

— Sa robe de chambre paraît neuve.

— En quoi est-elle?

— En reps.

— Rayé.

— Regardez donc les revers.

— Ils sont en peau.

— De tigre.

— Non, d’hermine.

— Fausse.

— Et il a des bas!

— C’est étrange.

— Et des souliers à boucles.

— D’argent!

— Voilà ce que les sabots de Camboulas ne lui pardonneront pas.

Sur d’autres bancs on affectait de ne pas voir Marat. On causait d’autre chose. Santhonax abordait Dussaulx.

— Vous savez, Dussaulx?

— Quoi?

— Le ci-devant comte de Brienne?

— Qui était à la Force avec le ci-devant duc de Villeroy?

— Oui.

— Je les ai connus tous les deux. Eh bien?

— Ils avaient si grand’peur qu’ils saluaient tous les bonnets rouges de tous les guichetiers, et qu’un jour ils ont refusé de jouer une partie de piquet parce qu’on leur présentait un jeu de cartes à rois et à reines.

— Eh bien?

— On les a guillotinés hier.

— Tous les deux?

— Tous les deux.

— En somme, comment avaient-ils été dans la prison?

— Lâches.

— Et comment ont-ils été sur l'échafaud?

— Intrépides.

Et Dussaulx jetait cette exclamation:

— Mourir est plus facile que vivre.

Barère était en train de lire un rapport: il s'agissait de la Vendée. Neuf cents hommes du Morbihan étaient partis avec du canon pour secourir Nantes. Redon était menacé par les paysans. Paimboeuf était attaqué. Une station navale croisait à Maindrin pour empêcher les descentes. Depuis Ingrande jusqu'à Maure, toute la rive gauche de la Loire était hérissée de batteries royalistes. Trois mille paysans étaient maîtres de Pornic. Ils criaient Vivent les Anglais! Une lettre de Santerre à la Convention, que Barère lisait, se terminait ainsi: «Sept mille paysans ont attaqué Vannes. Nous les avons repoussés, et ils ont laissé dans nos mains quatre canons…»

— Et combien de prisonniers? interrompit une voix.

Barère continua… — Post-scriptum de la lettre: «Nous n'avons pas de prisonniers, parce que nous n'en faisons plus.»

[Footnote 1: Moniteur, t. XIX, p. 81.]

Marat toujours immobile n'écoutait pas, il était comme absorbé par une préoccupation sévère.

Il tenait dans sa main et froissait entre ses doigts un papier sur lequel quelqu'un qui l'eût déplié eût pu lire ces lignes, qui étaient de l'écriture de Momoro et qui étaient probablement une réponse à une question posée par Marat:

« — Il n'y a rien à faire contre l'omnipotence des commissaires délégués, surtout contre les délégués du Comité de salut public. Génissieux a eu beau dire dans la séance du 6 mai: «Chaque commissaire est plus qu'un Roi», cela n'y fait rien. Ils ont pouvoir de vie et de mort. Massade à Angers, Trullard à Saint-Amand, Nyon près du général Marcé, Parrein à l'armée des Sables, Millier à l'armée de Niort, sont tout-puissants. Le club des Jacobins a été jusqu'à nommer Parrein général de brigade. Les circonstances absolvent tout. Un délégué du Comité de salut public tient en échec un général en chef.»

Marat acheva de froisser le papier, le mit dans sa poche, et s'avança lentement vers Montaut et Chabot qui continuaient à causer et qui ne l’avaient pas vu entrer.

Chabot disait:

— Maribon ou Montaut, écoute ceci: je sors du comité de salut public.

— Et qu’y fait-on?

— On y donne un noble à garder à un prêtre.

— Ah!

— Un noble comme toi…

— Je ne suis pas noble, dit Montaut.

— A un prêtre…

— Comme toi.

— Je ne suis pas prêtre, dit Chabot.

Tous deux se mirent à rire.

— Précise l’anecdote, repartit Montaut.

Voici ce que c’est. Un prêtre appelé Cimourdain est délégué avec pleins pouvoirs près d’un vicomte nommé Gauvain; ce vicomte commande la colonne expéditionnaire de l’armée des Côtes. Il s’agit d’empêcher le noble de tricher et le prêtre de trahir.

— C’est bien simple, répondit Montaut. Il n’y a qu’à mettre la mort dans l’aventure.

— Je viens pour cela, dit Marat.

Ils levèrent la tête.

— Bonjour, Marat, dit Chabot, tu assistes rarement à nos séances.

— Mon médecin me commande les bains, répondit Marat.

— Il faut se défier des bains, reprit Chabot; Sénèque est mort dans un bain.

Marat sourit:

— Chabot, il n’y a pas ici de Néron.

— Il y a toi, dit une voix rude.

C’était Danton qui passait et qui montait à son banc.

Marat ne se retourna pas.

Il pencha sa tête entre les deux visages de Montaut et de Chabot.

— Ecoutez. Je viens pour une chose sérieuse. Il faut qu’un de nous trois propose aujourd’hui un projet de décret à la Convention.

— Pas moi, dit Montaut; on ne m’écoute pas, je suis marquis.

— Moi, dit Chabot, on ne m’écoute pas, je suis capucin.

— Et moi, dit Marat, on ne m’écoute pas, je suis Marat.

Il y eut entre eux un silence.

Marat préoccupé n’était pas aisé à interroger. Montaut pourtant hasarda une question.

— Marat, quel est le décret que tu désires?

— Un décret qui punisse de mort tout chef militaire qui fait évader un rebelle prisonnier.

Chabot intervint.

— Ce décret existe. On a voté cela fin avril.

— Alors c’est comme s’il n’existait pas, dit Marat. Partout, dans toute la Vendée, c’est à qui fera évader les prisonniers, et l’asile est impuni.

— Marat, c’est que le décret est en désuétude.

— Chabot, il faut le remettre en vigueur.

— Sans doute.

— Et pour cela parler à la Convention.

— Marat, la Convention n’est pas nécessaire; le comité de salut public suffit.

— Le but est atteint, ajouta Montaut, si le comité de salut public fait placarder le décret dans toutes les communes de la Vendée, et fait deux ou trois bons exemples.

— Sur les grandes têtes, reprit Chabot. Sur les généraux.

Marat grommela: — En effet, cela suffira.

— Marat, repartit Chabot, va toi-même dire cela au comité de salut public.

Marat le regarda entre les deux yeux, ce qui n’était pas agréable, même pour Chabot.

— Chabot, dit-il, le comité de salut public, c’est chez Robespierre. Je ne vais pas chez Robespierre.

— J’irai, moi, dit Montaut.

— Bien, dit Marat.

Le lendemain était expédié dans toutes les directions un ordre du comité de salut public enjoignant d’afficher dans les villes et villages de Vendée et de faire exécuter strictement le décret portant peine de mort contre toute connivence dans les évasions de brigands et d’insurgés prisonniers.

Ce décret n’était qu’un premier pas. La Convention devait aller plus loin encore. Quelques mois après, le 11 brumaire au 11 novembre 1795, à propos de Laval qui avait ouvert ses portes aux Vendéens fugitifs, elle décréta que toute ville qui donnerait asile aux rebelles serait démolie et détruite.

De leur côté, les princes de l’Europe, dans le manifeste du duc de Brunswick, inspiré par les émigrés et rédigé par le marquis de Linnon, intendant du duc d’Orléans, avaient déclaré que tout français pris les armes à la main serait fusillé, et que, si un cheveu tombait de la tête du roi, Paris serait rasé.

Sauvagerie contre barbarie.

TROISIÈME PARTIE

EN VENDÉE

LIVRE PREMIER

LA VENDÉE

I. LES FORÊTS

Il y avait alors en Bretagne sept forêts horribles. La Vendée, c'est la révolte-prêtre. Cette révolte a eu pour auxiliaire la forêt. Les ténèbres s'entr'aident.

Les sept forêts-Noires de Bretagne étaient la forêt de Fougères qui barre le passage entre Dol et Avranches; la forêt de Princé qui a huit lieues de tour; la forêt de Paimpont, pleine de ravines et de ruisseaux, presque inaccessible du côté de Baignon, avec une retraite facile sur Concornet qui était un bourg royaliste; la forêt de Rennes d'où l'on entendait le tocsin des paroisses républicaines, toujours nombreuses près des villes; c'est là que Puysaye perdit Focard; la forêt de Machecoul qui avait Charette pour bête fauve; la forêt de la Garnache qui était aux La Trémoille, aux Gauvain et aux Rohan; la forêt de Brocéliande qui était aux fées.

Un gentilhomme en Bretagne avait le titre de seigneur des Sept-Forêts.

C'était le vicomte de Fontenay, prince breton.

Car le prince breton existait, distinct du prince français. Les Rohan étaient princes bretons. Garnier de Saintes, dans son rapport à la Convention, 13 nivôse an II, qualifie ainsi le prince de Talmont: «Ce Capet des brigands, souverain du Maine et de la Normandie.»

L'histoire des forêts bretonnes, de 1792 à 1800 pourrait être faite à part, et elle se mêlerait de la vaste aventure de la Vendée comme une légende.

L'histoire a sa vérité, la légende a la sienne. La vérité légendaire est d'une autre nature que la vérité historique. La vérité légendaire, c'est l'invention ayant pour résultat la réalité. Du reste, l'histoire et la légende ont le même but, peindre sous l'homme momentané l'homme éternel.

La Vendée ne peut être complètement expliquée que si la légende complète l'histoire; il faut l'histoire pour l'ensemble et la légende pour le détail.

Disons que la Vendée en vaut la peine. La Vendée est un prodige.

Cette Guerre des Ignorants, si stupide et si splendide, abominable et magnifique, a désolé et enorgueilli la France. La Vendée est une plaie qui est une gloire.

A de certaines heures la société humaine a ses énigmes, énigmes qui pour les sages se résolvent en lumière et pour les ignorants en obscurité, en violence et en barbarie. Le philosophe hésite à accuser. Il tient compte du trouble que produisent les problèmes. Les problèmes ne passent point sans jeter au-dessous d’eux une ombre comme les nuages.

Si l’on veut comprendre la Vendée, qu’on se figure cet antagonisme, d’un côté la révolution française, de l’autre le paysan breton. En face de ces évènements incomparables, menace immense de tous les bienfaits à la fois, accès de colère de la civilisation, excès du progrès furieux, amélioration démesurée et inintelligible, qu’on place ce sauvage grave et singulier, cet homme à l’œil clair et aux longs cheveux, vivant de lait et de châtaignes, borné à son toit de chaume, à sa haie et à son fossé, distinguant chaque hameau du voisinage au son de la cloche, ne se servant de l’eau que pour boire, ayant sur le dos une veste de cuir avec des arabesques de soie, inculte et brodé, tatouant ses habits, comme ses ancêtres les celtes avaient tatoué leurs visages, respectant son maître dans son bourreau, Parlant une langue morte, ce qui est faire habiter une tombe à sa pensée, piquant ses bœufs, aiguisant sa faulx, sarclant son blé noir, pétrissant sa galette de sarrasin, vénérant sa charrue d’abord, sa grand’mère ensuite, croyant à la sainte Vierge et à la Dame blanche, dévot à l’autel et aussi à la haute pierre mystérieuse debout au milieu de la lande, laboureur dans la plaine, pêcheur sur la côte, braconnier dans le hallier, aimant ses rois, ses seigneurs, ses prêtres, ses poux: pensif, immobile souvent des heures entières sur la grande grève déserte, sombre écouteur de la mer.

Et qu’on se demande si cet aveugle pouvait accepter cette clarté.

II. LES HOMMES

Le paysan a deux points d’appui: le champ qui le nourrit, le bois qui le cache.

Ce qu’étaient les forêts bretonnes, on se le figurerait difficilement; c’étaient des villes. Rien de plus sourd, de plus muet et de plus sauvage que ces inextricables enchevêtrements d’épines et de branchages, ces vastes broussailles étaient des gîtes d’immobilité et de silence; pas de solitude d’apparence plus morte et plus sépulcrale; si l’on eût pu, subitement et d’un seul coup pareil à l’éclair, couper les arbres, on eût brusquement vu dans cette ombre un fourmillement d’hommes.

Des puits ronds et étroits, masqués au dehors par des le couvercles de pierre et de branches, verticaux, puis horizontaux, s’élargissant sous terre en entonnoir, et aboutissant à des chambres ténébreuses, voilà ce que Cambyse trouva en Egypte et ce que Westermann trouva en Bretagne; là c’était dans le désert, ici c’était dans la forêt; dans les caves d’Egypte il y avait des morts, dans les caves de Bretagne il y avait des vivants. Une des plus sauvages clairières du bois de Misdon, toute perforée de galeries et de cellules où allait et venait un peuple mystérieux, s’appelait «la Grande ville». Une autre clairière non moins déserte en dessus et non moins habitée en dessous, s’appelait «la Place royale».

Cette vie souterraine était immémoriale en Bretagne. De tout temps l’homme y avait été en fuite devant l’homme. De là les tanières de reptiles creusées sous les racines des arbres. Cela datait des druides, et quelques-unes de ces cryptes étaient aussi anciennes que les dolmens. Les larves de la légende et les monstres de l’histoire, tout avait passé sur ce noir pays. Teutatès, César, Noël, Néomène, Geoffroy d’Angleterre, Alain-gant-de-fer, Pierre Mauclair, la maison française de Blois, la maison anglaise de Montfort, les rois et les ducs, les neuf barons de Bretagne, les juges des Grands-Jours, les comtes de Nantes querellant les comtes de Rennes, les routiers, les malandrins, les grandes compagnies, René II, vicomte de Rohan, les gouverneurs pour le roi, le «bon duc de Chaulnes» branchant les paysans sous les fenêtres de madame de Sévigné, au quinzième siècle les boucheries seigneuriales, au seizième et au dix-septième siècles les guerres de religion, au dix-huitième siècle les trente mille chiens dressés à chasser aux hommes; sous ce piétinement effroyable le peuple avait pris le parti de disparaître. Tour à tour les troglodytes pour échapper aux celtes, les celtes pour échapper aux romains, les bretons pour échapper aux normands, les huguenots pour échapper aux catholiques, les contrebandiers pour échapper aux gabelous, s'étaient réfugiés d'abord dans les forêts, puis sous la terre. Ressource des bêtes. C'est là que la tyrannie réduit les nations. Depuis deux mille ans, le despotisme sous toutes ses espèces, la conquête, la féodalité, le fanatisme, le fisc, traquaient cette misérable Bretagne éperdue, sorte de battue inexorable qui ne cessait sous une forme que pour recommencer sous l'autre. Les hommes se terraient.

L'épouvante, qui est une sorte de colère, était toute prête dans les âmes, et les tanières étaient toutes prêtes dans les bois, quand la république française éclata. La Bretagne se révolta, se trouvant opprimée par cette délivrance de force. Méprise habituelle aux esclaves.

III. CONNIVENCE DES HOMMES ET DES FORÊTS

Les tragiques forêts bretonnes reprirent leur vieux rôle et furent servantes et complices de cette rébellion, comme elles l'avaient été de toutes les autres.

Le sous-sol de telle forêt était une sorte de madrépore percé et traversé en tous sens par une voirie inconnue de sapes, de cellules et de galeries. Chacune de ces cellules aveugles abritait cinq ou six hommes. La difficulté était d'y respirer. On a de certains chiffres étranges qui font comprendre cette puissante organisation de la vaste émeute paysanne. En Ille-et-Vilaine, dans la forêt du Pertre, asile du de Talmont, on n'entendait pas un souffle, on ne trouvait pas une trace humaine, et il y avait six mille hommes avec Focard; en Morbihan, dans la forêt de Meulac, on ne voyait personne, et il avait huit mille hommes. Ces deux forêts, le Pertre et Meulac, ne comptent pourtant pas parmi les grandes forêts bretonnes. Si l'on marchait là-dessus, c'était terrible. Ces halliers hypocrites, pleins de combattants tapis dans une sorte de labyrinthe sous-jacent, étaient comme d'énormes éponges obscures d'où, sous la pression de ce pied gigantesque, la révolution, jaillissait la guerre civile.

Des bataillons invisibles guettaient. Ces armées ignorées serpentaient sous les armées républicaines, sortaient de terre tout à coup et y rentraient, bondissaient innombrables et s'évanouissaient, douées d'ubiquité et de dispersion, avalanche puis poussière, colosses ayant le don de rapetissement, géants pour combattre, nains pour disparaître. Des jaguars ayant des murs de taupes.

Il n'y avait pas que les forêts, il y avait les bois. De même qu'au-dessous des cités il y a les villages, au-dessous des forêts il y avait les broussailles. Les forêts se reliaient entre elles par le dédale, partout épars, des bois. Les anciens châteaux qui étaient des forteresses, les hameaux qui étaient des camps, les fermes qui étaient des enclos faits d'embûches et de pièges, les métairies, ravinées de fossés et palissadées d'arbres, étaient les mailles de ce filet où se prirent les armées républicaines.

Cet ensemble était ce qu'on appelait le Bocage.

Il y avait le bois de Misdon, au centre duquel était un étang, et qui était à Jean Chouan; il y avait le bois de Gennes qui était à Taillefer; il y avait le bois de la Huisserie qui était à Gouge-le-Bruant; le bois de la Charnie qui était à Courtillé-le-Bâtard, dit l’Apôtre saint Paul, chef du camp de la Vache-Noire; le bois de Burgault qui était à cet énigmatique Monsieur Jacques, réservé à une fin mystérieuse dans le souterrain de Juvardeil; il y avait le bois de Charreau où Pimousse et Petit-Prince, attaqués par la garnison de Châteauneuf, allaient prendre à bras-le-corps dans les rangs républicains des grenadiers qu’ils rapportaient prisonniers; le bois de la Heureuserie, témoin de la déroute du poste de Longue-Faye; le bois de l’Aulne d’où l’on épiait la route entre Rennes et Laval; le bois de la Gravelle qu’un prince de la Trémoille avait gagné eu jouant à la boule; le bois de Lorges dans les Côtes-du-Nord, où Charles de Boishardy régna après Bernard de Villeneuve; le bois de Bagnard près Foutenay, où Lescure offrit le combat à Chalbos qui, étant un contre cinq, l’accepta; le bois de la Durondais que se disputèrent jadis Alain le Redru et Hérispoux, fils de Charles le Chauve; le bois de Croqueloup, sur la lisière de cette lande où Coquereau tondait les prisonniers; le bois de la Croix-Bataille qui assista aux insultes homériques de Jambe-d’Argent à Morière et de Morière à Jambe-d’Argent; le bois de la Saudraie que nous avons vu fouiller par un bataillon de Paris. Bien d’autres encore.

Dans plusieurs de ces forêts et de ces bois, il n’y avait pas seulement des villages souterrains groupés autour du terrier du chef; mais il y avait encore de véritables hameaux de huttes basses cachés sous les arbres, et si nombreux que parfois la forêt en était remplie. Souvent les fumées les trahissaient. Deux de ces hameaux du bois de Misdon sont restés célèbres, Lorrière, près de Létang, et, du côté de Saint-Ouen-les-Toits, le groupe de cabanes appelé la Rue-de-Bau.

Les femmes vivaient dans les huttes et les hommes dans les cryptes. Ils utilisaient pour cette guerre les galeries des fées et les vieilles sapes celtiques. On apportait à manger aux hommes enfouis. Il y en eut qui, oubliés, moururent de faim. C’étaient d’ailleurs des maladroits qui n’avaient pas su rouvrir leurs puits. Habituellement le couvercle fait de mousse et de branches était si artistement façonné, qu’impossible à distinguer du dehors dans l’herbe. Il était très facile à ouvrir et à fermer du dedans. Ces repaires étaient creusés avec soin. On allait jeter à quelque étang voisin la terre qu’on ôtait du puits. La paroi intérieure et le sol étaient tapissés de fougère et de mousse. Ils appelaient ce réduit «la loge». On était bien là, à cela près qu’on était sans jour, sans feu, sans pain et sans air.

Remonter sans précaution parmi les vivants et se déterrer hors de propos était grave. On pouvait se trouver entre les jambes d’une armée en marche. Bois redoutables; pièges à doubles trappes. Les bleus n’osaient entrer, les blancs n’osaient sortir.

IV. LEUR VIE SOUS TERRE

Les hommes dans ces caves de bêtes s’ennuyaient. La nuit, quelquefois, à tout risque, ils sortaient et s’en allaient danser sur la lande voisine. Ou bien ils priaient pour tuer le temps. Tout le jour, dit Bourdoiseau, Jean Chouan nous faisait chapeletter.

Il était presque impossible, la saison venue, d’empêcher ceux du Bas-Maine de sortir pour se rendre à la Fête de la Gerbe. Quelques-uns avaient des idées à eux. Denys, dit Tranche-Montagne, se déguisait en femme pour aller à la comédie à Laval; puis il rentrait dans son trou.

Brusquement ils allaient se faire tuer, quittant le cachot pour le sépulcre.

Quelquefois ils soulevaient le couvercle de leur fosse, et ils écoutaient si l’on se battait au loin; ils suivaient de l’oreille le combat. Le feu des républicains était régulier, le feu des royalistes était éparpillé; ceci les guidait. Si les feux de peloton cessaient subitement, c’était signe que les royalistes avaient le dessous; si les feux saccadés continuaient et s’enfonçaient à l’horizon, c’était signe qu’ils avaient le dessus. Les blancs poursuivaient toujours: les bleus jamais, ayant le pays contre eux.

Ces belligérants souterrains étaient admirablement renseignés. Bien de plus rapide que leurs communications, rien de plus mystérieux. Ils avaient rompu tous les ponts, ils avaient démonté toutes les charrettes, et ils trouvaient moyen de tout se dire et de s’avertir de tout. Des relais d’émissaires étaient établis de forêt à forêt, de village à village, de ferme à ferme, de chaumière à chaumière, de buisson à buisson.

Tel paysan qui avait l’air stupide passait portant des dépêches dans son bâton, qui était creux.

Un ancien constituant, Boétidoux, leur fournissait, pour aller et venir d’un bout à l’autre de la Bretagne, des passeports républicains nouveau modèle, avec les noms en blanc, dont ce traître avait des liasses. Il était impossible de les surprendre. Des secrets livres, dit Puysaye à plus de quatre cent mille individus ont été religieusement gardés.

Il semblait, que ce quadrilatère fermé au sud par la ligne des Sables à Thouars, à l’est par la ligne de Thouars à Saumur et par la rivière de Thoué, au nord par la Loire et à l’ouest par l’Océan, eût un même appareil nerveux, et qu’un point de ce sol ne pût tressaillir sans que tout s’ébranlât. En un clin d’oeil on était informé de Noirmoutier à Luçon, et le camp de la Loué savait ce que faisait le camp de la Croix-Morineau. Ou eût dit que les oiseaux s’en mêlaient. Hoche écrivait, 7 messidor, an III: On croirait qu’ils ont des télégraphes.

C’étaient des clans, comme eu Ecosse. Chaque paroisse avait son capitaine.

Cette guerre, mon père l’a faite, et j’en puis parler.

V. LEUR VIE EN GUERRE

Beaucoup n’avaient que des piques. Les bonnes carabines de chasse abondaient. Pas de plus adroits tireurs que les braconniers du Bocage et les contrebandiers du Loroux.

C’étaient des combattants étranges, affreux et intrépides. Le décret de la levée de trois cent mille hommes avait fait sonner le tocsin dans six cents villages. Le pétillement de l’incendie éclata sur tous les points à la fois. Le Poitou et l’Anjou firent explosion le même jour. Disons qu’un premier grondement s’était fait entendre dès 1792, le 8 juillet, un mois avant le 10 août, sur la lande de Kerbader. Alain Redeler, aujourd’hui ignoré, fut le précurseur de La Rochejaquelein et de Jean Chouan. Les royalistes forçaient, sous peine de mort, tous les hommes valides à marcher. Ils réquisitionnaient les attelages, les chariots, les vivres. Tout de suite, Sapinaud eut trois mille soldats. Cathelineau dix mille, Stofflet vingt mille, et Charette fut maître de Noirmoutier. Le vicomte de Scépeaux remua le Haut-Anjou, le chevalier de Dieuzie l’Entre-Vilaine-et- Loire, Tristan-l’Hermite le Bas-Maine, le barbier Gaston la ville de Guéménée, et l’abbé Bernier tout le reste. Pour soulever ces multitudes, peu de chose suffisait. On plaçait dans le tabernacle d’un curé assermenté, d’un prêtre jureur, comme ils disaient, un gros chat noir qui sautait brusquement dehors pendant la messe — C’est le diable! criaient les paysans, et tout un canton s’insurgeait. Un souffle de feu sortait des confessionnaux. Pour assaillir les bleds et pour franchir les ravins, ils avaient leur long bâton de quinze pieds de long, la ferte, arme de combat et de fuite. Au plus fort des mêlées, quand les paysans attaquaient les carrés républicains, s’ils rencontraient sur le champ de combat une croix ou une chapelle, tous tombaient, à genoux et disaient leur prière sous la mitraille; le rosaire fini, ceux qui restaient se relevaient et se ruaient sur l’ennemi. Quels géants, hélas! Ils chargeaient leur fusil en courant; c’était leur talent. On leur faisait accroire ce qu’on voulait: les prêtres leur montraient d’autres prêtres dont ils avaient rougi le cou avec une ficelle serrée, et leur disaient: Ce sont des guillotinés ressuscités. Ils avaient leurs accès de chevalerie; ils honorèrent Fresque, un porte-drapeau républicain qui s’était fait sabrer sans lâcher son drapeau. Ces paysans raillaient; ils appelaient les prêtres mariés républicains des sans-calottes devenus sans-culottes. Ils commencèrent par avoir peur des canons; puis ils se jetèrent dessus avec des bâtons, et ils en prirent. Ils prirent d'abord un beau canon de bronze qu'ils baptisèrent le Missionnaire: puis un autre qui datait des guerres catholiques et où étaient gravées les armes de Richelieu et une figure de la Vierge; ils l'appelèrent Marie-Jeanne. Quand ils perdirent Fontenay, ils perdirent Marie-Jeanne, autour de laquelle tombèrent sans broncher six cents paysans; puis ils reprirent Fontenay afin de reprendre Marie-Jeanne, et ils la ramenèrent sous le drapeau fleurdelysé en la couvrant de fleurs et en la faisant baiser aux femmes qui passaient. Mais deux canons, c'était peu. Stofflet avait pris Marie-Jeanne; Cathelineau, jaloux, partit de Pin-en-Mauge, donna l'assaut à Jallais, et prit un troisième canon; Forest attaqua Saint-Florent et eu prit un quatrième. Deux autres capitaines, Chouppes et Saint-Pol, firent mieux: ils figurèrent des canons par des troncs d'arbres coupés, et des canonniers par des mannequins, et avec cette artillerie, dont ils riaient vaillamment, ils firent reculer les bleus à Mareuil. C'était là leur grande époque. Plus tard, quand Chalbos mit en déroute La Marsonnière, les paysans laissèrent derrière eux sur le champ de bataille déshonoré trente- deux canons aux armes d'Angleterre. L'Angleterre alors payait les princes français, et l'on envoyait «des fonds à monseigneur, écrivait Nantiat le 10 mai 1794, parce qu'on a dit à M. Pitt que cela était décent». Mélinet, dans un rapport du 31 mars, dit: «Le cri des rebelles est Vivent les Anglais!» Les paysans s'attardaient à piller. Ces dévots étaient des voleurs. Les sauvages ont des vices. C'est par là que les prend plus tard la civilisation. Puysaye dit, tome II, page 187: «J'ai préservé plusieurs fois le bourg de Pélan du pillage.» Et plus loin, page 454, il se prive d'entrer à Montfort: «Je fis un circuit pour éviter le pillage des maisons des jacobins.» Ils détroussèrent Chollet; ils mirent à sac Challans. Après avoir manqué Granville, ils pillèrent Ville-Dieu. Ils appelaient masse jacobine ceux des campagnards qui s'étaient ralliés aux bleus, et ils les exterminaient plus que les autres. Ils aimaient le carnage comme des soldats et le massacre comme des brigands. Fusiller les «patauds», c'est- à-dire les bourgeois, leur plaisait; ils appelaient cela «se décarêmer». A Fontenay, un de leurs prêtres, le curé Barbotin, abattit un vieillard d'un coup de sabre. A Saint-Germain-sur-Ille, un de leurs capitaines, gentilhomme, tua d'un coup de fusil le procureur de la commune et lui prit sa montre. A Machecoul, ils mirent les républicains en coupe réglée, à trente par jour; cela dura cinq semaines; chaque chaîne de trente s'appelait «le chapelet». On adossait la chaîne à une fosse creusée et l'on fusillait; les fusillés tombaient dans la fosse parfois vivants; on les enterrait tout de même. Nous avons revu ces murs. Joubert, président du district, eut les poings sciés. Ils mettaient aux prisonniers bleus des menottes coupantes, forgées exprès. Ils les assommaient sur les places publiques en sonnant l'hallali. Charette, qui signait: Fraternité; le chevalier Charrette, et qui avait pour coiffure, comme Marat, un mouchoir noué sur les sourcils, brûla la ville de Pornic et les habitants dans les maisons. Pendant ce temps-là, Carrier était épouvantable. La terreur répliquait à la terreur. L'insurgé breton avait presque la figure de l'insurgé grec, veste courte, fusil en bandoulière, jambières, larges braies pareilles à la fustanelle; le gars ressemblait au klephte. Henri de La Rochejaquelein, à vingt et un ans, partait pour cette guerre avec un bâton et une paire de pistolets. L'armée vendéenne comptait cent cinquante-quatre divisions. Ils faisaient des sièges en règle; ils tinrent trois jours Bressuire bloquée. Dix mille paysans, un vendredi saint, canonnèrent la ville des Sables à boulets rouges. Il leur arriva de détruire en un seul jour quatorze cantonnements républicains, de Montigné à Courbeveilles. À Thouars, sur la haute muraille, on entendait ce dialogue superbe entre La Rochejaquelein et un gars: — Carle! — Me voilà. — Tes épaules que je monte dessus. — Faites. — Ton fusil. — Prenez. — Et La Rochejaquelein sauta dans la ville, et l'on prit sans échelles ces tours qu'avait assiégées Duguesclin. Ils préféraient une cartouche à un louis d'or. Ils pleuraient quand ils perdaient de vue leur clocher. Fuir leur semblait simple; alors les chefs criaient: Jetez vos sabots, gardez vos Fusils! Quand les munitions manquaient, ils disaient leur chapelet et allaient prendre de la poudre dans les caissons de l'artillerie républicaine; plus tard d'Elbée en demanda aux anglais. Quand l'ennemi approchait, s'ils avaient des blessés, ils les cachaient dans les blés ou dans les fougères vierges, et, l'affaire finie, venaient les reprendre. D'uniformes point. Leurs vêtements se délabraient. Paysans et gentilshommes s'habillaient des premiers haillons venus. Roger Mouliniers portait un turban et un dolman pris au magasin de costumes du théâtre de la Flèche; Le chevalier de Beauvilliers avait une robe de procureur et un chapeau de femme par-dessus un bonnet de laine. Tous portaient l'écharpe et la ceinture blanches; les grades se distinguaient par le noeud. Stofflet avait un noeud rouge; La Rochejaquelein avait un noeud noir; Wimpfen, demi-girondin, qui du reste ne sortit pas de Normandie, portait le brassard des carabots de Caen. Ils avaient dans leurs rangs des femmes, madame de Lescure, qui fut plus tard madame de La

Rochejaquelein; Thérèse de Mollien, maitresse de La Rouarie, laquelle brûla la liste des chefs de paroisse; madame de La Rochefoucauld, belle, jeune, le sabre à la main, ralliant les paysans au pied de la grosse tour du chàteau du Puy-Rousseau, et cette Antoinette Adams, dite le chevalier Adams, si vaillante que, prise, on la fusilla, mais debout, par respect. Ce temps épique était cruel. On était des furieux. Madame de Lescure faisait exprès marcher son cheval sur les républicains gisant hors de combat: morts, dit-elle: blessés, peut-être. Quelquefois les hommes trahirent, les femmes jamais. Madeleine Fleury, du Théâtre-Français; passa de La Rouarie à Marat, mais par amour. Les capitaines étaient souvent aussi ignorants que les soldats; M. de Sapinaud ne savait pas l'orthographe, il écrivait: «nous orions de notre cauté.» Les chefs s'entre-haïssaient; les capitaines du marais criaient: A bas ceux du pays haut! Leur cavalerie était peu nombreuse et difficile à former. Puysaye écrit: Tel homme qui me donne gaîment ses deux fils devient froid si je lui demande un de ses Chevaux. Fertes, fourches, faulx, fusils vieux et neufs, couteaux de braconnage, broches gourdins ferrés et cloutés, c'étaient là leurs armes; quelques-uns portaient en sautoir une croix faite de deux os de mort. Ils attaquaient à grands cris, surgissaient subitement de partout, des bois, des collines, des cépées, des chemins creux, s'égaillaient, c'est-à-dire faisaient le croissant, tuaient, exterminaient, foudroyaient et se dissipaient. Quand ils traversaient un bourg républicain, ils coupaient l'arbre de la liberté, le brûlaient, et dansaient en rond autour du feu. Toutes leurs allures étaient nocturnes. Règle du vendéen: être toujours inattendu. Ils faisaient quinze lieues en silence, sans courber une herbe sur leur passage. Le soir venu, après avoir fixé, entre chefs et en conseil de guerre, le lieu où le lendemain matin ils surprendraient les postes républicains, ils chargeaient leurs fusils, marmottaient leur prière, ôtaient leurs sabots, et filaient en longues colonnes, à travers les bois, pieds nus sur la bruyère et sur la mousse, sans un bruit, sans un mot, sans un souffle. Marche de chats dans les ténèbres.

VI. L’AME DE LA TERRE PASSE DANS L’HOMME

La Vendée insurgée ne peut être évaluée à moins de cinq cent mille hommes, femmes et enfants. Un demi-million de combattants, c’est le chiffre donné par Tuffin de la Rouarie.

Les fédéralistes aidaient; la Vendée eut pour complice la Gironde. La Lozère envoyait au Bocage trente mille hommes. Huit départements se coalisaient, cinq en Bretagne, trois en Normandie. Evreux, qui fraternisait avec Caen, se faisait représenter dans la rébellion par Chaumont, son maire, et Gardembas, notable. Buzot, Gorsas et Barbaroux à Caen, Brissot à Mondins, Chassan à Lyon, Rabant-Saint-Etienne à Nîmes, Meillan et Duchâtel en Bretagne, toutes ces bouches soufflaient sur la fournaise.

Il y a en deux Vendées: la grande, qui faisait la guerre des forêts, la petite, qui faisait la guerre des buissons; là est la nuance qui sépare Charette de Jean Chouan. La petite Vendée était naïve, la grande était corrompue; la petite valait mieux. Charette fut fait marquis, lieutenant-général des armées du roi, et grand-croix de Saint-Louis; Jean Chouan resta Jean Chouan. Charette confine au bandit, Jean Chouan au paladin.

Quant à ces chefs magnanimes: Bonchamp, Leseure, La Rochejaquelein, ils se trompèrent. La grande armée catholique a été un effort insensé; le désastre devait suivre. Se figure-t-on une tempête paysanne attaquant Paris, une coalition de villages assiégeant le Panthéon, une meute de noëls et d’oremus aboyant autour de la Marseillaise, la cohue des sabots se ruant sur la légion des esprits? Le Mans et Savenay châtièrent cette folie. Passer la Loire était impossible à la Vendée. Elle pouvait tout, excepté cette enjambée. La guerre civile ne conquiert point. Passer le Rhin complète César et augmente Napoléon; passer la Loire tue La Rochejaquelein. La vraie Vendée, c’est la Vendée chez elle; là elle est plus qu’invulnérable, elle est insaisissable. Le vendéen chez lui est contrebandier, laboureur, soldat, pâtre, braconnier, franc-tireur, chevrier, sonneur de cloches, paysan, espion, assassin, sacristain, bête des bois.

La Rochejaquelein n’est qu’Achille, Jean Chouan est Protée.

La Vendée a avorté. D’autres révoltes ont réussi, la Suisse par exemple. Il y a cette différence entre l’insurgé de montagne comme le suisse et l’insurgé de forêt comme le vendéen, que, presque toujours, fatale influence du milieu, l’un se bat pour un idéal, et l’autre pour des préjugés. L’un plane, l’autre rampe. L’un combat pour l’humanité, l’autre pour la solitude; l’un veut la liberté, l’autre veut l’isolement; l’un défend la commune, l’autre la paroisse. Communes! communes! criaient les héros de Morat. L’un a affaire aux précipices, l’autre aux fondrières; l’un est l’homme des torrents et des écumes, l’autre est l’homme des flaques stagnantes d’où sort la fièvre; l’un a sur la tête l’azur, l’autre une broussaille; l’un est sur une cime, l’autre est dans une ombre.

L’éducation n’est point la même, faite par les sommets ou par les bas-fonds.

La montagne est une citadelle, la forêt est une embuscade; l’une inspire l’audace, l’autre le piège. L’antiquité plaçait les dieux sur les faites et les satyres dans les halliers. Le satyre c’est le sauvage; demi-homme, demi-bête. Les pays libres ont des Apennins, des Alpes, des Pyrénées, un Olympe. Le Parnasse est un mont. Le mont Blanc était le colossal auxiliaire de Guillaume Tell; au fond et au-dessus des immenses luttes des esprits contre la nuit qui emplissent les poèmes de l’Inde, on apertçoit l’Himalaya. La Grèce, l’Espagne, l’Italie, l’Helvétie, ont pour figure la montagne; la Cimmérie, Germanie ou Bretagne, a le bois. La forêt est barbare.

La configuration du sol conseille à l’homme beaucoup d’actions. Elle est complice, plus qu’on ne croit. En présence de certains paysages féroces, on est tenté d’exonérer l’homme et d’incriminer la création; on sent une sourde provocation de la nature; le désert est parfois malsain à la conscience, surtout à la conscience peu éclairée: la conscience peut être géante, cela fait Socrate et Jésus; elle peut être naine, cela fait Attrée et Judas. La conscience petite est vite reptile; les futaies crépusculaires, les ronces, les épines, les marais sous les branches, sont une fatale fréquentation pour elle; elle subit là la mystérieuse infiltration des persuasions mauvaises. Les illusions d’optique, les mirages inexpliqués, les effarements d’heure ou de lieu jettent l’homme dans une sorte d’effroi, demi-religieux, demi-bestial, qui engendre, en temps ordinaires, la superstition, et dans les époques violentes, la brutalité. Les hallucinations tiennent la torche qui éclaire le chemin du meurtre. Il y a du vertige dans le brigand. La prodigieuse nature a un double sens qui éblouit les grands esprits et aveugle les âmes fauves. Quand l’homme est ignorant, quand le désert est visionnaire, l’obscurité de la solitude s’ajoute à l’obscurité de l’intelligence; de là dans l’homme des ouvertures d’abîmes. De certains rochers, de certains ravins, de certains taillis, de certaines claires-voies farouches du soir à travers les arbres, poussent l’homme aux actions folles et atroces. On pourrait presque dire qu’il y a des lieux scélérats.

Que de choses tragiques a vues la sombre colline qui est entre Baignon et Plélan!

Les vastes horizons conduisent l’âme aux idées générales; les horizons circonscrits engendrent les idées partielles; ce qui condamne quelquefois de grands coeurs à être de petits esprits; témoin Jean Chouan.

Les idées générales haïes par les idées partielles, c’est là la lutte même du progrès.

Pays, Patrie, ces deux mots résument toute la guerre de Vendée; querelle de l’idée locale contre l’idée universelle. Paysans contre patriotes.

VII. LA VENDÉE A FINI LA BRETAGNE

La Bretagne est une vieille rebelle. Toutes les fois qu’elle s’était révoltée pendant deux mille ans, elle avait eu raison; la dernière fois, elle a eu tort. Et pourtant au fond, contre la révolution comme contre la monarchie, contre les représentants en mission comme contre les gouverneurs ducs et pairs, contre la planche aux assignats comme contre la ferme des gabelles, quels que fussent les personnages combattant. Nicolas Rapin, François de La Noue, le capitaine Pluviaut et la dame de la Garnache, ou Stofflet, Coquereau et Lechandelier de Pierreville, sous M. de Rohan contre le roi et sous M. de La Rochejaquelein pour le roi, c’était toujours la même guerre que la Bretagne faisait, la guerre de l’esprit local contre l’esprit central.

Ces antiques provinces étaient un étang; courir répugnait à cette eau dormante; le vent qui soufflait ne les vivifiait pas, il les irritait. Finisterre; c’était là que finissait la France, que le champ donné à l’homme se terminait et que la marche des générations s’arrêtait. Halte! criait l’océan à la terre et la barbarie à la civilisation. Toutes les fois que le centre, Paris, donne une impulsion, que cette impulsion vienne de la royauté ou de la république, qu’elle soit dans le sens du despotisme ou dans le sens de la liberté, c’est une nouveauté, et la Bretagne se hérisse. Laissez-nous tranquilles. Qu’est-ce qu’on nous veut? Le Marais prend sa fourche, le Bocage prend sa carabine. Toutes nos tentatives, notre initiative en législation et en éducation, nos encyclopédies, nos philosophies, nos génies, nos gloires, viennent échouer devant le Houroux; le tocsin de Bazouges menace la révolution française, la lande du Faon s’insurge contre nos orageuses places publiques, et la cloche du Haut-des-Prés déclare la guerre à la Tour du Louvre.

Surdité terrible.

L’insurrection vendéenne est un lugubre malentendu.

Échauffourée colossale, chicane de titans, rébellion démesurée, destinée à ne laisser à l’histoire qu’un mot, la Vendée, mot illustre et noir; se suicidant pour des absents, dévouée à l’égoïsme, passant son temps à faire à la lâcheté l’offre d’une immense bravoure; sans calcul, sans stratégie, sans tactique, sans plan, sans but, sans chef, sans responsabilité; montrant à quel point la volonté peut être l’impuissance; chevaleresque et sauvage; l’absurdité en rut, bâtissant contre la lumière un garde-fou de ténèbres; l’ignorance faisant à la vérité, à la justice, au droit, à la raison, à la délivrance, une longue résistance bête et superbe; l’épouvante de huit années, le ravage de quatorze départements, la dévastation des champs, l’écrasement des moissons, l’incendie des villages, la ruine des villes, le pillage des maisons, le massacre des femmes et des enfants, la torche dans les chaumes, l’épée dans les coeurs, l’effroi de la civilisation, l’espérance de M. Pitt; telle fut cette guerre, essai inconscient de parricide.

En somme, en démontrant la nécessité de trouer dans tous les sens la vieille ombre bretonne et de percer cette broussaille de toutes les flèches de la lumière à la fois, la Vendée a servi le progrès. Les catastrophes ont une sombre façon d’arranger les choses.

LIVRE DEUXIÈME

LES TROIS ENFANTS

I. PLUS QUAM CIVILIA BELLA

L’été de 1792 avait été très pluvieux; l’été de 1793 fut très chaud. Par suite de la guerre civile, il n’y avait, pour ainsi dire plus de chemins en Bretagne. On y voyageait pourtant, grâce à la beauté de l’été. La meilleure route est une terre sèche.

A la fin d’une sereine journée de juillet, une heure environ après le soleil couché, un homme à cheval, qui venait du côté d’Avranches, s’arrêta devant la petite auberge dite la Croix-Branchard, qui était à l’entrée de Pontorson, et dont l’enseigne portait cette inscription qu’on y lisait encore il y a quelques années: Bon cidre à depoteyer. Il avait fait chaud tout le jour, mais le vent commençait à souffler.

Ce voyageur était enveloppé d’un ample manteau qui couvrait la croupe de son cheval. Il portait un large chapeau avec cocarde tricolore, ce qui n’était point sans hardiesse dans ce pays de haies et de coups de fusil où une cocarde était une cible. Le manteau noué au cou s’écartait pour laisser les bras libres, et dessous on pouvait entrevoir une ceinture tricolore et deux pommeaux de pistolets sortant de la ceinture. Un sabre qui pendait dépassait le manteau.

Au bruit du cheval qui s’arrêtait, la porte de l’auberge s’ouvrit, et l’aubergiste parut, une lanterne à la main. C’était l’heure intermédiaire; il faisait jour sur la route et nuit dans la maison.

L’hôte regarda la cocarde.

— Citoyen, dit-il, vous arrêtez-vous ici?

— Non.

— Où donc allez-vous?

— A Dol.

— En ce cas, retournez à Avranches ou restez à Pontorson.

— Pourquoi?

— Parce qu’on se bat à Dol.

— Ah! dit le cavalier.

Et il reprit:

— Donnez l’avoine à mon cheval.

L’hôte apporta l’auge, y vida un sac d’avoine, et débrida le cheval qui se mit souffler et à manger.

Le dialogue continua.

— Citoyen, est-ce un cheval de réquisition?

— Non.

— Il est à vous?

— Oui. Je l’ai acheté et payé.

— D’où venez-vous?

— De Paris.

— Pas directement?

— Non.

— Je crois bien, les routes sont interceptées. Mais la poste marche encore.

— Jusqu’à Alençon. J’ai quitté la poste là.

— Ah! il n’y aura bientôt plus de postes en France. Il n’y a plus de chevaux. Un cheval de trois cents francs se paye six cents francs, et les fourrages sont hors de prix. J’ai été maître de poste et me voilà gargotier. Sur treize cent treize maîtres de poste qu’il y avait, deux cents ont donné leur démission. Citoyen, vous avez voyagé d’après le nouveau tarif?

— Du premier mai. Oui.

— Vingt sous par poste dans la voiture, douze sous dans le cabriolet, cinq sous dans le fourgon. C’est à Alençon que vous avez acheté ce cheval?

— Oui.

— Vous avez marché aujourd’hui toute la journée?

— Depuis l’aube.

— Et hier?

— Et avant-hier.

— Je vois cela. Vous êtes venu par Domfront et Mortain.

— Et Avranches.

— Croyez-moi, reposez-sous, citoyen. Vous devez être fatigué, votre cheval l’est.

— Les chevaux ont droit à la fatigue, les hommes non.

Le regard de l’hôte se fixa de nouveau sur le voyageur. C’était une figure grave, calme et sévère, encadrée de cheveux gris.

L’hôtelier jeta un coup d’oeil sur la route qui était déserte à perte de vue, et dit:

— Et vous voyagez seul comme cela?

— J’ai une escorte.

— Où ça?

— Mon sabre et mes pistolets.

L’aubergiste alla chercher un seau d’eau et fit boire le cheval, et, pendant que le cheval buvait, l’hôte considérait le voyageur et se disait en lui-même: — C’est égal, il a l’air d’un prêtre.

Le cavalier reprit:

— Vous dites qu’on se bat à Dol?

— Oui. Ça doit commencer dans ce moment-ci.

— Qui est-ce qui se bat?

— Un ci-devant contre un ci-devant.

— Vous dites?

— Je dis qu’un ci-devant qui est pour la république se bat contre un ci-devant qui est pour le roi.

— Mais il n’y a plus de roi.

— Il y a le petit. Et le curieux, c’est que les deux ci-devant sont deux parents.

Le cavalier écoutait attentivement. L’aubergiste poursuivit:

— L’un est jeune, l’autre est vieux. C’est le petit-neveu qui se bat contre le grand-oncle. L’oncle est royaliste, le neveu est patriote. L’oncle commande les blancs, le neveu commande les bleus. Ah! ils ne se feront pas quartier, allez. C’est une guerre à mort.

— A mort?

— Oui, citoyen. Tenez, voulez-vous voir les politesses qu’ils se jettent à la tête? Ceci est une affiche que le vieux trouve moyen de faire placarder partout, sur toutes les maisons et sur tous les arbres, et qu’il a fait coller jusque sur ma porte.

L’hôte approcha sa lanterne d’un carré de papier appliqué sur un des battants de sa porte, et, comme l’affiche était en très gros caractères, le cavalier, du haut de son cheval, put lire:

« — Le marquis de Lantenac a l’honneur d’informer son petit-neveu, monsieur le vicomte Gauvain, que, si monsieur le marquis a la bonne fortune de se saisir de sa personne, il fera bellement arquebuser monsieur le vicomte.»

— Et, poursuivit l’hôtelier, voici la réponse.

Il se retourna, et éclaira de sa lanterne une autre affiche placée en regard de la première sur l’autre battant de la porte. Le voyageur lut:

« — Gauvain prévient Lantenac que s’il le prend il le fera fusiller.»

— Hier, dit l’hôte, le premier placard a été collé sur ma porte, et ce matin le second. La réplique ne s’est pas fait attendre.

Le voyageur, à demi-voix, et comme se parlant à lui-même, prononça ces quelques mots, que l’aubergiste entendit sans trop les comprendre:

— Oui, c’est plus que la guerre dans la patrie, c’est la guerre dans la famille. Il le faut, et c’est bien. Les grands rajeunissements des peuples sont à ce prix.

Et le voyageur portant la main à son chapeau, l’il fixé sur la deuxième affiche, la salua.

L’hôte continua:

— Voyez-vous, citoyen, voici l’affaire. Dans les villes et dans les gros bourgs nous sommes pour la révolution, dans la campagne ils sont contre; autant dire dans les villes on est français et dans les villages on est breton. C’est une guerre de bourgeois à pays. Ils nous appellent patauds, nous les appelons rustauds. Les nobles et les prêtres sont avec eux.

— Pas tous, interrompit le cavalier.

— Sans doute, citoyen, puisque nous avons ici un vicomte contre un marquis.

Et il ajouta à part lui:

— Et que je crois bien que je parle à un prêtre.

Le cavalier continua:

— Et lequel des deux l’emporte?

— Jusqu’à présent, le vicomte. Mais il a de la peine. Le vieux est rude. Ces gens-là, c’est la famille Gauvain, des nobles d’ici. C’est une famille à deux branches; il y a la grande branche dont le chef s’appelle le marquis de Lantenac, et la petite branche dont le chef s’appelle le vicomte Gauvain. Aujourd’hui les deux branches se battent. Cela ne se voit pas chez les arbres, mais cela se voit chez les hommes. Ce marquis de Lantenac est tout-puissant en Bretagne; pour les paysans, c’est un prince. Le jour de son débarquement, il a eu tout de suite huit mille hommes; en une semaine trois cents paroisses ont été soulevées. S’il avait pu prendre un coin de la côte, les Anglais débarquaient. Heureusement ce Gauvain s’est trouvé là, qui est son petit-neveu, drôle d’aventure. Il est commandant républicain, et il a rembarré son grand-oncle. Et puis le bonheur a voulu que ce Lantenac, en arrivant et en massacrant une masse de prisonniers, ait fait fusiller deux femmes, dont une avait trois enfants qui étaient adoptés par un bataillon de Paris. Alors cela a fait un bataillon terrible. Il s'appelle le bataillon du Bonnet-Rouge. Il n'en reste pas beaucoup de ces parisiens-là, mais ce sont de furieuses bayonnettes. Ils ont été incorporés dans la colonne du commandant Gauvain. Rien ne leur résiste. Ils veulent venger les femmes et ravoir les enfants. On ne sait pas ce que le vieux en a fait, de ces petits. C'est ce qui enrage les grenadiers de Paris. Supposez que ces enfants n'y soient pas mêlés, cette guerre-là ne serait pas ce qu'elle est. Le vicomte est un bon et brave jeune homme. Mais le vieux est un effroyable marquis. Les paysans appellent ça la guerre de saint Michel contre Belzébuth. Vous savez peut-être que saint Michel est un ange du pays. Il a une montagne à lui au milieu de la mer dans la baie. Il passe pour avoir fait tomber le démon et pour l'avoir enterré sous une autre montagne qui est près d'ici, et qu'on appelle Tombelaine.

— Oui, murmura le cavalier, Tumba Beleni, la tombe de Belenus, de Belus, de Bel, de Bélial, de Belzébuth.

— Je vois que vous êtes informé.

Et l'hôte se dit en aparté:

— Décidément, il sait le latin, c'est un prêtre.

Puis il reprit:

— Eh bien, citoyen, pour les paysans, c'est cette guerre-là qui recommence. Il va sans dire que pour eux saint Michel, c'est le général royaliste, et Belzébuth, c'est le commandant patriote; mais s'il y a un diable, c'est bien Lantenac, et s'il y a un ange, c'est Gauvain. Vous ne prenez rien, citoyen?

— J'ai ma gourde et un morceau de pain. Mais vous ne me dites pas ce qui se passe à Dol.

— Voici. Gauvain commande la colonne d'expédition de la côte. Le but de Lantenac était d'insurger tout, d'appuyer la Basse-Bretagne sur la Basse-Normandie, d'ouvrir la porte à Pitt, et de donner un coup d'épaule à la grande armée vendéenne avec vingt mille Anglais et deux cent mille Paysans. Gauvain a coupé court à ce plan. Il tient la côte, et il repousse Lantenac dans l'intérieur et les Anglais dans la mer. Lantenac était ici, et il l'en a délogé; il lui a repris le Pont-au-Beau; il l'a chassé d'Avranches, il l'a chassé de Villedieu, il l'a empêché d'arriver à Granville. Il manuvre pour le refouler dans la forêt de Fougères, et l'y cerner. Tout allait bien. Le vieux, qui est habile, a fait une pointe; on apprend qu'il a marché sur Dol. S'il prend Dol, et s'il établit sur le Mont-Dol une batterie, car il a du canon, voilà un point de la côte où les anglais peuvent aborder, et tout est perdu. C’est pourquoi, comme il n’y avait pas une minute à perdre. Gauvain, que est un home de tête, n’a pris conseil de lui-même, n’a pas demandé d’ordre et n’en a pas attendu, a sonné le boute-selle, attelé son artillerie, ramassé sa troupe, tiré son sabre, et voilà comment, pendant que Lantenac se jette sur Dol, Gauvain se jette sur Lantenac. C’est à Dol que ces deux fronts bretons vont se cogner. Ce sera un fier choc. Ils y sont maintenant.

— Combien de temps faut-il pour aller à Dol?

— A une troupe qui a des chariots, au moins trois heures; mais ils y sont.

Le voyageur prêta l’oreille et dit:

— En effet, il me semble que j’entends le canon.

L’hôte écouta.

— Oui, citoyen. Et la fusillade. On déchire de la toile. Vous devriez passer la nuit ici. Il n’y a rien de bon à attraper par là.

— Je ne puis m’arrêter. Je dois continuer ma route.

— Vous avez tort. Je ne connais pas vos affaires, mais le risque est grand, et, à moins qu’il ne s’agisse de ce que vous avez de plus cher au monde…

— C’est en effet de cela qu’il s’agit, répondit le cavalier.

— … De quelque chose comme votre fils…

— A peu près, dit le cavalier.

L’aubergiste leva la tête et se dit à part soi:

— Ce citoyen me fait pourtant l’effet d’être un prêtre. Puis, après réflexion:

— Après ça, un prêtre, ça a des enfants.

— Rebridez mon cheval, dit le voyageur. Combien vous dois-je?

Et il paya.

L’hôte rangea l’auge et le seau le long de son mur, et revint vers le voyageur.

— Puisque vous êtes décidé à partir, écoutez mon conseil. Il est clair que vous allez à Saint-Malo. Eh bien, n’allez pas par Dol. Il y a deux chemins, le chemin par Dol, et le chemin le long de la mer. L’un n’est guère plus court que l’autre. Le chemin le long de la mer va par Saint-Georges de Brehaigne, Cherrueix, et Hirel-le-Vivier. Vous laissez Dol au sud et Cancale au nord. Citoyen, au bout de la rue, vous allez trouver l’embranchement des deux routes; celle de Dol est à gauche, celle de Saint-Georges de Brehaigne est à droite. Ecoutez-moi bien, si vous allez par Dol, vous tombez dans le massacre. C’est pourquoi ne prenez pas à gauche, prenez à droite.

— Merci, dit le voyageur.

Et il piqua son cheval.

L’obscurité s’était faite, il s’enfonça dans la nuit.

L’aubergiste le perdit de vue.

Quand le voyageur fut au bout de la rue à l’embranchement des deux chemins, il entendit la voix de l’aubergiste qui lui criait de loin:

— Prenez à droite!

Il prit à gauche.

II. DOL

Dol, ville espagnole de France en Bretagne, ainsi la qualifient les cartulaires, n’est pas une ville, c’est une rue. Grande vieille rue gothique, toute bordée à droite et à gauche de maisons à piliers, point alignées, qui font des caps et des coudes dans la rue, d’ailleurs très large. Le reste de la ville n’est qu’un réseau de ruelles se rattachant à cette grande rue diamétrale et y aboutissant comme des ruisseaux à une rivière. La ville, sans portes ni murailles, ouverte, dominée par le Mont-Dol, ne pourrait soutenir un siège; mais la rue en peut soutenir un. Les promontoires de maisons qu’on y voyait encore il y a cinquante ans, et les deux galeries sous piliers qui la bordent en faisaient un lieu de combat très solide et très résistant. Autant de maisons, autant de forteresses; et il fallait enlever l’une après l’autre. La vieille halle était à peu près au milieu de la rue.

L’aubergiste de la Croix-Branchard avait dit vrai, une mêlée forcenée emplissait Dol au moment où il parlait. Un duel nocturne entre les blancs arrivés le matin et les bleus survenus le soir avait brusquement éclaté dans la ville. Les forces étaient inégales, les blancs étaient six mille, les bleus étaient quinze cents, mais il y avait égalité d’acharnement. Chose remarquable, c’étaient les quinze cents qui avaient attaqué les six mille.

D’un côté une cohue, de l’autre une phalange. D’un côté six mille paysans, avec des coeurs-de-Jésus sur leurs vestes de cuir, des rubans blancs à leurs chapeaux ronds, des devises chrétiennes sur leurs brassards, des chapelets à leurs ceinturons, ayant plus de fourches que de sabres et des carabines sans bayonnettes, traînant des canons attelés de cordes, mal équipés, mal disciplinés, mal armés, mais frénétiques. De l’autre quinze cents soldats avec le tricorne à cocarde tricolore, l’habit à grandes basques et à grands revers, le baudrier croisé, le briquet à poignée de cuivre et le fusil à longue bayonnette, dressés, alignés, dociles et farouches, sachant obéir en gens qui sauraient commander, volontaires eux aussi, mais volontaires de la patrie, en haillons du reste, et sans souliers; pour la monarchie, des paysans paladins, pour la révolution, des héros va-nu-pieds; et chacune des deux troupes ayant pour âme son chef; les royalistes un vieillard, les républicains un jeune homme. D’un côté Lantenac, de l’autre Gauvain.

La révolution, à côté des jeunes figures gigantesques, telles que Danton, Saint-Just, et Robespierre, a les jeunes figures idéales, comme Hoche et Marceau. Gauvain était une de ces figures.

Gauvain avait trente ans, une encolure d'Hercule, l'oeil sérieux d'un prophète et le rire d'un enfant. Il ne fumait pas, il ne buvait pas, il ne jurait pas. Il emportait à travers la guerre un nécessaire de toilette; il avait grand soin de ses ongles, de ses dents, de ses cheveux qui étaient bruns et superbes; et dans les haltes il secouait lui-même au vent son habit de capitaine qui était troué de balles et blanc de poussière. Toujours rué éperdument dans les mêlées, il n'avait jamais été blessé. Sa voix très douce avait à propos les éclats brusques du commandement. Il donnait l'exemple de coucher à terre, sous la bise, sous la pluie, dans la neige, roulé dans son manteau, et sa tête charmante posée sur une pierre. C'était une âme héroïque et innocente. Le sabre au poing le transfigurait. Il avait cet air efféminé qui dans la bataille est formidable.

Avec cela penseur et philosophe, un jeune sage; Alcibiade pour qui le voyait, Socrate pour qui l'entendait.

Dans cette immense improvisation qui est la révolution française, ce jeune homme avait été tout de suite un chef de guerre.

Sa colonne, formée par lui, était comme la légion romaine, une sorte de petite armée complète; elle se composait d'infanterie et de cavalerie; elle avait des éclaireurs, des pionniers, des sapeurs, des pontonniers; et, de même que la légion romaine avait des catapultes, elle avait des canons. Trois pièces bien attelées faisaient la colonne forte en la laissant maniable.

Lantenac aussi était un chef de guerre, pire encore. Il était à la fois plus réfléchi et plus hardi. Les vrais vieux héros ont plus de froideur que les jeunes parce qu'ils sont loin de l'aurore, et plus d'audace parce qu'ils sont près de la mort. Qu'ont-ils à perdre? si peu de chose. De là les manoeuvres téméraires, en même temps que savantes, de Lantenac. Mais en somme, et presque toujours, dans cet opiniâtre corps-à-corps du vieux et du jeune. Gauvain avait le dessus. C'était plutôt fortune qu'autre chose. Tous les bonheurs, même le bonheur terrible, font partie de la jeunesse. La victoire est un peu fille.

Lantenac était exaspéré contre Gauvain; d'abord parce que Gauvain le battait, ensuite parce que c'était son parent. Quelle idée a-t-il d'être jacobin? ce Gauvain! ce polisson! son héritier, car le marquis n'avait pas d'enfants, un petit-neveu, presque un petit-fils? — Ah! disait ce quasi grand-père, si je mets la main dessus, je le tue comme un chien!

Du reste, la république avait raison de s’inquiéter de ce marquis de Lantenac. A peine débarqué, il faisait trembler. Son nom avait couru dans l’insurrection vendéenne comme une traînée de poudre, et Lantenac était tout de suite devenu centre. Dans une révolte de cette nature où tous se jalousent et où chacun a son buisson ou son ravin, quelqu’un de haut qui survient rallie les chefs épars égaux entre eux. Presque tous les capitaines des bois s’étaient joints à Lantenac, et, de près ou de loin, lui obéissaient.

Un seul l’avait quitté, c’était le premier qui s’était joint à lui, Gavard. Pourquoi? C’est que c’était un homme de confiance. Gavard avait eu tous les secrets et adopté tous les plans de l’ancien système de guerre civile que Lantenac venait supplanter et remplacer. On n’hérite pas d’un homme de confiance; le soulier de La Rouarie n’avait pu chausser Lantenac. Gavard était allé rejoindre Bonchamp.

Lantenac, comme homme de guerre, était de l’école de Frédéric II; il entendait combiner la grande guerre avec la petite. Il ne voulait ni d’une «masse confuse», comme la grosse armée catholique et royale, foule destinée à l’écrasement; ni d’un éparpillement dans les halliers et les taillis, bon pour harceler, impuissant pour terrasser. La guérilla ne conclut pas, ou conclut mal; on commence par attaquer une république et l’on finit par détrousser une diligence. Lantenac ne comprenait cette guerre bretonne, ni toute en rase campagne comme La Rochejaquelein, ni toute dans la forêt comme Jean Chouan; ni Vendée, ni Chouanerie; il voulait la vraie guerre; se servir du paysan, mais l’appuyer sur le soldat. Il voulait des bandes pour la stratégie et des régiments pour la tactique. Il trouvait excellentes pour l’attaque, l’embuscade et la surprise, ces armées de village, tout de suite assemblées, tout de suite dispersées, mais il les sentait trop fluides; elles étaient dans sa main comme de l’eau; il voulait dans cette guerre flottante et diffuse créer un point solide; il voulait ajouter à la sauvage armée des forêts une troupe régulière qui fût le pivot de manoeuvre des paysans. Pensée profonde et affreuse; si elle eût réussi, la Vendée eût été inexpugnable.

Mais où trouver une troupe régulière? où trouver des soldats? où trouver des régiments? où trouver une armée toute faite? En Angleterre. De là l’idée fixe de Lantenac: faire débarquer les anglais. Ainsi capitule la conscience des partis; la cocarde blanche lui cachait l’habit rouge. Lantenac; n’avait qu’une pensée: s’emparer d’un point du littoral, et le livrer à Pitt. C’est pourquoi, voyant Dol sans défense, il s’était jeté dessus, afin d’avoir par Dol le Mont-Dol, et par le Mont-Dol la côte.

Le lieu était bien choisi. Le canon du Mont-Dol balayerait d’un côté le Fresnois, de l’autre Saint-Brelade, tiendrait à distance la croisière de Cancale et ferait toute la plage libre à une descente, du Ras-sur-Couesnon à Saint-Mèloir-des-Ondes.

Pour faire réussir cette tentative décisive, Lantenac avait amené avec lui un peu plus de six mille hommes, ce qu’il avait de plus robuste dans les bandes dont il disposait, et toute son artillerie, dix couleuvrines de seize, une bâtarde de huit et une pièce de régiment de quatre livres de balles. Il entendait établir une forte batterie sur le Mont-Dol, d’après ce principe que mille coups tirés avec dix canons font plus de besogne que quinze cents coups tirés avec cinq canons.

Le succès semblait certain. On était six mille hommes. On n’avait à craindre, vers Avranches, que Gauvain et ses quinze cents hommes, et vers Dinan que Léchelle. Léchelle, il est vrai, avait, vingt-cinq mille hommes, mais il était à vingt lieues. Lantenac était donc rassuré, du côté de Léchelle, par la grande distance contre le grand nombre, et, du côté de Gauvain, par le petit nombre contre la petite distance. Ajoutons que Léchelle était imbécile, et que, plus tard, il fit écraser ses vingt-cinq mille hommes aux landes de la Croix-Bataille, échec qu’il paya de son suicide.

Lantenac avait donc une sécurité complète. Son entrée à Dol fut brusque et dure. Le marquis de Lantenac avait une rude renommée; on le savait sans miséricorde. Aucune résistance ne fut essayée. Les habitants terrifiés se barricadèrent dans leurs maisons. Les six mille vendéens s’installèrent dans la ville avec la confusion campagnarde, presque en champ de foire, sans fourriers, sans logis marqués, bivouaquant au hasard, faisant la cuisine en plein vent, s’éparpillant dans les églises, quittant les fusils pour les rosaires. Lantenac alla en hâte avec quelques officiers d’artillerie reconnaître le Mont-Dol, laissant la lieutenance à Gouge-le-Bruant, qu’il avait nommé sergent de bataille.

Ce Gouge-le-Brouant a laissé une vague trace dans l’histoire. Il avait, deux surnoms, Brise-bleu, a cause de ses carnages de patriotes, et l’Imânus, parce qu’il avait en lui ou ne sait quoi d’inexprimablement horrible. Imânus, dérivé D’immanis, est un vieux mot bas-normand qui exprime la laideur surhumaine, et quasi divine, dans l’épouvante, le démon, le satyre, l’ogre. Un ancien manuscrit dit: d’mes daeux iers j’vis L’imânus. Les vieillards du Bocage ne savent plus aujourd’hui ce que c’est que Gouge-le-

Bruant, ni ce que signifie Brise-Bleu; mais ils connaissent confusément l'Imânus. L'Imânus est mêlé aux superstitions locales. On parle encore de l'Imânus à Trémorel et à Plumangat, deux villages où Gouge-le-Bruant a laissé la marque de son pied sinistre. Dans la Vendée, les autres étaient les sauvages, Gouge-le-Bruant était le barbare. C'était une espèce de cacique, tatoué de croix-de-par-Dieu et de Fleurs-de-lys; il avait sur sa face la lueur hideuse, et presque surnaturelle, d'une âme à laquelle ne ressemblait aucune autre âme humaine. Il était infernalement brave dans le combat, ensuite atroce. C'était un cur plein d'aboutissements tortueux, porté à tous les dévouements, enclin à toutes les fureurs. Raisonnait-il? Oui, mais comme les serpents rampent, en spirale. Il partait de l'héroïsme pour arriver à l'assassinat. Il était impossible de deviner d'où lui venaient ses résolutions, parfois grandioses à force d'être monstrueuses. Il était capable de tous les inattendus horribles. Il avait la férocité épique.

De là ce surnom difforme, l'Imânus.

Le marquis de Lantenac avait confiance en sa cruauté.

Cruauté, c'était juste, l'Imânus y excellait: mais en stratégie et en tactique il était moins supérieur, et peut-être le marquis avait-il tort d'en faire son sergent de bataille. Quoi qu'il en soit, il laissa derrière lui l'Imânus avec charge de le remplacer et de veiller à tout.

Gouge-le-Bruant, homme plus guerrier que militaire, était plus propre à égorger un clan qu'à garder une ville. Pourtant il posa des grand'gardes.

Le soir venu, comme le marquis de Lantenac, après avoir reconnu l'emplacement de la batterie projetée, s'en retournait vers Dol, tout à coup, il entendit le canon. I1 regarda. Une fumée rouge s'élevait de la grande rue. Il y avait surprise, irruption, assaut: on se battait dans la ville.

Bien que difficile à étonner, il fut stupéfait. Il ne s'attendait à rien de pareil. Qui cela pouvait-il être? Evidemment ce n'était pas Gauvain. On n'attaque pas à un contre quatre. Etait-ce Léchelle? Mais alors quelle marche forcée! Léchelle était improbable, Gauvain impossible.

Lantenac poussa son cheval: chemin faisant il rencontra des habitants qui s'enfuyaient, il les questionna, ils étaient fous de peur. Ils criaient: Les bleus! les bleus! et quand il arriva la situation était mauvaise.

Voici ce qui s'était passé.

III. PETITES ARMÉES ET GRANDES BATAILLES

En arrivant à Dol, les paysans, on vient de le voir, s’étaient dispersés dans la ville, chacun faisant à sa guise, comme cela arrive quand «on obéit d’amitié», c’était le mot des vendéens. Genre d’obéissance qui fait des héros, mais non des troupiers. Ils avaient garé leur artillerie avec les bagages sous les voûtes de vieille halle, et, las, buvant, mangeant, «chapelettant», ils s’étaient couchés pèle-mêle en travers de la grande rue, plutôt encombrée que gardée. Comme la nuit tombait, la plupart s’endormirent, la tête sur leurs sacs, quelques-uns ayant leur femme à côté d’eux; car souvent les paysannes suivaient les paysans: en Vendée, les femmes grosses servaient d’espions. C’était une douce nuit de juillet; les constellations resplendissaient dans le profond bleu noir du ciel. Tout ce bivouac, qui était plutôt une halte de caravane qu’un campement d’armée, se mit à sommeiller paisiblement. Tout à coup, à la lueur du crépuscule, ceux qui n’avaient pas encore fermé les yeux virent trois pièces de canons braquées à l’entrée de la grande rue.

C’était Gauvain. Il avait surpris les grand’gardes, il était dans la ville, et il tenait avec sa colonne la tête de la rue.

Un paysan se dressa, cria: qui vive? et lâcha son coup de fusil: un coup de canon répliqua. Puis une mousqueterie furieuse éclata. Toute la cohue assoupie se leva en sursaut. Rude secousse. S’endormir sous les étoiles et se réveiller sous la mitraille.

Le premier moment fut terrible. Rien de tragique comme le fourmillement d’une foule foudroyée. Ils se jetèrent sur leurs armes. On criait, on courait, beaucoup tombaient. Les assaillis, ne savaient plus ce qu’ils faisaient et s’arquebusaient les uns les autres. Il y avait des gens ahuris qui sortaient des maisons, qui y rentraient, qui sortaient encore, et qui erraient dans la bagarre, éperdus. Des familles s’appelaient. Combat lugubre, mêlé de femmes et d’enfants. Les balles sifflantes rayaient l’obscurité. La fusillade partait de tous les coins noirs. Tout était fumée et tumulte. L’enchevêtrement des fourgons et des charrois s’y ajoutait. Les chevaux ruaient. On marchait sur les blessés. On entendait à terre des hurlement. Horreur de ceux-ci, stupeur de ceux-là. Les soldats et les officiers se cherchaient. Au milieu de tout cela, de sombres indifférences. Une femme allaitait son nouveau-né, assise contre un pan de mur auquel était adossé son mari qui avait la jambe cassée et qui, pendant que son sang coulait, chargeait tranquillement sa carabine et tirait au hasard, tuant devant lui dans l'ombre. Des hommes à plat ventre tiraient à travers les roues des charrettes. Par moments il s'élevait un hourvari de clameurs. La grosse voix du canon couvrait tout. C'était épouvantable.

Ce fut, comme un abatis d'arbres; tous tombaient les uns sur les autres.

Gauvain, embusqué, mitraillait à coup sûr et perdait peu de monde.

Pourtant l'intrépide désordre des paysans finit par se mettre sur la défensive; ils se replièrent sous la halle, vaste redoute obscure, forêt de piliers de pierre. Là ils reprirent pied; tout ce qui ressemblait à un bois leur donnait confiance. L'Imânus suppléait de son mieux à l'absence de Lantenac. Ils avaient du canon, mais, au grand étonnement de Gauvain, ils ne s'en servaient point; cela tenait à ce que, les officiers d'artillerie étant allés avec le marquis reconnaître le Mont-Dol, les gars ne savaient que faire des couleuvrines et des bâtardes; mais ils criblaient de balles les bleus qui les canonnaient. Les paysans ripostaient par la mousqueterie à la mitraille. C'étaient eux maintenant qui étaient abrités. Ils avaient entassé les baquets, les tombereaux, les bagages, toutes les futailles de la vieille halle, et improvisé une haute barricade avec des claires-voies par où passaient leurs carabines. Par ces trous leur fusillade était meurtrière. Tout cela se fit vite. En un quart d'heure la halle eut un front imprenable.

Ceci devenait grave pour Gauvain. Cette halle brusquement transformée en citadelle, c'était l'inattendu. Les paysans étaient là, massés et solides. Gauvain avait réussi la surprise et manqué la déroute. Il avait mis pied à terre. Attentif, ayant son épée au poing sous ses bras croisés, debout dans la lueur d'une torche qui éclairait sa batterie, il regardait toute cette ombre.

Sa haute taille dans cette clarté le faisait visible aux hommes de la barricade. Il était le point de mire, mais il n'y songeait pas.

Les volées de balles qu'envoyait la barricade s'abattaient autour de

Gauvain pensif.

Mais contre toutes ces carabines il avait du canon. Le boulet finit toujours par avoir raison. Qui a l'artillerie a la victoire. Sa batterie, bien servie, lui assurait la supériorité.

Subitement, un éclair jaillit de la halle pleine de ténèbres, on entendit comme un coup de foudre, et un boulet vint trouer une maison au-dessus de la tête de Gauvain.

La barricade répondait au canon par le canon.

Que se passait-il? Il y avait du nouveau. L’artillerie maintenant n’était plus d’un seul côté.

Un second boulet suivit le premier et vint s’enfoncer dans le mur tout près de Gauvain. Un troisième boulet jeta à terre son chapeau.

Ces boulets étaient de gros calibre. C’était une pièce de seize qui tirait.

— On vous vise, commandant, crièrent les artilleurs.

Et ils éteignirent la torche. Gauvain, rêveur, ramassa son chapeau.

Quelqu’un, en effet, visait Gauvain, c’était Lantenac.

Le marquis venait d’arriver dans la barricade par le côté opposé.

L’Imânus avait couru à lui.

— Monseigneur, nous sommes surpris.

— Par qui?

— Je ne sais.

— La route de Dinan est-elle libre?

— Je le crois.

— Il faut commencer la retraite.

— Elle commence. Beaucoup se sont déjà sauvés.

— Il ne faut pas se sauver; il faut se retirer. Pourquoi ne vous servez-vous pas de l’artillerie?

— On a perdu la tête, et puis les officiers n’étaient pas là.

— J’y vais.

— Monseigneur, j’ai dirigé sur Fougères le plus que j’ai pu des bagages, les femmes, tout l’inutile. Que faut-il faire des trois petits prisonniers?

— Ah! ces enfants?

— Oui.

— Ils sont nos otages. Fais-les conduire à la Tourgue.

Cela dit, le marquis alla à la barricade. Le chef venu, tout changea de face. La barricade était mal faite pour l’artillerie, il n’y avait place que pour deux canons: le marquis mit en batterie deux pièces de seize, auxquelles on fit des embrasures. Comme il était penché sur un des canons, observant la batterie ennemie par l’embrasure, il aperçut Gauvain.

— C’est lui! cria-t-il.

Alors il prit lui-même l’écouvillon et le fouloir, chargea la pièce, fixa le fronton de mire, et pointa.

Trois fois il ajusta Gauvain, et le manqua. Le troisième coup ne réussit qu’à le décoiffer.

— Maladroit! murmura Lantenac. Un peu plus bas, j’avais la tête.

Brusquement la torche s’éteignit, et il n’eut plus devant lui que les ténèbres.

— Soit, dit-il.

Et se tournant vers les canonniers paysans, il cria:

— A mitraille!

Gauvain de son côté n’était pas moins sérieux. La situation s’aggravait. Une phase nouvelle du combat se dessinait. La barricade en était à le canonner. Qui sait si elle n’allait point passer de la défensive à l’offensive? Il avait devant lui, en défalquant les morts et les fuyards, au moins cinq mille combattants, et il ne lui restait à lui que douze cents hommes maniables. Que deviendraient les républicains si l’ennemi s’apercevait de leur petit nombre? Les rôles seraient intervertis. On était assaillant, on serait assailli. Que la barricade fit une sortie, tout pouvait être perdu.

Que faire? Il ne fallait point songer à attaquer la barricade de front; un coup de vive force était chimérique: douze cents hommes ne débusquent pas cinq mille hommes. Brusquer était impossible, attendre était funeste. Il fallait en finir. Mais comment?

Gauvain était du pays, il connaissait la ville; il savait que la vieille halle, où les vendéens s’étaient crénelés, était adossée à un dédale de ruelles étroites et tortueuses.

Il se tourna vers son lieutenant qui était ce vaillant capitaine Guéchamp, fameux plus tard pour avoir nettoyé la forêt de Concise où était né Jean

Chouan, et pour avoir, en barrant aux rebelles la chaussée de l’étang de la

Chaîne, empêché la prise de Bourgneuf.

— Guéchamp, dit-il, je vous remets le commandement. Faites tout le feu que vous pourrez. Trouez la barricade à coups de canon. Occupez-moi tous ces gars-là.

— C’est compris, dit Guéchamp.

— Massez toute la colonne, armes chargées, et tenez-la prête à l’attaque.

Il ajouta quelques mots à l’oreille de Guéchamp.

— C’est entendu, dit Guéchamp.

Gauvain reprit:

— Tous nos tambours sont-ils sur pied?

— Oui.

— Nous en avons neuf. Gardez-en deux, donnez-m’en sept.

Les sept tambours vinrent en silence se ranger devant Gauvain.

Alors Gauvain cria:

— A moi le bataillon du Bonnet-Rouge!

Douze hommes, dont un sergent, sortirent du gros de la troupe.

— Je demande tout le bataillon, dit Gauvain.

— Le voilà, répondit le sergent.

— Vous êtes douze!

— Nous restons douze.

— C’est bien, dit Gauvain.

Ce sergent était le bon et rude troupier Radoub, qui avait adopté au nom du bataillon les trois enfants rencontrés dans le bois de la Saudraie.

Un demi-bataillon seulement, on s’en souvient, avait été exterminé à Herbe-en-Pail, et Radoub avait eu ce bon hasard de n’en point faire partie.

Un fourgon de fourrage était proche; Gauvain le montra du doigt au sergent.

— Sergent, faites faire à vos hommes des liens de paillé, et qu’on torde cette paille autour des fusils pour qu’on n’entende pas de bruit s’ils s’entre-choquent.

Une minute s’écoula, l’ordre fut exécuté, en silence et dans l’obscurité.

— C’est fait, dit le sergent.

— Soldats, ôtez vos souliers, reprit Gauvain.

— Nous n’en avons pas, dit le sergent.

Cela faisait, avec les sept tambours, dix-neuf hommes: Gauvain était le vingtième.

Il cria:

— Sur une seule file. Suivez-moi. Les tambours derrière moi. Le bataillon ensuite. Sergent, vous commanderez le bataillon.

Il prit la tête de la colonne, et, pendant que la canonnade continuait des deux côtés, ces vingt hommes, glissant comme des ombres s’enfoncèrent dans les ruelles désertes.

Ils marchèrent quelque temp de la sorte, serpentant le long des maisons. Tout semblait mort dans la ville; les bourgeois s’étaient blottis dans les caves. Pas une porte qui ne fût barrée, pas un volet qui ne fût fermé. De lumière nulle part.

La grande rue faisait dans ce silence un fracas furieux; le combat au canon continuait; la batterie républicaine et la barricade royaliste se crachaient toute leur mitraille avec rage.

Après vingt minutes de marche tortueuse, Gauvain, qui dans cette obscurité cheminait avec certitude, arriva à l'extrémité d'une ruelle d'où l'on rentrait dans la grande rue; seulement on était de l'autre côté de la halle.

La position était tournée. De ce côté-ci il n'y avait pas de retranchement, ceci est l'éternelle imprudence des constructeurs de barricades, la halle était ouverte, et l'on pouvait entrer sous les piliers où étaient attelés quelques chariots de bagages prêts à partir. Gauvain et ses dix-neuf hommes avaient devant eux les cinq mille Vendéens, mais de dos et non de front.

Gauvin parla à voix basse au sergent; on défit la paille nouée autour des fusils; les douze grenadiers se postèrent en bataille derrière l'angle de la ruelle, et les sept tambours, la baguette haute, attendirent.

Les décharges d'artillerie étaient intermittentes. Tout à coup, dans un intervalle, entre deux détonations, Gauvain leva son épée, et d'une voix qui, dans ce silence, sembla un éclat de clairon, il cria:

— Deux cents hommes par la droite, deux cents hommes par la gauche, tout le reste sur le centre!

Les douze coups de fusil partirent, et les sept tambours sonnèrent la charge.

Et Gauvain jeta le cri redoutable des bleus:

— A la bayonnette! Fonçons!

L'effet fut inouï.

Toute cette masse paysanne se sentit prise à revers, et s'imagina avoir une nouvelle armée dans le dos. En même temps, entendant le tambour, la colonne qui tenait le haut de la grande rue et que commandait Guéchamp s'ébranla, battant la charge de son côté, et se jeta au pas de course sur la barricade; les paysans se virent entre deux feux; la panique est un grossissement, dans la panique un coup de pistolet fait le bruit d'un coup de canon, toute clameur est fantôme, et l'aboiement d'un chien semble le rugissement d'un lion. Ajoutons que le paysan prend peur comme le chaume prend feu, et, aussi aisément qu'un feu de chaume devient incendie, une peur de paysan devient déroute. Ce fut une fuite inexprimable.

En quelques instants la halle fut vide, les gars terrifiés se désagrégèrent, rien à faire pour les officiers. L'Imânus tua inutilement deux ou trois fuyards, on n’entendait que ce cri: Sauve qui peut! et cette armée, à travers les rues de la ville comme à travers les trous d’un crible, se dispersa dans la campagne, avec une rapidité de nuée emportée par l’ouragan.

Les uns s’enfuirent vers Châteanneuf, les autres vers Merguer, les autres vers Antrain.

Le marquis de Lantenac vit cette déroute. Il encloua de sa main les canons, puis il se retira, le dernier, lentement et froidement, et il dit:

— Décidément les paysans ne tiennent pas. Il nous faut les anglais.

IV. C'EST LA SECONDE FOIS

La victoire était complète.

Gauvain se tourna vers les hommes du bataillon du Bonnet-Rouge, et leur dit:

— Vous êtes douze, mais vous en valez mille.

Un mot du chef, c'était la croix d'honneur de ce temps-là.

Guéchamp, lancé par Gauvain hors de la ville, poursuivit les fuyards et en prit beaucoup.

On alluma des torches et l'on fouilla la ville.

Tout ce qui ne put s'évader se rendit. On illumina la grande rue avec des pots à feu. Elle était jonchée de morts et de blessés. La fin d'un combat s'arrache toujours, quelques groupes désespérés résistaient encore çà et là, on les cerna, et ils mirent bas les armes.

Gauvain avait remarqué dans le pèle-mêle effréné de la déroute un homme intrépide, espèce de faune agile et robuste, qui avait protégé la fuite des autres et ne s'était pas enfui. Ce paysan s'était magistralement servi de sa carabine, fusillant avec le canon, assommant avec la crosse, si bien qu'il l'avait cassée; maintenant il avait un pistolet dans un poing et un sabre dans l'autre. On n'osait l'approcher. Tout à coup Gauvain le vit qui chancelait et qui s'adossait à un pilier de la grande rue. Cet homme venait d'être blessé. Mais il avait toujours aux poings son sabre et son pistolet. Gauvain mit son épée sous son bras et alla à lui.

— Rends-toi, dit-il.

L'homme le regarda fixement. Sou sang coulait sous ses vêtements d'une blessure qu'il avait, et faisait une mare à ses pieds.

— Tu es mon prisonnier, reprit Gauvain.

L'homme resta muet.

— Comment t'appelles-tu?

L'homme dit:

— Je m'appelle Danse-à-l'Ombre.

— Tu es un vaillant, dit Gauvain.

Et il lui tendit la main.

L'homme répondit:

— Vive le roi!

Et ramassant ce qui lui restait de force, levant les deux bras à la fois, il tira au cur de Gauvain un coup de pistolet et lui asséna sur la tête un coup de sabre.

Il fit cela avec une promptitude de tigre; mais quelqu’un fut plus prompt encore. Ce fut un homme à cheval qui venait d’arriver et qui était là depuis quelques instants, sans qu’on eût fait attention à lui. Cet homme, voyant le vendéen lever le sabre et le pistolet, se jeta entre lui et Gauvain. Sans cet homme, Gauvain était mort. Le cheval reçut le coup pistolet, l’homme reçut le coup de sabre, et tous deux tombèrent. Tout cela se fit le temps de jeter un cri.

Le vendéen de son côté s’était affaissé sur le pavé.

Le coup de sabre avait frappé l’homme en plein visage: il était à terre, évanoui. Le cheval était tué.

Gauvain s’approcha.

— Qui est cet homme? dit-il.

Il le considéra. Le sang de la balafre inondait le blessé et lui faisait un masque rouge. Il était impossible de distinguer sa figure. On lui voyait des cheveux gris.

— Cet homme m’a sauté la vie, poursuivit Gauvain. Quelqu’un d’ici le connaît-il?

Mon commandant, dit un soldat, cet homme est entré dans la ville tout à l’heure. Je l’ai vu arriver. Il venait par la route de Pontorson.

Le chirurgien-major de la colonne était accouru avec sa trousse. Le blessé était toujours sans connaissance. Le chirurgien l’examina et dit:

— Une simple balafre. Ce n’est rien. Cela se recoud. Dans huit jours il sera sur pied. C’est un beau coup de sabre.

Le blessé avait un manteau, une ceinture tricolore, des pistolets, un sabre. On le coucha sur une civière. On le déshabilla. On apporta un seau d’eau fraîche, le chirurgien lava la plaie. Le visage commença à apparaître. Gauvain le regardait avec une attention profonde.

— A-t-il des papiers sur lui? demanda Gauvain.

Le chirurgien tâta la poche de côté et en tira un portefeuille, qu’il tendit à Gauvain.

Cependant le blessé, ranimé par l’eau froide, revenait à lui. Ses paupières remuaient vaguement. Gauvain fouillait le portefeuille; il y trouva une feuille de papier pliée en quatre, il la déplia, il lut:

«Comité de salut public. Le citoyen Cimourdain…»

Il jeta un cri:

— Cimourdain!

Ce cri fit ouvrir les yeux au blessé.

Gauvain était éperdu.

— Cimourdain! c’est vous! C’est la seconde fois que vous me sauvez la vie.

Cimourdain regardait Gauvain. Un ineffable éclair de joie illuminait sa face sanglante.

Gauvain tomba à genoux devant le blessé en criant:

— Mon maître!

— Ton père, dit Cimourdain.

V. LA GOUTTE D'EAU FROIDE

Ils ne s'étaient pas vus depuis beaucoup d'années, mais leurs cœurs ne s'étaient jamais quittés; ils se reconnurent comme s'ils s'étaient séparés la veille.

On avait improvisé une ambulance à l'hôtel de ville de Dol. On porta Cimourdain sur un lit dans une petite chambre contiguë à la grande salle commune aux blessés. Le chirurgien, qui avait recousu la balafre, mit fin aux épanchements entre ces deux hommes, et jugea qu'il fallait laisser dormir Cimourdain. Gauvain d'ailleurs était réclamé par ces mille soins qui sont les devoirs et les soucis de la victoire. Cimourdain resta seul; mais il ne dormit pas; il avait deux fièvres, la fièvre de sa blessure et la fièvre de sa joie.

Il ne dormit pas, et pourtant il ne lui semblait pas être éveillé. Etait-ce possible? son rêve était réalisé. Cimourdain était de ceux qui ne croient pas au quine, et il l'avait. Il retrouvait Gauvain. Il l'avait quitté enfant, il le retrouvait homme: il la retrouvait, grand, redoutable, intrépide. Il le retrouvait triomphant, et triomphant pour le peuple. Gauvain était en Vendée le point d'appui de la révolution, et c'était lui, Cimourdain, qui avait fait cette colonne à la république. Ce victorieux était son élève. Ce qu'il voyait rayonner à travers cette jeune figure réservée peut-être au panthéon républicain, c'était sa pensée, à lui Cimourdain; son disciple, l'enfant de son esprit, était dès à présent un héros et serait avant peu une gloire; il semblait à Cimourdain qu'il revoyait sa propre âme faite Génie. Il venait de voir de ses yeux comment Gauvain faisait la guerre; il était comme Chiron ayant va combattre Achille. Rapport mystérieux entre le prêtre et le centaure; car le prêtre n'est homme qu'à mi-corps.

Tous les hasards de cette aventure, mêlés à l'insomnie de sa blessure, emplissaient Cimourdain d'une sorte d'enivrement mystérieux. Une jeune destinée se levait, magnifique, et, ce qui ajoutait à sa joie profonde, il avait plein pouvoir sur cette destinée; encore un succès comme celui qu'il venait de voir, et Cimourdain n'aurait qu'un mot à dire pour que la république confiât à Gauvain une armée. Rien n'éblouit comme l'étonnement de voir tout réussir. C'était le temps où chacun avait son rêve militaire; chacun voulait faire un général; Danton voulait faire Westermann, Marat voulait faire Rossignol, Hébert voulait faire Ronsin; Robespierre voulait les défaire tous. Pourquoi pas Gauvain? Se disait Cimourdain; et il songeait. L’illimité était devant lui; il passait d’une hypothèse à l’autre; tons les obstacles s’évanouissaient; une fois qu’on a mis le pied sur cette échelle-là, on ne s’arrête plus, c’est la montée infinie, on part de l’homme et l’on arrive à l’étoile. Un grand général n’est qu’un chef d’armées; un grand capitaine est en même temps un chef d’idées; Cimourdain rêvait Gauvain grand capitaine. Il lui semblait, car la rêverie va vite, voir Gauvain sur l’Océan, chassant les anglais; sur le Rhin, châtiant les rois du Nord; aux Pyrénées, repoussant l’Espagne; aux Alpes, faisant signe à Rome de se lever. Il y avait en Cimourdain deux hommes, un homme tendre et un homme sombre; tous deux étaient contents; car, l’inexorable étant son idéal en même temps qu’il voyait Gauvain superbe, il le voyait terrible. Cimourdain pensait à tout ce qu’il fallait détruire avant de construire, et, certes, se disait-il, ce n’est pas l’heure des attendrissements. Gauvain sera «à la hauteur», mot du temps. Cimourdain se figurait Gauvain écrasant du pied les ténèbres, cuirassé de lumière, avec une lueur de météore au front, ouvrant les grandes ailes idéales de la justice, de la raison et du progrès, et une épée là la main; ange, mais exterminateur.

Au plus fort de cette rêverie qui était presque une extase, il entendit, par la porte entr’ouverte, qu’on parlait dans la grande salle de l’ambulance, voisine de sa chambre; il reconnut la voix de l’homme. Il écouta. Il y avait un bruit de pas. Des soldats disaient:

— Mon commandant, cet homme-ci est celui qui a tiré sur vous. Pendant qu’on ne le voyait pas, il s’était traîné dans une cave. Nous l’avons trouvé. Le voilà.

Alors Cimourdain entendit ce dialogue entre Gauvain et l’homme:

— Tu es blessé?

— Je me porte assez bien pour être fusillé.

— Mettez cet homme dans un lit. Pansez-le, soignez-le, guérissez-le.

— Je veux mourir.

— Tu vivras. Tu as voulu me tuer au nom du roi; je te fais grâce au nom de la république.

Une ombre passa sur le front de Cimourdain. Il eut comme un réveil en sursaut, et il murmura avec une sorte d’accablement sinistre:

— En effet, c’est un clément.

VI. SEIN GUÉRI, CŒUR SAIGNANT

Une balafre se guérit vite; mais il y avait quelque part quelqu’un de plus gravement blessé que Cimourdain. C’était la femme fusillée que le mendiant Tellmarch avait ramassée dans la grande mare de sang de la ferme d’Herbe-en-Pail.

Michelle Fléchard était plus en danger encore que Tellmarch ne l’avait cru: au trou qu’elle avait au-dessus du sein correspondait un trou dans l’omoplate; en même temps qu’une balle lui cassait la clavicule, une autre balle lui traversait l’épaule; mais, comme le poumon n’avait pas été touché, elle put guérir. Tellmarch était un «philosophe», mot de paysans qui signifie un peu médecin, un peu chirurgien et un peu sorcier. Il soigna la blessée dans sa tanière de bête sur son grabat de varech, avec ces choses mystérieuses qu’on appelle des «simples», et, grâce à lui, elle vécut.

La clavicule se ressouda, les trous de la poitrine et de l’épaule se fermèrent; après quelques semaines, la blessée fut convalescente.

Un matin, elle put sortir du carnichot, appuyée sur Tellmarch; elle alla s’asseoir sous les arbres au soleil. Tellmarch savait d’elle peu de chose, les plaies de poitrine exigent le silence, et, pendant la quasi-agonie qui avait précédé sa guérison, elle avait à peine dit quelques paroles. Quand elle voulait parler, Tellmarch la faisait taire: mais elle avait une rêverie opiniâtre, et Tellmarch observait dans ses yeux une sombre allée et venue de pensées poignantes. Ce matin-là elle était forte, elle pouvait presque marcher seule; une cure, c’est une paternité, et Tellmarch la regardait, heureux. Ce bon vieux homme se mit à sourire. Il lui parla.

— Eh bien, nous sommes debout. Nous n’avons plus de plaie.

— Qu’au coeur, dit-elle.

Et elle reprit:

— Alors vous ne savez pas du tout où ils sont?

— Qui ça? demanda Tellmarch.

— Mes enfants.

Cet «alors» exprimait tout un monde de pensées; cela signifiait: «puisque vous ne m’en parlez pas, puisque depuis tant de jours vous êtes près de moi sans m’en ouvrir la bouche, puisque vous me faites taire chaque fois que je veux rompre le silence, puisque vous semblez craindre que je n’en parle, c’est que vous n’avez rien à m’en dire.» Souvent dans la fièvre, dans l’égarement, dans le délire, elle avait appelé ses enfants, et elle avait bien vu, car le délire fait ses remarques, que le vieux homme ne lui répondait pas.

C’est en effet Tellmarch ne savait que lui dire. Ce n’est pas aisé de parler à une mère de ses enfants perdus. Et puis, que savait-il? rien. Il savait qu’une mère avait été fusillée, que cette mère avait été trouvée à terre par lui, que lorsqu’il l’avait ramassée, c’était à peu près un cadavre, que ce cadavre avait trois enfants, et que le marquis de Lantenac, après avoir fait fusiller la mère, avait emmené les enfants.

Toutes ses informations s’arrêtaient là. Qu’est-ce que ces enfants étaient devenus? Etaient-ils même encore vivants? Il savait, pour s’en être informé, qu’il y avait deux garçons et une petite fille, à peine sevrée. Rien de plus. Il se faisait sur ce groupe infortuné une foule de questions, mais il n’y pouvait répondre. Les gens du pays qu’il avait interrogés s’étaient bornés à hocher la tête. M. de Lantenac était un homme dont on ne causait pas volontiers.

On ne parlait pas volontiers de Lantenac et on ne parlait pas volontiers à Tellmarch. Les paysans ont un genre de soupçon à eux. Ils n’aimaient pas Tellmarch. Tellmarch-le-Caimand était un homme inquiétant. Qu’avait-il à regarder toujours le ciel? que faisait-il, et à quoi pensait-il dans ses longues heures d’immobilité? Certes, il était étrange. Dans ce pays en pleine guerre, en pleine déflagration, en pleine combustion, où tous les hommes n’avaient qu’une affaire, la dévastation, et qu’un travail, le carnage, où c’était à qui brûlerait une maison, égorgerait une famille, massacrerait un poste, saccagerait un village, où l’on ne songeait qu’à se tendre des embuscades, qu’à s’attirer dans des pièges, et qu’à s’entre-tuer les uns les autres, ce solitaire, absorbé dans la nature, comme submergé dans la paix immense des choses, cueillant des herbes et des plantes, uniquement occupé des fleurs, des oiseaux et des étoiles, était évidemment dangereux. Visiblement, il n’avait pas sa raison; il ne s’embusquait derrière aucun buisson, il ne tirait aucun coup de fusil à personne. De là une certaine crainte autour de lui.

— Cet homme est fou, disaient les passants.

Tellmarch était plus qu’un homme isolé, c’était un homme évité.

On ne lui faisait pas de questions, et on ne lui faisait guère de réponses. Il n’avait donc pu se renseigner autant qu’il l’aurait voulu. La guerre s’était répandue ailleurs, on était allé se battre plus loin, le marquis de Lantenac avait disparu de l’horizon, et dans l’état d’esprit où était Tellmarch, pour qu’il s’aperçût de la guerre, il fallait qu’elle mît le pied sur lui.

Après ce mot, — mes enfants, — Tellmarch avait cessé de sourire, et la mère s’était mise à penser. Que se passait-il dans cette âme? Elle était comme au fond d’un gouffre. Brusquement elle regarda Tellmarch, et cria de nouveau et presque avec un accent de colère: Mes enfants!

Tellmarch baissa la tête comme un coupable.

Il songeait à ce marquis de Lantenac qui certes ne pensait pas à lui, et qui, probablement, ne savait même plus qu’il existât. Il s’en rendait compte, il se disait: Un seigneur, quand c’est dans le danger, ça vous connaît; quand c’est dehors, ça ne vous connaît plus.

Et il se demandait: — Mais alors pourquoi ai-je sauvé ce seigneur?

Et il se répondait: — Parce que c’est un homme.

Il fut là-dessus quelque temps pensif, et il reprit en lui-même:

— En suis-je bien sûr?

Et il se répéta son mot amer: — Si j’avais su!

Toute cette aventure l’accablait; car dans ce qu’il avait fait il voyait une sorte d’énigme. Il méditait douloureusement.

Une bonne action peut donc être une mauvaise action. Qui sauve le loup tue les brebis. Qui raccommode l’aile du vautour est responsable de sa griffe.

Il se sentait en effet coupable. La colère inconsciente de cette mère avait raison.

Pourtant, avoir sauvé cette mère le consolait d’avoir sauvé ce marquis.

Mais les enfants?

La mère aussi songeait. Ces deux pensées se côtoyaient et, sans se le dire, se rencontraient peut-être, dans les ténèbres de la rêverie.

Cependant son regard, au fond duquel était la nuit, se fixa de nouveau sur

Tellmarch.

— Ça ne peut pourtant pas se passer comme ça, dit-elle.

— Chut! fit Tellmarch, et il mit le doigt sur sa bouche.

Elle poursuivit:

— Vous avez eu tort de ne sauver, et je vous en veux. J’aimerais mieux être morte, parce que je suis sûre que je les verrais. Je saurais où ils sont. Ils ne me verraient pas, mais je serais près d’eux. Une morte, ça doit pouvoir protéger.

Il lui prit le bras et lui tâta le pouls.

— Calmez-vous, vous vous redonnez la fièvre.

Elle lui demanda presque durement:

— Quand pourrai-je m’en aller?

— Vous en aller?

— Oui. Marcher.

— Jamais, si vous n’êtes pas raisonnable. Demain, si vous êtes sage.

— Qu’appelez-vous être sage?

— Avoir confiance en Dieu.

— Dieu! où m’a-t-il mis mes enfants?

Elle était comme égarée. Sa voix devint très douce.

— Vous comprenez, lui dit-elle, je ne peux pas rester comme cela. Vous n’avez pas eu d’enfants, moi j’en ai eu. Cela fait une différence. On ne peut pas juger d’une chose quand on ne sait pas ce que c’est. Vous n’avez pas eu d’enfants, n’est-ce pas?

— Non, répondit Tellmarch.

— Moi, je n’ai eu que ça. Sans mes enfants, est-ce que je suis? Je voudrais qu’on m’expliquât pourquoi je n’ai pas mes enfants. Je sens bien qu’il se passe quelque chose, puisque je ne comprends pas. Ou a tué mon mari, on m’a fusillée, mais c’est égal, je ne comprends pas.

— Allons, dit Tellmarch, voilà que la fièvre vous reprend.

Ne parlez plus.

Elle le regarda, et se tut.

A partir de ce jour, elle ne parla plus.

Tellmarch fut obéi plus qu’il ne voulait. Elle passait de longues heures accroupie au pied du vieux mur, stupéfaite. Elle songeait et se taisait. Le silence offre ou ne sait quel abri aux âmes simples qui ont subi l’approfondissement sinistre de la douleur. Elle semblait renoncer à comprendre. A un certain degré le désespoir est inintelligible au désespéré.

Tellmarch l’examinait, ému. En présence de cette souffrance, ce vieux homme avait des pensées de femme. — Oh oui, se disait-il, ses lèvres ne parlent pas, mais ses yeux parlent, je vois bien ce qu’elle a, une idée fixe. Avoir été mère, et ne plus l’être! avoir été nourrice, et ne plus l’être! Elle ne peut pas se résigner. Elle pense à la toute petite qu’elle allaitait il n’y a pas longtemps. Elle y pense, elle y pense, elle y pense. Au fait, ce doit être si charmant de sentir une petite bouche rose qui vous tire votre âme de dedans le corps et qui avec votre vie à vous se fait une vie à elle!

Il se taisait de son côté, comprenant, devant un tel accablement, l’impuissance de la parole. Le silence d’une idée fixe est terrible. Et comment faire entendre raison à l’idée fixe d’une mère? La maternité est sans issue; on ne discute pas avec elle. Ce qui fait qu’une mère est sublime, c’est que c’est une espèce de bête. L’instinct maternel est divinement animal. La mère n’est plus femme, elle est femelle. Les enfants sont des petits.

De là dans la mère quelque chose d’inférieur et de supérieur au raisonnement. Une mère a un flair. L’immense volonté ténébreuse de la création est en elle, et la mène. Aveuglement plein de clairvoyance.

Tellmarch maintenant voulait faire parler cette malheureuse; il n’y réussissait pas. Une fois, il lui dit:

— Par malheur, je suis vieux, et je ne marche plus. J’ai plus vite trouvé le bout de ma force que le bout de mon chemin. Après un quart d’heure, mes jambes refusent, et il faut que je m’arrête; sans quoi je pourrais vous accompagner. Au fait, c’est peut-être un bien que je ne puisse pas. Je serais pour vous plus dangereux qu’utile: on me tolère ici; mais je suis suspect aux bleus comme paysan et aux paysans comme sorcier.

Il attendit ce quelle répondrait. Elle ne leva même pas les yeux.

Une idée fixe aboutit à la folie ou à l’héroïsme. Mais de quel héroïsme peut être capable une pauvre paysanne? d’aucun. Elle peut être mère, et voilà tout. Chaque jour elle s’enfonçait davantage dans sa rêverie. Tellmarch l’observait.

Il chercha à l’occuper; il lui apporta du fil, des aiguilles, un dé: et en effet, ce qui fit plaisir au pauvre caimand, elle se mit à coudre; elle songeait, mais elle travaillait, signe de santé; ses forces lui revenaient peu à peu; elle raccommoda son linge, ses vêtements, ses souliers; mais sa prunelle restait vitreuse. Tout en cousant elle chantait à demi-voix des chansons obscures. Elle murmurait des noms, probablement des noms d’enfants, pas assez distinctement pour que Tellmarch les entendît. Elle s’interrompait et écoutait les oiseaux, comme s’ils avaient des nouvelles à lui donner. Elle regardait le temps qu’il faisait. Ses lèvres remuaient. Elle se parlait bas. Elle fit un sac, et elle le remplit de châtaignes. Un matin Tellmarch la vit qui se mettait en marche, l’il fixé au hasard sur les profondeurs de la forêt.

— Où allez-vous? lui demanda-t-il.

Elle répondit:

— Je vais les chercher.

Il n’essaya pas de la retenir.

VII. LES DEUX POLES DU VRAI

Au bout de quelques semaines pleines de tous les va-et-vient de la guerre civile, il n'était bruit dans le pays de Fougères que de deux hommes dont l'un était l'opposé de l'autre, et qui cependant faisaient la même oeuvre, c'est-à-dire combattaient côte à côte le grand combat révolutionnaire.

Le sauvage duel vendéen continuait, mais la Vendée perdait du terrain. Dans l'Ille-et-Vilaine en particulier, grâce au jeune commandant qui, à Dol, avait si à propos riposté à l'audace des six mille royalistes par l'audace des quinze cents patriotes, l'insurrection était, sinon éteinte, du moins très amoindrie et très circonscrite. Plusieurs coups heureux avaient suivi celui-là, et de ces succès multipliés était née une situation nouvelle.

Les choses avaient changé de face, mais une singulière complication était survenue.

Dans toute cette partie de la Vendée, la république avait le dessus, ceci était hors de doute; mais quelle république? Dans le triomphe qui s'ébauchait, deux formes de la république étaient en présence, la république de la terreur et la république de la clémence, l'une voulant vaincre par la rigueur et l'autre par la douceur. Laquelle prévaudrait? Ces deux formes, la forme conciliante et la forme implacable, étaient représentées par deux hommes ayant chacun son influence et son autorité, l'un commandant militaire, l'autre délégué civil; lequel de ces deux hommes l'emporterait? De ces deux hommes, l'un, le délégué, avait de redoutables points d'appui; il était arrivé apportant la menaçante consigne de la commune de Paris aux bataillons de Santerre: «Pas de grâce, pas de quartier!» Il avait, pour tout soumettre à son autorité, le décret de la Convention portant «peine de mort contre quiconque mettrait en liberté et ferait évader un chef rebelle prisonnier», de pleins pouvoirs émanés du comité de salut public, et une injonction de lui obéir, à lui délégué, signée: ROBESPIERRE, DANTON, MARAT. L'autre, le soldat, n'avait pour lui que cette force, la pitié.

Il n'avait pour lui que son bras, qui battait les ennemis, et son coeur, qui leur faisait grâce. Vainqueur, il se croyait le droit d'épargner les vaincus.

De là un conflit latent, mais profond, entre ces deux hommes. Ils étaient tous les deux dans des nuages différents, tous les deux combattant la rébellion, et chacun ayant sa foudre à lui, l'un la victoire, l'autre la terreur.

Dans tout le Bocage on ne parlait que d’eux; et, ce qui ajoutait à l’anxiété des regards fixés sur eux de toutes parts, c’est que ces deux hommes, si absolument opposés, étaient en même temps étroitement unis. Ces deux antagonistes étaient deux amis. Jamais sympathie plus haute et plus profonde n’avait rapproché deux coeurs; le farouche avait sauvé la vie au débonnaire, et il en avait la balafre au visage. Ces deux hommes incarnaient, l’un la mort, l’autre la vie; l’un était le principe terrible, l’autre le principe pacifique, et ils s’aimaient. Problème étrange. Qu’on se figure Oreste miséricordieux et Pylade inclément. Qu’on se figure Arimane frère d’Ormus.

Ajoutons que celui des deux qu’on appelait «le féroce» était en même temps le plus fraternel des hommes; il pansait les blessés, soignait les malades, passait ses jours et ses nuits dans les ambulances et les hôpitaux, s’attendrissait sur des enfants pieds nus, n’avait rien à lui, donnait tout aux pauvres. Quand on se battait, il y allait; il marchait à la tête des colonnes et au plus fort du combat, armé, car il avait à sa ceinture un sabre et deux pistolets, et désarmé, car jamais on ne l’avait vu tirer son sabre et toucher à ses pistolets. Il affrontait les coups et n’en rendait pas. On disait qu’il avait été prêtre.

L’un de ces hommes était Gauvain, l’autre était Cimourdain.

L’amitié était entre les deux hommes, mais la haine était entre les deux principes; c’était comme une âme coupée en deux, et partagée; Gauvain, en effet, avait reçu une moitié de l’âme de Cimourdain, mais la moitié douce. Il semblait que Gauvain avait eu le rayon blanc et que Cimourdain avait gardé pour lui ce qu’on pourrait appeler le rayon noir. De là un désaccord intime. Cette sourde guerre ne pouvait pas ne point éclater. Un matin la bataille commença.

Cimourdain dit à Gauvain:

— Où en sommes-nous?

Gauvain répondit:

— Vous le savez aussi bien que moi. J’ai dispersé les bandes de Lantenac.

Il n’a plus avec lui que quelques hommes. Le voilà acculé à la forêt de Fougères. Dans huit jours, il sera cerné.

— Et dans quinze jours?

— Il sera pris.

— Et puis?

— Vous avez lu mon affiche?

— Oui. Eh bien?

— Il sera fusillé.

— Encore de la clémence. Il faut qu’il soit guillotiné.

— Moi, dit, Gauvain, je suis pour la mort militaire.

— Et moi, répliqua Cimourdain, pour la mort révolutionnaire.

Il regarda Gauvain en face et lui dit:

— Pourquoi as-tu fait mettre en liberté ces religieuses du couvent de Saint-Marc-le-Blanc?

— Je ne fais pas la guerre aux femmes, répondit Gauvain.

— Ces femmes-là haïssent le peuple. Et, pour la haine une femme vaut dix hommes. Pourquoi as-tu refusé d’envoyer au tribunal révolutionnaire tout ce troupeau de vieux prêtres fanatiques pris à Louvigné?

— Je ne fais pas la guerre aux vieillards.

— Un vieux prêtre est pire qu’un jeune. La rébellion est plus dangereuse, prêchée par les cheveux blancs. On a foi dans les rides. Pas de fausse pitié, Gauvain. Les régicides sont les libérateurs. Aie l’oeil fixé sur la tour du Temple.

— La tour du Temple. J’en ferais sortir le dauphin. Je ne fais pas la guerre aux enfants.

L’oeil de Cimourdain devint sévère.

— Gauvain, sache qu’il faut faire la guerre à la femme quand elle se nomme Marie-Antoinette, au vieillard quand il se nomme Pie VI, pape, et à l’enfant quand il se nomme Louis Capet.

— Mon maître, je ne suis pas un homme politique.

— Tâche de ne pas être un homme dangereux. Pourquoi, à l’attaque du poste de Cossé, quand le rebelle Jean Treton, acculé et perdu, s’est rué seul, le sabre au poing, contre toute ta colonne, as-tu crié: Ouvrez les rangs. Laissez passer?

— Parce qu’on ne se met pas à quinze cents pour tuer un homme.

— Pourquoi, à la Cailleterie d’Astillé, quand tu as vu que tes soldats allaient tuer le Vendéen Joseph Bézier, qui était blessé et qui se traînait, as-tu crié: Allez en avant! J’en fais mon affaire! et as-tu tiré ton coup de pistolet en l’air?

— Parce qu’on ne tue pas un homme à terre.

— Et tu as eu tort. Tous deux sont aujourd’hui chefs de bande; Joseph Bézier, c’est Moustache, et Jean Treton, c’est Jambe-d’Argent. En sauvant ces deux hommes, tu as donné deux ennemis à la république.

— Certes, je voudrais lui faire des amis, et non lui donner des ennemis.

— Pourquoi, après la victoire de Landéan, n’as-tu pas fait fusiller tes trois cents paysans prisonniers?

— Parce que, Bonchamp ayant fait grâce aux prisonniers républicains, j’ai voulu qu’il fût dit que la république faisait grâce aux prisonniers royalistes.

— Mais alors, si tu prends Lantenac, tu lui feras grâce?

— Non.

— Pourquoi? Puisque tu as fait grâce aux trois cents paysans?

— Les paysans sont des ignorants; Lantenac sait ce qu’il fait.

— Mais Lantenac est ton parent?

— La France est la grande parente.

— Lantenac est un vieillard.

— Lantenac est un étranger. Lantenac n’a pas d’âge. Lantenac appelle les Anglais. Lantenac c’est l’invasion. Lantenac est l’ennemi de la patrie. Le duel entre lui et moi ne peut finir que par sa mort, ou par la mienne.

— Gauvain, souviens-toi de cette parole.

— Elle est dite.

Il y eut un silence, et tous deux se regardèrent.

Et Gauvain reprit:

— Ce sera une date sanglante que cette année 93 où nous sommes.

— Prends garde, s’écria Cimourdain. Les devoirs terribles existent. N’accuse pas qui n’est point accusable. Depuis quand la maladie est-elle la faute du médecin? Oui, ce qui caractérise cette année énorme, c’est d’être sans pitié. Pourquoi? parce qu’elle est la grande année révolutionnaire. Cette année où nous sommes incarne la révolution. La révolution a un ennemi, le vieux monde, et elle est sans pitié pour lui, de même que le chirurgien a un ennemi, la gangrène, et est sans pitié pour elle. La révolution extirpe la royauté dans le roi, l’aristocratie dans le noble, le despotisme dans le soldat, la superstition dans le prêtre, la barbarie dans le juge, en un mot, tout ce qui est la tyrannie dans tout ce qui est le tyran. L’opération est effrayante, la révolution la fait d’une main sûre. Quant à la quantité de chair saine qu’elle sacrifie, demande à Boerhave ce qu’il en pense. Quelle tumeur à couper n’entraîne une perte de sang? Quel incendie à éteindre n’exige la part du feu? Ces nécessités redoutables sont la condition même du succès. Un chirurgien ressemble à un boucher; un guérisseur peut faire l’effet d’un bourreau. La révolution se dévoue à son uvre fatale. Elle mutile, mais elle sauve. Quoi! vous lui demandez grâce pour le virus! vous voulez qu’elle soit clémente pour ce qui est vénéneux! Elle n’écoute pas. Elle tient le passé, elle l’achèvera. Elle fait à la civilisation une incision profonde, d’où sortira la santé du genre humain. Vous souffrez? sans doute. Combien de temps cela durera-t-il? Le temps de l’opération. Ensuite vous vivrez. La révolution ampute le monde. De là cette hémorragie, 93.

— Le chirurgien est calme, dit Gauvain, et les hommes que je vois sont violents.

— La révolution, répliqua Cimourdain, veut pour l’aider des ouvriers farouches. Elle repousse toute main qui tremble. Elle n’a foi qu’aux inexorables. Danton, c’est le terrible, Robespierre, c’est l’inflexible, Saint-Just, c’est l’irréductible, Marat, c’est l’implacable. Prends-y garde, Gauvain. Ces noms-là sont nécessaires. Ils valent pour nous des armées. Ils terrifieront l’Europe.

— Et peut-être aussi l’avenir, dit Gauvain.

Il s’arrêta et repartit:

— Du reste, mon maître, vous faites erreur, je n’accuse personne. Selon moi, le vrai point de vue de la révolution, c’est l’irresponsabilité. Personne n’est innocent, personne n’est coupable. Louis XVI, c’est un mouton jeté parmi des lions. Il veut fuir, il veut se sauver, il cherche à se défendre; il mordrait, s’il pouvait. Mais n’est pas lion qui veut. Sa velléité passe pour crime. Ce mouton en colère montre les dents. Le traître! disent les lions. Et ils le mangent. Cela fait, ils se battent entre eux.

— Le mouton est une bête.

— Et les lions, que sont-ils?

Cette réplique fit songer Cimourdain. Il releva la tête et dit:

— Ces lions-là sont des consciences. Ces lions-là sont des idées. Ces lions-là sont des principes.

— Ils font la terreur.

— Un jour, la révolution sera la justification de la terreur.

— Craignez que la terreur ne soit la calomnie de la révolution.

Et Gauvain reprit:

— Liberté, Egalité, Fraternité, ce sont des dogmes de paix et d’harmonie. Pourquoi leur donner un aspect effrayant? Que voulons-nous? conquérir les peuples à la république universelle. Eh bien, ne leur faisons pas peur. A quoi bon l’intimidation? Pas plus que les oiseaux, les peuples ne sont attirés par l’épouvantail. Il ne faut pas faire le mal pour faire le bien. On ne renverse pas le trône pour laisser l’échafaud debout. Mort aux rois, et vie aux nations. Abattons les couronnes, épargnons les têtes. La révolution, c’est la concorde, et non l’effroi. Les idées douces sont mal servies par les hommes incléments. Amnistie est pour moi le plus beau mot de la langue humaine. Je ne veux verser de sang qu’en risquant le mien. Du reste je ne sais que combattre, et je ne suis qu’un soldat. Mais si l’on ne peut pardonner, cela ne vaut pas la peine de vaincre. Soyons pendant la bataille les ennemis de nos ennemis, et après la victoire leurs frères.

— Prends garde! répéta Cimourdain pour la troisième fois. Gauvain, tu es pour moi plus que mon fils, prends garde!

Et il ajouta, pensif:

— Dans des temps comme les nôtres, la pitié peut être une des formes de la trahison.

En entendant parler ces deux hommes, on eût cru entendre le dialogue de l’épée et de la hache.

VIII. DOLOROSA

Cependant la mère cherchait ses petits.

Elle allait devant elle. Comment vivait-elle? Impossible de le dire. Elle ne le savait pas elle-même. Elle marcha des jours et des nuits; elle mendia, elle mangea de l’herbe, elle coucha à terre, elle dormit en plein air, dans les broussailles, sous les étoiles, quelquefois sous la pluie et la bise.

Elle rôdait de village en village, de métairie en métairie, s’informant. Elle s’arrêtait aux seuils. Sa robe était en haillons. Quelquefois on l’accueillait, quelquefois on la chassait. Quand elle ne pouvait entrer dans les maisons, elle allait dans les bois.

Elle ne connaissait pas le pays, elle ignorait tout, excepté Siscoignard et la paroisse d’Azé, elle n’avait point d’itinéraire, elle revenait sur ses pas, recommençait une route déjà parcourue, faisait du chemin inutile. Elle suivait tantôt le pavé, tantôt l’ornière d’une charrette, tantôt les sentiers dans les taillis. A cette vie au hasard, elle avait usé ses misérables vêtements. Elle avait marché d’abord avec ses souliers, puis avec ses pieds nus, puis avec ses pieds sanglants.

Elle allait à travers la guerre, à travers les coups de fusil, sans rien entendre, sans rien voir, sans rien éviter, cherchant ses enfants. Tout étant en révolte, il n’y avait plus de gendarmes, plus de maires, plus d’autorité. Elle n’avait affaire qu’aux passants.

Elle leur parlait. Elle demandait:

— Avez-vous vu quelque part trois petits enfants?

Les passants levaient la tête.

— Deux garçons et une fille, disait-elle.

Elle continuait:

— René-Jean, Gros-Alain, Georgette? Vous n’avez pas vu ça?

Elle poursuivait:

— L’aîné a quatre ans et demi, la petite a vingt mois.

Elle ajoutait:

— Savez-vous où ils sont? on me les a pris.

On la regardait et c’était tout.

Voyant qu’on ne la comprenait pas, elle disait:

— C’est qu’ils sont à moi. Voilà pourquoi.

Les gens passaient leur chemin. Alors elle s'arrêtait et ne disait plus rien, et se déchirait le sein avec les ongles.

Un jour pourtant un paysan l'écouta. Le bonhomme se mit à réfléchir.

— Attendez donc, dit-il. Trois enfants?

— Oui.

— Deux garçons?…

— Et une fille.

— C'est ça que vous cherchez?

— Oui.

— J'ai ouï parler d'un seigneur qui avait pris trois petits enfants et qui les avait avec lui.

— Où est cet homme? cria-t-elle. Où sont-ils?

Le paysan répondit:

— Allez à la Tourgue.

— Est-ce que c'est là que je trouverai mes enfants?

— Peut-être bien que oui.

— Vous dites?…

— La Tourgue.

— Qu'est-ce que c'est que la Tourgue?

— C'est un endroit.

— Est-ce un village? un château? une métairie?

— Je n'y suis jamais allé.

— Est-ce loin?

— Ce n'est pas près.

— De quel côté?

— Du côté de Fougères.

— Par où y va-t-on?

— Vous êtes à Vantortes, dit le paysan, vous laisserez Ernée à gauche et Coxelles à droite, vous passerez par Lorchamp et vous traverserez le Leroux.

Et le paysan leva sa main vers l'occident.

— Toujours droit devant vous en allant du côté où le soleil se couche.

Avant que le paysan eût baissé son bras, elle était en marche.

Le paysan lui cria:

— Mais prenez garde. On se bat par là.

Elle ne se retourna point pour lui répondre, et continua d'aller en avant.

IX. UNE BASTILLE DE PROVINCE

i LA TOURGUE

Le voyageeur qui, il y a quarante ans, entré dans la forêt de Fougères du côté de Laignelet, en ressortait du côté de Parigné, faisait, sur la lisière de cette profonde futaie, une rencontre sinistre. En débouchant du hallier, il avait brusquement devant lui la Tourgue.

Non la Tourgue vivante, mais la Tourgue morte. La Tourgue lézardée, sabordée, balafrée, démantelée. La ruine est à l'édifice ce que le fantôme est à l'homme. Pas de plus lugubre vision que la Tourgue. Ce qu'on avait sous les yeux, c'était une haute tour ronde, toute seule au coin du bois comme un malfaiteur. Cette tour, droite sur un bloc de roche à pic, avait presque l'aspect romain tant elle était correcte et solide, et tant dans cette masse robuste l'idée de la puissance était mêlée à l'idée de la chute. Romaine, elle l'était même un peu, car elle était romane. Commencée au neuvième siècle, elle avait été achevée au douzième, après la troisième croisade. Les impostes à oreillons de ses baies disaient son âge. On approchait, on gravissait l'escarpement, on apercevait une brèche, on se risquait à entrer, on était dedans, c'était vide. C'était quelque chose comme l'intérieur d'un clairon de pierre posé debout sur le sol. Du haut en bas, aucun diaphragme; pas de toit, pas de plafonds, pas de planchers, des arrachements de voûtes et de cheminées, des embrasures à fauconneaux, à des hauteurs diverses, des cordons de corbeaux de granit et quelques poutres transversales marquant les étages; sur les poutres les fientes des oiseaux de nuit, la muraille colossale, quinze pieds d'épaisseur à la base et douze au sommet, çà et là des crevasses et des trous qui avaient été des portes, par où l'on entrevoyait des escaliers dans l'intérieur ténébreux du mur. Le passant qui pénétrait là le soir entendait crier les hulottes, les tette-chèvres, les bihoreaux et les crapauds-volants, et voyait sous ses pieds des ronces, des pierres, des reptiles, et sur sa tête, à travers une rondeur noire qui était le haut de la tour et qui semblait la bouche d'un puits énorme, les étoiles.

C'était la tradition du pays qu'aux étages supérieurs de cette tour il y avait des portes secrètes faites, comme les portes des tombeaux des rois de Juda, d'une grosse pierre tournant sur pivot, s'ouvrant, puis se refermant, et s'effaçant dans la muraille; mode architecturale rapportée des croisades avec l'ogive. Quand ces portes étaient closes, il était impossible de les retrouver, tant elles étaient bien mêlées aux autres pierres du mur. On voit encore aujourd’hui de ces portes-là dans les mystérieuses cités de l’Anti-Liban, échappées au tremblement des douze villes sous Tibère.

ii. LA BRÈCHE

La brèche par où l’on entrait dans la ruine était une trouée de mine. Pour un connaisseur, familier avec Errard, Sardi et Pagan, cette mine avait été savamment faite. La chambre à feu en bonnet de prêtre était proportionnée à la puissance du donjon qu’elle avait à éventrer. Elle avait dû contenir au moins deux quintaux de poudre. On y arrivait par un canal serpentant qui vaut mieux que le canal droit; l’écroulement produit par la mine montrait à nu dans le déchirement de la pierre le saucisson, qui avait le diamètre voulu d’un oeuf de poule. L’explosion avait fait à la muraille une blessure profonde par où les assiégeants avaient dû pouvoir entrer. Cette tour avait évidemment soutenu, à diverses époques, de vrais sièges en règle; elle était criblée de mitrailles; et ces mitrailles n’étaient pas toutes du même temps; chaque projectile a sa façon de marquer un rempart; et tous avaient laissé à ce donjon leur balafre, depuis les boulets de pierre du quatorzième siècle jusqu’aux boulets de fer du dix-huitième.

La brèche donnait entrée dans ce qui avait dû être le rez-de-chaussée. Vis-à-vis de la brèche, dans le mur de la tour, s’ouvrait le guichet d’une crypte taillée dans le roc et se prolongeant dans les fondations de la tour jusque sous la salle du rez-de-chaussée.

Cette crypte, aux trois quarts comblée, a été déblayée en 1855 par les soins de M. Auguste Le Prévost, l’antiquaire de Bernay.

iii. L’OUBLIETTE

Cette crypte était l’oubliette. Tout donjon avait la sienne. Cette crypte, comme beaucoup de caves pénales des mêmes époques, avait deux étages. Le premier étage, où l’on pénétrait par le guichet, était une chambre voûtée assez vaste, de plain-pied avec la salle du rez-de-chaussée. On voyait sur la paroi de cette chambre deux sillons parallèles et verticaux qui allaient d’un mur à l’autre en passant par la voûte où ils étaient profondément empreints, et qui donnaient l’idée de deux ornières. C’étaient deux ornières en effet. Ces deux sillons avaient été creusés par deux roues. Jadis, aux temps féodaux, c’était dans cette chambre que se faisait l’écartèlement, par un procédé moins tapageur que les quatre chevaux. Il y avait là deux roues, si fortes et si grandes qu’elles touchaient les murs et la voûte. On attachait à chacune de ces roues un bras et une jambe du patient, puis on faisait tourner les deux roues en sens inverse, ce qui arrachait l’homme. Il fallait de l’effort; de là les ornières creusées dans la pierre que les roues effleuraient. On peut voir encore aujourd’hui une chambre de ce genre à Vianden.

Au-dessous de cette chambre il y en avait une autre. C’était l’oubliette véritable. On n’y entrait point par une porte, on y pénétrait par un trou; le patient, nu, était descendu, au moyen d’une corde sous les aisselles, dans la chambre d’en bas par un soupirail pratiqué au milieu du dallage de la chambre d’en haut. S’il s’obstinait à vivre, on lui jetait sa nourriture par ce trou. On voit encore aujourd’hui un trou de ce genre à Bouillon.

Par ce trou il venait du vent. La chambre d’en bas, creusée sous la salle du rez-de-chaussée, était plutôt un puits qu’une chambre. Elle aboutissait à de l’eau, et un souffle glacial l’emplissait. Ce vent qui faisait mourir le prisonnier d’en bas faisait vivre le prisonnier d’en haut. Il rendait la prison respirable. Le prisonnier d’en haut, à tâtons sous sa voûte, ne recevait d’air que par ce trou. Du reste, qui y entrait, ou qui y tombait, n’en sortait plus. C’était au prisonnier à s’en garer dans l’obscurité. Un faux pas pouvait du patient d’en haut faire le patient d’en bas. Cela le regardait. S’il tenait à la vie, ce trou était son danger; s’il s’ennuyait, ce trou était sa ressource. L’étage supérieur était le cachot, l’étage inférieur était le tombeau. Superposition ressemblante à la société d’alors.

C’est là ce que nos aïeux appelaient «un cul-de-basse-fosse». La chose ayant disparu, le nom pour nous n’a plus de sens. Grâce à la révolution, nous entendons prononcer ces mots-là avec indifférence.

Du dehors de la tour, au-dessus de la brèche qui en était, il y a quarante ans, l’entrée unique, on apercevait une embrasure plus large que les autres meurtrières, à laquelle pendait un grillage de fer descellé et défoncé.

iv. LE PONT-CHATELET

A cette tour, et du côté opposé à la brèche, se rattachait un pont de pierre de trois arches peu endommagées. Le pont avait porté un corps de logis dont il restait quelques tronçons. Ce corps de logis, où étaient visibles les marques d’un incendie, n’avait plus que sa charpente noircie, sorte d’ossature à travers laquelle passait le jour, et qui se dressait auprès de la tour, comme un squelette à côté d’un fantôme.

Cette ruine est aujourd’hui tout à fait démolie, et il n’en reste aucune trace. Ce qu’ont fait beaucoup de siècles et beaucoup de rois, il suffit d’un jour et d’un paysan pour le défaire.

La Tourgue, abréviation paysanne, signifie la Tour-Gauvain, de même que la Jupelle signifie la Jupellière, et que ce nom d'un bossu chef de bande, Pinson-le-Tort, signifie Pinson-le-Tortu.

La Tourgue, qui il y a quarante ans était une ruine et qui aujourd'hui est une ombre, était en 1793 une forteresse. C'était la vieille bastille des Gauvain, gardant à l'occident l'entrée de la forêt de Fougères, forêt qui, elle-même, est à peine un bois maintenant.

On avait construit cette citadelle sur un de ces gros blocs de schiste qui abondent entre Mayenne et Dinan, et qui sont partout épars parmi les halliers et les bruyères, comme si les titans s'étaient jeté des pavés à la tête.

La tour était toute la forteresse; sous la tour le rocher, au pied du rocher un de ces cours d'eau que le mois de janvier change en torrents et que le mois de juin met à sec.

Simplifiée à ce point, cette forteresse était, au moyen-âge, à peu près imprenable. Le pont l'affaiblissait. Les Gauvain gothiques l'avaient bâtie sans pont. On y abordait par une de ces passerelles branlantes qu'un coup de hache suffisait à rompre. Tant que les Gauvain furent vicomtes, elle leur plut ainsi, et ils s'en contentèrent; mais quand ils furent marquis, et quand ils quittèrent la caverne pour la cour, ils jetèrent trois arches sur le torrent, et ils se firent accessibles du côté de la plaine de même qu'ils s'étaient faits accessibles du côté du roi. Les marquis au dix-septième siècle et les marquises au dix-huitième, ne tenaient plus à être imprenables. Copier Versailles remplaça ceci: continuer les aïeux.

En face de la tour, du côté occidental, il y avait un plateau assez élevé allant aboutir aux plaines; ce plateau venait presque toucher la tour, et n'en était séparé que par un ravin très creux où coulait le cours d'eau qui est un affluent du Couesnon. Le pont, trait d'union entre la forteresse et le plateau, fut fait haut sur piles; et sur ces piles on construisit, comme à Chenonceaux, un édifice en style Mansard, plus logeable que la tour. Mais les moeurs étaient encore très rudes; les seigneurs gardèrent la coutume d'habiter les chambres du donjon pareilles à des cachots. Quant au bâtiment sur le pont, qui était une sorte de petit châtelet, on y pratiqua un long couloir qui servait d'entrée et qu'on appela la salle des gardes; au-dessus de cette salle des gardes, qui était une sorte d'entresol, on mit une bibliothèque, au-dessus de la bibliothèque un grenier. De longues fenêtres à petites vitres en verre de Bohême, des pilastres entre les fenêtres, des médaillons sculptés dans le mur; trois étages; en bas, des pertuisanes Et des mousquets; au milieu, des livres; en haut, des sacs d'avoine; tout Cela était un peu sauvage et fort noble.

La tour à côté était farouche.

Elle dominait cette bâtisse coquette de toute sa hauteur lugubre. De la plate-forme on pouvait foudroyer le pont.

Les deux édifices, l'un abrupt, l'autre poli, se choquaient plus qu'ils ne s'accostaient. Les deux styles n'étaient point d'accord; bien que deux demi-cercles semblent devoir être identiques, rien ne ressemble moins à un plein-cintre roman qu'une archivolte classique. Cette tour digne des forêts était une étrange voisine pour ce pont digne de Versailles. Qu'on se figure Alain Barbe-Torte donnant le bras à Louis XIV. L'ensemble terrifiait. Des deux majestés mêlées sortait on ne sait quoi de féroce.

Au point de vue militaire, le pont, insistons-y, livrait presque la tour. Il l'embellissait et la désarmait; en gagnant de l'ornement elle avait perdu de la force. Le pont la mettait de plain pied avec le plateau. Toujours inexpugnable du côté de la forêt, elle était maintenant vulnérable du côté de la plaine. Autrefois elle commandait le plateau, à présent le plateau la commandait. Un ennemi installé là serait vite maître du pont. La bibliothèque et le grenier étaient pour l'assiégeant, et contre la forteresse. Une bibliothèque et un grenier se ressemblent en ceci que les livres et la paille sont du combustible. Pour un assiégeant qui utilise l'incendie, brûler Homère ou brûler une botte de foin, pourvu que cela brûle, c'est la même chose. Les français l'ont prouvé aux allemands en brûlant la bibliothèque de Heidelberg, et les allemands l'ont prouvé aux français en brûlant la bibliothèque de Strasbourg. Ce pont, ajouté à la Tourgue, était donc stratégiquement une faute; mais au dix-septième siècle, sous Colbert et Louvois, les princes Gauvain, pas plus que les princes de Rohan ou les princes de la Trémoille, ne se croyaient désormais assiégeables. Pourtant les constructeurs du pont avaient pris quelques précautions. Premièrement, ils avaient prévu l'incendie; au-dessous des trois fenêtres du côté aval, ils avaient accroché transversalement, à des crampons qu'on voyait encore il y a un demi-siècle, une forte échelle de sauvetage ayant pour longueur la hauteur des deux premiers étages du pont, hauteur qui dépassait celle de trois étages ordinaires; deuxièmement, ils avaient prévu l'assaut; ils avaient isolé le pont de la tour au moyen d'une lourde et basse porte de fer; cette porte était cintrée; on la fermait avec une grosse clef qui était dans une cachette connue du maître seul, et, une fois fermée, cette porte pouvait défier le bélier, et presque braver le boulet.

Il fallait passer par le pont pour arriver à cette porte, et passer par cette porte pour pénétrer dans la tour. Pas d'autre entrée.

v. LA PORTE DE FER

Le deuxième étage du châtelet du pont, surélevé à cause des piles, correspondait avec le deuxième étage de la tour; c'est à cette hauteur que, pour plus de sûreté, avait été placée la porte de fer.

La porte de fer s'ouvrait du côté du pont sur la bibliothèque et du côté de la tour sur une grande salle voûtée avec pilier au centre. Cette salle, on vient de le dire, était le second étage du donjon. Elle était ronde comme la tour; de longues meurtrières, donnant sur la campagne, l'éclairaient. La muraille, toute sauvage, était nue, et rien n'en cachait les pierres, d'ailleurs très symétriquement ajustées. On arrivait à cette salle par un escalier en colimaçon pratiqué dans la muraille, chose toute simple quand les murs ont quinze pieds d'épaisseur. Au moyen-âge on prenait une ville rue par rue, une rue maison par maison, une maison chambre par chambre. On assiégeait une forteresse étage par étage. La Tourgue était sous ce rapport fort savamment disposée et très revêche et très difficile. On montait d'un étage à l'autre par un escalier en spirale d'un abord malaisé; les portes étaient de biais et n'avaient pas hauteur d'homme, et il fallait baisser la tête pour y passer; or, tête baissée c'est tête assommée; et, à chaque porte, l'assiégé attendait l'assiégeant.

Il y avait au-dessous de la salle ronde à pilier deux chambres pareilles, qui étaient le premier étage et le rez-de-chaussée, et au-dessus trois; sur ces six chambres superposées la tour se fermait par un couvercle de pierre qui était la plate-forme, et où l'on arrivait par une étroite guérite.

Les quinze pieds d'épaisseur de muraille qu'on avait dû percer pour y placer la porte de fer, et au milieu desquels elle était scellée, l'emboîtaient dans une longue voussure; de sorte que la porte, quand elle était fermée, était, tant du côté de la tour que du côté du pont, sous un porche de six ou sept pieds de profondeur; quand elle était ouverte, ces deux porches se confondaient et faisaient la voûte d'entrée.

Sous le porche du côté du pont s'ouvrait dans l'épaisseur du mur le guichet bas d'une vis-de-Saint-Gilles qui menait au couloir du premier étage sous la bibliothèque; c'était encore là une difficulté pour l'assiégeant. Le châtelet sur le pont n'offrait à son extrémité du côté du plateau qu'un mur à pic, et le pont était coupé là. Un pont-levis, appliqué contre une porte basse, le mettait en communication avec le plateau, et ce pont-levis, qui, à cause de la hauteur du plateau, ne s'abaissait jamais qu'en plan incliné, donnait dans le long couloir dit salle des gardes. Une fois maître de ce couloir, l'assiégeant, pour arriver à la porte de fer, était forcé d'enlever de vive force l'escalier en vis-de-Saint-Gilles qui montait au deuxième étage.

vi. LA BIBLIOTHEQUE

Quant à la bibliothèque, c'était une salle oblongue ayant la largeur et la longueur du pont, et une porte unique, la porte de fer. Une fausse porte battante, capitonnée de drap vert, et qu'il suffisait de pousser, masquait à l'intérieur la voussure d'entrée de la tour. Le mur de la bibliothèque était du haut en bas, et du plancher au plafond, revêtu d'armoires vitrées dans le beau goût de menuiserie du dix-septième siècle. Six grandes fenêtres, trois de chaque côté, une au-dessus de chaque arche, éclairaient cette bibliothèque. Par ces fenêtres, du dehors et du haut du plateau, on en voyait l'intérieur. Dans les entre-deux de ces fenêtres se dressaient sur des gaines de chêne sculpté six bustes de marbre, Hermolaüs de Byzance, Athénée, grammairien naucratique, Suidas, Casaubon, Clovis, roi de France, et son chancelier Anachalus, lequel, du reste n'était pas plus chancelier que Clovis n'était roi.

Il y avait dans cette bibliothèque des livres quelconques.

Un est resté célèbre. C'était un vieil in-quarto avec estampes, portant pour titre en grosses lettres SAINT-BARTHÉLEMY, et pour sous-titre Evangile selon saint Barthélemy, précédé d'une dissertation de Pantoenus, philosophe chrétien, sur la question de savoir si cet évangile doit être réputé apocryphe et si saint Barthélemy est le même que Nathanaél. Ce livre, considéré comme exemplaire unique, était sur un pupitre au milieu de la bibliothèque. Au dernier siècle, on le venait voir par curiosité.

vii. LE GRENIER

Quant au grenier, qui avait, comme la bibliothèque, la forme oblongue du pont, c'était simplement le dessous de la charpente du toit. Cela faisait une grande halle encombrée de paille et de foin, et éclairée par six mansardes. Pas d'autre ornement qu'une figure de saint Barnabé sculptée sur la porte et au-dessous ce vers:

Barnabus sanctus falcem jubet ire per herbam.

Ainsi une haute et large tour, à six étages, percée çà et là de quelques meurtrières, ayant pour entrée et pour issue unique une porte de fer donnant sur un pont-châtelet fermé par un pont-levis; derrière la tour, la forêt; devant la tour un plateau de bruyères, plus haut que le pont, plus bas que la tour; sous le pont, entre la tour et le plateau, un ravin profond, étroit, plein de broussailles, torrent en hiver, ruisseau au printemps, fossé pierreux l’été, voilà ce que c’était que la Tour-Gauvain, dite la Tourgue.

X. LES OTAGES

Juillet s’écoula, août vint, un souffle héroïque et féroce passait sur la France, deux spectres venaient de traverser l’horizon, Marat un couteau au flanc, Charlotte Corday sans tête, tout devenait formidable. Quant à la Vendée, battue dans la grande stratégie, elle se réfugiait dans la petite, plus redoutable, nous l’avons dit; cette guerre était maintenant une immense bataille, déchiquetée dans les bois; les désastres de la grosse armée, dite catholique et royale, commençaient; un décret envoyait en Vendée l’armée de Mayence; huit mille vendéens étaient morts à Ancenis; les vendéens étaient repoussés de Nantes, débusqués de Montaigu, expulsés de Thouars, chassés de Noirmoutier, culbutés hors de Cholet, de Mortagne et de Saumur; ils évacuaient Parthenay; ils abandonnaient Clisson; ils lâchaient pied à Châtillon; ils perdaient un drapeau à Saint-Hilaire; ils étaient battus à Pornic, aux Sables, à Fontenay, à Doué, au Château-d’Eau, aux Ponts-de-Cé; ils étaient en échec à Luçon, en retraite à la Châtaigneraye, en déroute à la Roche-sur-Yon; mais, d’une part, ils menaçaient la Rochelle, et d’autre part, dans les eaux de Guernesey, une flotte anglaise, aux ordres du général Craig, portant, mêlés aux meilleurs officiers de la marine française, plusieurs régiments anglais, n’attendait qu’un signal du marquis de Lantenac pour débarquer. Ce débarquement pouvait redonner la victoire à la révolte royaliste. Pitt était d’ailleurs un malfaiteur d’état; dans la politique il y a la trahison de même que dans la panoplie il y a le poignard; Pitt poignardait notre pays et trahissait le sien; c’est trahir son pays que de le déshonorer; l’Angleterre, sous lui et par lui, faisait la guerre punique. Elle espionnait, fraudait, mentait. Braconnière et faussaire, rien ne lui répugnait; elle descendait jusqu’aux minuties de la haine. Elle faisait accaparer le suif, qui coûtait cinq francs la livre; on saisissait à Lille, sur un anglais, une lettre de Prigent, agent de Pitt en Vendée, où on lisait ces lignes: «Je vous prie de ne pas épargner l’argent. Nous espérons que les assassinats se feront avec prudence, les prêtres déguisés et les femmes sont les personnes les plus propres à cette opération. Envoyez soixante mille livres à Rouen et cinquante mille livres à Caen.» Cette lettre fut lue par Barère à la Convention le 1er août. A ces perfidies ripostaient les sauvageries de Parrein et plus tard les atrocités de Carrier. Les républicains de Metz et les républicains du Midi demandaient à marcher contre les rebelles. Un décret ordonnait la formation de vingt-quatre compagnies de pionniers pour incendier les haies et les clôtures du Bocage. Crise inouïe. La guerre ne cessait sur un point que pour recommencer sur l’autre. Pas de grâce! pas de prisonniers! était le cri des deux partis. L’histoire était pleine d’une ombre terrible.

Dans ce mois d’août la Tourgue était assiégée.

Un soir, pendant le lever des étoiles, dans le calme d’un crépuscule caniculaire, pas une feuille ne remuant dans la forêt, pas une herbe ne frissonnant dans la plaine, à travers le silence de la nuit tombante, un son de trompe se fit entendre. Ce son de trompe venait du haut de la tour.

A ce son de trompe répondit un coup de clairon qui venait d’en bas.

Au haut de la tour il y avait un homme armé; en bas, dans l’ombre, il y avait un camp.

On distinguait confusément dans l’obscurité autour de la Tour-Gauvain un fourmillement de formes noires. Ce fourmillement était un bivouac. Quelques feux commençaient à s’y allumer sous les arbres de la forêt et parmi les bruyères du plateau, et piquaient çà et là de points lumineux les ténèbres, comme si la terre voulait s’étoiler en même temps que le ciel. Sombres étoiles que celles de la guerre! Le bivouac du côté du plateau se prolongeait jusqu’aux plaines et du côté de la forêt s’enfonçait dans le hallier. La Tourgue était bloquée.

L’étendue du bivouac des assiégeants indiquait une troupe nombreuse.

Le camp serrait la forteresse étroitement, et venait du côté de la tour jusqu’au rocher et du côté du pont jusqu’au ravin.

Il y eut un deuxième bruit de trompe que suivit un deuxième coup de clairon.

Cette trompe interrogeait et ce clairon répondait.

Cette trompe, c’était la tour qui demandait au camp: Peut-on vous parler? et ce clairon, c’était le camp qui répondait: Oui.

A cette époque, les vendéens n’étant pas considérés par la Convention comme belligérants, et défense étant faite par décret d’échanger avec les «brigands» des parlementaires, on suppléait comme on pouvait aux communications que le droit des gens autorise dans la guerre ordinaire et interdit dans la guerre civile. De là, dans l’occasion, une certaine entente entre la trompe paysanne et le clairon militaire. Le premier appel n’était qu’une entrée en matière, le second appel posait la question: Voulez-vous écouter? Si, à ce second appel, le clairon se taisait, refus; si le clairon répondait, consentement. Cela signifiait: Trêve de quelques instants.

Le clairon ayant répondu au deuxième appel, l'homme qui était au haut de la tour parla, et l'on entendit ceci:

« — Hommes qui m'écoutez, je suis Gouge-le-Bruant, surnommé Brise-Bleu, parce que j'ai exterminé beaucoup des vôtres, et surnommé aussi l'Imânus, parce que j'en tuerai encore plus que je n'en ai tué; j'ai eu le doigt coupé d'un coup de sabre sur le canon de mon fusil à l'attaque de Granville, et vous avez fait guillotiner à Laval mon père et ma mère et ma soeur Jacqueline, âgée de dix-huit ans. Voilà ce que je suis.

«Je vous parle au nom de monseigneur le marquis Gauvain de Lantenac, vicomte de Fontenay, prince breton, seigneur des sept forêts, mon maître.

«Sachez d'abord que monseigneur le marquis, avant de s'enfermer dans cette tour où vous le tenez bloqué, a distribué la guerre entre six chefs, ses lieutenants; il a donné à Delière le pays entre la route de Brest et la route d'Entrée; à Treton le pays entre la Roë et Laval; à Jacquet, dit Taillefer, la lisière du Haut-Maine; à Gaulier, dit Grand-Pierre, Château-Gontier; à Lecomte, Craon; Fougères, à monsieur Dubois-Guy; et toute la Mayenne à monsieur de Rochambeau; de sorte que rien n'est fini pour vous par la prise de cette forteresse, et que, lors même que monseigneur le marquis mourrait, la Vendée de Dieu et du roi ne mourra pas.

«Ce que j'en dis, sachez cela, est pour vous avertir. Monseigneur est là, à mes côtés. Je suis la bouche par où passent ses paroles. Hommes qui nous assiégez, faites silence.

«Voici ce qu'il importe que vous entendiez:

«N'oubliez pas que la guerre que vous nous faites n'est point juste. Nous sommes des gens qui habitons notre pays, et nous combattons honnêtement, et nous sommes simples et purs sous la volonté de Dieu comme l'herbe sous la rosée. C'est la république qui nous a attaqués; elle est venue nous troubler dans nos campagnes, et elle a brûlé nos maisons et nos récoltes et mitraillé nos métairies, et nos femmes et nos enfants ont été obligés de s'enfuir pieds nus dans les bois pendant que la fauvette d'hiver chantait encore.

«Vous qui êtes ici et qui m'entendez, vous nous avez traqués dans la forêt, et vous nous cernez dans cette tour; vous avez tué ou dispersé ceux qui s'étaient joints à nous; vous avez du canon; vous avez réuni à votre colonne les garnisons et postes de Mortain, de Barenton, de Teilleul, de

Landivy, d'Evran, de Tinténiac et de Vitré, ce qui fait que vous êtes quatre mille cinq cents soldats qui nous attaquez; et nous, nous sommes dix-neuf hommes qui nous défendons.

«Nous avons des vivres et des munitions.

«Vous avez réussi à pratiquer une mine et à faire sauter un morceau de notre rocher et un morceau de notre mur.

«Cela a fait un trou au pied de la tour, et ce trou est une brèche par laquelle vous pouvez entrer, bien qu'elle ne soit pas à ciel ouvert et que la tour, toujours forte et debout, fasse voûte au-dessus d'elle.

«Maintenant vous préparez l'assaut.

«Et nous, d'abord monseigneur le marquis, qui est prince de Bretagne et prieur séculier de l'abbaye de Sainte-Marie de Lantenac, où une messe de tous les jours a été fondée par la reine Jeanne, ensuite les autres défenseurs de la tour, dont est monsieur l'abbé Turmeau, en guerre Grand-Francoeur, mon camarade Guinoiseau, qui est capitaine du Camp-Vert, mon camarade Chante-en-Hiver, qui est capitaine du camp de l'Avoine, mon camarade la Musette, qui est capitaine du camp des Fourmis, et moi, paysan, qui suis né au bourg de Daon, où coule le ruisseau Moriandre, nous tous, nous avons une chose à vous dire.

«Hommes qui êtes au bas de cette tour, écoutez.

«Nous avons en nos mains trois prisonniers, qui sont trois enfants. Ces enfants ont été adoptés par un de vos bataillons, et ils sont à vous. Nous vous offrons de vous rendre ces trois enfants.

«A une condition.

«C'est que nous aurons la sortie libre.

«Si vous refusez, écoutez bien, vous ne pouvez attaquer que de deux façons, par la brèche, du côté de la forêt, ou par le pont, du côté du plateau. Le bâtiment sur le pont a trois étages; dans l'étage d'en bas, moi l'Imânus, moi qui vous parle, j'ai fait mettre six tonnes de goudron et cent fascines de bruyères sèches; dans l'étage d'en haut, il y a de la paille; dans l'étage du milieu, il y a des livres et des papiers; la porte de fer qui communique du pont avec la tour est fermée, et monseigneur en a la clef sur lui; moi, j'ai fait sous la porte un trou, et par ce trou passe une mèche soufrée dont un bout est dans une des tonnes de goudron et l'autre bout à la portée de ma main, dans l'intérieur de la tour; j'y mettrai le feu quand bon me semblera. Si vous refusez de nous laisser sortir, les trois enfants seront placés dans le deuxième étage du pont, entre l'étage où aboutit la mèche soufrée et où est le goudron, et l’étage où est la paille, et la porte de fer sera refermée sur eux. Si vous attaquez par le pont, ce sera vous qui incendierez le bâtiment; si vous attaquez à la fois par la brèche et par le pont, le feu sera mis à la fois par vous et par nous; et, dans tous les cas, les trois enfants périront.

«A présent, acceptez ou refusez.

«Si vous acceptez, nous sortons.

«Si vous refusez, les enfants meurent.

«J’ai dit.»

L’homme qui parlait du haut de la tour se tut.

Une voix d’en bas cria:

— Nous refusons.

Cette voix était brève et sévère. Une autre voix moins dure, ferme pourtant, ajouta:

— Nous vous donnons vingt-quatre heures pour vous rendre à discrétion.

Il y eut un silence, et la même voix continua:

— Demain, à pareille heure, si vous n’êtes pas rendus, nous donnons l’assaut.

Et la première voix reprit:

— Et alors pas de quartier.

A cette voix farouche, une autre voix répondit du haut de la tour. On vit entre deux créneaux se pencher une haute silhouette dans laquelle on put, à la lueur des étoiles, reconnaître la redoutable figure du marquis de Lantenac, et cette figure d’où un regard tombait dans l’ombre et semblait chercher quelqu’un, cria:

— Tiens, c’est toi, prêtre!

— Oui, c’est moi, traître! répondit la rude voix d’en bas.

XI. AFFREUX COMME L’ANTIQUE

La voix implacable en effet était la voix de Cimourdain; la voix plus jeune et moins absolue était celle de Gauvain.

Le marquis de Lantenac, en reconnaissant l’abbé Cimourdain, ne s’était pas trompé.

En peu de semaines, dans ce pays que la guerre civile faisait sanglant, Cimourdain, on le sait, était devenu fameux; pas de notoriété plus lugubre que la sienne; on disait: Marat à Paris, Châlier à Lyon, Cimourdain en Vendée. On flétrissait l’abbé Cimourdain de tout le respect qu’on avait eu pour lui autrefois; c’est là l’effet de l’habit de prêtre retourné. Cimourdain faisait horreur. Les sévères sont des infortunés; qui voit leurs actes les condamne, qui verrait leur conscience les absoudrait peut-être. Un Lycurgue qui n’est pas expliqué semble un Tibère. Quoi qu’il en fût, deux hommes, le marquis de Lantenac et l’abbé Cimourdain, étaient égaux dans la balance de haine; la malédiction des royalistes sur Cimourdain faisait contre-poids à l’exécration des républicains pour Lantenac. Chacun de ces deux hommes était, pour le camp opposé, le monstre; à tel point qu’il se produisit ce fait singulier que, tandis que Prieur de la Marne à Granville mettait à prix la tête de Lantenac, Charette à Noirmoutier mettait à prix la tête de Cimourdain.

Disons-le, ces deux hommes, le marquis et le prêtre, étaient jusqu’à un certain point le même homme. Le masque de bronze de la guerre civile a deux profils, l’un tourné vers le passé, l’autre tourné vers l’avenir, mais aussi tragiques l’un que l’autre. Lantenac était le premier de ces profils, Cimourdain était le second; seulement l’amer rictus de Lantenac était couvert d’ombre et de nuit, et sur le front fatal de Cimourdain il y avait une lueur d’aurore.

Cependant la Tourgue assiégée avait un répit.

Grâce à l’intervention de Gauvain, on vient de le voir, une sorte de trêve de vingt-quatre heures avait été convenue.

L’Imânus, du reste, était bien renseigné, et, par suite des réquisitions de Cimourdain, Gauvain avait maintenant sous ses ordres quatre mille cinq cents hommes, tant garde nationale que troupe de ligne, avec lesquels il cernait Lantenac dans la Tourgue, et il avait pu braquer contre la forteresse douze pièces de canon, six du côté de la tour, sur la lisière de la forêt, en batterie enterrée, et six du côté du pont, sur le plateau, en batterie haute. Il avait pu faire jouer la mine, et la brèche était ouverte au pied de la tour.

Ainsi, sitôt les vingt-quatre heures de trêve expirées, la lutte allait s'engager dans les conditions que voici:

Sur le plateau et dans la forêt, on était quatre mille cinq cents.

Dans la tour, dix-neuf.

Les noms de ces dix-neuf assiégés peuvent être retrouvés par l'histoire dans les affiches de mise hors la loi. Nous les rencontrerons peut-être.

Pour commander à ces quatre mille cinq cents hommes qui étaient presque une armée, Cimourdain aurait voulu que Gauvain se laissât faire adjudant général. Gauvain avait refusé, et avait dit: — Quand Lantenac sera pris, nous verrons. Je n'ai encore rien mérité.

Ces grands commandements avec d'humbles grades étaient d'ailleurs dans les moeurs républicaines. Bonaparte, plus tard, fut en même temps chef d'escadron d'artillerie et général en chef de l'armée d'Italie.

La Tour-Gauvain avait une destinée étrange: un Gauvain l'attaquait, un Gauvain la défendait. De là, une certaine réserve dans l'attaque, mais non dans la défense, car M. de Lantenac était de ceux qui ne ménagent rien, et d'ailleurs il avait surtout habité Versailles et n'avait aucune superstition pour la Tourgue, qu'il connaissait à peine. Il était venu s'y réfugier, n'ayant plus d'autre asile, voilà tout; mais il l'eût démolie sans scrupule. Gauvain était plus respectueux.

Le point faible de la forteresse était le pont; mais dans la bibliothèque, qui était sur le pont, il y avait les archives de la famille; si l'assaut était donné là, l'incendie du pont était inévitable; il semblait à Gauvain que brûler les archives, c'était attaquer ses pères. La Tourgue était le manoir de famille des Gauvain; c'est de cette tour que mouvaient tous leurs fiefs de Bretagne, de même que tous les fiefs de France mouvaient de la tour du Louvre: les souvenirs domestiques des Gauvain étaient là; lui-même, il y était né; les fatalités tortueuses de la vie l'amenaient à attaquer, homme, cette muraille vénérable qui l'avait protégé enfant. Serait-il impie envers cette demeure jusqu'à la mettre en cendres? Peut-être son propre berceau, à lui Gauvain, était-il dans quelque coin du grenier de la bibliothèque. Certaines réflexions sont des émotions. Gauvain, en présence de l'antique maison de famille, se sentait ému. C'est pourquoi il avait épargné le pont. Il s'était borné à rendre toute sortie ou toute évasion impossible par cette issue et à tenir le pont en respect par une batterie, et il avait choisi pour l'attaque le côté opposé. De là, la mine et la sape au pied de la tour.

Cimourdain l'avait laissé faire; il se le reprochait; car son âpreté fronçait le sourcil devant toutes ces vieilleries gothiques, et il ne voulait pas plus l'indulgence pour les édifices que pour les hommes. Ménager un château, c'était un commencement de clémence. Or la clémence était le côté faible de Gauvain. Cimourdain, on le sait, le surveillait et l'arrêtait sur cette pente, à ses yeux funeste. Pourtant lui-même, et en ne se l'avouant qu'avec une sorte de colère, il n'avait pas revu la Tourgue sans un secret tressaillement; il se sentait attendri devant cette salle studieuse où étaient les premiers livres qu'il eût fait lire à Gauvain; il avait été curé du village voisin, Parigné; il avait, lui Cimourdain, habité les combles du châtelet du pont; c'est dans la bibliothèque qu'il tenait entre ses genoux le petit Gauvain épelant l'alphabet; c'est entre ces vieux quatre murs-là qu'il avait vu son élève bien-aimé, le fils de son âme, grandir comme homme et croître comme esprit. Cette bibliothèque, ce châtelet, ces murs pleins de ses bénédictions sur l'enfant, allait-il les foudroyer et les brûler? Il leur faisait grâce. Non sans remords.

Il avait laissé Gauvain entamer le siège sur le point opposé. La Tourgue avait son côté sauvage, la tour, et son côté civilisé, la bibliothèque. Cimourdain avait permis à Gauvain de ne battre en brèche que le côté sauvage.

Du reste, attaquée par un Gauvain, défendue par un Gauvain, cette vieille demeure revenait, en pleine révolution française, à ses habitudes féodales. Les guerres entre parents sont toute l'histoire du moyen-âge; les Etéocles et les Polynices sont gothiques aussi bien que grecs, et Hamlet fait dans Elseneur ce qu'Oreste a fait dans Argos.

XII. LE SAUVETAGE S’EBAUCHE

Toute la nuit se passa de part et d’autre en préparatifs.

Sitôt le sombre pourparler qu’on vient d’entendre terminé, le premier soin de Gauvain fut d’appeler son lieutenant.

Guéchamp, qu’il faut un peu connaître, était un homme de second plan, honnête, intrépide, médiocre, meilleur soldat que chef, rigoureusement intelligent jusqu’au point où c’est le devoir de ne plus comprendre, jamais attendri, inaccessible à la corruption, quelle qu’elle fût, aussi bien à la vénalité qui corrompt la conscience qu’à la pitié qui corrompt la justice. Il avait sur l’âme et sur le coeur ces deux abat-jour, la discipline et la consigne, comme un cheval a ses garde-vue sur les deux yeux, et il marchait devant lui dans l’espace que cela lui laissait libre. Son pas était droit, mais sa route était étroite.

Du reste, homme sûr; rigide dans le commandement, exact dans l’obéissance.

Gauvain adressa vivement la parole à Guéchamp.

— Guéchamp, une échelle.

— Mon commandant, nous n’en avons pas.

— Il faut en avoir une.

— Pour escalade?

— Non. Pour sauvetage.

Guéchamp réfléchit et répondit:

— Je comprends. Mais pour ce que vous voulez, il la faut très haute.

— D’au moins trois étages.

— Oui, mon commandant, c’est à peu près la hauteur.

Et il faut dépasser cette hauteur, car il faut être sûr de réussir.

— Sans doute.

— Comment se fait-il que vous n’ayez pas d’échelle?

— Mon commandant, vous n’avez pas jugé à propos d’assiéger la Tourgue par le plateau; vous vous êtes contenté de la bloquer de ce côté-là; vous avez voulu attaquer, non par le pont, mais par la tour. On ne s’est plus occupé que de la mine, et l’on a renoncé à l’escalade. C’est pourquoi nous n’avons pas d’échelles.

— Faites-en faire une sur-le-champ.

— Une échelle de trois étages ne s’improvise pas.

— Faites ajouter bout à bout plusieurs échelles courtes.

— Il faut en avoir.

— Trouvez-en.

— On n’en trouvera pas. Partout les paysans détruisent les échelles, de même qu’ils démontent les charrettes et qu’ils coupent les ponts.

— Ils veulent paralyser la république, c’est vrai.

— Ils veulent que nous ne puissions ni traîner un charroi, ni passer une rivière, ni escalader un mur.

— Il me faut une échelle, pourtant.

— J’y songe, mon commandant, il y a à Javené, près de Fougères, une grande charpenterie. On peut en avoir une là.

— Il n’y a pas une minute à perdre.

— Quand voulez-vous avoir l’échelle?

— Demain, à pareille heure, au plus tard.

— Je vais envoyer à Javené un exprès à franc-étrier. Il portera l’ordre de réquisition. Il y a à Javené un poste de cavalerie qui fournira l’escorte. L’échelle pourra être ici demain avant le coucher du soleil.

— C’est bien, cela suffira, dit Gauvain, faites vite. Allez.

Dix minutes après, Guéchamp revint et dit à Gauvain:

— Mon commandant, l’exprès est parti pour Javené.

Gauvain monta sur le plateau et demeura longtemps l’œil fixé sur le pont-châtelet qui était en travers du ravin. Le pignon du châtelet, sans autre baie que la basse entrée fermée par le pont-levis dressé, faisait face à l’escarpement du ravin. Pour arriver du plateau au pied des piles du pont, il fallait descendre le long de cet escarpement, ce qui n’était pas impossible, de broussaille en broussaille. Mais une fois dans le fossé, l’assaillant serait exposé à tous les projectiles pouvant pleuvoir des trois étages. Gauvain acheva de se convaincre qu’au point où le siège en était, la véritable attaque était par la brèche de la tour.

Il prit toutes ses mesures pour qu’aucune fuite ne fût possible; il compléta l’étroit blocus de la Tourgue; il resserra les mailles de ses bataillons de façon que rien ne pût passer au travers. Gauvain et Cimourdain se partagèrent l’investissement de la forteresse; Gauvain se réserva le côté de la forêt et donna à Cimourdain le côté du plateau. Il fut convenu que, tandis que Gauvain, secondé par Guéchamp, conduirait l’assaut par la sape, Cimourdain, toutes les mèches de la batterie haute allumées, observerait le pont et le ravin.

XIII. CE QUE FAIT LE MARQUIS

Pendant qu’au dehors tout s’apprêtait pour l’attaque, au dedans tout s’apprêtait pour la résistance.

Ce n’est pas sans une réelle analogie qu’une tour se nomme une douve, et l’on frappe quelquefois une tour d’un coup de mine comme une douve d’un coup de poinçon. La muraille se perce comme une bonde. C’est ce qui était arrivé à la Tourgue.

Le puissant coup de poinçon donné par deux ou trois quintaux de poudre avait troué de part en part le mur énorme. Ce trou partait du pied de la tour, traversait la muraille dans sa plus grande épaisseur et venait aboutir en arcade informe dans le rez-de-chaussée de la forteresse. Du dehors, les assiégeants, afin de rendre ce trou praticable à l’assaut, l’avaient élargi et façonné à coups de canon.

Le rez-de-chaussée où pénétrait cette brèche était une grande salle ronde toute nue, avec pilier central portant la clef de voûte. Cette salle, qui était la plus vaste de tout le donjon, n’avait pas moins de quarante pieds de diamètre. Chacun des étages de la tour se composait d’une chambre pareille, mais moins large, avec des logettes dans les embrasures des meurtrières. La salle du rez-de-chaussée n’avait pas de meurtrières, pas de soupiraux, pas de lucarnes; juste autant de jour et d’air qu’une tombe.

La porte des oubliettes, faite de plus de fer que de bois, était dans la salle du rez-de-chaussée. Une autre porte de cette salle ouvrait sur un escalier qui conduisait aux chambres supérieures. Tous les escaliers étaient pratiqués dans l’épaisseur du mur.

C’est dans cette salle basse que les assiégeants avaient chance d’arriver par la brèche qu’ils avaient faite. Cette salle prise, il leur restait la tour à prendre.

On n’avait jamais respiré dans cette salle basse. Nul n’y passait vingt-quatre heures sans être asphyxié. Maintenant, grâce à la brèche, on y pouvait vivre.

C’est pourquoi les assiégés ne fermèrent pas la brèche.

D’ailleurs, à quoi bon? Le canon l’eût rouverte.

Ils piquèrent dans le mur une torchère de fer, y plantèrent une torche, et cela éclaira le rez-de-chaussée.

Maintenant comment s’y défendre?

Murer le trou était facile, mais inutile. Une retirade valait mieux. Une retirade, c'est un retranchement à angle rentrant, sorte de barricade chevronnée qui permet de faire converger les feux sur les assaillants, et qui, en laissant à l'extérieur la brèche ouverte, la bouche à l'intérieur. Les matériaux ne leur manquaient pas; ils construisirent une retirade, avec fissures pour le passage des canons de fusil. L'angle de la retirade s'appuyait au pilier central; les deux ailes touchaient le mur des deux côtés. Cela fait, on disposa dans les bons endroits des fougasses.

Le marquis dirigeait tout. Inspirateur, ordonnateur, guide et maître, âme terrible. Lantenac était de cette race d'hommes de guerre du dix-huitième siècle qui, à quatre-vingts ans, sauvaient des villes. Il ressemblait à ce comte d'Alberg qui, presque centenaire, chassa de Riga le roi de Pologne.

— Courage, amis! disait le marquis, au commencement de ce siècle, en 1715, à Bender, Charles XII, enfermé dans une maison, a tenu tête, avec trois cents suédois, à vingt mille turcs.

On barricada les deux étages d'en bas, on fortifia les chambres, on crénela les alcôves, on contrebuta les portes avec des solives enfoncées à coups de maillet, qui faisaient comme des arcs-boutants; seulement on dut laisser libre l'escalier en spirale qui communiquait à tous les étages, car il fallait pouvoir y circuler; et l'entraver pour l'assiégeant, c'eût été l'entraver pour l'assiégé. La défense des places a toujours ainsi un côté faible.

Le marquis, infatigable, robuste comme un jeune homme, soulevant des poutres, portant des pierres, donnait l'exemple, mettait la main à la besogne, commandait, aidait, fraternisait, riait avec ce clan féroce, toujours le seigneur pourtant, haut, familier, élégant, farouche.

Il ne fallait pas lui répliquer. Il disait: Si une moitié de vous se révoltait, je la ferais fusiller par l'autre, et je défendrais la place avec le reste. Ces choses-là font qu'on adore un chef.

XIV. CE QUE FAIT L’IMANUS

Pendant que le marquis s’occupait de la brèche et de la tour, l’Imânus s’occupait du pont. Dès le commencement du siège, l’échelle de sauvetage suspendue transversalement en dehors et au-dessous des fenêtres du deuxième étage, avait été retirée par ordre du marquis, et placée par l’Imânus dans la salle de la bibliothèque. C’est peut-être à cette échelle-là que Gauvain voulait suppléer. Les fenêtres du premier étage entre-sol, dit salle des gardes, étaient défendues par une triple armature de barreaux de fer scellés dans la pierre, et l’on ne pouvait ni entrer ni sortir par là.

Il n’y avait point de barreaux aux fenêtres de la bibliothèque, mais elles étaient très hautes.

L’Imânus se fit accompagner de trois hommes, comme lui capables de tout et résolus à tout. Ces hommes étaient Hoisnard, dit Branche-d’Or, et les deux frères Pique-en-Bois. L’Imânus prit une lanterne sourde, ouvrit la porte de fer, et visita minutieusement les trois étages du châtelet du pont. Hoisnard Branche-d’Or était aussi implacable que l’Imânus, ayant eu un frère tué par les républicains.

L’Imânus examina l’étage d’en haut, regorgeant de foin et de paille, et l’étage d’en bas, dans lequel il fit apporter quelques pots à feu, qu’il ajouta aux tonnes de goudron; il fit mettre le tas de fascines de bruyères en contact avec les tonnes de goudron, et il s’assura du bon état de la mèche soufrée dont une extrémité était dans le pont et l’autre dans la tour. Il répandit sur le plancher, sous les tonnes et sous les fascines, une mare de goudron où il immergea le bout de la mèche soufrée; puis il fit placer dans la salle de la bibliothèque, entre le rez-de-chaussée où était le goudron et le grenier où était la paille, les trois berceaux où étaient René-Jean, Gros-Alain et Georgette, plongés dans un profond sommeil. On apporta les berceaux très doucement pour ne point réveiller les petits.

C’étaient de simples petites crèches de campagne, sorte de corbeilles d’osier très basses qu’on pose à terre, ce qui permet à l’enfant de sortir du berceau seul et sans aide. Près de chaque berceau, l’Imânus fit placer une écuelle de soupe avec une cuiller de bois. L’échelle de sauvetage décrochée de ses crampons avait été déposée sur le plancher, contre le mur; l’Imânus fit ranger les trois berceaux bout à bout le long de l’autre mur en regard de l’échelle. Puis, pensant que des courants d’air pouvaient être utiles, il ouvrit toutes grandes les six fenêtres de la bibliothèque. C’était une nuit d’été, bleue et tiède.

Il envoya les frères Pique-en-Bois ouvrir les fenêtres de l’étage inférieur et de l’étage supérieur. Il avait remarqué, sur la façade orientale de l’édifice, un grand vieux lierre desséché, couleur d’amadou, qui couvrait tout un côté du pont du haut en bas et encadrait les fenêtres des trois étages. Il pensa que ce lierre ne nuirait pas. L’Imânus jeta partout un dernier coup d’oeil; après quoi, ces quatre hommes sortirent du châtelet et rentrèrent dans le donjon. L’Imânus referma la lourde porte de fer à double tour, considéra attentivement la serrure énorme et terrible, et examina, avec un signe de tête satisfait, la mèche soufrée qui passait par le trou pratiqué par lui, et était désormais la seule communication entre la tour et le pont. Cette mèche partait de la chambre ronde, passait sous la porte de fer, entrait sous la voussure, descendait l’escalier du rez-de-chaussée du pont, serpentait sur les degrés en spirale, rampait sur le plancher du couloir entre-sol, et allait aboutir à la mare de goudron sous le tas de fascines sèches. L’Imânus avait calculé qu’il fallait environ un quart d’heure pour que cette mèche, allumée dans l’intérieur de la tour, mit le feu à la mare de goudron sous la bibliothèque. Tous ces arrangements pris, et toutes ces inspections faites, il rapporta la clef de la porte de fer au marquis de Lantenac, qui la mit dans sa poche.

Il importait de surveiller tous les mouvements des assiégeants. L’Imânus alla se poster en vedette, sa trompe de bouvier à la ceinture, dans la guérite de la plate-forme, au haut de la tour. Tout en observant, un oeil sur la forêt, un oeil sur le plateau, il avait près de lui, dans l’embrasure de la lucarne de la guérite, une poire à poudre, un sac de toile plein de balles de calibre, et de vieux journaux qu’il déchirait, et il faisait des cartouches.

Quand le soleil parut, il éclaira dans la forêt huit bataillons, le sabre au côté, la giberne au dos, la bayonnette au fusil, prêts à l’assaut; sur le plateau, une batterie de canons, avec caissons, gargousses et boîtes à mitraille; dans la forteresse, dix-neuf hommes chargeant des tromblons, des mousquets, des pistolets et des espingoles; et dans les trois berceaux trois enfants endormis.

LIVRE TROISIEME

LE MASSACRE DE SAINT-BARTHELEMY

i

Les enfants se réveillèrent.

Ce fut d’abord la petite.

Un réveil d’enfants, c’est une ouverture de fleurs; il semble qu’un parfum sorte de ces fraîches âmes.

Georgette, celle de vingt mois, la dernière née des trois, qui tétait encore en mai, souleva sa petite tête, se dressa sur son séant, regarda ses pieds, et se mit à jaser.

Un rayon du matin était sur son berceau; il eût été difficile de dire quel était le plus rose, du pied de Georgette ou de l’aurore.

Les deux autres dormaient encore; c’est plus lourd, les hommes; Georgette, gaie et calme, jasait.

René-Jean était brun, Gros-Alain était châtain, Georgette était blonde. Ces nuances des cheveux, d’accord dans l’enfance avec l’âge, peuvent changer plus tard. René-Jean avait l’air d’un petit Hercule; il dormait sur le ventre, avec ses deux poings dans ses yeux. Gros-Alain avait les deux jambes hors de son petit lit.

Tous trois étaient en haillons; les vêtements que leur avait donnés le bataillon du Bonnet-Rouge s’en étaient allés en loques; ce qu’ils avaient sur eux n’était même pas une chemise; les deux garçons étaient presque nus, Georgette était affublée d’une guenille qui avait été une jupe et qui n’était plus guère qu’une brassière. Qui avait soin de ces enfants? On n’eût pu le dire. Pas de mère. Ces sauvages paysans combattants, qui les traînaient avec eux de forêt en forêt, leur donnaient leur part de soupe. Voilà tout. Les petits s’en tiraient comme ils pouvaient. Ils avaient tout le monde pour maître et personne pour père. Mais les haillons des enfants, c’est plein de lumière. Ils étaient charmants.

Georgette jasait.

Ce qu’un oiseau chante, un enfant le jase. C’est le même hymne. Hymne indistinct, balbutié, profond. L’enfant a de plus que l’oiseau la sombre destinée humaine devant lui. De là la tristesse des hommes qui écoutent, mêlée à la joie du petit qui chante. Le cantique le plus sublime qu’on puisse entendre sur la terre, c’est le bégaiement de l’âme humaine sur les lèvres de l’enfance. Ce chuchotement confus d’une pensée qui n’est encore qu’un instinct contient on ne sait quel appel inconscient à la justice éternelle; peut-être est-ce une protestation sur le seuil avant d’entrer; protestation humble et poignante; cette ignorance souriant à l’infini compromet toute la création dans le sort qui sera fait à l’être faible et désarmé. Le malheur, s’il arrive, sera un abus de confiance.

Le murmure de l’enfant, c’est plus et moins que la parole; ce ne sont pas des notes, et c’est un chant; ce ne sont pas des syllabes, et c’est un langage; ce murmure a eu son commencement dans le ciel et n’aura pas sa fin sur la terre; il est d’avant la naissance, et il continue; c’est une suite. Ce bégaiement se compose de ce que l’enfant disait quand il était ange et de ce qu’il dira quand il sera homme; le berceau a un Hier de même que la tombe a un Demain; ce demain et cet hier amalgament dans ce gazouillement obscur leur double inconnu; et rien ne prouve Dieu, l’éternité, la responsabilité, la dualité du destin, comme cette ombre formidable dans cette âme rose.

Ce que balbutiait Georgette ne l’attristait pas, car tout son doux visage était un sourire. Sa bouche souriait, ses yeux souriaient, les fossettes de ses joues souriaient. Il se dégageait de ce sourire une mystérieuse acceptation du matin. L’âme a foi dans le rayon. Le ciel était bleu, il faisait chaud, il faisait beau. La frêle créature, sans rien savoir, sans rien connaître, sans rien comprendre, mollement noyée dans la rêverie qui ne pense pas, se sentait en sûreté dans cette nature, dans ces arbres honnêtes, dans cette verdure sincère, dans cette campagne pure et paisible, dans ces bruits de nids, de sources, de mouches, de feuilles, au-dessus desquels resplendissait l’immense innocence du soleil.

Après Georgette, René-Jean, l’aîné, le grand, qui avait quatre ans passés, se réveilla. Il se leva debout, enjamba virilement son berceau, aperçut son écuelle, trouva cela tout simple, s’assit par terre et commença à manger sa soupe.

La jaserie de Georgette n’avait pas éveillé Gros-Alain, mais au bruit de la cuiller dans l’écuelle, il se retourna en sursaut, et ouvrit les yeux. Gros-Alain était celui de trois ans. Il vit son écuelle, il n’avait que le bras à étendre, il la prit, et, sans sortir de son lit, son écuelle sur ses genoux, sa cuiller au poing, il fit comme René-Jean, il se mit à manger.

Georgette ne les entendait pas, et les ondulations de sa voix semblaient moduler le bercement d'un rêve. Ses yeux grands ouverts regardaient en haut, et étaient divins; quel que soit le plafond ou la voûte qu'un enfant a au-dessus de sa tête, ce qui se reflète dans ses yeux, c'est le ciel.

Quand René-Jean eut fini, il gratta avec la cuiller le fond de l'écuelle, soupira, et dit avec dignité: — J'ai mangé ma soupe.

Ceci tira Georgette de sa rêverie.

— Poupoupe, dit-elle.

Et voyant que René-Jean avait mangé et que Gros-Alain mangeait, elle prit l'écuelle de soupe qui était à côté d'elle, et mangea, non sans porter sa cuiller beaucoup plus souvent à son oreille qu'à sa bouche.

De temps en temps elle renonçait à la civilisation et mangeait avec ses doigts.

Gros-Alain, après avoir, comme son frère, gratté le fond de l'écuelle, était allé le rejoindre et courait derrière lui.

ii.

Tout à coup on entendit au dehors, en bas, du côté de la forêt, un bruit de clairon, sorte de fanfare hautaine et sévère. A ce bruit de clairon répondit du haut de la tour un son de trompe.

Cette fois, c'était le clairon qui appelait et la trompe qui donnait la réplique.

Il y eut un deuxième coup de clairon que suivit un deuxième son de trompe.

Puis, de la lisière de la forêt, s'éleva une voix lointaine, mais précise, qui cria distinctement ceci:

— Brigands! sommation. Si vous n'êtes pas rendus à discrétion au coucher du soleil, nous attaquons.

Une voix, qui ressemblait à un grondement, répondit de la plate-forme de la tour:

— Attaquez.

La voix d'en bas reprit:

— Un coup de canon sera tiré, comme dernier avertissement, une demi-heure avant l'assaut.

Et la voix d'en haut répéta:

— Attaquez.

Ces voix n'arrivaient pas jusqu'aux enfants, mais le clairon et la trompe portaient plus haut et plus loin, et Georgette, au premier coup de clairon, dressa le cou, et cessa de manger; au son de trompe, elle posa sa cuiller dans son écuelle; au deuxième coup de clairon, elle leva le petit index de sa main droite, et l'abaissant et le relevant tour à tour, marqua les cadences de la fanfare, que vint prolonger le deuxième son de trompe; quand la trompe et le clairon se turent, elle demeura pensive le doigt en l'air, et murmura à demi-voix: — Misique.

Nous pensons qu'elle voulait dire «musique».

Les deux aînés, René-Jean et Gros-Alain, n'avaient pas fait attention à la trompe et au clairon; ils étaient absorbés par autre chose; un cloporte était en train de traverser la bibliothèque.

Gros-Alain l'aperçut et cria:

— Une bête.

René-Jean accourut.

Gros-Alain reprit:

— Ça pique.

— Ne lui fais pas de mal, dit René-Jean.

Et tous deux se mirent à regarder ce passant.

Cependant Georgette avait fini sa soupe; elle chercha des yeux ses frères. René-Jean et Gros-Alain étaient dans l'embrasure d'une fenêtre, accroupis et graves au-dessus du cloporte; ils se touchaient du front et mêlaient leurs cheveux; ils retenaient leur respiration, émerveillés, et considéraient la bête, qui s'était arrêtée et ne bougeait plus, peu contente de tant d'admiration.

Georgette, voyant ses frères en contemplation, voulut savoir ce que c'était. Il n'était pas aisé d'arriver jusqu'à eux, elle l'entreprit pourtant; le trajet était hérissé de difficultés; il y avait des choses par terre, des tabourets renversés, des tas de paperasses, des caisses d'emballage déclouées et vides, des bahuts, des monceaux quelconques autour desquels il fallait cheminer, tout un archipel d'écueils; Georgette s'y hasarda. Elle commença par sortir de son berceau, premier travail; puis elle s'engagea dans les récifs, serpenta dans les détroits, poussa un tabouret, rampa entre deux coffres, passa par-dessus une liasse de papiers, grimpant d'un côté, roulant de l'autre, montrant avec douceur sa pauvre petite nudité, et parvint ainsi à ce qu'un marin appellerait la mer libre, c'est-à-dire à un assez large espace de plancher qui n'était plus obstrué et où il n'y avait plus de périls; alors elle s'élança, traversa cet espace qui était tout le diamètre de la salle, à quatre pattes, avec une vitesse de chat, et arriva près de la fenêtre; là il y avait un obstacle redoutable; la grande échelle gisante le long du mur venait aboutir à cette fenêtre, et l’extrémité de l’échelle dépassait un peu le coin de l’embrasure; cela faisait entre Georgette et ses frères une sorte de cap à franchir; elle s’arrêta et médita; son monologue intérieur terminé, elle prit son parti; elle empoigna résolument de ses doigts roses un des échelons, lesquels étaient verticaux et non horizontaux, l’échelle étant couchée sur un de ses montants; elle essaya de se lever sur ses pieds et retomba; elle recommença deux fois, elle échoua; à la troisième fois, elle réussit; alors, droite et debout, s’appuyant successivement à chacun des échelons, elle se mit à marcher le long de l’échelle; arrivée à l’extrémité, le point d’appui lui manquait, elle trébucha, mais saisissant de ses petites mains le bout du montant qui était énorme, elle se redressa, doubla le promontoire, regarda René-Jean et Gros-Alain, et rit.

iii.

En ce moment-là, René-Jean, satisfait du résultat de ses observations sur le cloporte, relevait la tête et disait:

— C’est une femelle.

Le rire de Georgette fit rire René-Jean, et le rire de René-Jean fit rire Gros-Alain. Georgette opéra sa jonction avec ses frères, et cela fit un petit cénacle assis par terre.

Mais le cloporte avait disparu.

Il avait profité du rire de Georgette pour se fourrer dans un trou du plancher.

D’autres événements suivirent le cloporte.

D’abord des hirondelles passèrent.

Leurs nids étaient probablement sous le rebord du toit. Elles vinrent voler tout près de la fenêtre, un peu inquiètes des enfants, décrivant de grands cercles dans l’air, et poussant leur doux cri du printemps. Cela fit lever les yeux aux trois enfants et le cloporte fut oublié.

Georgette braqua son doigt sur les hirondelles et cria: — Cocos!

René-Jean la réprimanda.

— Mamoiselle, on ne dit pas des cocos, on dit des oseaux.

— Zozo, dit Georgette.

Et tous les trois regardèrent les hirondelles.

Puis une abeille entra.

Rien ne ressemble à une âme comme une abeille. Elle va de fleur en fleur comme une âme d’étoile en étoile, et elle rapporte le miel comme l’âme rapporte la lumière.

Celle-ci fit grand bruit en entrant, elle bourdonnait à voix haute, et elle avait l’air de dire: J’arrive, je viens de voir les roses, maintenant je viens voir les enfants. Qu’est-ce qui se passe ici?

Une abeille, c’est une ménagère, et cela gronde en chantant.

Tant que l’abeille fut là, les trois petits ne la quittèrent pas des yeux.

L’abeille explora toute la bibliothèque, fureta les recoins, voleta ayant l’air d’être chez elle et dans une ruche, et rôda, ailée et mélodieuse, d’armoire en armoire, regardant à travers les vitres les titres des livres, comme si elle eût été un esprit.

Sa visite faite, elle partit.

— Elle va dans sa maison, dit René-Jean.

— C’est une bête, dit Gros-Alain.

— Non, repartit René-Jean, c’est une mouche.

— Muche, dit Georgette.

Là-dessus, Gros-Alain, qui venait de trouver à terre une ficelle à l’extrémité de laquelle il y avait un noeud, prit entre son pouce et son index le bout opposé au noeud, fit de la ficelle une sorte de moulinet, et la regarda tourner avec une attention profonde.

De son côté, Georgette, redevenue quadrupède et ayant repris son va-et-vient capricieux sur le plancher, avait découvert un vénérable fauteuil de tapisserie mangé des vers dont le crin sortait par plusieurs trous. Elle s’était arrêtée à ce fauteuil. Elle élargissait les trous et tirait le crin avec recueillement.

Brusquement, elle leva un doigt, ce qui voulait dire: Écoutez.

Les deux frères tournèrent la tête.

Un fracas vague et lointain s’entendait au dehors; c’était probablement le camp d’attaque qui exécutait quelque mouvement stratégique dans la forêt; des chevaux hennissaient, des tambours battaient, des caissons roulaient, des chaînes s’entre-heurtaient, des sonneries militaires s’appelaient et se répondaient, confusion de bruits farouches qui en se mêlant devenaient une sorte d’harmonie; les enfants écoutaient, charmés.

— C’est le mondieu qui fait ça, dit René-Jean.

iv.

Le bruit cessa.

René-Jean était demeuré rêveur.

Comment les idées se décomposent-elles et se recomposent-elles dans ces petits cerveaux-là? Quel est le remuement mystérieux de ces mémoires si troubles et si courtes encore? Il se fit dans cette douce tête pensive un mélange du mondieu, de la prière, des mains jointes, d'on ne sait quel tendre sourire qu'on avait sur soi autrefois, et qu'on n'avait plus, et René-Jean chuchota à demi-voix: Maman.

— Maman, dit Gros-Alain.

— Mman, dit Georgette.

Et puis René-Jean se mit à sauter.

Ce que voyant, Gros-Alain sauta.

Gros-Alain reproduisait tous les mouvements et tous les gestes de René-Jean; Georgette moins. Trois ans, cela copie quatre ans; mais vingt mois, cela garde son indépendance. Georgette resta assise, disant de temps en temps un mot. Georgette ne faisait pas de phrases. C'était une penseuse; elle parlait par apophtegmes. Elle était monosyllabique.

Au bout de quelque temps néanmoins, l'exemple la gagna, et elle finit par tâcher de faire comme ses frères, et ces trois petites paires de pieds nus se mirent à danser, à courir et à chanceler, dans la poussière du vieux parquet de chêne poli, sous le grave regard des bustes de marbre auxquels Georgette jetait de temps en temps de côté un oeil inquiet, en Murmurant: — Les momommes!

Dans le langage de Georgette, un «momomme», c'était tout ce qui ressemblait à un homme et pourtant n'en était pas un. Les êtres n'apparaissent à l'enfant que mêlés aux fantômes.

Georgette, marchant moins qu'elle n'oscillait, suivait ses frères, mais plus volontiers à quatre pattes.

Subitement, René-Jean, s'étant approché d'une croisée, leva la tête, puis la baissa, et alla se réfugier derrière le coin du mur de l'embrasure de la fenêtre. Il venait d'apercevoir quelqu'un qui le regardait. C'était un soldat bleu du campement du plateau qui, profitant de la trêve et l'enfreignant peut-être un peu, s'était hasardé jusqu'à venir au bord de l'escarpement du ravin d'où l'on découvrait l'intérieur de la bibliothèque. Voyant René-Jean se réfugier, Gros-Alain se réfugia; il se blottit à côté de René-Jean, et Georgette vint se cacher derrière eux. Ils demeurèrent là en silence, immobiles, et Georgette mit son doigt sur ses lèvres. Au bout de quelques instants, René-Jean se risqua à avancer la tête; le soldat y était encore. René-Jean rentra sa tête vivement; et les trois petits n'osèrent plus souffler. Cela dura assez longtemps. Enfin cette peur ennuya Georgette, elle eut de l'audace, elle regarda. Le soldat s'en était allé. Ils se remirent à courir et à jouer.

Gros-Alain, bien qu'imitateur et admirateur de René-Jean, avait une spécialité, les trouvailles. Son frère et sa soeur le virent tout à coup caracoler éperdument en tirant après lui un petit chariot à quatre roues qu'il avait déterré je ne sais où.

Cette voiture à poupée était là depuis des années dans la poussière, oubliée, faisant bon voisinage avec les livres des génies et les bustes des sages. C'était peut-être un des hochets avec lesquels avait joué Gauvain enfant.

Gros-Alain avait fait de sa ficelle un fouet qu'il faisait claquer; il était très fier. Tels sont les inventeurs. Quand on ne découvre pas l'Amérique, on découvre une petite charrette. C'est toujours cela.

Mais il fallut partager. René-Jean voulut s'atteler à la voiture et Georgette voulut monter dedans.

Elle essaya de s'y asseoir. René-Jean fut le cheval. Gros-Alain fut le cocher.

Mais le cocher ne savait pas son métier, le cheval le lui apprit.

René-Jean cria à Gros-Alain:

— Dis: Hu!

— Hu! répéta Gros-Alain.

La voiture versa. Georgette roula. Cela crie, les anges, Georgette cria.

Puis elle eut une vague envie de pleurer.

— Mamoiselle, dit René-Jean, vous êtes trop grande.

— J'ai grande, dit Georgette.

Et sa grandeur la consola de sa chute.
